Table of Contents

1. Merely Players
2. Stranded
3. Not One Will Be Lost
4. Eavesdropping
5. One's Own Destiny
6. Believe In Me
7. Teaching and Learning
8. Easier Alone
9. Never Again
10. An Unbreakable Promise
11. Warmth
12. White Masks
13. Making Your Own Bravery
14. Claw Your Way Out
15. All Your Grief And Rage
16. The Warmer One's Love
17. Risk and Reward
18. Adrift From Your Moor
19. In The Tiger's Den
20. Refusal To Submit
21. Signs of Change
22. Ice Cold
23. Ache No More (And No Less)
24. Grito de Corea
25. Same Old Game
26. A Creeping Chill
27. Butterfly Lovers
28. Not Again
29. The Unfaithful and The Upright
30. Growing Past You
31. Bad Cop
32. Protectors' Onus
33. Cast Your Own Rope
34. Once A Soldier

35. Soldier On
36. Butterflies Take Wing
37. Betray Me Like A Man
38. Empty Stomachs, Full Hearts
39. Hunger
40. Bloody Muzzle
41. Bleeding Hearts
42. And A Happy New Year
43. Hunger Is A Dog
44. Little White Lies
45. Long-Cherished Desire
46. Her Shackles Are Different Than My Own
47. Ruminating On Corruption
48. Rising Fever
49. Last Little Sister
50. Hard Call
51. The Coming Tide
52. Placing The Blame
53. Pestilence And Plague
54. Broken Wings
55. Someone Like You
56. Philosophy Of A Scalpel
57. March First
58. Sick Over You
59. Slipping Up
60. A Change You Can't Stop
61. Entrepreneurial Spirit
62. Shared Blood
63. Saving Face
64. Losing Heart
65. Mistake
66. A Cruel Echo
67. Everything Is Up To You
68. Sons Of Sons
69. The Price We Pay
70. No Choice
71. Backstage Helper
72. At Your Fingertips
73. Parallel Steps
74. Born To Leave

75. Betting On Jade
76. Down In Your Bones (You Know)
77. Shattering Delusions
78. Fetters Of Conscience
79. History Marches On
80. Homecoming
81. Hold It Close
82. Unscreened
83. A Woman Is A Gardener
84. A Spirit We'll Pass Down
85. For Your Sake
86. The Wrong Brother
87. Chronic Masquerading As Acute
88. So You May Be Healed
89. Always Another Day
90. Nescitur Ignescitur
91. Sleep of Death
92. As Long As I Can Feel It
93. Lights Out
94. On Parliament Hill
95. Saving Grace
96. Me and You
97. I Looked, But I Didn't See
98. Chosen
99. Going-Away Present
100. Assurances, Believed And Not
101. Fraying
102. Puppet On A String
103. An Interlude: Fool's Game
104. Once A Fool
105. Theirs Alone
106. Straining
107. Sealed With Solidarity
108. Seven Years Separated
109. Family Ties
110. Sarang, Sarang
111. Learning Experience
112. An Interlude: Two Halves, One Whole
113. Pear Blossom
114. Singed Petals

115. A Divide That Doesn't Ache
116. Meant To Be
117. Holding Back The Flood
118. What Will Be
119. Not Enough
120. The Old Silence
121. Starving For It
122. In The Embrace
123. Like Poetry
124. Skinship
125. Why
126. To Be Human
127. Celestial Burdening
128. Take Your Silver Spoon
129. Dog Eat Dog
130. I Want To Believe
131. Something Wicked
132. Feast and Famine

Merely Players

HALT!! THIS IS THE SECOND BOOK IN A SERIES. Well not really. It's part 2 of the only book. Did you know Wattpad only allows 200 chapters? Stifling my creativity. IF YOU READ THIS YOU WON'T HAVE ANY IDEA WHAT'S HAPPENING. IF YOU FOUND THIS ALL OF A SUDDEN PLEASE GO TO MY PROFILE AND READ PART 1. Thank you for your attention. Everyone else- hiiiiii. Welcome baaaaack. Make sure you read chapter 200 Reaching Out first.

China's heart thundered in his chest as he saw who exactly America had brought as his star witness.

She lingered in the doorway, her eyes wide as they flicked around the cavernous room, before settling on him. China kept his mask on, staring at her without recognition, even as her face fell, like up until the last moment, she had been hoping he wouldn't really be here.

And as the American aide prodded her forward, Song Kum-jeong, O-geun's mother, stepped into the Great Hall.

Relief flooded through him with the force of the Chang Jiang River at the same time as sorrow welled, mingling in his body to create a sickening feeling.

His Liaoxi was safe, safer than if she had been taken by America, anyway.

And Song Kum-jeong was not.

He didn't let his eyes linger on her for too long, nothing more than an observation, wondering what new stone America was about to toss at him that he would have to deflect.

The Korean woman stood at the back of the room, her eyes on the blood-red carpeting as America gave the audience time to appraise the new character.

She was dressed in Western-style clothes- a long, dark blue skirt and blouse. To make her more 'civilized' for the audience? Or because her other clothes had been dirty? Had she come from a POW camp? Her thinness said she could have. How had she ended up there? Why hadn't they been able to find her when they looked?

China's teeth almost clenched, despising his lack of information. But he kept his jaw loose.

"Is she Korean?" he asked America idly.

"You know she is," he replied, that triumphant white grin still marring his striped face.

"En," China said easily. "Unlike most of you, I can tell the citizens of fellow Asian nations apart. I just find it interesting that you brought a Korean witness without having a Korean representative at this discussion."

Not even a southern one. Rhee's government had become slightly unpalatable to the rest of the 'free world.'

"This assembly is only for members of the United Nations," the UN said, his wings ruffling uneasily as he recovered from his surprise at the new obstacle to him going home.

"Of course," China said. "Like always."

Song Kum-jeong was trying desperately to make eye contact with him. China refused.

Her expression was distraught, filled with guilt and a desperate plea. She wasn't doing this out of hatred or for money, even if that would have helped him. China knew why she was doing it.

That would make this easier.

And so much harder.

Song Kum-jeong's guards led her forward. They had almost reached the pews.

He couldn't let her tell her story. Even if she had no physical evidence, she was still looking at him in that way, with that desperate recognition. At least some of the representatives had to have seen it.

Now.

"Just like you didn't invite the DPRK to his own trial," China said, loud enough for the rest of the room to hear. Not fast, not like he was trying to buy time. Just casually. "Only the representative of the government that you support."

"The rightful government of Korea," America interjected.

"Is it you that decides that?" China asked curiously. "Or the United Nations, perhaps? I thought it was the people of the country, but I suppose that can't be true. Otherwise you wouldn't have the loser of a civil war who doesn't even have a proper Countryhuman sitting in Mr. Wu's seat."

He spoke over Tingfu. "If that were the case, I also would have been invited to the vote to label me as an aggressor, and my representative wouldn't have had such a difficult time getting in."

Song Kum-jeong had been stopped below the lip of the balcony as her guards shifted uncertainly. Her escort was under stage directions, as predicted.

"And the Palestinian Statehumans would be allowed to attend any conversations about how their people were forced out of their homes by a certain newly-formed 'country.'"

He didn't glance at the Israeli representative. He didn't want the audience looking at the man. They had to look at him.

"It's interesting," China said, lounging in his chair. "Your little resolution about 'uniting for peace' was supposed to be about securing peace in the world through collective measures. But it seems the only countries allowed to unite are the ones that want war."

"Hey pal, you're the one that joined a war that had nothing to do with him," America said with impatience, irritated that his dramatic timing had been interrupted.

"And what does Korea have to do with you?" China asked, still smiling. "The trusteeship is over. The south no longer belongs to you."

"And if I didn't step in to save them, it would belong to CCCP. Or you."

There was something dark under America's tone. The eyes of the audience were on them, watching their duet.

The United Nations attendant stood, walking to the balcony doors, glass of water in hand.

"If I recall correctly, it's been CCCP and I that have been calling for a withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea for months," he said, still sitting, heart beating purposefully slow. "Including mine. You might remember my Mr. Wu campaigning for that the first time you tried to label me an aggressor."

"Yeah, you'd love that, wouldn't you?" America snorted. "I'm sure we all know what would've happened if the United Nations hadn't stepped in."

He looked back at the crowd, making sure he had their attention. China tensed internally, but the foreigner didn't spare a glance for the man in the black suit as he slid from the room.

"North Korea and his drones would have swept straight to Busan," he announced as he turned back to China, voice echoing around the hall. "He and his Communists would have conquered South Korea and turned it into another Soviet puppet state."

'Move faster,' China projected, even has his heart grew heavier with every unseen step the attendant took towards Song Kum-jeong.

"I think I forgot the part of the United Nations Charter that says you're allowed to interfere in the outcome of a civil war when you don't like it," he said out loud, smiling up at the American as he came closer. "I'm fact, I think I remember something that says the direct opposite."

"And how would we have been able to sleep at night if we didn't step in?" America demanded. "How would any of the good folks here have rested easily knowing that we just stood back and let Communism ravage Korea, that we let men and women lose their rights, their liberties, just so we could say we 'followed the law?'"

If China wanted to counter him, he could have asked how he could do the same thing. How he could sit back and watch as his neighbour was invaded by foreign powers once more, as they bombed his cities, razed his villages, as the river that joined them filled with the blood of a hundred thousand innocents.

He didn't. He stayed quiet, letting the country monologue as the attendant crept quietly in one of the side doors, heading along the wall for the back of the room. Winning the battle didn't matter.

All that mattered was winning the war.

"We came to Korea because we knew it was the right thing to do," America's voice was rising in tempo, more fervent, and still passionless. "Because we knew that someone has to stand up for the little guy in this world, for peace and democracy-"

Hidden from the cameras and translators above and the audience in front, only seen by the eyes of the Chinese delegation, the attendant reached Song Kum-jeong. Behind the safety of her escorts' backs, he held something out to her, not the glass of water. She looked down and her face paled as she understood what it meant, the colour draining from it as she jerked her head up, her eyes wide as moons, looking to China, begging him to tell her it was a lie.

For the first time, he met her gaze.

And he let his smile fall.

Her beautiful face went blank, the light leaving her eyes.

"-and justice!" America was spitting, unaware of what was happening behind his back. "That's why each and every person is here today. Because they know as well as I do that the only way the world will ever have peace is if countries like you-"

Song Kum-jeong started to scream, a loud piercing cry that came from her heart as it bled out.

The entire room had flinched. China did, too, letting his mask slip on purpose. Representatives jumped up, the guards spun, looking for some threat. But there was only the Korean woman, her head tipped back as the howl of grief poured from her throat.

The attendant had already put distance between them.

"What's wrong with her?!" the UN cried, wings flaring.

One of the men reached for her, and she turned, fleeing for the exit, her footsteps staggered. She fell to her knees with a sob, but threw herself forward again, slamming through the double doors and out of the room.

There was a moment of stunned silence. It was good that no one immediately followed her, China told himself. It gave her time.

America recovered first. "What are you waiting for?!" he barked at the escorts. "After her!"

They burst into action, pursuing the woman like hunting hounds.

China watched, eyes wide. They widened further as America turned to him and furiously demanded, "What did you do?"

"Me?" China asked, shocked enough to let his voice become a bit louder. "I was sitting right here!"

"I saw you look at her," America accused, his aviators flashing.

"Because I noticed she looked pale," China retorted. "Do you think I have some sort of psychic powers?"

"She did look rather sickly," Su Xianghua fretted from behind him. "I was watching her the whole time. She was swaying on her feet. Is she going to be okay?"

"I'm sure she will be, Miss Su," he said, 'not able to disguise' the fretting note in his own words.

"You-"

"Mr. America." The UN marched up to them, noticeably not actually placing himself between them as the American advanced. "The eyes of every person in this room were on you and Mr. PRC. I will admit that your witness' sudden breakdown is suspicious, but it's evident that he wasn't directly responsible for it."

"Perhaps she was ill," Yakov Malik spoke up. "I have heard the conditions in the United Nations camps are poor. Is that where you got her from?"

"None of your business, 'comrade,'" America said cheerily. But there was frost under it. China could see his fingers twitching, wanting to curl into fists.

"Once she is retrieved and calmed, we can ask," the UN cut in. "In the meantime, I'm sure America has already heard her account, if he would like to repeat it."

"I'd hate to put words in her mouth," America said, casual again as he leaned on the podium. "I can wait for her to mosey on back."

"Didn't you say you wanted to get this done with today?" the Swedish representative asked. "Tell us now, and she can corroborate you when she returns."

America quirked a brow. "And what are you in a rush for, friend? You don't even have to be here."

"Matters pertaining to world peace should be dealt with expediently," the Swede replied, crossing his arms.

America looked like he might argue, then shrugged. "Fine, sure, if you like the sound of my voice that much."

The Countryhuman casually recounted what Song Kum-jeong had told him, but China could tell he had scored a blow. The words weren't as convincing as they would have been coming from a nervous woman filled with fear for her son and shame at her betrayal.

And who had looked at him with so much hope.

Luckily she hadn't passed on any exact quotes that China had said, only the bare bones of their encounters (though he noticed America left out the parts about him giving her rations).

He wondered if she had done it on purpose, trying not to betray him entirely, only enough to gain her freedom.

Just after America finished, one of the men that had went after Song Kum-jeong slunk back in, whispering something into the UN's 'ear.'

But China heard. He had expected it.

His heart still ached.

"Well, where is she?" America asked in a more chipper voice.

The UN cleared his throat anxiously. "Mrs. Song Kum-jeong will not be rejoining us."

America's jaw tensed slightly. "Why not?"

The UN hustled him around the side of the choir loft, and they engaged in a fierce, whispered discussion that only China was privy to. He kept his mask firmly in place.

America came back out, grinning broadly as he clapped his hands together. "Bad news, folks!" he called, with no sign of dismay for the general audience to see. "The flight didn't agree with Mrs. Song. She's feeling a bit peaked, so I'm letting her back out. You'll have to stick with my reporting skills."

China was sure he was irked that he hadn't held his tongue for news of the woman. With her not around, he could have made up all sorts of nasty lies, knowing she could never confirm or deny.

If China were him, he would have said he'd violated her in exchange for military rations or protection, and that her sudden outburst had been from the trauma of being in the same room as her assaulter again. The impact a woman's tears had was always effective against upstanding people. Or at least those that pretended to be upstanding.

That was why China had a list of women (and some men) who knew that the answer to 'Did this man assault you?' was always 'Yes.' Though thanks to he and Wu Xinquan's work with the traitors, he hadn't had to resort to that today.

"I think your reporting skills are quite good," China politely praised America, shoving all feelings about what he had just done behind his mask. The war wasn't over yet. "Though I have to wonder- even without a monetary incentive, isn't it all still just hearsay?"

"Then what do you call these?" America pulled something out of his suitcase, holding them up like fish.

China raised a brow. "...'Lián zhǐ shǒutào?' I believe you call them 'mittens.'"

He won a cough from the Indian representative.

America was undeterred. "Mittens from your army. Mittens that you gave to her son."

'Don't you dare mention him.'

Fortifying his mask for the possibility that he might have to hear O-geun's name from the mouth of the country that had killed him, China said, "I'm certain I wouldn't wear anything like... that. No offense," he tossed over his shoulder to Wu Xinquan.

"Those are standard issue mittens for the People's Volunteer Army," his comrade said. "Our soldiers were underequipped when we first entered Korea, but by January and February- which is when you claim Mrs. Song met my Countryhuman- quite literally any soldier could have given them to her."

China could hear the Colombian representative lean towards the Ecuadorian one and whisper, "Underequipped when they first got there? They routed the Yanquis."

That must make him nervous. His own troops had only just deployed to the battlefront.

"Unless they have my name embroidered on them," China pointed out. "Do they?"

"No," America admitted. "But explain how else a random Korean woman would have got her hands on Chinese army mitts."

China let Wu Xinquan say, "Our army lives under the principle of serving the people. And if we're fighting for Korea, that includes Koreans. It's common for our soldiers to trade non-essential items with civilians in exchange for food or clothing repairs. That might be hard for you to comprehend."

"No one just gives away their mittens in January," America retorted. "Especially not in the winter we just had in Korea. Not unless he's high-ranking enough to get a new pair without having to dig latrines for giving away the old."

"You might not," China agreed.

"But you would."

China quirked a brow at him. "Unfortunately, you have no proof of that. Unless you want to bring Mrs. Song back in. Maybe she can provide some evidence you forgot."

America's jaw feathered slightly. "I won't drag some poor woman in to testify when she's half-dead on her feet. I'm not a monster."

China's jaw didn't feather. "In that case, I'm afraid your story lacks proof. Unlike ours."

He smiled, smug, reaching down for the ground. Then he froze.

"Comrade China?" Wu Xinquan murmured.

"I, ah." China chuckled nervously. "I forgot the bag."

Wu Xinquan closed his eyes. Su Xianghua put a hand over her mouth. Li Yanmiao gaped. The rest of his entourage all held varying expressions of dismay, his translator even momentarily forgetting to translate.

"I appear to have misspoke," China said to America with an air of embarrassment. "So I suppose neither of us have-"

"Mr. China!"

The room turned to see his cameraman hustling in from the side door, having come down from the balcony.

"Is this your bag?" he panted, holding out the black leather bag. "I went to put on a new lens, but this isn't mine. I think I took yours by accident on the plane."

China lit up. "That's it! Aiya, thank you so much, Mr. Wang. You've saved us!"

The man blushed and stuttered, handing over the bag to Wu Xinquan.

"Did you supply the film projector we asked ahead for?" his comrade asked the UN.

"I was unfortunately unable to procure one," the organization said, not looking at America a little too determinedly.

"No matter," China said breezily, opening the bag. "I brought my own, just in case."

The audience watched in bemusement as China's entourage set the projector up on the podium, while Wu held up an envelope.

"What I have here are official photos taken by both photographers employed by the state and private citizens," he announced.

He tried to hand them to the UN, but America intercepted, dumping the photos into his hand and flipping quickly through them before tossing them to the podium.

"And we're supposed to trust these?" he demanded. "Just because you write a couple dates on them, doesn't mean they aren't staged."

"If you look closely, you can see several were taken on national holidays or celebrations," Wu Xinquan said as the UN edged by to examine them. "Commemorating the liberation of Pyongyang, the parade for the liberation of Seoul, the New Year, the Spring Festival, and the Founding of our Communist Party just this July."

There were a dozen black-and-white photos of China greeting soldiers returned from Korea, looking elegant compared to them; with his Premier at meetings; standing on the steps above Tiananmen Square; posing with his Chairman.

"They don't show much," America combatted. "You could've easily staged these to look like they were taken then, or edited them. Photo-editing exists."

"I'm sure you would know about that," China said lightly.

"And what's that supposed to mean, Red?"

"Because you're such a wealthy and developed nation, of course." China smiled. "What do you think it meant?"

"These are fake," America announced, straightening up.

"They could very well be," the UN admitted, somewhat reluctantly. "I'm afraid-"

"Projector's working," China's secretary cut in, sliding a reel into it.

On the wall of the pit, a video flickered to life. Black and white and grainy, with no sound. It showed Tiananmen Square filled with people- women in short cheongsam, men in zhongshan, children in shirts that glowed white on film with ascots around their necks. All waving red flags and holding banners patterned with slogans in Mandarin- 'WORKERS OF THE WORLD UNITE,' 'LONG LIVE THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA,' 'CELEBRATE MAY DAY,' which China bade the UN's translator to recite for the room.

And there was China, standing on the steps with his Chairman and Premier, a little girl in the uniform of the Young Pioneers holding a bouquet of flowers out to him, which he accepted with a smile and soundless comment that made her beam.

"If you still believe we could stage something of this magnitude, then do," Wu Xinquan said as the audience watched the reel play on. "But there were multiple foreign photographers and journalists there that can attest this footage is real."

America stared at it, his face blank before his smile returned as he faced the Chinese man. "And what's this supposed to prove? Okay, he was safe and sound at home on May 1st. Mrs. Song said she saw him in late January and early February."

Wu Xinquan frowned, and China sighed. "I suppose he's right. Do we have anything specific for those dates?"

"Only the Spring Festival photographs," Wu muttered grimly. "And they won't accept those."

China's blood beat in his veins as he looked to the UN. "Well, then I suppose we're out of evidence for our side. Does Mr. America have anything else to bring up?"

"Nope," he said with real cheer this time. "I think I've said everything I need to."

Even though he had as much evidence as China, less evidence than China, he radiated a smug surety, his earlier irritation swept away.

The war, not the battle.

"Alright then." The UN nervously shuffled his wings. "Any closing remarks?"

Wu Xinquan stepped forward, his handsome face intense as he looked out at the crowd of representatives.

"Fellow men of peace, I ask you- why would the country that has been a vocal proponent of pulling all foreign troops from Korea from the start, including our own, choose to involve himself in the war? What would we gain from it? We know the risks that come with being an enemy of global imperialism, and while we would brave those fires every day for the sake of our nation, why would my Countryhuman jeopardize our people when he doesn't have to?"

'There's that question again.'

"We know there will be lies and slander about us every step of the way," Wu said fiercely. "Why would he do anything that would only add to that?"

He placed a hand over his heart. "My country wants peace, in Korea, in China, in the world."

He did. And the only way to win that peace was through struggle.

"Don't give in to the voices of the warmongers," Wu plead. "Don't send your soldiers to die for the sake of their conquests. I ask you all today to make the right decision."

"Touching," America drawled, not giving the words time to land. "And I'm sure the folks here will."

The projector reached the end of the film, stopping with a 'clunk.'

Wu left the podium, returning to his place behind China, not sitting, his face tense, no longer a mask.

"You can go," the Countryhuman said, waving a hand at America. "My representative said everything that's needed."

His expression was easy on the surface, but his eyebrows were almost imperceptibly furrowed, anxious for the verdict. He didn't look like a man that was waiting for something.

"If you say so." America strode to the podium, facing the audience. "Fellow men of the free world! And Mr. Malik. I think from everything we've seen here today, one thing has become clear- Communist China is just as crafty as we knew he was. Just as sly as CCCP, as vicious as North Korea."

China would like to see his friend show the man 'vicious.'

"Mr. Wu asked why his country would jeopardize his people when he doesn't have to." America slammed a fist on the podium. "Because he doesn't give a damn about them! Because their lives are meaningless to him, something that the witnesses that weren't allowed to speak today know. They know that they were sent to Korea to satisfy their country's lust for conquest, and they know he was there to satisfy his thirst for blood!

"Slaughtering his own people in a civil war wasn't enough." America's voice rang around the hall, demanding to be heard, demanding to be believed. "He needed to kill Koreans, too. Did you know Mrs. Song has a son? All she wanted was to see him again. Do you know what she told me when I promised we'd find him? She said 'if Red China hasn't gotten to him first.'"

China had detached himself as soon as he heard the word 'son.' A good actor didn't allow their own feelings to interfere with the role. He forced himself to raise one eyebrow for the audience to see.

"Her son could be dead, killed by this country." America flung a hand at China. "Or killed by men that are just as savage and brutish as him. Just like so many Korean and Chinese children. Like your children one day could be."

China's comrades weren't as skilled at feeling nothing as he was. He could hear Li Yanmiao's teeth grating.

"So I tell you today, men of the United Nations." America leaned over the podium, gripping it with his hands so hard his tendons bulged.

"Make the right choice."

China's heartbeat sped up as he allowed himself to feel again.

He was the only one that could hear the absence of passion in the other country's voice. To the audience, his monologue had been powerful, commanding.

He could see it in their eyes. Even the ones that had been irritated with America, the ones that had been bored, the ones that clearly had believed China's evidence, had been swayed.

Almost everyone in this room had been born to wealth, or broken other's backs to obtain it. It didn't matter how much America annoyed them or how little they cared about China personally.

They would do anything to destroy what they saw as a threat to their power.

The only point of China speaking now would be to buy himself more time. He stayed silent.

"If that's all-" The UN's voice was weak and shrill compared to the war cannon of America's. "Then we can start the-"

The door opened. China's heart leapt.

"Do you mind?" America asked impatiently. "We're kind of in the middle of something here."

"Apologies for interrupting." The man that had frisked Li Yanmiao hustled down the steps to speak quietly with the UN.

"There's a man outside insisting we let him in," he murmured. "Says he's a reporter with The Manchester Guardian."

"Tell him this is a private assembly," the UN dismissed.

"He says he has evidence."

"I think we have enough evidence," America cut in.

"Really?" China asked innocently. "I think when it comes to international justice, you can never have enough."

"Admit him!" Yakov Malik called, along with a few others, some of which clearly only wanted to witness more drama.

China would give it to them.

"Alright." The UN cringed under America's aviators. "Let him in."

As they waited, the American strolled over to China, smiling.

"What are you scheming?" he asked quietly.

"You seem to think I'm much more clever than I really am." China smiled up at him. "It flatters me."

"You get that you aren't going to get out of this, don't you?" the foreigner asked with mock sympathy. "These people-" He waved at the audience. "Aren't dumb. They know what you are."

China's smiled widened. "So do I."

America flashed his teeth at him, then walked away. China toyed with his pankou knot, waiting for his third act twist.

It came in the form of a short, squat man with a thick brown moustache and balding pate sprinting into the room, exploding the doors open. His chest heaved as he glanced wildly around the hall, ignoring the calls of the guards behind him.

"Mr. China!" he cried, flying down the aisle like a chestnut being flicked away.

A guard intercepted him, and he cried, "They searched me! They searched me!"

He wasn't released until the doormen had caught up to confirm, upon which he rushed the final steps for the stage.

"Have you voted yet?" he demanded of the UN, blue eyes wide behind his wire-rimmed spectacles.

"We were just about-"

"Oh thank heavens!" The man reached into a massive brown duffel bag, rummaging aggressively. "I came as soon as I heard the news, but those blighters at the gate wouldn't let me in, understandable, of course, lot o' important folk here, but quite irritating. I told them I had evidence for the trial, but even then-"

He cut himself off, beaming as he pulled two things from his baga notebook and a reel of film.

"Got it!" he cried. "Pray tell, do you have a projector I could borrow?"

"It just so happens that we do." Wu Xinquan's tone was wry. China smiled, feeling his eyes on him.

"Excellent!" The man hustled for it, but the UN stuck out a wing, feathers askew.

"Before you take any further actions, please state your name and occupation, and what is going on."

"Ah, right, of course." The man held his items close, straightening his glasses. "William Gardiner, senior reporter with The Manchester Guardian. And upon this reel I have an interview conducted with the Countryhuman of the People's Republic of China."

"Really?" America said, skepticism dripping from his voice. "Let me see that."

"Apologies, sir, but this is a once-in-a-lifetime interview that no one will be laying hands on but me." Gardiner held it protectively to his chest. "Countryhumans don't just go handing out interviews to foreign reporters, as I'm sure you're well aware."

"Then why'd he give one to you?" America asked, thinking he'd caught him.

"I'm a bit of an exception," China explained. "I've given a few foreign interviews. When the person asking is interesting, that's all that matters."

The United Nations nodded. "That is true. That he's done interviews before, that is. I've seen them published in a few journals, mostly left-wing." His wings rustled as America turned his head to him. "But I cannot confirm whether Mr. Gardiner conducted one."

"I can," Gardiner said proudly, switching out the reel in the projector, and shoving his in. "No audio, that's on my audio recorder. One second."

He lugged the heavy box from his bag, fiddling about with it until he had both ready. He did a countdown, then, with an awkward stretch of arms, flipped the switches for both machines at once.

China was sitting in a plush seat in an ornately furnished office, sipping something from a crystal glass, while Gardiner sat across from him, notebook perched on his lap and rear perched on the edge of his chair.

"Alright, a few light questions before we get into the serious matters," Gardiner said. "My wife has been dying to know what sort of dramas they have in China."

"Have you ever seen jingju?" the China on the recorder asked, voice just slightly out of sync with the lips of the one projected in black and white on the wall. "I believe you call it Peking opera."

"I'll confess my knowledge of Chinese culture is limited," Gardiner's voice said. "Though I've always been fascinated with your country."

The interview went on, while America turned back to the reporter. "Sorry, pal, you're a bit late. We already have a bunch of useless evidence."

"It's useless?" China asked, frowning. "How so?"

America's brow twitched above his aviators. "We went over this- whatever day it was, it doesn't matter. That Korean woman said she saw you in late January and early February."

"Late January and early February?" Gardiner perked back up. "That's when this interview was conducted! February 8th, to be precise!"

The day Song Kum-jeong had said she had left O-geun with China to watch the celebration of the founding of the Korean People's Army.

America froze for the briefest of seconds. "Prove it."

"It is rather convenient," the UN murmured. "And if this interview was conducted on that day, why hasn't it been published?"

Gardiner drew himself up like an indignant chipmunk. "It should have been! But when I brought my notes back to press, they said they wouldn't! We speak a little about the war in Korea further in, and they said interviewing an enemy Countryhuman might be too hot-button to put out! Look."

He started to pull papers from the bottom of his bag, thrusting them out. "Plane tickets for my flight there and back, bills from my lodgings, my report, and the cursed rejection letter. All dated."

The United Nations scanned over them in silence for several minutes.

"Well?" the Indian representative eventually called.

"They appear to be legitimate," the UN said, looking up.

"Of course they're legitimate!" Gardiner blustered. "Do you think I'd try to bluff you?"

"No, no," the UN said hastily. "It's only... Why didn't you say anything about this before?" he directed at China.

The Countryhuman tipped his head. "Would you have believed me? You barely believe Mr. Gardiner with all the proof in your hands."

The UN cleared his throat.

"And more than that..." China looked away, embarrassed. "I forgot."

"You forgot?" America demanded.

"The Spring Festival began on the 6th this year, and lasts for around a week, if you're feeling enthusiastic," China said. "It's a very lively holiday. And I am... something of a lightweight, as Mr. Wu can attest."

Wu Xinquan nodded, not acting. He didn't think he was, anyway.

"That entire week is a blur," the Countryhuman admitted shamefully. "I hope I didn't say anything I shouldn't have," he said to the reporter.

"No, but you took me drinking," the man said cheerily. "I've never seen a man get put under by half a glass."

China laughed nervously. "Yes, well, I'll give you another interview next time you're in my country if you promise not to tell anyone else that."

"Do you swear that what you just told this assembly is true?" the UN cut in.

Gardiner nodded. "I'm not much of a religious bloke, but I'll swear on a Bible if need be."

The UN turned him down, which was good. If god had been real, China doubted it would have been merciful enough to spare a man for only thinking he was telling the truth.

"I believe you." The organization closed his eyes for a moment, then said, "Thank you for your statement, Mr. Gardiner."

"Can I stay for the rest of the trial?" he asked excitedly.

"I think you've more than overstayed your welcome, pal," America said, grinning as he slapped him on the shoulder. "You should get out of here before you trip over your own feet."

"I've never done that even once," the man protested. "But very well."

He set about fetching his things as the interview wound down.

"Thank you for your time, Mr. China," the Gardiner on the wall said. "I truly believe your country will go on to do great things."

"So do I," the black-and-white 'China' said. "I tell you what- the next time I see you, why don't I show you a proper Chinese performance? I'm sure you'll love it."

"I'd like that very much, sir."

China smiled, and the projection went blank.

When Gardiner was gone, he finally stood, walking to the podium with measured steps.

"I suppose I will say something after all," he said to his audience, revelling as they held their breaths. "You voted for 'Uniting For Peace' in order to bring peace to the world. If you vote to find me guilty today, you are uniting for war."

He didn't have the power that America did. He couldn't afford to narrow his eyes or put ice in his tone.

So he smiled.

The United Nations was sober as he sent China back to his seat. "Does anyone need time to discuss everything we've been presented with?"

For one of the very few times in the UN's six years of history, the answer from the assembly was unanimous- no.

"I see." The organization let out a breath. "Then barring any further interruptions, it is time to cast your votes. A reminder that only the eleven Security Council members are allowed to vote, and that seven votes are needed for the decision to pass. This is not a Security Council resolution, so in this case, a permanent member voting against it will not be considered a veto."

Yakov Malik gritted his teeth. China had expected this. That was why this wasn't a proper resolution- because CCCP would just veto it. And the General Assembly would take too long, and give too many 'lesser' countries a vote.

"Why don't we let the guys that think Red China's innocent go first?" America suggested.

He was sure in the outcome, even with proof that his only witness' story was false. He wanted the drama of China having to see that only one person found him innocent, already knowing how the vote would end before it was even over.

"That isn't-" The United Nations sighed, giving up. "Very well. Those who believe the People's Republic of China is innocent of the crime of participating personally in his aggression against Korea, please cast your votes."

Yakov Malik raised his hand for the domed ceiling, his face determined.

There was a pause. No one else moved.

'Ah.' Humbling to be reminded that no matter how good an actor you were, the one with more money and power would get the role.

The UN closed his eyes, lines drawn at the edges of his lips. "And-"

"Wait," the Indian representative called, thrusting his hand up.

"Yes?"

"I'm not asking a question." Sir Benegal Narsing Rau firmed his chin. "I'm voting."

That was a bit surprising. Their relations were friendly- or rather, they had the potential for friendliness. And India had just supported the recent acceptance of China's sovereignty by the Tibetan delegation, and voted against labelling him an aggressor.

But he knew the country had far preferred Chang Kai-shek, and saw China and his Socialism (and desire to Liberate their historical buffer zone) as a threat.

Ah. He supposed that wasn't so surprising then. As someone that shared a border with him, India had likely realized he would be expected to play a large part in blockading him, which was bad for his economy. And as someone recently out from under the thumb of British imperialism, he would understand that his soldiers would be viewed as cannon fodder by the rest of the United Nations.

"Anyone else?" the UN asked, scanning the crowd hopelessly.

China sat still. Unless the entire assembly had a sudden change of heart, his fate was sealed.

'Never bow before it's over.'

He looked into the audience, finding the eyes of Aleš Bebler. The man stared back.

Then, slowly, he raised his hand.

China blinked thankfully at him.

The UN waited a few more seconds, and when no one else moved, exhaled, deep and slow.

Three votes. That was all China had received. There were eight more aligned against him. Would two people abstain? Would there be a recount? Or would they all vote to move against him, pulled by America's strings?

His heart beat fast, his blood pounded in his veins, excitement filling his body as they reached the climax.

"Alright." The UN's voice was weary, knowing he was about to be forced into another war. "And for the crime of participating personally in his aggression against Korea, who finds the People's Republic of China guilty?"

Warren R. Austin's hand shot up, only beaten by Jiang Tingfu, who rose to his feet, his eyes narrowed in hate. His clique hadn't been able to win against the will of the Chinese people alone. He had seen how well having foreign masters had worked out for the reactionaries in Korea. Now he wanted some of that for himself.

'But not you, personally, right?' China asked him with his eyes. 'You won't fight. You'll send others to do it for you.'*

Tingfu stared back, defiant and boring.

China locked his gaze on the audience, awaiting his verdict.

Behind him, his entourage readied themselves.

The two hands remained in the air. Alone.

His heart beat faster.

America leaned on the podium, his smile bright. "It's voting time," he reminded them all. "That means you're supposed to vote."

There was a heavy hush over the hall as the representatives stayed silent, no one wanting to be the one to explain themselves to the American country.

Finally, the Dutch representative stood, a hand on the folding table before him.

"The Netherlands is abstaining."

"Oh?" America said after a moment. "Care to explain why that is, Balluseck?"

The portly man adjusted his glasses. "I reserve the right to not explain the decision of my nation."

"Colombia is abstaining, too." The Colombian representative joined him in standing. "And reserving the right not to explain our vote."

One by one, the other representatives stood, adding their country's voices to abstainment. Ecuador, Brazil, Turkey, and after a moment, France.

All eyes turned to Sir Gladwyn Jebb, still seated in the front row. America lowered his head, staring into his soul, if the British had those.

One more vote and they would need a recount. Would the other representatives still hold firm? Or would they crumble under the weight of America's influence?

China fought the urge to lean forward, slowing his breathing. America didn't, canting towards the Brit, his chest rising and falling shallowly.

Jebb reached for his glass of water, taking a long sip before he placed it back with a decisive 'thunk.'

"The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is abstaining," he announced.

Relief, joy, excitement, and an overwhelming sense of victory flooded China, exploding through his nerves. He wanted to leap up and dance, but he remained seated, only allowing himself a small smile, making sure he looked more relieved than smug.

His Premier had lost the bet.

"I have been asked to explain this decision." Jebb levered a look at America. "Britain does not wish for war."

Maybe he didn't see the dark, vicious look that twisted the American's face, the subtle, almost unnoticeable, twitch and contortion of muscles.

But China did.

He would confess, he felt something similar, considering that British troops had been massacring his friend's people and his own soldiers in Korea.

'Britain only wishes for a war he thinks he can win, right?'

But he knew that wasn't the source of America's rage.

The foreigner looked like he might lose his mask. China tipped his head, eager to see it.

But instead, he just looked out at the audience, and announced, darkly and authoritatively, "You're all making a big mistake."

The men shifted under his gaze. Yakov Malik smirked.

"Well those are the votes," the UN said brightly, likely trying to deliver a verdict before America could change anyone's minds. "On the charge of violating Resolution 6 of the United Nations Security Council by dwelling in Korea during a time of war, and personally participating in his country's aggression against it, the People's Republic of China is found not guilty."

China could have jumped to his feet and taken a sweeping bow, but instead, he dipped his head.

"Thank you," he said humbly. "China is honoured by the assembly's commitment to truth and justice."

He likely wasn't the only one that could see the sheen of relief that flashed across the UN's eyes at the verdict. America certainly did.

The assembly started to pack up, tucking their papers away, draining the last of their water, hoisting their briefcases. Some lingered to ply their diplomacy, Yakov Malik exchanging a few words with Benegal Narsing Rau, while others left immediately, the Swedish representative gone before the dust had even settled.

China didn't bother circulating. The curtain call had never interested him as much. Even if it was satisfying to receive a standing ovation for a perfect act, it didn't carry the same level of excitement, of not knowing how things would turn out.

He was innocent. And it would be a mistake to think any of these people or their countries had decided that for his country's sake, or justice, or even because he had been an exceedingly good actor.

He had put on a good show. He had won the war that was actually just other battle. This small victory could be taken and expanded on another day.

Though he did make sure to thank Rau and Bebler personally.

"I am glad comrades can stick up for each other," China said to the Yugoslav in rough Slovene. "I am sure China will return the favour someday."

The man dipped his head. "My Countryhuman is very much looking forward to meeting you."

Yakov Malik strode over, placing himself directly between them with an unobtrusiveness that was frankly impressive. "Father will be pleased to hear that we prevailed here today."

China smiled, nodding. "Tell Comrade CCCP that I am grateful for the support. It is good for the Socialist countries of the world to stick together, do you not think?"

He smiled over the man's shoulder at Bebler, switching from Russian to Slovene. "Comrade Korea is looking forward to meeting Comrade Yugoslavia as well."

Actually, he didn't think his friend cared for the country much, due to him not voting against the United Nations interfering in his country, only abstaining. China didn't care much for that, either. But he understood playing the game.

He bid his farewells to the men, who exchanged curt well wishes with each other before leaving.

China smiled, looking down at his photographs as he gathered them from the chair they had been placed on.

He admired the picture of him and his Chairman on the steps of Tiananmen Square, both of them smiling. Full-frontal, his face to the camera. Now that would be the picture to use for his wanted poster, if he didn't look so happy and innocent. He looked good.

Or rather, Hebei looked good.

His skin, as scarlet as China's, looked dark in the black-and-white photo, but flawless, the little moles under his eye and mouth covered by red oil paint, along with the white circle and characters centered on his face. More make-up made his masculine jaw look as refined as his Countryhuman's. His eyes were held in a more narrow position than usual, his lips curved up in a manner that was similar enough to China's smile that only he, his Chairman, or a handful of very specific people could notice the difference. The few inches he was missing were made up for by secret soles in his shoes, just as sitting in the chair had disguised him in William Gardiner's interview.

Internally, China nodded in satisfaction as he slid the evidence back into the envelope. His province had played his part well, as usual, attending meetings, holidays, interviews, following the scripts China had crafted for him excellently. He'd especially enjoyed the adlib about taking Gardiner to a performance. He'd have to take him to another one once his friend's war was over.

With their film projector and evidence packed, China's entourage headed for the door. And while no one was looking, he slipped behind the choir loft, out of sight.

"I wish Comrade China would actually wait for us for once," one secretary sighed as they passed the UN.

"He wants to get home as soon as possible," the other replied. "You know he hates leaving the country."

China crouched, waiting, listening to the remaining representatives and their crews exit the room, until the hall was silent. He closed his eyes, exhaling silently, holding his breath as he listened, forming a picture in his mind's eye.

A rustle of feathers, an exhale as the UN leaned over the podium.

"I bet you're happy."

"I wouldn't say 'happy,'" the UN said to America, no longer disguising the weariness in his voice. "But I am pleased I don't have to authorize another invasion."

"Did you tell them to pull that little abstaining trick?"

"Do you think they would listen to me if I did?" The UN sighed again. "They chose to abstain because they don't wish to go to war against Red China. It wouldn't end well for anyone."

A slam against the wood of the podium as America slapped it. "Neither can letting him get away with fucking around in Korea."

No need to mask in front of the UN. A poor sign for all of them.

"You know damn well he's there," America growled. "You know it."

"And how do you explain the photos, the film, the interview?"

"They're tricks," the American dismissed. "Big Red put something together, helped him pull a fast one."

Rude. China and his crew had worked hard to pull off their tricks without outside help.

Well, aside from utilizing the attendant, who was the Soviet's man. But the idea had still been China's.

The UN exhaled. "America, you need to let this obsession with CCCP go. You see his hand in everything. It's making you paranoid and I-"

"Paranoid?" America's voice was low.

Silence stretched tight like a string.

"You think it's paranoid that I'm the only one that knows how dangerous he is? You think it's paranoid that I see his hand here when it clearly is?" A swish, a hand through the air. "What do you think happened with that Korean broad? My best lead and she fucking offs herself? You think she just got all the way here and decided she'd had enough? She had a fucking kid to get back to!"

'And why did she have to 'get back to' him? Where did you take her?'

The UN didn't voice the accusation, though he had to be thinking it as well.

"The Chinese delegation didn't move," he argued. "Neither did the Soviets. Someone would have noticed them."

"They're sneaky!" America hissed. "Why do you think we had no idea the Norks were going to cross the 38th?!"

Another silence.

America's voice cooled. "Why do you think the North Korean army was able to ambush us last year?"

"Because they're sneaky," the UN murmured.

"Exactly." Another slam. "Just like CCCP, just like Red China. You know he's in Korea. And you're letting him trample all over your fucking Charter, all over my army and everyone else's. Over me.

"Well, I'm not going to let it happen."

"America, please." There was a plea in the UN's thin voice. "The verdict was decided upon, we're going to have peace in Korea, and hopefully this entire Korean Question will be settled soon. Just let this go."

"Let it go?" The darkness in his voice seeped out, no longer restrained by his mask. "You want me to let it go? You want me to 'let go' of truth and justice? Why don't we let go of democracy while we're at it!?"

"This was democracy," the UN stressed, wings rustling. "Please, abide by the-"

"This was a farce!" America snarled. "This was a damn commie mock-up and if you aren't careful, I'm going to start thinking you had hand in it. Or a wing."

UN gasped, and China could hear his wings flare. He focused, clearing his mind of everything but sound, and heard the soft rasp of fingers on feathers.

"Well, you might all be content to let go of righteousness. You might all be cowards." The words were low and slow.

"But America isn't."

"America." His name was the only thing the UN said, desperate.

The country's tone was casual, conversational, as he said, "You know, I've been thinking getting a new quill. The old one's starting to run out of ink. What do you think?"

Another long silence. China could hear follicles straining and the shake of feathers as they trembled.

When the United Nations spoke again, his voice was bleak.

"If you find inarguable proof of Red China's presence in Korea, I will move the matter directly to the Court."

A chill ran through China's skin. His one chance was up, it seemed.

"That's real nice of ya," America drawled, tone back to normal as he released the man's wing. "You can go ahead and start drawing things up now then. Because I'm going to find it."

Heels clicked away on the stage, and thumped across the hall.

"Good chat, like always!" America shouted, and the doors slammed shut.

There was a thump as the UN slammed his head into the podium. China stood, stretching languidly, then crept around the side of the terraces.

The organization was slumped over the wooden stand, face down and wings drooping.

China padded up behind him, not making a sound. He cocked his head, looking at the exposed back of his neck, slowly reaching out a finger, stopping just short of his sky blue skin.

'No survival instinct at all.' Unlike his friend.

He wasn't going to kill the UN, obviously. Even though he easily could. He'd already dodged one true accusation today. He wouldn't give them the satisfaction of another.

He slid around to the UN's front, waiting patiently. He knew America wouldn't leave yet.

Eventually the winged man heaved a despairing sigh, and propped his head up on his hand. His eyes flicked up to China's.

"Ah!" He leaped back, wings flaring defensively as he almost fell over.

"Hello," China said politely.

"M-Mr. PRC." The UN placed a hand on his chest. "I'm sorry, I didn't you there. When did you, ah, when did you return?"

His eyes gleamed nervously. China smiled.

"I figured I should thank you for your fair arbitration today."

"Yes, well, you're- It's my job as the United Nations to be fair and impartial." His wings twitched. An easy tell.

"I'll admit," China said pleasantly. "After how you accepted the violation of your own Charter to try and destroy Korea, and your refusal to acknowledge the winners of my civil war, I was slightly skeptical of you."

"I see." His white eyes dipped to the floor.

"En. But now I know you'll do what's best for you in the end." China narrowed his eyes just slightly, leaning over the podium.

"I'm sure I'll see you at the Security Council soon."

The thin man shrank back slightly. It could have been just an innocuous parting comment.

But the United Nations heard it as the promise it was.

In the end, roles like this were fun, too. There was always something satisfying about the moment the mask would come off, as the audience would realize they had been tricked.

It wasn't time for that yet. But when it came, China knew it would set his blood aflame.

"Now if you'll excuse me, I need to be getting back to my own country." China bowed exaggeratedly low. "Good day."

He swished away, head up, not a care in the world. As he left the hall, he heard the UN's face make contact with the podium once more.

He smiled. Time for the encore.

He found America on the landing between the third and second floor, staring crossly down into the entryway, thinking he'd missed him. He didn't see China as he approached from behind.

"So, we finally get to meet." China was satisfied to see the American's broad shoulders tense imperceptibly before he turned around. "Well, I suppose we met in the assembly. But that was a little too formal for my tastes."

He eyed the America up and down. "I have to say, I thought you'd be taller in person."

America stared at him, clearly taking in the fact that they stood at almost the exact same height, before laughing loudly. "And I thought you wouldn't have a sense of humour. We never properly introduced ourselves, did we?" He thrust out a hand imperially. "The United States of America. Sorry if things got a bit heated in there, you know how it is. Good to meet ya."

China stared at his outstretched limb, smiling neutrally until the other country retracted it, looking somewhat annoyed.

"Oh, right," he said, falsely jovial. "You chinks don't know how to shake hands."

"Only those whose hands are clean. But I will take that apology for the misunderstanding, if it's still available."

Though China hadn't deigned to acknowledge the slur, America's brows rose as if he had. "Oh shit, right. I'm not supposed to use that word. It's not 'politically correct,' anymore, is it."

"I don't take offense," China said smoothly. "I don't expect much from someone for whom the majority of his politics are incorrect."

America's lips flattened minutely. "Did you need something from me, ching-chong?"

The other country had swapped masks, changing his voice from white stone and rolling lawns to parlours and cigar smoke. China allowed himself a slight slackening of his own in response.

"I just wanted to see the country my comrades are winning against. And now I have." China breezed by him, pleased when the other man had to jump a few stairs to catch up to him.

"You don't really think you and your other little commie pal are going to win this, do you?" America asked, arrogant once more.

But China had heard the way his teeth had grit when his racial epithet had once more gone unchallenged. Clearly, a man used to getting a rise from his audience. Which meant the best way to get on his nerves was to ignore what he thought the script should be.

"I certainly don't think you are going to." China cast a smile over his shoulder as he said it. He had always enjoyed prodding little men who thought of themselves as dragons. Truly one of life's greatest treasures.

America stepped in front of him, blocking his path down to the empty entry hall. "Alright, so you're a smooth-talker and pretty smart, for a commie," he said in the tone of a fruit vendor who had just been called out on selling windfalls. "How 'bout you and I cut a deal?"

He paused dramatically, most likely waiting for China to inquire as to what it would be. The Asian country, however, did not play along with his theatricality, smiling at him politely until he continued.

"'What deal?' Well, I'm glad you asked." America looked around the empty hallway exaggeratedly before stage-whispering, "I don't offer this kind of thing to every Third World schmuck, but I'm willing to invest a dollar or two in your industries, to, y'know, help you get up and running. And I could-" He looked around again, once more confirming that they were alone, before managing to whisper even louder, "Talk to my guys and maybe nudge 'em in the right direction when it comes to getting you recognized as the real China.

"And all you'd have to do is-"

"Sign an armistice agreeing to abandon Korea," China finished languidly. It didn't take any masterful power of observation to realize that was what the other country had been leading up to. Now that his attempt to go to war with China had been deflected, for now, the next step would be to try and salvage his gains in Korea.

If China had to say, the ideal plan now was- conquer Korea, use his capture of Korean politicians and records to falsify information proving China had in fact been there (well, some actually could provide true information), then use that as an excuse to invade him, able to come at him from two fronts. And if China really was as aloof and bourgeois as he had been acting, perhaps America wouldn't even have to invade him. Perhaps he could get him to sell out, as he was trying now.

It wasn't really about destroying China, you see. It was about dominating it, and him. As always.

America looked satisfyingly irked by his spotlight being stolen.

'Get used to it,' the Chinese country gloated silently.

"We have a winner!" America admitted, sounding briefly like a hawker before returning to his normal voice. "Which is what you won't be if you don't take my deal. So whaddya say? Get a jumpstart to your businesses and maybe even get recognized as China- no promises, but I'd try to steer 'em in the right direction- or keep fighting a thankless war that has nothing to do with you? Seems like an easy choice to me."

"And to me," China replied congenially.

"Great!" America rubbed his hands together. "Let me talk to my guys-"

"I choose the war." China slipped by him, basking in the stunned silence from behind him before the other Countryhuman had to catch up again, jogging this time as they reached the unforgiving marble of the ground floor.

It was empty, the security likely being interrogated on what they had witnessed.

"Okay, I feel like we were on the same page, but now I've lost you." America tried to cut him off again, but was stymied by China lengthening his strides. He could only keep pace as he continued, "You heard me, right? Millions of dollars plus UN recognition- which means you can veto any more attempts from these guys to try and screw you over- and all you have to do is sign a paper."

"I heard you."

"Then what's not clicking?" America sounded like he was trying to not let his irritation seep into his voice. "I thought you Asians were supposed to be smart."

Smart enough to realize that the latter half of his promise wasn't true. Even now, the American was collaborating with the Kuomintang against China. The American military and the Chinese 'Nationalists' were bosom-buddies in the fight against Communism, and signing an armistice wouldn't change that. And as for his industries...

"For the first time in Chinese history, the business of China belongs to the Chinese people alone," China said, feeling a thrill as he always did at the words. "I'm sure your people don't know the feeling, but it's one mine are willing to fight for. For both us, and our comrades."

"And you'd take that over economic development?" America asked, disgusted. "Do you realize how much cash you're turning down? It would make a hundred thousand look like chump change."

"And how many lives would I have to trade for each of those dollars?"

"See, that's the neat thing about capitalism- you wouldn't be trading any lives." America grinned, a shark with perfectly straight, white teeth.

"I'm sure the Koreans in the south would have something to say about that."

And so would Song Kum-jeong.

"And I think there are many who would have something to say about you talking so easily about bribing the UN."

China stopped abruptly, turning in a way that placed America between him and the wall.

"There is no ivory in a dog's mouth." He kept up his small smile as he widened his eyes slightly. "I don't need your money, your 'investments,' or your bribes. I know you have no intention of recognizing me anytime soon. But one day, you and the rest of the world will have no choice before my merits. CCCP isn't your only competition, anymore, Yankee."

Unlike him, America had dropped of his façade completely, and none of his previous insincerity remained as he growled, "I tried to give you a way out, but you just had to make yourself my enemy. Now you can say goodbye to everything you've thought you've accomplished. Your factories, your resources, your cities." He stared at China from behind his aviators, cold and unfeeling. "When this war ends and Korea belongs to me, then it's your turn."

"I'm well-aware that I became your enemy the day I decided to walk a path that didn't involve selling myself to foreign powers," China returned. "But I don't actually seem to care. I'm not the frightened one here."

"Frightened?" America scoffed, clearly finding the thought ridiculous. "I'm the USA. I don't get 'frightened.' Certainly not from some backwater country that doesn't even have plumbing.'"

"No?" China tipped his head, smiling once more. "Then why do you want me to sign an armistice?"

He bowed slightly, then glided away, hands clasped together.

"You may have fooled UN and the rest of those idiots, but I know you're in Korea. And if I catch you on the battlefield, it's fucking over for you." America was fully dispensed of any pretend amicability as his words swirled like dark smog. "You're going to regret getting in my way, chink."

"I don't think I will." China would never regret helping a friend, or getting the chance to slip a verbal arrow past the American's armour.

"Oh, and America." He smiled over his shoulder. "Have a safe drive to the airport. I hear the roads can get... dangerous."

He sailed away after that, claiming the last line as his.

He didn't look back at the bottom of the stairs as he left. The blood had already been mopped away, like she had never even been there.

North would find out about this. He would read the transcripts and pester CCCP and China for every detail. But after she was buried by America and the United Nations, no one else would find out what had happened to Song Kum-jeong. Maybe he didn't have to either. At least not from China.

Every victory required a sacrifice. You always had to lose something.

As he emerged into the late afternoon sunlight, pausing as he blinked it from his eyes, the attendant from the main hall hustled over, his face blank. He escorted China past the cameras and crowd, to the black car where his comrades were waiting.

As the Countryhuman climbed in, the man pressed something into his hand. The same object Li Yanmiao had snuck into his pocket. The same that China had passed to the Soviet agent, and that he had shown Song Kum-jeong.

A long, leaf-shaped throwing knife with a scratch running vertically down the blade.

'Some women can't bear to outlive their children.' Wise words.

China tucked the grief away with all the rest, saving it for if it was ever needed.

"There you are," Wu Xinquan said as he took his seat.

"Toilet," China explained breezily.

"You should tell me before you go off and do something like that." His comrade quirked his brow, really meaning 'You should have told us about Gardiner.'

"It must have slipped my mind," China replied innocently, letting a trace of his real voice bleed through Hebei's, knowing the driver wouldn't be able to tell the difference. "I'm sure I'll remember next time."

Wu Xinquan shook his head.

China smiled.

As his car pulled out of the building's lot, he was amused to see one of the last vehicles on the street unmoving, while a team of mechanics swarmed towards it, several of them dressed like members of a bomb squad.

They wouldn't find anything, of course, but it would keep the American stuck here for an hour, at least.

Their first-meet and he had already outperformed him, and scored a victory. He looked forwards to the next act, where he would make sure to score another.

But he couldn't get overconfident. It couldn't be forgotten that the only reason he had won here today was because the other nations had been cowed by their losses in Korea. If it weren't for that, America would likely be dragging him to a holding cell right now.

China drummed his long fingers on the side of the door, watching as the oppressive buildings blurred by on their way to his plane.

But all in all, he had accomplished what he came here to do. The winged fool had at least pretended to buy that he wasn't involved in the war personally and would be unable to authorize force against his country, and- of near-equal importance- America knew he was no longer alone on the stage.

China's country and people were safe, for now. Mission accomplished, soon he would be back with Korea, fighting for his friend's freedom once more.

He smiled, though there was still one little loose thread dangling from the tapestry.

'Where are you, Little Sister?'

Court chapters: 3 (and counting?)

So. Book outline says 90 chapters in this part. But it did say 89 a day before I wrote this chapter. So we will see.

I HAVE BEEN WAITING TO WRITE THESE CHAPTERS FOREVER. Also the United Nations has the most evil web design ever. I think they actively attempt to make it difficult to access specific past records to hide their crimes. I know this sounds paranoid, but please don't say that until you try and use their filter and you have to manually tap the screen to go one month at a time all the way back to 1951 TWICE.

[image]

Stranded

North Pyongan had always believed that being in Heaven would feel like being rocked gently by refreshingly cool water.

But he had also believed it would be the end of all pain. And as the comforting blackness he had been rocking within became flooded with an agony that only grew stronger, he wondered if he had been sent to Hell instead.

He lashed out blindly, his body twitching and thrashing, and suddenly he was breathing water again, the liquid pouring into his lungs as his panicked mind whirled.

This was the punishment for breaking the Ten Commandments, for taking lives and lying for his sister and trying to turn his back on God. He had been wrong that He would understand, that He would know he had always tried to do what was right and that that was enough. And now North Pyongan had been sent to suffer forever, to be drowned over and over by one of the things he loved most while he-

There was a hand on the back of his collar, 'Thank God He realizes I don't deserve this,' and he was being hauled up, that same hand slapping his back hard, forcing the water from his lungs.

He coughed and sputtered, nails clawing at something that felt like wood, his eyes squeezed tight against the salt in them.

"Hey, comrade, easy," a raspy voice soothed, and North Pyongan had a moment to be pleased he had been right about God being a Communist before realizing that the voice was actually Pak Ga-ram's.

North Pyongan tried to speak, but when he opened his mouth, he started to vomit water, his already sore throat spasming painfully as he forced out all the brine his stomach had filled with before his lungs had given up.

When he was done, he tried to collapse. But his face only landed in more water. Someone quickly hauled his head up before he could drown again.

"It's okay," a familiar voice said, soft, but raspy as Pak Ga-ram's. A more gentle hand rubbed the back of his. "It's okay, I say."

North Pyongan tried to make sense of what was happening. He was still being rocked, and his legs wouldn't meet solid ground, kicking in the water. His arms were splayed across… a board? He tried to open his eyes to see, but everything was blurred by saltwater and pain.

His thoughts swirled about like a ship's wreckage, occasionally crashing up each other and sparking a memory. The mission, the sampan fleet, the destroyer, flying through the air and…

He tried to focus on the one thing he was certain about.

"Com... rade Liao… xi?" he croaked to the familiar voice. His own was unfamiliar, throaty and garbled, like he was still drowning.

"That's me," she confirmed, and he forced his eyes open to see a blur of yellow and green across from him.

"Where…?" His mind couldn't remember the words, or how to move his tongue.

"We're out on the ocean," the Chinese woman explained. "Just rest and listen, don't cause a commotion."

"The entire task force went down," Pak Ga-ram said grimly from beside him. North Pyongan tried to turn his head, but his muscles wouldn't move. "I think Captain Ko and Comrade Jon might've made it away, but I don't know for sure. You went down, too."

Liaoxi chimed in, "Comrade Pak saved you."

Sounding sheepish, the man said, "I just fished you out and gave you chest compressions. It wasn't a big deal."

"You did almost drown," the woman cut in.

“I was fine,” Pak Ga-ram said quickly.

Drowned… North Pyongan could vaguely remember flailing in the water, reaching out for salvation that wasn’t coming. Did he remember a hand grabbing his, or was that a false memory?

“Your… efforts I crown,” he slurred, since his comrade hadn’t finished Liaoxi’s rhyme. “Thank you for saving me.”

“I… didn’t really save you,” Pak Ga-ram uncomfortably denied. “You… Uh, never mind.”

“I don’t intend worries to cast,” Liaoxi said softly. “But I’m afraid you passed.”

North Pyongan blinked, her olive and pastel citrine smearing together. “Passed?”

“You, uh, died,” Pak Ga-ram said awkwardly. “Once I got the water out of your lungs, it was a good half hour before your heart started beating again.”

North Pyongan tried to wrap his mind around that.

Your heart could stop when you drowned, as it ran out of oxygen to pump. And it could be restarted with chest compressions. North Pyongan had seen it before, and even saved a boy who had almost drowned in the Amnok the same way.

The person wasn't truly dead when that happened. Their brain was still working, their body was just shutting down around it. Their soul was still intact, hovering above its vessel, ready for life to be breathed back into it, or for God to reach down and draw it close.

But the heart could only pause for a few minutes before it could no longer be restarted. A half hour…

North Pyongan had died. He had died, and all he had seen was… nothing. No light of Heaven, no embrace of the Lord. Just…. Nothing. Not even blackness. A complete absence of anything.

He tried to shake his head, the world swaying.

Of course he hadn't seen Heaven. He hadn't truly died. He hadn't thrown himself into the waters on purpose, or been held under by a Countryhuman. His own soul would have been firmly intact, not even drifting away, only waiting for his body to heal so it could rekindle.

"Comrade?" Liaoxi said, her brows furrowed.

"I don't… feel well," North Pyongan slurred.

"Well you did… y'know," Pak Ga-ram coughed. "Sorry."

"I don't think you're done healing," Liaoxi said, almost sounding guilty. "The thought of waking you wasn't appealing, but…"

"We need your help." Pak Ga-ram's voice was grim. "Take a look around us."

North Pyongan forced his head up, rubbing the blur from his eyes with great effort. When he could finally see, he looked. What he saw made his heart sink.

The sea. And only the sea.

Behind Liaoxi, who was clinging to the opposite side of what had been a board from a sampan, with a large bag in front of her, beyond Pak Ga-ram, holding on with one hand while the other was poised to catch North Pyongan if he slid under again, on his other side. The only thing around them was a slate grey expanse of open water stretching to the dark line of the distant horizon.

It was only when North Pyongan twisted to look behind that he could see a smudge of shoreline, made indistinct not by his eyes, but by distance.

"We're stranded."

Liaoxi bit her lip, and Pak Ga-ram nodded soberly.

"After the destroyer finished taking the sampan out, they started to send out boats to take prisoners. We'd already put some distance between us so I could resuscitate you, so we just held tight. We thought we'd wait for them to go away, then swim back to shore. But they were taking forever, and using that spotlight to search the sea."

"So we just let the current take us," Liaoxi continued. "Like thus."

North Pyongan could feel it pushing at them, sending them… eastward? The sun was covered by heavy clouds, but if that faraway shore was Korea, then he was right.

"But once I came off the adrenaline, I realized my leg is screwed," Pak Ga-ram said with shame. "Some shrapnel must've got me when we went down. I wanted to push though, but…" He winced. "It's too much. I can only go for short bursts, and Comrade Liaoxi can't fight the current by herself."

"How… long have we been out here?" North Pyongan managed.

"Four days," the sailor rasped. "It should be the 12th."

Four days. South Pyongan would be chasing her tail with worry, and Korea would be…

"Comrade Pak wanted to delay waking you." Liaoxi's guilt was clearer now. "But we can't wait any longer, and we can't make it with just us two."

"It's'okay." North Pyongan's tongue still couldn't separate the words. It was all he could do to remain focused on what was happening around him, and not spiral thinking about how his sister and Countryhuman must be feeling right now.

He knew why he was so muddled now. His brain had shut down from lack of oxygen, and was still working on repairing itself.

He shuddered. Hwang's worst nightmare. At least the damage shouldn't be too severe, if his lungs and heart had already fixed themselves up enough to function.

"I suggested waiting until we drift into Soviet territory," Pak Ga-ram said. “A few people fled up north on fishing boats, so I figure they’re not just blowing everything they pick up on radar out of the water. But Comrade Liaoxi’s not keen on that.”

Liao…

North Pyongan’s eyes widened as the address registered, swivelling towards the Chinese woman. Her mask was on, but her scarf didn't cover her yellow skin or white eyes.

She nodded soberly. “He had to know my identity true. My mask was soaked through.”

“She was practically waterboarding herself,” the sailor agreed. “I couldn’t stand watching her anymore, so when she almost passed out, I took it off her.” He winced. “I didn’t expect her to be a foreign Provincehuman. I thought she just had really bad jaundice.”

Liaoxi looked a bit offended at that, though it didn’t show in her voice.

“Of the Soviets we have to stay free,” she told him. “They can’t know about me.”

For the first time, North Pyongan wondered if CCCP even knew China was here, let alone his provinces.

“We wouldn’t… get taken to Shoviet waterssh anywaysh,” he slurred, trying to picture a nautical map of the East Sea in his mind.

If they were farther north, the Northern Korean Cold Current would send them into shore, likely even into Wonsan Harbour. The East Korean Warm Current farther south that could sometimes bring debris from Japan onto their coasts could do the same thing.

But they were in the southern branch of the Northern Cold Current, after it had already left the Wonsan area. If they continued to float in it, it would carry them directly to the Tsushima Warm Current.

And Japan.

He managed to communicate this to his comrades, stumbling through the words.

The skin around Liaoxi's eyes had paled. "If the options are CCCP or Japan, then I choose the first man."

For good reason. North Pyongan hadn't been able to get her to share any more about what had happened to Manchukuo, but she had shared information that the Soviets had passed onto China after interrogating the Japanese scientists responsible for Unit 731 and its counterparts. The more details that came out, the more North Pyongan regretted asking. Which he was sure was her intention.

Pak Ga-ram nodded vigorously. "I also vote no to Japan."

"Alright." North Pyongan drew in a deep breath, tightening his grip on the sampan board.

"Then let's get back to Korea."

—

Resisting the current hurt more than anything he had ever felt physically.

The Northern Korean Cold Current wasn't particularly strong or fast this close to the surface. Only around half a knot. But North Pyongan's muscles were stiff, his legs cramped from thigh to calf, and his skin stung awfully from being submerged in salt for so long.

Four days of Liaoxi and Pak Ga-ram having to force themselves to struggle against the current, preventing themselves from being carried too far, dragging North Pyongan's dead weight with them. To his horror, he found that they'd even made him drink two canteens full of water, and the flask of Liaoxi's ginger tea in an effort to speed his healing. Only one canteen was left now, and they were rationing it.

Even though they both assured him they'd discussed it and done it willingly, it still weighed heavily on him, bearing him down in the sea. South Pyongan wouldn't have left them to sleep in shifts and waste their strength paddling on no food and little water, exhausted and injured, for four days. Neither would Korea.

North Pyongan was a sailor, and he couldn't even stop himself from drowning.

The hours blurred together like words on seawater-soaked paper. His skin wouldn't stop burning, and his lungs ached, the inside scoured by saltwater.

His mind and body begged him to stop, to close his eyes and sink down into the deep again, to rest.

But he couldn't when the other two were refusing to give up.

Liaoxi had swam around to join them on their side, turning the sampan board around. He couldn't see the fingers that clutched at their little raft, but he knew they would be just as pruned as he and Pak Ga-ram's, the pastel skin waterlogged by the prolonged soak. She was breathing heavily, trying to get enough oxygen through her facemask, and the eyes visible above it were bone-weary.

Pak Ga-ram, too, seemed like he could barely keep his open. And while he refused to show his leg to North Pyongan, the province knew it had to be curing like pork from the saltwater, the lips of the wound puffed up, refusing to scab, like his own broken-open burns.

Kangwon said saline water was good for washing out wounds, but to always thoroughly clean any injuries if he ever went overboard. The salt in ocean water wasn't sterile, and would cause infections easier.

But still, both the sailor and Chinese province kept going. So North Pyongan did, too. Even when one of them had to catch his head as it dipped back towards the water covering their raft, his legs still kicked.

As part of their training, North Pyongan and Pak Ga-ram had had to swim laps in the ocean for an hour, until their limbs were trembling and they could barely stand once they were on the shore. Korea had been there, too, somehow going for longer than them, until even he was panting as he dragged himself back onto land. His province had wondered how he even stood, let alone walked, when his own legs still wouldn't hold him properly, cramped and aching down to the bone.

This was worse.

On and on they paddled, refusing to stop as the sun emerged from the clouds and started to slide down below the horizon. The waters flushed pink, then turned red as blood before dying into black.

North Pyongan couldn't see even the smudge of shoreline now. With no lights allowed to burn at light for fear of the planes and ships, there was nothing. Only an impenetrable blackness, like that under the sea.

'Purgatory,' his mind said blearily. That was where he had been. Not dead, not alive. Purgatory.

'Maybe the Catholics didn't just make it up.'

He wanted to sleep. He didn't want to fight the current. He wanted to give in to it, to let it rock him in its watery arms and pretend they were those of God again.

But he could hear his sister urging him on, saying she would call him a loser if he stopped now. And he could see Korea's face as he swam laps long after the sailors had returned to the barracks, his eyes intensely focused as he swam towards something North Pyongan couldn't see.

The province wasn't that strong. He couldn't keep himself going through force of will alone.

'The Lord is our shepherd; we shall not want.'

He closed his eyes, shoulders and legs screaming as he tightened his grip on the board, kicking harder.

'He makes us lie down in green pastures.'

Beside him, Liaoxi dry-heaved, unable to cure her seasickness with the ginger tea given to North Pyongan.

‘He leads us beside still waters.’

Pak Ga-ram made a noise between a pant and a sob as his lungs strained, damaged like his province’s from saving him.

‘He restores our souls.’

His comrade had been the one to do that, hauling him from the depths and purging the water from his insides.

‘He leads us in paths of righteousness for His name’s sake.’

He wanted to rest. But Pak Ga-ram had saved him, and he needed to return the favour. The path of righteousness was getting him back to shore.

‘Even though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we will fear no evil, for you are…’

Everything faded away but the slosh of water, the sting of salt, and the desire to save Liaoxi and Pak Ga-ram.

Swimming, swimming, he just had to keep swimming, he just had to-

“-rade. Comrade.”

The out-of-breath voice finally penetrated the fog in his mind, hoarse and fading.

“Stop.”

North Pyongan almost couldn’t make himself. And when his legs did receive the message from his brain, he didn’t think they would take another.

He raised his head, his eyes cracking open. The sky had started to lighten, the sun rising in the east.

“We’re almost there,” Liaoxi panted, her eyes wide with relief. “If another few kilometres we can bear.”

Neck stiff, North Pyongan looked up, his heart skipping a beat.

The shore! He could see it, a dark shadow where the water ended, the mountains rising into the sky. They looked like those south of Wonsan Harbour, the ones they had launched the sampan from. He could even see the shape of Guk Island before them.

"Land ho," Pak Ga-ram croaked.

They had almost made it.

'Thank you, Lord.'

Shockingly, even though his legs were drifting in the water like seaweed, they were still able to move. The sight of land had filled them all with a renewed burst of energy.

But as they neared Guk Island, trying to beat the rising light, Pak Ga-ram's kicking started to slow.

"Are… you… alright?" Every word from North Pyongan's mouth was an effort.

The sailor stopped altogether, ignoring Liaoxi's reminder that they needed to hurry. His eyes were fixed on the lump of Guk Island.

"Is it… really okay to just head back to shore?"

The two provinces were both silent, and he turned to look at North Pyongan.

"We were told to remove the observation post there. We didn't."

"The task force was… destroyed," the province reminded him.

"Maybe not all of them. I swear Captain Ko made it. And if he did, others might've, too."

"Not enough to complete the mission," North Pyongan said gently.

He could remember the destruction before he had gone under.

The cannons blasting and the water exploding, men sent flying, blown apart in the water. He knew it had ran red under the moonlight.

"And you're injured."

"I can still hold a gun," the sailor protested.

"We might not have guns."

Liaoxi had explained that her bag was waterproof, and that she had placed their firearms in it- her sniper rifle, Type 50, and ammunition, North Pyongan's pistol (his Type 49 had been lost to the waves; Korea was going to kill him), and Pak Ga-ram's submachine gun and pistol.

But the bag wasn't specially-treated rubber, like Captain Ko Man-jo's cargo had been in. It was leather coated with melted oils and fats in the traditional way. Water resistant, not water*proof.* And not only had it been sitting in an inch of water for three days, but it had apparently been raining sporadically as well. Not to mention both North Pyongan and Pak Ga-ram's firearms had been submerged before being put in there.

"We won't stand a chance," North Pyongan said, making himself kick to stop them from drifting out again. His thighs screamed as he did.

Pak Ga-ram was too tired to move, but on the board, his fingers clenched.

"We were assigned this mission by Comrade Korea and the Supreme Commander themselves," he said fiercely. "They believed that Task Force Dokdo could do this. Even if we're the only ones left, we have to carry out their orders."

North Pyongan's thoughts swirled sluggishly, trying to comprehend the words.

Pak Ga-ram's jaw flexed. "If you order me back to shore, I'll go. But I think we should try to fulfill our mission."

None of them were in any position to fight. They were exhausted and injured, with no rations and now only a quarter of a canteen left. Their weapons might not even work. And there would be at least a unit on that island.

He looked to Liaoxi, hoping she would tell him they should return to safety.

But the Chinese province shook her head. “I made a promise not to participate in the command chain. I should keep it if I don’t want your Countryhuman to cause me pain. I’ll only say- whatever you choose, choose today.”

Korea had had that look in his eye when he saw him off, the one that said he didn’t want to see North Pyongan return if he didn’t bring results with him. But he knew his Countryhuman would understand if he took them back to shore under these circumstances.

But…

He didn't want to go back to Korea without results. He wanted to prove that he wasn’t useless, that he could lead. And when so many of their comrades had perished, to walk away from this mission without finishing what they had set out to do felt wrong, especially when Captain Ko Man-jo and Jon Kong-mo could still be alive.

‘Pak Jeong-ri. Pak Yun-sung. Choe Ki-bin.’

He couldn't bring them back. But maybe he could save someone else.

Despite his injuries and four days of no rest, there was a glint in Pak Ga-ram’s pine wood eyes.

‘They can believe in whatever they wish. You can only believe in them.’

North Pyongan knew it hadn’t been his prayer that had got them here. It had been Pak Ga-ram, not giving in to his injury, refusing to become a burden, pushing to get them home.

He would try and believe in him again.

"Alright," he said, before he could talk himself out of it. "But Comrade Liaoxi-"

"Even if you order, I won't leave you," she firmly cut him off. "For China, I also still have a mission to do."

'She only said it that way to rhyme,' he told himself, shaking his head to clear the new muddle from it.

"Then…" He mustered the courage to say the words, just as he mustered the strength to move his legs to push them towards Guk Island.

"Task Force Dokdo will complete its mission."

Yayyyy now that I don't think I'm at risk of going into three books I can make some chapters shorter. But this does mean I just added one to the count already. So we'll see how long that lasts.

People that can be whatever ethnicity you want them to be as a form of cultural assimilation, coming from my observances:

Lenin
Marx
Jesus Christ
Hatsune Miku

Not One Will Be Lost

The sun was starting to climb over the eastern horizon when the wooden raft finally bumped against the side of Guk Island.

None of them could move at first, too stunned by actually having reached their destination, and drained. North Pyongan's body went limp with the suddenness of being shot. Pak Ga-ram's head slumped onto the water resistant bag, and Liaoxi let out a shaky exhale.

"We made it," she rasped.

"It took a bit," North Pyongan agreed, panting. "But we did."

Pak Ga-ram turned his head, his eyes peering out from heavy shadows. "Now what?"

The three of them lifted their gazes.

Guk Island's shores rose above them, rocky and steep. Very steep.

"We have no rope," Liaoxi stated, her brows furrowed in concern. "So there is a beach, I hope?"

"No," North Pyongan said reluctantly.

Guk Island sat above the sea like an aquatic inselberg, with almost nowhere to run your boat aground.

"The sides are all like this," he explained. "There's one with a lip below it, but..."

"They'll probably be watching that one," Pak Ga-ram grimly intuited.

"Yes."

They went back to staring silently at the island as their raft bumped into the side over and over again, driven by the waves.

"Do you... think we could rest?" Pak Ga-ram muttered after a moment. "I can do this. I just need... Just a break."

North Pyongan looked at Liaoxi. She ignored him, still refusing to participate in the chain of command.

"We can't head up until nighttime anyways," he decided.

Guk Island was barely more than half a ri wide at its widest, and while it was thickly forested and rocky, it wouldn't be safe to wander around in broad daylight.

"At least they might have lowered their guard after so long," he said, then winced. A commander probably shouldn't sound so pathetically hopeful.

Liaoxi gave him a sympathetic look, and they settled in to wait.

Guk Island's coastline was relatively smooth, except for on the east side, where a chunk was missing, almost like some gargantuan leviathan had taken a bite out of it, leaving two narrow projections of rock protecting a crescent-shaped bay. It was here they waited, hidden by the shadow of the granite cliffs.

North Pyongan strained to hear anything from above, but the constant crash of waves against the rocks drowned everything else out. At least it would also drown out their own voices, and the impact of their raft from the enemy.

"Can you hear anything?" he asked Liaoxi.

She shook her head. "I don't exactly have my comrade's hearing, if it's an ambush you're-"

She cut herself off as they surged forward again, smacking into the cliff. Her cheeks puffed out a little, her pastel yellow skin turning more greenish.

Pak Ga-ram shifted slightly farther away, though they had to stay on the same side if they didn't want to be dashed against the rock. "Sorry, I know you're a woman, but I have to be blunt- please don't throw up again, comrade. We'll sort of be... stuck with it."

Liaoxi moaned miserably, burying her face in her bag. North Pyongan noted with worry that the constant sea spray had gotten it even more wet.

"You shouldn't have given me that ginger tea," he said guiltily.

"Right now, it wouldn't do much good for me," the woman grumbled. "Mark me when I say- when we get back, someone is going to pay."

'Someone' being China. Just because Pak Ga-ram knew a Chinese Provincehuman was here, didn't mean he had to know the Countryhuman also was.

Again North Pyongan had to wonder what reason China had for sending Liaoxi along, what the mission she had mentioned was. But he knew by now that he wouldn't get a straight answer.

The day was long and arduous. As much as North Pyongan loved the rocking of the sea, the unending momentum of being nearly sucked out of the cove by the tide before being slammed back into the island at full force was starting to get to even him. He knew his sister wouldn't have been able to tolerate the long hours of monotony.

None of them spoke much. The other two were being crushed under the same exhaustion that he was, needing to devote their full strength to clinging to the raft to avoid being knocked into the island or sucked into the water.

The mainland was blocked from sight by the southern spur of granite, but North Pyongan still found his eyes drawn that way.

Were Korea and South Pyongan there, scanning the sea? Did they have someone looking for him? He knew they must. Did they think he and Liaoxi had been captured?

New worry sank in his stomach like a stone in a pond. Not only that his sister might do something reckless in order to find him, but...

What if Korea thought he had purposefully defected? That he might have intentionally turned himself over to the enemy, or at least went willingly?

He wanted to believe that Korea would never think that way about him, but... He knew how paranoid he was. And what if he thought that forbidding North Pyongan from his religion had been the last straw?

He would never. He might not agree with his Countryhuman's decision, but he knew he thought he was doing it for the right reasons.

But Korea had such a low view of religion. What if he lumped North Pyongan in with the right-wing Christians that followed their own wills instead of God's or anyone else's, and thought he viewed his Countryhuman's order as an attack on his beliefs?

It sort of was. But he knew it was more of an attack on him. And North Pyongan understood why he had thought he had to do it.

Even if Korea didn't think he had defected, he would still be worried. And so would South Pyongan. Having them both feeling that way at the same time, especially when it was over something his sister could blame their Countryhuman for, could never end well.

It felt like an age before the sun finally disappeared behind the island, and even longer before the red stain finally faded from the water around them.

When it was finally dark, Pak Ga-ram said, "I'll go scout."

"We'll all go," North Pyongan tried, but the sailor shook his head.

"There's no point in all of us going up if they're just waiting on top of the cliff."

"You're injured."

"Naw, I'm fine." The man slapped his chest, giving a smile. "Now that I'm all rested up, I feel good as new."

North Pyongan wasn't convinced. He could see the way the lines around his eyes drew tight. He had tried to get his comrade to sleep, but the bag of guns made a poor pillow, and not everyone was as soothed by the crash of the tide as he was.

Pak Ga-ram saw his doubt, and sighed. "If one of us gets captured, it should be me. I won't be able to fight as well if it comes down to it, and I'm not a Provincehuman. I can afford to be captured. You comrades can't."

North Pyongan hesitated, but finally agreed. "Fine. But don't take any risks."

Pak Ga-ram promised not to, then shrugged the gun bag over one shoulder. "I'll stash these somewhere safe to dry off."

As the waves carried them towards the cliffside again, he let go, latching onto the rough face before he could be sucked back out, clinging tight to avoid being dragged under.

For a moment, North Pyongan thought he wouldn't be strong enough to do it. But then he gritted his teeth, and started to climb, one hand over the other, using the shallow shelves the tide had carved into the granite as footholds.

The right leg of his pants was torn, and North Pyongan could see through the shredded black fabric that his wound looked just the way he expected.

The provinces held their breaths as the man worked his way up the twenty-foot tall cliff. Only a few feet up, his injured leg slipped on the slick rocks, making North Pyongan tense. But he managed to regain his footing, shooting a tight smile over his shoulder at them.

The going got easier as he moved out of range of the spray, climbing with more confidence until he was pulling himself over the top. He vanished, and the two waited in nervous anticipation for a shout of discovery.

After a moment, a shadow peeked over the edge of the cliff, giving a brief salute before retreating. North Pyongan let out a breath.

"He'll be fine, I know," Liaoxi reassured him. "How are your wounds, though?"

"Not well," North Pyongan admitted. "As I'm sure you can tell."

Most of his sodden bandages had sloughed off on the way, exposing the burns on his face and neck. If they were anything like the ones on his hands, he felt sorry that she had to look at them.

The scabs had split apart, gorged with water, exposing fresh flesh to be stung by salt. The skin around them had turned a paler blue, the edges almost starting to fray, like fabric or wet pulp paper.

Thinking of paper sent a burst of alarm through him as he slapped at his chest and underwater torso, suddenly realizing that his missing pack meant something else was missing, too.

"My Bible," he said in dismay, spinning to look out at the sea, like even if it hadn't sank below the waves days ago, it would still be legible.

Maybe it was pathetic of him, especially when he was trying to follow Korea's orders to abandon God, but as he realized it was gone forever, he felt more salt well in his eyes.

"Comrade, there's no need to fret," Liaoxi said quickly, nudging him with her shoulder as they were dragged towards sea again. "I saved your pack and put it with my poetry so it wouldn't get more wet."

Relief rushed through North Pyongan like the waves that carried them forward. "You did?"

Liaoxi nodded vigorously. "I tried to find and rescue you, but when I couldn't, I hoped your book would do."

She suddenly turned away from him, gripping tight to the raft, and he remembered the way she had shouted his name as he was sent flying.

"It wasn't your responsibility to help me," he told her. "I should have been able to rescue myself."

Liaoxi still didn't look at him. "I'm glad I could at least save your book."

Letting her change the subject back, he said, "I... hope you didn't hurt yourself getting it." When she said she hadn't, he looked at the dark cliffside. "Thank you. I know it's silly, but..."

"It means a lot to you."

He nodded, a bit ashamed. "I know F- Pak Chae-eun betrayed me, and it isn't like the Bible is hard to get a new copy of, but..." He fiddled with the edge of the raft.

"There's memories between its pages," Liaoxi said understandingly. "I could get a new rifle, but it wouldn't feel like 'mine' for ages."

It was a bit more than that. That little brown Bible had been the thing he held onto when his sister was recovering from one of her concussions, and what he clutched as she threw herself into the ring to get another. He had held it close as the Kempeitei closed in on the empty farmhouse to punish his sister for taking a life, and hid it under his pillow in the prison cell as they awaited their sentence. When he had left Anju and his sister behind, that Bible was the only thing he had, the only guarantee that things would work out, that justice would prevail and they would all be safe one day.

It was foolish, even from the Christian side of it. He didn't need a material object to receive God's love and protection. He just needed his belief.

But he felt better knowing that it wasn't lying at the bottom of the East Sea.

And his Party membership card was still in there. Korea would gut him if he lost that.

He nodded to Liaoxi. "Thank you, really. Even if it got wet. It's happened before. I can dry it."

He knew even if the pages started to mold, Hwang would be able to fix it.

Liaoxi bit her lip as she looked at him, almost seeming to be debating something. He tipped his head at her.

When she spoke her voice was lower than before, making him lean in.

"When earlier I said China was an explanation for my acting, the wrong idea on you I might've been enacting." Her tone was serious, but hadn't dipped into that different cadence she had used before. "My sister and I were acting long before we met him; 'tis our own whim."

North Pyongan raised an eyebrow. "And would China want you to tell me that?"

"Maybe he wouldn't," she confessed. "But I want you to know that my Countryhuman also wouldn't make me do anything he shouldn't."

Liaoxi appeared to consider her words for a moment, then said, "Well, 'shouldn't' he definitely has done in lore." Her white eyes met his again. "But he would never make me change who I am at my core."

North Pyongan looked away, his shoulders hunching. Liaoxi didn't say anything else, and they lapsed into silence, leaving only the crashing of waves between them.

After maybe an hour, a rock fell into the water beside them, and North Pyongan looked up to see the shadow leaning over the cliff again. His heart leapt as another one joined it.

He moved to climb the cliff, but the shade beckoned him to stay, and both of the people above began to descend.

As they got closer, North Pyongan could make out a few details on the second man. A lanky frame, short dark hair, and weathered brown skin.

"That's the man that was with the captain that night," Liaoxi noted. "The explosives expert, right?"

North Pyongan nodded. Their original plan had been to distract the force protecting the observation post before eliminating the post itself, using the dynamite the man had brought in his waterproof bag. Though he noted with concern that he wasn't carrying one as he dropped into the water. He hoped he had only left it up above.

"Comrade." He reached over to clasp his forearm and pull him closer, all four of them squeezed onto one side of the raft, tipping it precariously. "I'm glad you made it. Where's Captain Ko Man-jo?"

His heart sank as Jon Kong-mo's eyes flickered.

"Bastards got him the first night we were here," he spat. "They were on alert, caught us coming over the cliffside. Shot him dead before he could even draw his gun. Would've got me, too, 'cept he booted me down soon as he saw 'em."

North Pyongan closed his eyes, grief staking his chest.

Another comrade from the war against Japan, gone.

"Ssi-bal," Pak Ga-ram cursed.

"You come to get me outta here?" Jon Kong-mo asked.

North Pyongan hesitated, then shook his head. "No. We came to finish the mission."

"Good." The man spat into the water. "I wantta toss those bastards into the sea."

"It's good that you're alive," Liaoxi said, leaning around North Pyongan. "But did your cargo also survive?"

The man paused. "Yuh. That it did."

"Comrade Jon's also been staking the island out," Pak Ga-ram chimed in. "I only made it to the boats before he found me."

"Thought he was one of the bastards creeping around," Jon Kong-mo grunted. "'Bout near fell to my knees when I saw the uniform."

"I thought I was about to be killed," the other sailor said.

The older man waved a hand. "I wasn't gonna hurt you. Just had to use the knife to make sure you didn't scream."

"Could you give us a situation report?" North Pyongan asked, before realizing it probably should have been an order. 'Give me a situation report,' that was what Korea always said. Or just 'Situation report.' Or 'sit-rep,' if it was his sister.

"Sure." Jon Kong-mo leaned over Pak Ga-ram. "'Bout twenty-five, thirty men up there. Hard to get a solid count, but I wasn't getting under or over those numbers."

Probably a task force and some attached communications specialists. At best, twenty-five to four. North Pyongan tried not to wince at that.

"Terrain here's sort of uneven," the man continued. "You know?"

He nodded. Part of his training had been going to all the strategic islands around the northern half of the Peninsula with Korea, surveying them from coast to coast. He let the man explain the layout to Liaoxi and Pak Ga-ram.

The north of Guk Island was raised higher than the south, ledges and crags dipping shallowly above the cove they were in before climbing back into a lower hill on the side facing Kuge-ri. The only parts that was slightly flatter were the southwest sector, where the cliffs sloped down to a less-forested swath, and a small section of shore that was just beyond the southern spur of rock that hid their cove. The latter was where the enemy had apparently moored their boats.

"Motorboats?" North Pyongan asked, and the man nodded.

"Two of 'em. And the post itself with all the fancy equipment's up in the northwest."

Just like reconnaissance had said. The high elevation and angle were perfect for keeping an eye on the harbour.

"No barracks," Jon Kong-mo finished. "They've just set up tarp shelters nearby."

North Pyongan bobbed his head, absorbing that. After a long moment of silence, he realized the other three were looking at him. He blinked.

"Orders, Captain?" Pak Ga-ram prompted.

Oh.

The province's neck twitched, but he thought of SJ and resisted the urge to glance sideways. He knew his sister wasn't there.

"Alright," he said, immediately hearing South Pyongan calling him lame in his mind. "We're outnumbered. But we don't need to take out the entire task force. We just need to destroy their equipment. We can still use the dynamite for that."

Jon Kong-mo nodded, tapping his fingers in the water covering the raft. Liaoxi eyed him.

"So... let's work out a plan." Maybe not the most commanding tone he could've used. But there was nothing wrong with looking for ideas from comrades.

Over the next hour, they threw suggestions at each other, shooting them down or modifying them, until they had a rough plan sketched out.

"It could just about work," Jon Kong-mo said after pondering it one last time. "If we get real lucky."

"Of course we'll get lucky," Pak Ga-ram joked, nudging North Pyongan. "We have god on our side, don't we, comrade?"

That hadn't stopped the sampan fleet from being destroyed.

"It will be dangerous," North Pyongan pointed out. "We might not be able to..." He trailed off, knowing that wasn't something a commander should say.

'You can only believe in them.'

"You could die," he said instead, looking between the two human men and Liaoxi.

"I should be in the most danger," the Chinese province said. "And to that I am no stranger."

"If I wasn't willing to die for my country, I wouldn't be in the army," Jon Kong-mo dismissed.

Pak Ga-ram removed a hand from the raft to place on his chest. "Captain Ko risked his life to save mine. Who would I be if I didn't do the same to avenge him? And I know we'll succeed. Not because we're blessed by god."

As the sea sent them into the rocks again, he clapped that hand on North Pyongan's shoulder, his teeth flashing.

"Because we have our captain here."

He was putting too much faith in him when North Pyongan had allowed himself to be tricked, and gotten their comrades killed. When Pak Ga-ram had been the one that had to rescue him.

But if he was putting that faith in North Pyongan, then he had to do his best to be worthy of it.

He closed his eyes. "Then we have our plan."

"How're you three doing?" Jon Kong-mo asked as the younger soldier regripped the raft. "Do you think you could spend another night out here?"

North Pyongan exchanged glances with the other two. "If we had to. Why?"

"I think you should give your firearms time to dry," the man replied. "We're already outgunned. It'd be best if we weren't out of guns."

"Are yours in good condition?"

"Only got dunked once for about an hour," Jon Kong-mo replied. "Had to hide in the sea from those bastards. Not ideal, but I've been putting everything out whenever I've seen sun these past few days, so hopefully they'll fire right."

While modern bullets were more protected from water by their metal casings than when firearms had just required gunpowder, being soaked for as long as theirs had could still definitely be detrimental for them. If the powder had gotten wet, the cartridges might be defective, either making it so the primers wouldn't detonate, causing the powder to burn unevenly, affecting accuracy, or swelling them too much to leave the chamber at all.

"If you can hold out, I'll spend tomorrow watching over your weapons while they dry," Jon Kong-mo said. "I'll go through all your ammunition and toss any bunk ones. That way we'll at least stand a chance."

"What do you think?" North Pyongan asked Liaoxi and Pak Ga-ram.

"Having my Type 49 would make me happy," the man said. "I'd be willing to deal with another day of being brined for it."

"Another twenty-four hours?"

Pak Ga-ram hesitated, then nodded, his lips firm. "I can do it."

"If you can so do, then I can, too," Liaoxi agreed.

"Is there any chance Comrade Pak Ga-ram could at least spend the day on the island?" North Pyongan asked Jon Kong-mo, who shook his head.

"Place is too small. It's hard enough for me to keep moving around without being spotted, and I don't have a gimp leg. If you weren't seen today, you should stick here."

"I'll be fine," Pak Ga-ram cut in. "I don't need to move much for my part, anyways."

Should they take the risk? They were only going to grow hungrier and thirstier. And weaker.

But they did need any advantage they could get. And another day might allow his brain to finish fixing itself.

"Then we'll wait," North Pyongan decided. "But do you have any water?"

"I've got a canteen left," Jon Kong-mo said. "Took Captain Ko's off him when he died. I'll toss it down."

"What happened to the captain's body?" the province ventured.

The man grimaced. "Bastards fished him up and took him. Probably dumped him at sea."

"Pray for the bliss of the dead," North Pyongan murmured. That was fine to say. Even if Korea didn't like it, it was cultural.

"Should probably pray for us, too, while you're at it."

"Who needs prayers?" Pak Ga-ram grinned. "We have dynamite."

Jon Kong-mo dipped his head, then started to swim for the cliff. "I'll come by after nightfall tomorrow. Then we'll make these sons of bitches pay."

He left his canteen with them, along with the men's jackets (Liaoxi understandably not wanting to be left in her white undershirt), then disappeared into the night.

Liaoxi stared up after him.

"Well," North Pyongan said, trying to not sound like he was on the verge of passing out. "Here goes another night."

They did their best to sleep in shifts, with him going first. He felt awkward being pressed in so close to Liaoxi, but every time he attempted to move away, she shivered and wormed closer. Without the swimming to warm them, the night sea had started to get too cold for comfort.

And she had to keep her head on his shoulder, he reasoned. They didn't have the bag anymore. Pak Ga-ram was doing it, too, so it was fine. Manners didn't matter as much when survival was on the line.

When it was his turn to rest, he traded places with her, both of them having wordlessly agreed to let the injured sailor rest longer. He felt even more awkward putting his head on her shoulder, but it didn't stop him from passing out.

His dreams were scattered and confusing- Korea's disapproving glare, his Tokarev slammed down between them, his sister's eyes shining with an emotion he never saw from her, Pak Chae-eun staring into his soul, money in hand- interspersed with periods of that same black nothingness he had experienced while drowning.

He thought of SH in the hospital, twitching and crying out in her sleep, refusing to let herself slip into a recuperative coma. He couldn't either. He needed to heal, but he needed to be ready to lead more.

Occasionally he could feel someone pulling him closer as the world tilted, keeping him from sliding into the waves again, until an arm was wrapped around his shoulders, holding him in place, and a quiet hum vibrated against his side.

The day passed in disconnected fragments, like a film reel that had been spliced and put back together. Waking, trading places with Liaoxi or Pak Ga-ram, being tugged to and fro by the ocean like a piece of debris until he was able to close his eyes again and be plunged back into his dreams and that emptiness.

When he finally opened his eyes to the sunset again, he was relieved to find that his thoughts had finally washed ashore, no longer feeling like they were swirling about at sea. Perhaps not completely recovered, but enough to act.

Pak Ga-ram had nudged him awake. "Almost time."

Liaoxi was yawning into his other shoulder, rubbing sleep from her eyes. "Comrades. I must say..." She blinked blearily, then gave up. "I don't feel well at all."

"I heard you gagging earlier," Pak Ga-ram confirmed.

"Just bile."

"Still vile."

A small smile crossed Liaoxi's lips before she groaned. "My strength hasn't been made to bend. But I'm quite ready to ascend."

North Pyongan looked up, seeing a dark shape lean over the edge, making a hand gesture. "Good. Let's go."

He made them do a few stretches to limber up, then they all pushed off of the raft, catching onto the wall. He waited until the other two had started up to join them.

The rocks were slippery, but his fingers were too pruned to even feel it. They were so wrinkled that he had to wonder if the deep grooves of his finger pads actually gave him extra traction. They made it up without incident at least, and North Pyongan had never been relieved to leave the sea, let alone this relieved.

Liaoxi moaned happily, immediately falling to her knees and placing her forehead on the ground. Pak Ga-ram joined her, vigorously kissing the leaf litter under the trees.

"I'm quitting the Navy," he fervently promised. "I'm quitting and joining the ground force and when we're Reunified I'm moving to North Chungcheong. I never want to see the sea again."

"I've always wanted to visit Xinjiang," Liaoxi agreed, muffled by the mulch.

"Landlubbers," North Pyongan remarked quietly, doing more stretches to regain his land legs as he scanned the trees.

"If you two are done with the dramatics, we've got some Yanks to kill." Jon Kong-mo gestured a hand to the ground, where he'd laid out their firearms. "Now, I disassembled 'em all, rubbed 'em down with my shirt, and left 'em to dry since last night. Plucked a few rounds outta the magazines if they looked too swollen, but that doesn't necessarily mean the ones left are good. Don't fire a shot and expect it to hit. And I'd save the 7.62x25mm cartridges for the Type 49s and 50. Tokarevs jam on the best of days. They can't be counted on if they've been soaked."

North Pyongan nodded. Korea was always reminding them of that.

"Your Mosin's the best off, little lady." Jon Kong-mo nodded to Liaoxi. "All the ammunition looks good. But you've only got twenty rounds."

"I didn't bring much of a supply," she admitted. "On my submachine I was expecting to rely."

"You'll still need to." Jon Kong-mo handed her the Type 50. "The rounds in your drums were mostly up to shape, but the loose ones were worse off. I'd say you have enough for one reload."

"If you give the signal, I'll buy you time to rest and do it," North Pyongan promised. "And if I hear you switch to your pistol, I'll come back you up."

Liaoxi nodded, accepting her Mauser C96 back, along with two magazines worth of stripper clips. Eighteen rounds, plus almost three drums worth of submachine cartridges, and twenty bullets for her rifle, although using it while she was being chased would be difficult.

"Comrade North Pyongan, I'll swap my Type 14 for your Tokarev. It might jam on me, but if you do your job right, that won't matter."

"I will," he vowed, accepting the Nambu Type 14, slightly disdainfully.

'Japanese.' Just because they were common in the army, didn't mean he had to enjoy it. It was the reason he used a Tokarev, despite the jamming issues. Korea had never said so out loud, but he thought his reasoning might be the same.

"And you'll take my Type 49. Comrade Pak, here's yours." Jon Kong-mo handed them their weapons.

"Are you sure you'll be alright with just a pistol?" North Pyongan asked as the man holstered his TT-33.

"So long as Comrade Pak watches my back right while I do what I've gotta." He clapped the younger soldier on the shoulder.

Pak Ga-ram saluted seriously. "With my life."

Jon Kong-mo considered him for a moment, then nodded. "Well, we're all set then. Me and Comrade Pak will scout the perimeter while you two get loaded up. C'mon, boy, let's get those legs of yours working again."

He took the other man away while the provinces got ready, North Pyongan happy to slide on his now dry jacket, though he felt a bit guilty that Liaoxi was still completely soaked.

"He's hiding something, that Jon Kong-mo," the Chinese province said as the Korean checked his straps.

He blinked at her. "What?"

Liaoxi closed her ammo pouch, her eyes on the dark trees. "That I don't know."

"How can you tell?"

"The way he chews on the corner of his lip. It let's his guilt slip."

North Pyongan frowned. "Comrade Jon Kong-mo was in the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army."

'And Pak Chae-eun saved my life.'

He shook his head, trying to brush the doubts away. "If he was going to betray us, why wouldn't he have done it last night? All he would've had to do was lead them over to the cliff edge, and we would be fish in a barrel."

"I'm not saying he'll lead us to our doom," Liaoxi corrected. "Just that he's feeling some sort of gloom."

"I believe you," North Pyongan quickly assured her. She had caught Kim Pan-suk's lie, after all. "I'll keep an eye out."

Liaoxi nodded, finishing adjusting her firearms. She looked down her Mosin-Nagant's scope in satisfaction.

North Pyongan's pack was still wet inside, so he slid his Bible into his jacket's inner pocket. He hesitated, then removed his Party membership card, tucking it into his breast pocket, which could actually button shut.

He was not going to be chided by Korea for losing it. He had already lost his Type 49, and now had to leave his soaked pack to avoid being weighed down.

"You should let me take the bulk of them," he tried, not for the first time. "You should stay hidden until you're drier."

"I won't be dry anytime soon." Liaoxi wrung a cup's worth of water from her tunic. "Don't worry- I can still run like the winds of a monsoon."

He watched her preen at her own rhyme. "Alright. But if you need a break, switch places with me."

"Depending on how things fall, we might not have a say in it at all." Liaoxi straightened as the soldiers returned.

"Just three down by the boats," Jon Kong-mo reported. "Easy to take care of, but they'll probably send more to defend 'em once things start going."

North Pyongan tried to see if he could see some sign of whatever made Liaoxi think he was hiding something. He looked grim, and Pak Ga-ram was sober, but they were about to go up against at least twenty-five men.

He thought of those broadcasts from the south, the ones that had said Korea had killed hundreds of enemy soldiers in Seoul. His Countryhuman refused to confirm or deny whether they were sheerly propaganda.

But the fact that North Pyongan could easily believe it, while he wondered how their squad of four could possibly eliminate two dozen men, said something.

"Well, let's get going." Jon Kong-mo had a long bag in hand now, the waterproof one with the explosives in it. "No more talking.

Sound travels."

He started off, and Liaoxi slid after him. North Pyongan went to follow, before a hand landed on his shoulder.

"Comrade." Pak Ga-ram looked at him, eyes gleaming in the moonlight. "I just wanted to say thank you for believing in us. That we can do this."

"Of course," North Pyongan said, a bit of guilt surging at his initial hesitance. "I... know we can."

His comrade nodded seriously. "I'll do whatever it takes to complete our mission for Comrade Korea and the Supreme Commander. I promise."

The province dipped his head, and they slid into the trees.

Every step needed to be soft and measured to avoid disturbing the leaf litter. On an island with no large animals, even the snap of a twig would be cause for alarm.

North Pyongan grazed his boots along the ground, not putting his weight down until he was sure there weren't any sticks or particularly crunchy dead leaves under them. Jon Kong-mo had practice from four days of hiding, navigating with ease, while Liaoxi moved with light, precise steps. Pak Ga-ram had the hardest time, not only weak from the days lost at sea, but from his injury. Liaoxi had to support him.

They didn't go far before they split, the three going towards the north, and North Pyongan turning south. Pushing aside his worries, he stalked though the island foliage, the faint moonlight painting dappled shadows beneath the canopies as mist started to rise between the trunks.

Around the rest of the island, the trees grew right up until the steep edges. But on the southern side, a patch had been cleared to provide an unloading zone for the materials the enemy had hauled up from below to build the observation post.

It would've been difficult to transport the wood, tin, and equipment necessary all the way up the island. And if things went well, now all that effort would go to waste.

He could hear his sister's offended voice. 'Blowing things up without me? C'mon!'

If she had known this mission would involve dynamite, nothing would have convinced her to stay back.

North Pyongan got down on his stomach, careful not to cast a shadow over the cliff edge.

On the small spit of water-level shore below stood three Americans, idling around a couple motorboats moored to the island by metal spikes drilled into the rock.

"Fog's heavy tonight," one remarked, tapping the ashes of a cigarette onto the ground.

"What?" one asked loudly.

"Ah said 'Fog's heavy tonight,'" the first loudly repeated. "God, are you deaf?"

"Cut him some slack, Carolina," the third said, his eyes fixed on the sea. "No one can hear anything with these waves. Just keep your eye out for the Reds."

"They ain't going to try anythin' else after we gave their fleet a mommuckin' like that," Carolina grumbled.

"What?"

He shot a exasperated glare at the second man as the third said, "I don't know. I saw a few of those little wooden boats trolling the waters yesterday."

That got North Pyongan's attention. A search party sent by Korea?

He looked towards the mainland, but the cooling night had coaxed fog out of it, and the still warm, sticky temperature was draping a heavy veil of mist over the East Sea to match.

"They might take advantage of the fog to strike again."

The second man shivered, but Carolina just shook his head. "You're just on edge from that big guy we took out. They were just fishahmen."

"We can't risk it," the second man muttered, almost too low for North Pyongan to hear. "We should've called a strike in. Blew them out of the water, too."

"They were just fishahmen." Carolina's growl echoed up the cliffside. "My pa's a fishahman. You want to blow him outta the watah, Boots?"

"What? How does that make any sense?"

North Pyongan listened to them bicker as he waited, Nambu in hand, the long muzzle trained on them. When he was sure it had been long enough, he aimed down the sight at Boot's head. Unlike his companions, he wasn't wearing a helmet.

He hesitated, looking at 'Carolina,' who had lit another cigarette. He seemed more moral than the other two, or at least more so than Boots.

The face of the boy from Anju flickered through his mind. He wished...

But he had to complete the mission. And while the man was against killing civilians, he wasn't against killing the rest of their comrades who were fighting for freedom, people who would still be civilians if they hadn't had to take up arms to defend their families and country. He wasn't against this war that had murdered thousands.

North Pyongan wouldn't have hesitated if he was Japanese, opposite the way that Carolina only wanted to spare fishermen because his father was one. He had to stop viewing the Western soldiers as any different. Japan may have tortured their country for decades, but America would do the same if given the chance.

He could regret the death of Pak Myong-sol, he could regret that his fear for his sister might have caused him to kill someone that could've been turned back to the right path, one of their people. He could regret that he had to kill. But he couldn't regret what this was.

Justice.

Boots' head exploded in a shower of blood, the crimson droplets glistening like rubies in the mist. Before the other two could react, so had the lookout's. He had been watching for a threat from the sea, unaware that it was already here.

Carolina had time to move, drawing his pistol, lunging for cover instinctively. But there was no cover on the isolated patch of shore. North Pyongan waited until the man's magazine had been emptied trying to buy himself time, then stepped back to the edge of the cliff.

He looked down, meeting the American's eyes in the shadow of his helmet.

It took three shots to kill him, one in the chest as he reloaded, one jammed in the chamber and swiftly removed, and a final one as he raised his pistol again, catching him in the face.

North Pyongan closed his eyes, uttering a shaky breath as he fought the urge to cross himself.

He didn't have time to decide if he should pray for the man's soul. From across the island came the crack of a sniper rifle, followed by the rattle of submachine guns.

North Pyongan inhaled, long and deep, then turned and plunged into the woods.

The trunks of most of the trees were too slender to hide behind, so he settled for a patch of undergrowth, waiting crouched on the balls of his feet, ready to spring, gritting his teeth as he listened to the shouts and gunfire to the near north as Liaoxi tested the main force, drawing them into the darkness under the trees and away from the observation post.

Part of him still said be should have been the one to run, but he knew they had made the right decision. Even soaking wet, Liaoxi was lighter on her feet than him. And he knew he still wasn't fully recovered.

But when a shout of victory came as one of the American men thought he'd hit his target, North Pyongan's heart stopped beating, only starting again when be heard fire returned.

It was barely a few minutes before the pounding of boots and clank of firearms charged towards him, heading for the shore as they shouted for their lookouts. North Pyongan waited until the bulk of them had passed before popping up, firing with his Type 49, catching one of the last men before diving back into the undergrowth.

His heart pounded as he tried to shelter behind one of the thin trees, bullets spraying around him. He flinched as wood chips flew from the trunk he was behind, showering his lap.

Behind him, one of the men shouted, "Hold fire!" and the group went silent.

North Pyongan could hear the clink of their guns as they surveyed the dark woods.

"Moore, Harris, go check the boats."

The province wanted to pray as he heard footsteps jogging away, but instead he sprang up, firing near-blind at the shadows under the moonlight. Someone cried out, someone barked to, "Return fire!" and North Pyongan gritted his teeth as a bullet grazed his shoulder as he dove aside.

He didn't stop, rolling back to his feet and sprinting after the men he could still hear running for the cliffside, relieved when he heard the man in charge order the squad to hold their fire to avoid hitting their own.

North Pyongan sprinted the ten metres to the edge of the island, pursued by at least six soldiers. He didn't look back, forcing his aching legs to keep moving. One of the men ahead turned around, eyes widening as he pulled his gun, and the province didn't hesitate, pumping his torso full of bullets. He fell back, over the edge of the cliff, and North Pyongan barrelled into the other before he could react, shoving him after him.

There was no point in trying to take a hostage. He knew he was too weak right now to restrain one of the huge, well-fed foreigners.

Without waiting to hear the man's neck break, he turned and ran back into the woods, bullets whistling by him.

He leaped, rolled, jumped up and fired, getting a few rounds off, possibly eliminating another target, before the Type 49 clicked, jammed.

'Please please please.'

North Pyongan didn't have time to fix it, forced to flee as the four or five men left pursued.

If he was Korea or his sister, maybe he could have taken them all at once in melee. But he knew he stood no chance.

He pulled his pistol, firing behind him, hearing his bullets strike wood. He had to keep them on him and away from the boats.

The clatter of stone echoed over the island with the gunshots. Liaoxi leading her targets down the northern cliff. She had already eliminated enough to change position.

Gunfire sounded from another sector now, the northwest.

"The observation post!" one of the men cried. "It was a trap!"

"Forget the boats," the one in charge barked. "Fall back and protect the post."

They started moving back in a huddle, ready to shoot in any direction if North Pyongan came from it. He quickly unjammed his Type 49, swapped the near-empty drum for the full, then took a deep breath and lobbed something from his belt towards them.

"Grenade!"

The men scattered, and he lunged, gritting his teeth as he fired, trying to get as many as possible before they realized the explosive was defective.

He saw two shades go down before a third caught him in the side. He muffled his cry, refusing to let his gun dip as he finished off the man that had shot him.

When he fell, nothing else moved.

Not around him, anyway. From the heights, he could hear Pak Ga-ram's submachine gun stuttering, and to the near west, down the slope, he could hear the crash of trees as men blundered through the mist, firing at the lithe shadow harassing them.

Feeling his wound until he was almost certain nothing too important had been hit, he started towards her.

Suddenly something slammed into him, sending him to the ground, rolling across it. Twigs lashed his face and hands clawed at him, trying to wrap around his neck. North Pyongan caught sight of wide, furious eyes and bared teeth before they succeeded.

He struggled vainly, trying to pry the meaty fingers off him. But they only tightened, cutting off his air. Already out of breath, the night started to darken more, closing in as he struggled for oxygen, drowning again, this time in dry air.

He knew he wasn't this useless. He knew even if he was weaker than his sister and Korea, he could easily win a grapple against this man if he was in good condition.

But he wasn't. He was starving and dehydrated and exhausted and he had died. He had died and now he was going to die again. No God, no Heaven, only Korea's disappointed glower once he came back to life to find that the others had been forced to complete the mission without him.

The gunshots grew muted as his struggles grew weaker. He didn't want to fight. He didn't want to kill anymore. He didn't want to dirty his soul over and over again until there was nothing worth saving.

He just wanted to rest.

His lids fluttered shut as darkness closed in, and it felt like a relief. Unlike drowning, there would be no point where the water rushed in and he was forced to remember what pain felt like. Only that thick, black nothing as he sank into it.

'You're useless,' Korea's voice decreed, his eyes burning into him with a dark flame on Sobaek Mountain.

'What kind of person are you? The kind that would let our people suffer to avoid getting your 'soul' dirty?'

He wasn't. He knew nothing could leave more of a stain on his soul than standing by and doing nothing as their people suffered. He had fought to save them for years. Even when he didn't truly believe God could forgive him for it, he had fought for them. And it still wasn't enough.

'Pak Jeong-ri. Pak Yun-sung. Choe Ki-bin.'

'They are all dead because of you. Their blood is on your hands.'

Theirs and so many others. Even if they deserved it, even if he would kill them again, he didn't want to. God, he was so tired.

As the darkness drew in, the sensation of hands faded from around his neck, his last bit of air escaping in a sigh.

Finally. He could dream of Party meetings and picnics by the river. Of SH's awful home-cooked meals and dancing with their people. Of living by the water with his sister.

Of peace.

A voice came from a great distance, from the bottom of the world's deepest well. Not Korea's this time, but his, choked and desperate as he and his sister lay together in the darkness of the air raid shelter.

'I know they deserve that same peace.'

They did. Their people deserved to be at peace, all of them. But he couldn't give it to them. He was too weak and naïve and useless, just like Korea said.

He believed in Pak Ga-ram, Jon Kong-mo, and Liaoxi. They could do this without him.

'You want to get more of the people who trust in us, who believe in us killed.'

He didn't. That was why it was better if he just let this happen. If he didn't, he would just end up making another mistake, getting them hurt, like their Yebong Mountain guerrillas, like Liaoxi and Pak Chae-eun.

'You are only allowed to believe in them.'

He did, he did believe in them. But how could he ask them to believe in him when he couldn't even keep a promise to Tae-min and Han-jin?

'I know we'll succeed. Not because we're blessed by god. Because we have our captain here.'

Even if Pak Ga-ram believed in him, he couldn't live up to it. He wanted to, he wanted to so desperately. He wanted to protect him, to protect all of them, but-

His own voice again, dimmer, the well growing deeper by the slowing heartbeat.

'I want them to have peace. I know we have to fight for it.'

'That is what you are for!' Korea's voice shouted down at him, and North Pyongan realized that he was the one drowning in the well, not the voices. 'Protecting our people!'

'I want to!' he cried back, the desperate desire surging inside him. 'I want to prove I'm not useless, I want to be someone they can count on, someone that can protect my sister, my people, my country!'

'Then fight back!'

With a rushing sound, North Pyongan was rocketed out of the darkness of the well, lunging forward, mustering a final desperate energy to grab his attacker's wrists, prying them from his throat.

He threw him back, inhaling with a ragged gasp. He couldn't take more time to recover, throwing himself forward, trying to see past the black spots crowding his vision, trying to make his limbs obey him.

The American recovered before him, tackling him again, pinning him. White flashed across North Pyongan's vision as his fist met his cheek, flooding his mouth with blood. His head rang, but before the man could hit the other, he grabbed his arm, wrenching it aside, sending him tumbling to the leaf litter.

The province jumped on him, and they rolled across the ground while he tried to pry his pistol free of its holster, unused to the shape of the Nambu.

He got on top and finally freed his gun, bringing it down on the American's head, smashing it into his nose and brow and jaw, anything he could, until the province was covered in blood and he had stopped moving.

North Pyongan didn't climb off the dead man. He slumped over, face-first into the ground, before twisting, staring up at the canopy as he panted, deep inhales that made his throat ache.

His vision was still spotting, his hands twitching weakly as he fought for air, fought to live.

His head was still ringing, but under it he could hear the gunshots and shouts.

And then pistol fire, rapid and from the southwest.

'Liaoxi.'

North Pyongan grit his teeth, rolling over, dragging his legs off the corpse as he struggled up, a hand over his bleeding side.

The mission. He had to help her keep the soldiers off their comrades until they were done.

"Again and again, no matter what you suffer in the process," North Pyongan rasped, staggering to his feet.

Even if it was eternal damnation.

He cut off the soldiers attempting to return to the observation post at the cliff, taking them with a spray of fire, using the last of his drum before shoving the now unjammed one in. He darted behind a rock outcrop, leaning out to spray the men as they scattered through the trees.

A surge of fear filled him as he heard more coming his way, and realized he could no longer hear Liaoxi's counterfire.

Had she been calling for back-up for herself, not for stopping the men?

He tried to lunge out of cover, but the enemy kept him pinned down. He could only peek out to return fire, unable to move or find out if the Chinese province was okay.

He had messed up again. He had made the wrong decision and gotten someone in his unit hurt or worse. Someone he cared about. He hadn't been able to protect Liaoxi and he couldn't protect-

As his submachine gun ran empty, one of the enemy soldiers leaped up, raising his.

Suddenly, a bullet took him in the side of the head, and he went down like a sampan at sea.

"She's back!" someone screamed in fear, and North Pyongan's heart soared.

He took out one of the men aiming up the cliff, then with a shower of rock, Liaoxi was dropping down next to him, Jon Kong-mo's waterproof bag over her shoulder.

"Sorry for leaving you with all these pests without permission," she panted, hefting the bag. "But that you could handle it, I had an intuition."

North Pyongan frantically searched her for injuries, but only saw rips in her uniform. "Where were you?"

Bullets pinged off the rocks, and Liaoxi shrank back. "Perhaps that we can talk about that once we're no longer having fun. Our comrades are almost done."

The Korean nodded briskly. "Ammunition?"

"Half a magazine left in this one." She flashed her Mauser, then gestured to the sniper rifle and Type 50 on her back. "And these out of bullets have run."

"Only one magazine left here." He ducked out, shooting one of the shadows in the mist down. "Not enough?"

"I'm afraid it will be tough," Liaoxi confirmed. "Our comrades dealt with theirs- now let's show these ones terror."

They fled from the shadow of the rocks, darting in opposite directions, slicing through the fog like destroyers as bullets hammered around them.

North Pyongan couldn't get a good count, but there could have been ten men in the mist. Since Pak Ga-ram had managed to deal with those guarding the observation post, these should be all that was left.

If they hadn't gotten the chance to call for back-up.

One problem at a time. North Pyongan hissed as a bullet glanced off his arm.

The two provinces criss-crossed over the small island, leading the soldiers in circles through the woods, firing the occasional shot to keep the enemy from thinking they had run out of ammo.

But soon his pistol clicked empty, and from the silence, he knew Liaoxi's had, too.

The soldiers realized it, grouping together now that they weren't in danger of being hit, combing through the woods. North Pyongan hunched in a bush, watching them pass just metres away.

A tap on his back almost made him jump, before relief filled him as he saw who it was.

"Do you have any ammo left?" Jon Kong-mo whispered urgently, crouched behind him. The province shook his head, and his jaw feathered.

Wordlessly, he gestured him to be quiet, slowly army-crawling away. North Pyongan followed, until they emerged at the edge of the island, above the boats.

Liaoxi was already waiting there, and wasted no time in sliding down the knotted rope the Americans had used to climb the cliff, the two men immediately following.

"Got any ammo left?" Jon Kong-mo demanded.

"None. I'm done," Liaoxi said, quickly setting about to untying one of the boats from its moorings.

The man closed his eyes, then quietly turned to dismantling the motor of the other.

North Pyongan went to help, before halting.

"Where is Comrade Pak Ga-ram?"

Jon Kong-mo straightened. As he turned, his expression was heavy enough to sink North Pyongan's heart.

"I didn't tell you everything about the explosives," he wearily admitted. "When I went under, the dynamite got soaked. The blasting caps were screwed. Someone has to detonate them by hand."

North Pyongan's lips parted, horror filling him. "Why didn't you-?"

"I know enough people that've worked with Comrade Korea," the man said, returning to the boat engine. "I knew you wouldn't let one of us take the risk. I told the kid, and he said he'd do it. He wouldn't be like to make it down here with that leg, anyhow."

Jon Kong-mo couldn't keep the clinical tone he was attempting. The grief bled in as he said, "He's waiting for the Yanks to come in. Then he'll take 'em all out with the post."

'I'll do whatever it takes to complete our mission.'

North Pyongan whirled for the rope. "I need to go get him."

"If you had any ammo, I'd say go for it," the man said, finishing with the motor. "The more range he has, the better chance he's got of surviving. But you're both out. All he's got is your Tokarev."

The provinces were silent.

He nodded grimly. "Someone's got to trigger it if we want to make sure these bastards don't just fix up the damage the little lady did. And with that gun..." He shook his head. "I wouldn't give him much of chance. He'll need to be close."

North Pyongan wanted to demand why he wouldn't have let their comrade keep the Mauser or the Nambu then.

But he knew. They had needed the good guns to buy time for the explosives to be rigged, and to keep themselves alive. Just like North Pyongan would have prioritized the two men, they had prioritized their Provincehuman. He and Liaoxi had needed the accuracy and reliability.

But even if the Tokarev's accuracy was affected by the water, it wouldn't matter. It only had to fire, once. All Pak Ga-ram needed was a spark.

"We'll bring the boat by that side," Jon Kong-mo said, not looking at him. "See if he can make it down."

Was there really no other way? Why couldn't they have told him? He could have conserved his ammunition.

But he had already been trying to conserve it. And Jon Kong-mo had been worried he wouldn't take a shot he needed to for himself if he was worrying about Pak Ga-ram.

He had wanted to save him. To save both of them. He knew sometimes victory required sacrifices, but to have one like this, when all they needed was more-

He jerked around at the same time Liaoxi did, reaching out as she tore her sniper rifle from her back.

"Get in the boat," he ordered, lunging for the rope with her gun in hand. "Meet us on the other side."

Jon Kong-mo was startled. "Where are you-?"

North Pyongan was already gone, sprinting through the woods, sliding down the southwestern slope to run across flatter ground, trying to head off the soldiers he could hear storming back towards the observation post.

His heart beat hard, his lungs and legs burning, and he fell to his knees several times as he crossed the rocky island. He reached the cliffs, scrambling up, kicking stones free. He tripped, his chin slamming painfully off the ground, pain cracking up his jaw.

His head spun, but he forced himself up, nails tearing on the rocks, until he was finally at the top.

"Comrade!" he shouted, and he could hear the men close behind redouble their pace. "Wait!"

He tore through the trees until he finally burst into another cleared area by the cliffside where a wooden building with a tin roof sat, dead bodies scattered around it. He ran, ripping the door open to reveal a bank of machinery that looked like it had been torn apart, wires protruding from open panels, with sticks of dynamite arranged around the room.

Pak Ga-ram sat on the floor by a stack of them, the muzzle of his Tokarev pressed to the explosives.

He blinked, face paling. "Comrade North Pyongan?

"We need to leave." He grabbed him by the arm, hauling him up.

"The mission-"

"We will complete the mission!" he barked, panic surging in him as the enemy closed in, howling for blood. "But you are coming with me, and that is an order."

Pak Ga-ram allowed himself to be dragged from the post, cowed. Bullets thudded into it as they slid around the side, North Pyongan dragging the injured man for the cliff, a sinking feeling tightening his chest as he realized there was no way they could make it around the building to escape into the forest.

"Jump," North Pyongan told his comrade, hefting Liaoxi's rifle.

"But-!"

"Now! Please!"

He didn't turn, but he heard Pak Ga-ram take a deep breath and hobble as fast as he could for the edge.

Praying the man wouldn't smash into the cliffside on the way down or be crushed against the rocks before the boat could come, North Pyongan raised the Mosin-Nagant to his eye, focusing on the shack a good distance away. To his relief, one of the enemy bullets had shattered the window before they'd realized what had been done to their post and ceased fire, leaving his shot clear.

He inhaled, trying to stop his hands from trembling as he looked down the scope, aiming for a bundle of dynamite sticks nestled amongst the machinery.

'Please don't let it misfire, please don't let it jam, please-'

He pulled the trigger of the 'empty' gun, and suddenly the observation post was engulfed in a fireball, the unstable dynamite triggered by the spark of the bullet Liaoxi always kept in reserve.

Relief exploded in his heart the same way the flames exploded from the window, blowing boards out and sending the tin roof spinning into the sky, washing his face with heat. Above the rise of explosions, the soldiers shouted and cursed in rage, and North Pyongan spun on a heel, charging for the edge of the cliff.

His stomach swooped as he threw himself from it, clutching Liaoxi's rifle tight as he plunged towards the dark waves forty feet below. He had no time to spot Pak Ga-ram before he was slamming into the surface of the water, the impact almost driving the breath from him again.

But he kept it this time, shooting for the surface, breaking free with a gasp. He kept one hand tight around the Mosin as he scanned the waves, trying to find his comrade in the thick fog.

His hand suddenly went to his jacket, realizing his Bible was getting soaked. Panic shot through him as his hand met nothing.

He had had it at the boats, and he knew it hadn't fallen while running. It had to be here.

He floundered about, trying in vain to spot it in the shadowy waters. His foot brushed something, and he felt a momentary relief before feeling a larger one as he heard splashing.

"Comrade Pak Ga-ram!" he called, before shutting his mouth as bullets started to rain down around them.

He swam towards the splashing, finding the man thrashing about, sputtering and coughing as his head dipped underwater. He must have passed out from the impact.

North Pyongan grabbed him, kicking desperately to stay afloat with one hand on the gun and the other supporting his comrade, trying to swim out of reach of the enemy, even as he felt himself being pulled under again.

Not even church hymns had ever sounded as beautiful as the rumble of the motorboat as it rounded the island, speeding towards them.

"Here!" North Pyongan cried, thrusting Liaoxi's rifle out of the fog, praying he didn't get them shot.

The boat skidded up, and hands reached down, Liaoxi and Jon Kong-mo hauling up Pak Ga-ram, then North Pyongan. He hesitated, looking down into the dark water, then allowed them to pull him up.

He flopped into the boat, immediately starting chest compressions on Pak Ga-ram as Jon Kong-mo threw himself at the wheel, Liaoxi starting the motor so he could get them out of there.

They made a sharp turn back towards the mainland, speeding away from Guk Island as bullets sank uselessly into the sea behind them.

He could see lights to the west, a destroyer coming to investigate the explosion. But by the time it reached here, they would already be back on shore.

"I can't believe you got him and pulled that off!" Jon Kong-mo shouted over the rush of wind, filled with disbelief and joy. "I thought you said you were out of ammo?"

Liaoxi laughed sheepishly, and as Pak Ga-ram turned over, starting to cough out water, North Pyongan smiled tiredly.

"Ammunition is like lifeblood," he said to the man. "You would not say you were out only when it ceased to flood."

He met Liaoxi's eyes, and they both burst into wild laughter, much to Jon Kong-mo's bemusement.

"We did it?" Pak Ga-ram rasped from the floor, barely audible.

"We did," North Pyongan confirmed, almost disbelievingly.

The man smiled. "I knew we could. I believed-"

His eyes rolled back in his head, and he passed out again.

"He'll be fine," Jon Kong-mo said. The words were heavy with relief. "He's a tough kid."

North Pyongan barely heard him. He felt giddy, his heart full to bursting. They had actually competed their mission! He had led them to victory without losing a single person from their surviving squad. He couldn't wait to tell his sister. And Korea-

He fell backwards, staring up at the stars as they danced and twirled, hearing Liaoxi say something from a great distance. But he wasn't back in the well. This dark didn't feel like nothing. It felt full and warm.

His last thought was that maybe Pak Ga-ram had been right after all.

If North knew how many people have psychic conversations with him, it would piss him off so much.

Also I started crying watching the video of the new resort in Wonsan. At the same time as these chapters are going on, Wonsan (and the entire coast) were going on six months of being under constant bombardment. Day and night, constant strikes against the shore. It was blockaded for 861 days. Almost three years. 80% of the city was turned to rubble. 35000 people had lived there, and they were reduced to soldiers running suicide missions from caves to keep the Americans and South Koreans from landing. At this point the DPRK had no Navy, and the only thing they could do was man shore batteries and use sampan to lay mines. The American admiral in charge said, 'In Wonsan, you cannot walk on the streets. You cannot sleep any time in the twenty-four hours unless it is the sleep of death. Today marks the one hundredth day of the siege. It is a city of death.'
And now it's a modern city with a huge beachside resort! They have a fun fair! And a harbour! People can fish there without being blown up! The amazing resilience of humanity!

Eavesdropping

The plane ride hasn't been enough to put out the fire burning in America's belly. It had just made it burn hotter, spreading through his veins as he was forced to sit there and joke with his aides like nothing was wrong, like he hadn't just been fucking bull rushed at his own damn show, like every single rep in that room hadn't just betrayed the very concept of justice itself.

Because finding Red China guilty would have been justice. That Korean broad had convinced him with her story, but after seeing him in that room, he was sure.

He was in Korea.

He'd been too innocent, too bumbling. Everyone else in the room might've had their fucking blinders on, but America knew it was all an act. Because even if he couldn't pin down when the bastard'd been formed, he was sure of one thing- he was a Communist. Giving his gloves away, bringing that bitch and her kid rations, the charity the Reds did to make themselves seem like the good guys, to lure the greedy little working folk in, making 'em think they were entitled to that shit instead of having to work for it.

Red China was a commie to the core. And Communists lied. He had planned for that limp-wrist reporter to intervene with just the perfect evidence he needed. He had killed that woman. Somehow, some way. He knew it.

And those damn knuckleheads at the UN knew it, too. They knew it and they had let him go when they were supposed to vote to find him guilty, after all the effort America had put in to make sure they would. He'd expected the Yugo and the curry-muncher to abstain after they rejected his 'gifts' again, but Brazil, Ecuador, the Netherlands, Turkey, France had all agreed to vote how they should in his follow up calls.

There had only been one he just couldn't seem to get ahold of.

America slammed into the office in his house in Busan, aggressively turning on the lamp and gripping the rotary phone as he dialled the numbers, his blood pounding in his veins like Injun war drums as he held the handset up to his 'ear.' Someone very deliberately picked up on the third ring.

"America."

Like he had known he would be calling. Fuck that pissed him off so much.

"Awfully early to be answering the phone that quick, don't ya think?" he asked brightly, knuckles whitening around the plastic. "What is it, ten in the morning there? Were you expecting a call?"

"Some of us do wake up before one o'clock in the afternoon," Britain sniffed.

"Well, don't worry, I won't keep ya. I just wanted to ask you a little question." America's grip tightened.

"What the fuck was that?"

"Always with the language," Britain sighed. "Am I supposed to know what you are referring to?"

A spike of heat stabbed America's stomach as he growled, "Don't play dumb with me, old man."

Fuck, he'd wanted to work off some of this anger before he called. He hated when the limey bastard knew he'd got under his skin. He could just see that look on his fucking mug, the same one he'd always had whenever America would lose his temper in the old days, watching him stomp his feet and shout. That superior 'holier-than-thou' look as he told him to 'cease throwing tantrums.'

He stormed to the window, throwing it open. Koreans didn't seem to understand the concept of window screens, but he'd take moths in the house over giving Britain the satisfaction of making him flip his wig.

"You know what you did," he said, calmer with the night breeze on him, the nails of his other hand dug into the desk. "That's why you were hiding from me."

"I was not 'hiding from you,'" Britain said in that stupid hoity-toity accent. "I was paying a visit to the countryside."

"All day," America said with false cheer. "While those gorillas of yours in their ugly hats refused to let me in to wait."

"Ah yes. I had heard of that little… altercation." He could hear that condescending eyebrow raise. "Do you really need an explanation as to why a foreign Countryhuman cannot simply walk into Buckingham Palace as he pleases?"

America's jaw creaked. "You don't get to tell me where I can go or what I can to do. I tell you. And I told you to vote Red China guilty."

"And I told you, for the second time might I add, that I have no desire for a war with China," the Brit replied with a touch of exasperation.

"What did you say to them?" the American demanded. "What did you give those yellow-belly bastards to turn them against me?"

They'd been on his side when he called, and the reps had the night before as they smoked in his hotel room. He didn't know when the geezer had got to them, but he knew he had.

"Nothing," Britain sighed. "I did not speak a word to them. I had more important matters to attend to."

"More important than defending the free world?"

"They all simply feel the same way as I do," the other country continued like he hadn't even spoke. "I already imparted on you that if you attempted to bring the United Nations to bear against China, no one would go along with it. Perhaps if you had managed to settle the Korean matter, they might have been convinced.

"But you have not."

Blinding fury shocked through America's body, seizing his muscles, locking his jaw. The phone creaked, the plastic cracking.

That same fucking tone as back then, whenever he'd be dragged to England for an 'audience.' 'Why haven't you been able to produce more agriculture, why haven't you settled more land, why haven't you cleared out the Indians yet, Virginia?' Making judgements from his throne when America was the one on the ground having to do all that shit.

And that same fucking judgemental attitude as South. 'Oh, why weren't your soldiers able to win?' Like his soldiers were the ones turning tail at every opportunity, like his boys were the ones contributing jack-all to this venture. The Brits' greatest claim to fame was that fucking Glaucoma Brigade or whatever holding off the chinks for a few days north of Seoul. And they'd still been fucking shredded by a bunch of farmers, damn near wiped out.

It was America's men doing the goddamn lion's share, America leading the charge, getting his hands dirty, while everyone else sat back and whined about policy and 'international law,' just like always.

"Korea is nothing!" he snapped into the receiver. "Without Red China and CCCP this place wouldn't have a leg to stand on. But if we eliminate them, every single commie regime is done for!"

Crap. Plausible deniability.

But no. He didn't need plausible deniability. The only 'people' that would have a problem with his words were the commies themselves. Anyone else would understand that that was what was right, what was just.

"And how do you expect to eliminate them when you could not even conquer Korea?" Britain spoke slowly, like he was talking to a-

"I could have already," America growled, careful to keep his words vague this time. "But I knew you idiots needed help seeing where the real threat was."

"You have always been like this," the other country sighed, like he was the one being fucking put upon. "You invent these schemes, get yourself tangled up in them, then act as if nothing could ever have possibly gone wrong once you succeed."

"Yeah, because I always do," America shot back. "Does the Revolutionary War ring a bell?"

"Quite," Britain replied scathingly. "But you did not this succeed this time, did you? Perhaps this will finally teach you the lesson that a good punishment evidently never could."

America's hand went slack around the handset.

"I don't need to learn a lesson."

At hearing his tone, the atmosphere on the other side of the phone shifted.

"Beg pardon-"

"You had better beg," America said coldly. "You don't get to teach me lessons anymore*."*

"Son-"

"YOU DON'T GET TO CALL ME THAT!" America exploded, then slammed a fist on his desk, lowering his voice so he wouldn't be heard from the open window.

"I am not your son," he said viciously. "I am the United States of America and you do not control me anymore. I control you."

There was silence from across the sea.

"And you are going to let me," America said, icier. "Because do you know what will happen if you don't?"

There was more silence, before- "Are you threatening me?"

Despite everything, the old bastard still sounded disbelieving, even after America had made him face the truth at their last meeting. Because he'd always been like that. Thinking he was so high-and-mighty, that the world bowed before him and nothing would ever change, even now that he was a doddering old fool sitting on a rotting empire.

"No, no, I'd never do that," America said, suddenly light. "We might not be family anymore, but you're still a democratic nation. It took you awhile to get there, sure, but now that you're here, I'd never threaten you." He paused. "So long as you stay democratic."

He could hear Britain's jaw clench as he read between the lines.

"I'd never threaten you," he said. "But Red China would. If he wins in Korea, if he gets Formosa back, if we allow him to climb out of the cradle and start toddling, who do you think he's gonna head for first?"

His 'father' didn't answer. He smiled.

"I think it would be the country that walloped him in a few wars, don't you?"

"We were both a part of the Eight-Nation Alliance," Britain said stiffly.

"Yeah, but only one of us burned his Summer Palace to the ground. How would you feel if someone torched your big fancy palace?" He let the words linger. "Only one of us is still holding on to the mainland. And only one of us humiliated him for a hundred years. Take it from me."

His voice turned dark. "That leaves a grudge."

"America-"

He cut him off before he could say anything that would just make his blood run hotter. "If CCCP kicked the bucket tomorrow, we could get along with whoever came next. The Russian Empire, he was a good guy. You and him had your differences, hell, I did, too. But you can't deny he was civilized."

His voice lowered. "China isn't. Every single one of their Countryhumans've thought the world belongs to them, that they're God's gift to the Earth."

And they weren't. America was.

"This one isn't any different," he told Britain. "You should've seen the way he was looking at your guy, at all of us. Like we were the savages."

He'd hidden it well, but America knew what hate looked like. And he had seen it in those slanty eyes of his as he smiled at him.

'I'm not the frightened one here.'

The phone protested under his grip as Britain admitted, "The Chinese are quite different from the Russians. The Orient has always been a place of strange morals. I shudder to imagine what thoughts a Communist China might be entertaining."

"Exactly." America thumped his fist on the desk. "The Ruskies could be like us if they wanted to be. But the chinks can't."

Even once their country belonged to America, once he had brought them freedom and democracy and civilization, the Chinese would never be like them.

"We could smother him in his cradle," he said. "If you're willing to risk giving him time to get strong enough to take his revenge.

"Or you could do what I say, and we could put an end to it now."

Another long silence from Britain. America's heart pounded. If the old man said 'no' just to try and prove that he still could, he couldn't stand for it. He would have to go teach him that he hadn't had the power to say 'no' to America in a long time.

"Alright." The word was quiet, almost meek, and it sent a rush of euphoria through the American. "We cannot walk back our current vote. It would not be proper. But if you acquire the evidence to call another… I will vote true."

Reluctance dripped from the words. Not at the idea of crushing

Red China, or even at having to go to war with him. Reluctance that he was giving in. That America had won.

America's chest rose and fell rapidly, his fingers tapping erratically on the desk. But his voice was smooth. "I knew you'd make the right decision. I guess we can let yesterday go then, huh? This time. Since I'm so nice, can I get some thanks?"

He could hear Britain's teeth grinding.

His tone flattened. "You didn't even show up to the vote. How about you thank me for forgiving you?"

"…Thank you, America."

The American's mouth twisted in a wide grin, satisfaction flushing his body. "There we go," he said patronizingly. "'We' use our manners, don't 'we?' Good man. You can run along now."

Before Britain could hang up, he sharpened his voice into a blade of pure ice.

"And if you ever try something like that shit you pulled with your little 'message' again, I am going to prove to you that I am the one on top now. Understand?"

"I do," Britain said wearily.

America went to slam the receiver.

"America."

The man had that fucking note in his voice again, the one he had when he was comparing them in that mirror of his, like he was still oh-so-superior.

America knew he should hang up while he still had the last laugh. His hand tightened on the phone again.

"What?"

"You can pretend that you are no longer my son," the Brit delivered.

“You can pretend that you no longer have anything to do with me. But you can never change that fact that I raised you.” Pride and despair mingled heavily in his upper-class accent.

“Everything you have, you have because of me.”

The anger in America’s stomach flared, bursting through his entire body, filling his skull with red and obliterating the office.

He couldn't let him get the last word, he couldn’t let him know he’d got to him.

“Whatever helps you sleep at night, old man,” he managed casually.

He didn’t bother hanging up. He just grabbed the phone cord, tearing it from the wall. Then he picked up the entire rotary phone and heaved it out the open window, slamming it behind it before slamming his palms on his desk.

That fucking bastard.

He couldn’t think past the pressure in his temples. He knew the limey was just trying to piss him off, trying to make himself feel better, to pretend that he still had some kind of influence.

But the idea that even part of him truly believed that everything America had done, everything he had accomplished, was his, filled him with a monumental fury.

It wasn't. He was the one that had finished off the Indians, he was the one that killed their Tribehumans and made them bend the knee. He was the one that had won his civil war, and their war, the one against Britain. He had beaten him and all his crooked-toothed, tea-drinking fops. He had beaten Nazi Germany and made Japan bow and won World War II. Him, not CCCP, not France, and not fucking Britain.

America was the greatest country in history because of him. Because he was the one with a destiny, he was the one God had given the world to.

“ME!” he screamed at the wall and someone five thousand miles away as the rage burst out of him. *“DO YOU FUCKING HEAR THAT?! I’M THE ONE FIGHTING THIS WAR, I’M THE ONE WILLING TO DEAL WITH RED CHINA, I’M THE ONE THAT’LL TAKE DOWN CCCP AND SAVE THE WORLD. ME! AMERICA!!”

He shoved the desk, sending it and everything on it to the floor, before storming from the room and down the hall.

Grace was on the bed, scrunched up against the headboard. She flinched as he stormed in, already bright-eyed and bushy-tailed, which made the pressure inside his temples throb.

“Why didn’t you come see if I was okay?” he demanded.

Her blue eyes widened. “W-What?”

“Don’t fucking ‘what’ me!” he snapped, ripping off his tie. “You heard me shouting, you heard that fucking crash and you didn’t even call out to ask what it was.”

“I-I’m sorry,” she stuttered, her hick accent bleeding through. “But ah- I- When you’re like this-“

“Like what?” he demanded, advancing on her. “Like what, Grace?”

She drew her knees to her chest and the covers to her chin, infuriating him even more. “Angry,” she said in a small voice.

“I wouldn’t have to be angry if you people would stop making me!” he snarled. “How am I supposed to feel when my girl doesn’t even come check on me after I get back from halfway across the world?”

“I-“

“Do you even care about me, Gracie?”

“Of course ah care about you!” she cried, sitting bolt upright, but still with those stupid blue sheets clutched over her like a shield. “I got you that present, I- I make you dinner, I’m learnin' how to cook for-!”

“So just because you get me shit means I have to ignore it when you treat me like it?” he demanded, looming over the foot of the bed.

“N-No.” She shook her head furiously, long freshly-dyed blonde hair flying. “I’m sorry, I’m so sorry, n-next time I’ll come see, I promise.”

The words sent a new surge of anger through him.

“Next time,” he growled, stalking around to the side of the bed. “It’s always fucking next time, isn’t it?”

‘Next time I will send you candy, next time I will visit. Next time I will vote true.’

“If you just did it this time, we wouldn’t have a problem!” he shouted at Grace.

“I’m sorry, ah d-didn’t- I didn’t know-“

“You should fucking know!” he screamed, and her head went rocketing back as he slapped her, slamming into the oak headboard.

She cried out, slumping over, and he yanked her down on the bed by the thigh, climbing on top of her.

“Stop!” she cried, holding her hands out, useless like always. “Please don’t, please stop-“

“You don’t tell me what to do!” He bared his teeth, seizing her thin wrists and pinning them over her head. “I’m not a fucking kid anymore and none of you get to tell me what to do! I am the United States of America, and I tell you!”

“Ah’m sorry!” Grace sobbed, twisting her face away. “Ah’m so sorry!”

He shouldn’t have made Britain say ‘thank you.’ He should’ve made him apologize, not just for the fucking vote. But he wouldn’t give the bastard the satisfaction of lying to his face.

America sat up suddenly, releasing Grace's hands as he looked down at her, cocking his head.

"Are you afraid of me, Grace?"

The girl stared up at him with those Tennessee sky eyes, tears trembling on the brown lashes. She'd learned her lesson awhile ago. She didn't try to struggle or push him off. Her tongue darted across her lips, pink on Rosy Future.

"Yes," she breathed.

He grit his teeth. What fucking right did she have to be afraid of him? After everything he'd done for her, everything he gave her. The only reason she wasn't in some camp tending to sick gooks was because of him, because he'd saved her.

But she was telling the truth.

"You're a good girl, Gracie," he said softly, reaching down to run his fingers through her hair. "You know that, right?"

Her chest heaved, her lips quivering, unsure of whether she was supposed to deny it or not.

America leaned down, placing a kiss on her forehead, before climbing off her, wiping her sweat from his mouth.

"I'm going out, okay, babe?" he said, heading for the door. "Don't wait up."

He heard her let out a sob before he slammed the bedroom door.

The red-hot anger was still churning inside him, lighting his veins on fire. He could still feel his blood pounding in his head. He needed to take it out on someone.

But not Grace. Not today.

He hadn't meant to kill Angela. But the stock markets had just crashed, and the Panic of 1893 was building. Banks were closing, reserves were running out, companies, companies that America had stocks in, were going bankrupt, and on top of all that, Britain had sent that fucking letter. All he'd wanted was to come home to his girl and have a nice homecooked meal.

And she'd forgotten to thaw the chicken.

As he'd stared down at her on the bed, her green eyes staring lifelessly, and her blonde ringlets spread across the pillow like a halo, he couldn't help but feel like it wasn't her fault. She was only eighteen. You were allowed to make goofs when you were young. And they'd been going steady for two years, and she'd always taken her punishments like a champ. He could've gotten more fun out of her.

It wasn't his fault either, obviously. He wouldn't have done it if she hadn't screwed up. He still would've had to punish her, but it wouldn't have gone that far.

It was Britain's fault. Him and that stupid letter, on the same goddamn paper he'd used in the 1700s with the same red wax seal. On the surface it was a letter of sympathy, but America knew that wasn't why the old man had sent it. He was taunting him, mocking him.

'Looks like your Gilded Age is winding down. It is quite unfortunate, but you did have a good run. There is never any shame in coming home. I look forward to seeing you.'

How had he been supposed to hold back when that was all he was thinking about? How was he supposed to realize Angie had started fighting again when all he could see was red? And how was he supposed to realize she'd stopped when the only thing in his mind was that fucking smug old man sitting behind his desk with his fucking feather quill, waiting for America to come crawling back?

He wouldn't give him the satisfaction of forcing America to get rid of another one before he was ready. He didn't have 'tantrums.' He made decisions. Grace would go when he got bored of her, not before.

He didn't bother grabbing his wallet as he left. Whatever Korean broad he met wouldn't be needing money once he was done with her tonight.

'Perhaps if you had managed to settle the Korean matter. But you have not.'

America grit his teeth.

It wasn't his fault they hadn't won in Korea, he hadn't gotten 'tangled up' in his schemes. Even after Truman had backstabbed him and MacArthur after they'd pulled their Doughboys back to Busan, things still could've worked out. He could've driven the commies back to the Yalu, and gone after Red China from there.

It was North Korea's fault, still holding the line, still acting like he had anything to bargain with when he was just a backwater little peninsula, not even a real player.

He could just picture Red China sliding back into the country like a snake, wrapping his strings- CCCP's strings- around the Nork again. They were laughing at him, he knew. They were laughing about that fucking mummer's farce the chink had put on, and how thoroughly they thought they'd tricked everyone.

But they hadn't tricked America. And they hadn't won.

Fine. If he couldn't have China right now, then he would make sure Korea regretted it.

America wasn't going to let Britain get the better of him, or CCCP, or the United Nations and all those cowards in it, let alone the commies. He wasn't the one that needed to learn his lesson- they were.

Red China would get his punishment for thinking he could threaten the free world and escape justice, and for thinking he had the power to turn down the world's most generous offer from America himself, he would make sure of that. There would be no more offers for him.

And in the meantime, North would learn his lesson.

—

South lay on his back in the yard, heart pounding as he stared up at the night sky.

He'd come out here to try and get some relief from the burns throbbing on his skin, hoping the night breeze would at least cool him down. But now…

From across the fence and alley that separated his house from America's, he heard the window on the side that faced him slam shut.

He hadn't heard much, just scraps of conversation floating out of the office, and that one outburst. He couldn't even be sure what they were talking about. But the one thing he had heard clearly rang in his head.

'Korea is nothing!'

He hadn't heard that. He couldn't have heard that. There was no way.

America said all the time that Korea was important, that he had to defeat Communism here or it would spread all over the world. And South was his friend. He would never say that his country was nothing, that he was nothing. He wouldn't.

There was a muffled commotion from America's house, screaming muted but the now closed window. South couldn't make it out. He didn't want to make it out.

Suddenly he froze, his eyes sliding sideways, towards his front door.

The guards stood there, unaffected. Ku Cheol-moo and Seok Ki-cheol playing cards while Wesson smoked. Only Smith was watching him, green eyes hard.

But they didn't stray towards the fence.

South relaxed, closing his eyes. They couldn't hear America. Which meant they wouldn't think South had. If America knew he'd overheard that-

*'You didn't hear anything.'

He had to have been imagining it, or- or his 'ears' were playing tricks on him. Or he'd just misunderstood, like South Chungcheong had. America hadn't wanted to pull out of Korea to go to war with China, and he didn't think Korea was nothing.

He couldn't. He'd got South that suit and the applejack for Christmas, and the shoes for his birthday. He'd wrestled with him and flew paper planes with him on July 4th. He bought him presents and food and watched movies with him so he wouldn't feel lonely.

He was here. He was here with him when he could be home safe in his own country. Why would he do that if he thought South was nothing?

Tears welled in his eyes, which was pathetic because he knew America hadn't said that. He was inventing things in his head again, making himself sad over nothing.

('Nothing.')

South squeezed his eyes shut, trying not to let his chest shake as he breathed, not wanting the guards to see him crying.

He heard America's door open and close, slamming like a gunshot in the night, followed by the rattle of his gate.

South froze, waiting, heart beating in mingled hope and dread. Hope that his friend was coming to see him, and dread that he'd see him crying and want to know why. That he'd find out he heard.

His heart leapt and stomach sank as his guards slid open his gate, and directed America to where he was.

South lay still, trying to relax his muscles, not closing his lids too tight. He was worried he'd be betrayed by his trembling as footsteps crunched towards him.

"Hey, kid," America hailed.

South didn't move. 'Breathe in, breathe out.' Slow and steady, like when North would try and nudge him awake for their writing lessons or another escape attempt.

"Kid." America sounded annoyed as his foot nudged South's ribs.

The Korean blinked blearily, opening his eyes. "Mm?" he half-moaned, sounding dazed.

"What are you doing out here?" America, didn't give him time to respond. "Never mind. I just dropped by to tell ya they found Red China innocent."

South's heart pounded as he sleepily said, "Oh. That's… That's good, right? Now you don't have to go to war with him."

He watched him from behind half-closed lids, praying the other man wouldn't see the tears glistening in his lashes.

America stared down at him, his aviators glinting in the moonlight. "Yeah, kid," he said after a moment. "It is."

The Korean exhaled, and he turned to leave.

"Just wanted to let you know, and make sure the commies didn't get ya while I was gone," he said, not looking back. "I'll tell you all about it tomorrow. Night, Southie. Don't let the skeeters eat ya alive."

"Night," South called, and his voice didn't even waver.

When America was gone, he let out a shaky breath.

He'd been too nervous. But the other man hadn't seemed to notice. He'd seemed distracted, shifting from foot to foot.

He looked up, catching sight of America walking away as his gate clanged shut.

But he didn't head towards his house. He went the opposite way, headed off on foot into the dark streets of Busan.

It was past ten. Where was he going?

South Chungcheong's words echoed in his mind. 'Investigate for yourself.'

It was what she had said after she'd told him what she thought she'd heard America say. 'If you do not believe me, and you will not Command the truth from my lips, then investigate the matter for yourself. Or you may shut your eyes and continue to ignore it all.'

He didn't have to investigate. The UN already had. And they said Red China wasn't in Korea.

And what if he did investigate? What if he found out that everything she had told him was true? That America's men had retreated so fast before because he wanted to make the rest of the world think China was a threat? That he was getting ready to abandon Korea, abandon South to go start a war with the Chinese country, leaving North and his puppet army to overrun the Peninsula?

'Either investigate yourself or ignore it all.'

Well, he was choosing the second option. Because what if an investigation did turn something up? What if there were pictures of Taejon? What if Kim Chong-won had been in Busan that day? What if the people on Jeju had been slaughtered by the tens of thousands? What if their soldiers were stealing women to rape in brothels? What if America had hurt South Chungcheong? What if he really did think Korea was nothing?

What if he actually wasn't South's friend, just like everyone said?

He knew that couldn't be true. None of it. America was just headed to the UN Headquarters. Kim Chong-won hadn't been here. South had just been having an episode. And anyone that had died at Taejon or on Jeju was a Communist. They started it, so they deserved it. If America had hurt South Chungcheong, it was probably because she'd said something awful, like she usually did. And South had given her that new Command, which made up for it.

America couldn't think Korea was nothing. He couldn't not be South's friend. He was here, he had stayed.

'And not even your own brother did that.'

Investigating was pointless. The more he knew, the more North would have to be mad at him for. Because he'd be fine if he found out Rhee's army had killed people at Taejon, so long as they were just Communists.

But he knew North wouldn't be. He wouldn't understand. He wouldn't get it until he was unbrainwashed and they were Reunified.

And they would be soon. Red China wasn't in Korea. Whether that was true or not, that was what the UN had decided on. America and his army would stay. Even with the Chinese still here, the armistice was still going to be signed.

They could investigate once everything was over, if South Chungcheong and North really wanted to. But honestly, why would they? Everything would be settled, everything would be okay. And even if they found out something awful, what was the point?

America would have won.

What was the point in knowing something if it had already happened? Or if it hadn't happened?

Or if you couldn't do anything about it.

If he asked America about what he heard, it would just be causing problems for nothing, like North wanting to protest against the trusteeship. America was his friend. But if South kept getting paranoid and questioning him every time he made up a problem in his head, he wouldn't be.

It was best to just let it go, and wait for the war to end.

And so South shut his eyes.

My stance on America is that he doesn't consider himself a pedophile and thinks those people are disgusting freaks. He thinks it's perfectly fine for him (417 + chronologically- 344 in 1951- 28 mentally and physically) to date a sixteen year old because 'Hey, back in the day if you weren't married with fourteen kids by age 16, you were an old hag. You know the age of consent used to be 10? I never fucked with that, America doesn't go under 16, 15 if their birthday's in a few months.' And it's like okay, but that was in the sixteen-seventeen-eighteen hundreds. Please update your moral compass because you definitely are a pedophile by today's standards.
He is very much a pedophile enabler, too, as he knows exactly which rich and powerful people in his country engage in those actions because he uses them for blackmail. 'God that's disgusting. But on the bright side, I own that guy now!' What I'm saying is he is saying, 'Release the Epstein list!' while he has a copy in his back pocket.

Also obligatory 'if any other country had a well-known child sex trafficker who had a list of the huge amounts of rich businessmen, celebrities, and politicians that had raped children in a mass pedophilia ring everyone would be calling for a complete dismantling of its political system, government, and the execution of every single person in it, as well as an invasion.' But it's America so its just another quirky little flaw that won't affect anything.

One's Own Destiny

1923

The water of the small falls gurgled cheerfully as it poured over the ledge, chuckling as it wound its way around the boulders scattered at its edge before heading off down the mountainside.

Both the joyful river and the budding blooms of Seorak Mountain- the latest stop on Korea's mission to map the entire Korean Peninsula- denied the way North Pyongan felt.

He sighed miserably, staring down into the clear water as it rippled over stones of amber and onyx.

The river they had crossed to get here, the Bukcheon, was deeper. It shouldn't have been deep enough to matter, if he hadn't been forced to throw himself down and swim to make it across before the Japanese police could emerge from the trees to catch sight of them, and if they hadn't had to mobilize so swiftly when they heard a patrol was coming to investigate reports of poaching around Seoheung-ri, leaving him to make the mistake of shoving his Bible into his pack instead of giving it to Hwang to safeguard alongside their other books.

But he had had to do those things. And it did matter.

He'd realized what he'd done as they fled from the river to regroup before vanishing into the Taebaeks, but he hadn't been able to see the damage until last night, when they were finally able to stop running, hidden beneath the ridges of the mountain range.

His Bible had been soaked through, the pages stuck together, still not dry even after hours of running. He'd been too afraid to open it, knowing his heart would break if he ruined it any further.

Korea had said he was overreacting, that it was just a book. He'd made him turn it over, likely to save for kindling.

He knew his Countryhuman was right. It was just a book. He could just get a new one. It would be difficult, with the Japanese shutting down more Christian churches and Buddhist temples to replace with their Kokka Shinto shrines. But surely he could find one somewhere.

'It won't be the same.'

That was what he had said to his sister when she offered to steal him one earlier. He had been trying to dissuade her, since he could never let her steal anything from a church, let alone a Bible. But he had meant it, too.

That was the Bible that Father Pak had given him. The first person to ever show them kindness, to give them charity. And North Pyongan had ruined it.

He knew the priest wouldn't care. He had even told him before he left that if he lost the book, it wouldn't matter, so long as he held God's word close to his heart.

But it did matter to the province. Enough that South Pyongan had slunk off after her jokes had failed to make him feel better, something that almost never happened.

He couldn't tell Korea that. He was protective of their Russian books and their rough Korean translations because of the value they held. But North Pyongan's Bible was worthless to him.

"Are you still moping over your stupid book?"

The province quickly sat up, trying to wipe at his eyes without making it noticeable, before he turned to face Korea, who stood above the tumble of rocks that led down to the stream.

North Pyongan nodded miserably, ashamed.

Korea's lip twitched in disdain as he jumped from boulder to boulder, until he stood behind his province, talking loud enough to be heard over the sound of the falls. "It's just paper. And not even paper we can use."

"I know." Still, North Pyongan wished he had protested more before Korea had taken it from him. "But… I wasn't done reading it yet."

He looked down at the river as he said it, his reflection wavering below.

He had been trying to work through the book ever since Father Pak had gifted it to him, struggling to learn the letters, made even more difficult by how different biblical prose was from modern speech. And ever since Korea had taught them how to read, he had been using whatever time he could to finally read God's word for himself. But even after almost a year, he had only just finished Genesis 32.

"I just…" He trailed off, knowing the boy behind him wouldn't understand.

Korea made a noise of distaste, and North Pyongan felt something nudge his shoulder. He braced himself, thinking his Countryhuman was about to boot him into the river.

All he felt was another nudge.

"Ssi-bal," Korea hissed irritably. "Turn around."

North Pyongan twisted, blinking at what was held out to him, stunned.

"My Bible?"

"From the way you were acting, I thought you tore it in half or something," his Countryhuman said, irked. "Asking North Hwanghae if he knew how to repair books. It was wet."

“I… I thought the ink would run, or the pages would…” North Pyongan looked up at him in disbelief. “You dried it?”

“Yes,” his Countryhuman said, shaking the Bible aggressively. “Now take it before I throw it in the stream again.”

North Pyongan hurriedly snatched the small brown book, tentatively opening it.

The lettering looked fine. Perhaps slightly blurred, and the thin paper felt rougher under his fingers than before.

But it was readable.

“Did you dry it on a fire?” he asked, stroking the page in wonder.

“No,” Korea said sarcastically. “I laid it out on an ondol floor. How do you think I dried it?”

Korea had been gone all last night, according to his cousins that had been on watch. That wasn’t unusual. Often he would leave to prowl the woods to serve as an early warning if the Kempeitei came.

But he never lit a fire when he was alone. He made sure they never made one if they didn’t have to. The smoke and light could make them a target.

There were hundreds of pages in the Bible, and as North Pyongan carefully flipped through, he found they were all perfectly dry, not sticking at all.

“This had to have taken all night,” he said worriedly.

“It’s dry,” Korea said, turning away. “Now stop sulking over it. It’s annoying.”

“Thank you!” North Pyongan called as his Countryhuman jumped off the rocks.

“Get back to camp before you fall in the water and drown,” Korea replied, not looking back.

North Pyongan smiled, clutching the good book close as his heart radiated light.

His Countryhuman might not believe in God, but the Provincehuman thanked Him for him anyway.

—

1951

It was dark in the Party Foundation building, and more run-down than the last time they had sat like this. North Pyongan suspected it had become too dangerous to use as an office now that it was the only building over two stories left in Pyongyang.

His body ached, still sore, even after his three-day healing coma. But he kept his back straight in the wooden chair.

Korea sat across from him, staring him down in the light of the oil lamp as he finished his report of what had happened on Guk Island.

“Why did you decide to continue on to the island?” he eventually asked, his voice giving away nothing of what he was thinking.

North Pyongan hesitated, then told the truth. “Because I wanted to complete the mission.”

Korea’s shoulders almost seemed to relax an infinitesimal amount. “I see. And do you have any criticisms?”

“Yes.” North Pyongan took a deep breath, then met Korea’s eye. “I think it was wrong of you to tell me I can’t practice my faith anymore.”

He braced himself for Korea’s anger.

His country examined him coolly. “Is that so? And what made you decide that?”

“I… thought it from the start,” North Pyongan quietly admitted, his hands clasped in his lap. “You can’t say that we’re bound to the same laws as our people, then deny us the rights we’re promised in the Constitution. You can’t pick and choose which of them apply to us.”

Korea’s outburst came, but not in the way he had expected.

“Than why didn’t you say that?” his country demanded, slapping a hand on the desk. “If you thought like that from the start, then why didn’t you tell me?”

North Pyongan blinked. “Because… it was an order.”

“An order you didn’t agree with.”

“I know why you did it, Korea,” he explained. “I know you’re just trying to keep me safe. But my faith isn’t the reason I trusted Pak-“

“I told you this isn’t about your faith, or Pak Chae-eun!” Korea snapped. “It’s about you.”

He stood up to pace back and forth behind the desk before rounding on him again.

“It doesn’t matter if you think you knew why I did it,” he growled. “I violated the Constitution, I stripped away one of your personal rights, and you barely even protested. From the day I met you, you’ve been waving that Bible around like a flag, even before you could fucking read it. It’s the most important thing in the world to you, but when I took it away, you let me.”

North Pyongan was stunned, but he still managed to murmur, “It’s not the most important thing to me.”

“That isn’t what matters here!” Korea bated his teeth in frustration. “What matters is that you didn’t fight back!”

“You hate when we push back on orders, Korea,” the province pointed out.

“No, I don’t!” he snapped. “I want you to push back. I want to know when you think I’m doing something unreasonable, especially when I am violating the law. If you think what I’m doing is wrong, I want you to tell me.”

North Pyongan was baffled. “Then why didn’t you say that?”

“Because I shouldn’t have to!”

Korea spun away, then turned back, calmer. “My problem is not with your religion. It is with you. You’ve always been a follower, North Pyongan. If you aren’t following your god, you are following your sister, or me. Or our people.”

The first three made sense, but the last... “Korea, you want us to follow our people.”

“No- I want you to lead them.” Korea slammed his fist on the desk. “When you were on Ganghwa, you weren’t sure that executing Kim Kang-sim was the correct course of action. But you still did it because those boys told you to.”

“You said you approved of that,” North Pyongan protested. “And it wasn’t just because they told me they wanted him to die. I wanted him to see justice, too.”

“But you weren’t sure if it was the right thing for you to be there, or for you to be the one to do it,” Korea said. “It doesn’t matter if it worked out and I approve. It matters that you thought it would be better if you left it to them, but because they didn’t want you to, you didn’t.

“When I tell you ‘our people are our god,’ that doesn’t mean I want you to blindly follow them,” he growled. “I want you to examine your own morals and beliefs first, and decide if what both you and they want is what is right. That is what being a leader requires."

North Pyongan thought he got what he was saying, but…. "Korea, if someone leads, then someone has to follow."

His country slapped his hand down, making the lamp flame flicker. "That is not always true."

He turned away again, rubbing under his eyepatch, leaving North Pyongan to sit in confused silence. Finally, he turned back, his expression set.

"We are on a path," his country announced. "And it is our duty as Korea and his provinces to lead our people down it. But we do not dictate every step. Like the vanguard party, whose job isn't to tell the working class what they should want, but to help them see what they already do, and organize them so that they can achieve it, we listen to those we lead. We all want the same destination- a free, prosperous country. We help them take the best route towards that. And if they take us down the wrong path, then we help them navigate it safely and get back on course.

"Neither us nor our people are following," he said firmly. "Just because we are slightly ahead of them on our path, does not mean we are better than them. We are the vanguard of the vanguard party, and it is our job to guide them, just as they guide us. We are walking with them."

North Pyongan barely had time to absorb that before Korea was leaning over the desk and pinning him with his stare.

"But it can be hard for some of our people to realize that," he said grimly. "Some of them think that they are following us, and that our decisions about how to get where we need to go are unquestionable. Because of what we are."

North Pyongan nodded. Sometimes he would almost forget that he wasn't solely human. But then an old man would stare at him on the street with wide, awestruck eyes, or an old woman would try to fall to her knees and ask for his blessing.

It was usually only elders, those who had enough years to remember the old set of Provincehumans. When North Pyongan had been a court lady who only ever left her Sinuiju palace wrapped in veils of emerald, refusing to look at or speak to commoners. And when a sighting of Joseon himself had been like Christ returning to the Earth.

No, that wasn't comparable. Christ would have allowed the poor to touch his robes and laid his hands on those begging for relief from their illness.

From what North Pyongan had heard, Joseon leaving his palace was more like if God Himself had descended from Heaven, distant, untouchable, but not half as loving.

"We need to crush that way of thinking," Korea continued. "In our people and ourselves. I am not infallible, my decisions are not always correct. But when so many of our people have been raised to believe in Countryhumans and those in power unquestioningly, some might refuse to tell me when they think that, even when we invite criticism."

He leaned forward, his eye burning intensely. "That is why I need you and the other provinces to challenge me. Because that kind of thinking is exactly what made Rome, the Russian Empire, Joseon, and America turn out the way that they did."

His eye flickered. "And Japan."

North Pyongan gaped, horrified by what he was implying. "Korea, you could never be like Japan."

"And how many Provincehumans have thought that way?!" Korea demanded, suddenly fierce again. "How many of them disagreed with their Countryhuman or thought he was leading them down the wrong path, but held their tongues because they thought he knew what was best, or because they 'understood why he was doing it?' How many of them believed that their country could never become a tyrant, right up until the moment they looked around and realized they and their people were kneeling before him instead of walking with him?"

North Pyongan was struck speechless as his country snapped, "I can't-"

His jaw feathered, and he lowered his voice. "Korea cannot afford to let that happen. Joseon was no god. And neither am I. We don't follow our people blindly, and they can't follow us blindly."

He leaned farther, so that he was almost hunched over the desk, his voice fervent as he told him, "That is why I can't tolerate you being a follower anymore, North Pyongan. I can't have you trailing after me and doing everything I say without question. I need you to believe in yourself and that you know what is right, and to challenge me if I go against it."

There was an edge to his voice, a barely restrained note of urgency.

"I need you to walk with me."

North Pyongan looked at his country as he stood behind the desk, lit by the flickering flame of the oil lamp, his bandaged fingertips dug into the wood and his eye gleaming almost desperately.

And he suddenly realized that he was being selfish.

For his entire life, he had always had someone to follow. As Korea had said, if it wasn't his sister, it was God, or him, or their people. He had always been assured that no matter what they suffered, what trials they had to face, in the end, things would work out. His sister and his Countryhuman were unstoppable forces of nature, and God would always see good triumph over evil. All North Pyongan had to do was follow in their footsteps, and everything would be okay.

But Korea didn't have that sense of security. He didn't have anyone he could place his belief in, and wholeheartedly trust to see them through.

He believed in their people, he believed they could free them, but he couldn't believe that they would always set them on the right path, not when there were so many disagreements on how to get where they needed to go. And not when they didn't all agree that a free, prosperous country was the destination. Some reactionaries might only be fighting against Socialism because they truly believed it was evil, but plenty of them didn't care about freedom or prosperity so long as they were free, so long as they were prosperous.

Korea had told him years ago that he didn't need God to provide him comfort because he had people. But how could he feel comfortable when he was always looking over his shoulder, making sure they hadn't dropped too far back or to their knees?

He believed their people were God, but it terrified him that they might see him the same way.

North Pyongan thought of his first days alive, before he had met his sister. How scared and lost he had felt as he fled across the fields of his province with no idea where he was going or what was going to happen. Seeing South Pyongan emerge from the trees and kill that Japanese soldier had felt the same way that spotting Pak Chae-eun's church through the blizzard had. A beacon of safety, of security. Of hope.

And how had she felt, fighting for her life every step of the way, only to realize that she was going to have to be the one to protect him? He knew his sister wouldn't have accepted him trying to play the role of protective brother, but he still should have been able to when she couldn't.

Whenever he had fallen ill, he knew he would be safe while he recovered. He knew his sister would watch over him. But what had she felt when she was concussed from another fight, or when she had lost consciousness in the blizzard? He knew she wouldn't have been able to feel comforted knowing that he would take care of her, or get her to safety. She only would have been worried for him, worried that her weak, pacifist brother couldn't even defend himself, let alone her.

It didn't matter if she didn't resent him for it, as with him forcing her to bear his sins for him. He resented himself.

He had never felt lost during those years- he had her and God. And South Pyongan had had nothing but herself. And even if that was enough, it shouldn't have had to be.

Like he had thought it on Guk Island- even if Liaoxi, Pak Ga-ram, and Jon Kong-mo could win without him, they shouldn't have to. They should be able to depend on him.

And so should his country.

"I understand, Korea." North Pyongan looked him in the eye as he said it, showing him he meant it. "And I'm sorry."

His Countryhuman searched his face, looking for something, then twitched back, away from him.

"There's nothing to be sorry for," he said gruffly. "Just do better."

North Pyongan placed a hand over his heart, not letting his gaze waver. "I will. I promise."

Even if he truly never believed Korea could become the kind of man or country that Japan was, it didn't matter. So long as Korea feared it, he had to be there to reassure him he wouldn't. He had to be reliable enough that Korea didn't need to question every single step he took, or at least so he didn't need to look behind him quite so often.

He had to believe in himself, so that his country could, too.

"Good," Korea said, turning away from his eyes. "Do that. And not a word to the others about this conversation."

"Don't you think-?"

“No.”

North Pyongan sighed, but knew that no amount of challenging would ever convince Korea to be vulnerable if he didn’t have to.

“Your criticism session for the mission will be withheld until tomorrow,” Korea clipped, still not looking at him. “Return to the hospital for observation.”

“Kangwon says I’ll be fine.”

“This is not one of the orders you should question,” Korea said icily. “You died. South Pyongan will be by the hospital.”

North Pyongan ducked his head sheepishly. He hadn’t gotten to see her yet.

But he knew he’d passed Korea’s test by answering his summons first.

“And take this.”

North Pyongan blinked as a red card was pushed across the desk towards him. “A Party membership card?”

“Your old one was soaked.” Korea glared at him. “But you didn’t lose it. That was your one strike. If it happens again, you will have to get down on your knees and beg the Party Central Committee not to expel you. And don’t tell South Pyongan about this,” he added after a moment’s thought.

North Pyongan smiled, going to tuck it into his Bible, before remembering. He put it in the left breast pocket of his uniform instead.

“Comrade Liaoxi told me about your Bible before she left,” Korea said, slightly awkwardly. “I will talk to Comrade Kang Ryang-uk. He’ll get you another one.”

“It’s alright, Korea.” His Countryhuman narrowed his eye, and he quickly clarified, “I’m not following your order anymore. Not when I don’t think it was right.”

“You are released from it anyway,” Korea said stiffly.

North Pyongan nodded, smiling. “I just don’t need it.”

He couldn’t cling to a sense of security anymore. He had to provide it- to their people, his sister, and Korea.

His Countryhuman examined him, then nodded, turning his back deliberately, a sign that their discussion was over.

North Pyongan stood, walking to the door. He glanced back at Korea, standing alone in the lamplight, his spine straight.

“Korea. Did you torture Paik Sun-yup?”

His Countryhuman’s shoulders tensed. “Even if I did, he deserved it. And it has nothing to do with you.”

“I know,” he said, and he did. “But I want to know if you’re leading us down the right path.”

Korea was silent for a long moment. Then-

“No. I did not torture Paik Sun-yup.”

North Pyongan exhaled. Laying a hand over the card in his pocket, his province slipped from the room.

—

North sighed as he heard the door shut, slumping into his chair.

That had gotten… He begrudged having to share those thoughts.

But it was one problem resolved, hopefully. North Pyongan had seemed sincere (uncomfortably sincere) as he made his pledge, and he had done well on the island. Out of all of the options- sunk at sea, taken by the enemy, swept away to Japan- he hadn't thought that 'completed the mission' would have been the outcome. And certainly not because he had wanted to.

At least the men of Task Force Dokdo had been avenged with no further losses.

And China was safe. For now.

North Pyongan, Liaoxi, and the two soldiers hadn't been found by the observation post until the morning of Liberation Day, and word hadn't reached Pyongyang until after North's speech. By then it was too late to get word to China for his trial.

Hearing he had been found innocent had lifted a heavy weight from North's shoulders, though Liaoxi had already left for her country before the communique had came through.

China had avoided America's efforts to spread the war to his country once again, and the one in North's was winding down.

The day after Liberation Day, America's Joy had proposed a smaller two-man sub-committee to try and break the deadlocked talks. After countering his effort to restrict the ceasefire to solely American and Chinese representatives by demanding four men, two on each side, the talks had actually seen some progress. North had made sure to send a junior negotiator, as had Peng Dehuai, and had been pleasantly surprised to find that Ridgway (he wouldn't be optimistic enough to say America) had done the same.

Without the pride of the seniors to get in the way, and with the committee narrowed to a more casual scope, they had finally seen progress as defensive lines were drawn for both of their sides, with a buffer zone in between.

Of course, it had taken Nam Il announcing a day later that they would be willing to make adjustments to the current line to make that progress. And North being unable to speak to any of his people for the past day.

But it had been made. The war- the combat part of it anyway- was drawing to a close.

And yet North's shoulders weighed heavier than ever. Even if the Americans were being genuine, even if an armistice was signed, peace was obtained, and they were seamlessly able to negotiate Reunification…

He had let his people down. Not only by being unable to free their country.

The Countryhuman ran a hand roughly over his face, sighing.

He was a hypocrite. He had said all of that to North Pyongan- about how they had to lead their people, to guide them- and he hadn't even been able to look them in the eyes on the anniversary of the happiest day in most of their lives.

What sort of example did it set when he hid away in a broadcasting booth and rattled off a speech that he hadn't even been paying attention to? He had been praised for it the few times he couldn't escape the civilians heading towards him, but he knew they had sensed the difference from his usual ones. They hadn't been approaching him because they wanted to tell him his words had affected them. They approached because they were seeking reassurance. Because they had seen him stumble.

He knew Liberating their country hadn't been on only him. He knew that even if he could have changed their course by refusing to wait after they had taken Seoul the first time, that things could still have gone wrong.

He knew he wasn't solely at fault for their stalemate. But he was for Liberation Day.

North had let his people down when he couldn't Liberate their country. But he had let them down even more by refusing to stand tall for them despite that.

It couldn't happen again. He was not a god, but he was the person his people and provinces looked to. He couldn't afford to falter because he was too weak to deal with his failure.

They all needed to believe in themselves, and believe that they could win. And they couldn't do that if they thought their country didn't believe in them. They needed to know that it wasn't them he was doubting.

Whether his next speech was on Foundation Day, or sooner to celebrate the signing of the armistice, North would make it up to them.

And maybe he would even have his brother by his side when he did it.

The fact that the Yanks tried to cut the Koreans out entirely from their own armistice talks will never not irritate me. If I were Rhee I would have killed those guys. But I guess he was too busy ordering civilians that wanted the war to end to be killed. And embezzling.

I do think this is clear, but if you ever wonder why one of North Pyongan's beliefs doesn't line up entirely with Protestantism, it's on purpose. For example, him believing that bad actions send you to hell, even if you believe in God, when most Protestants believe that not believing is what does that. His view is 'Well, if you're committing that awful sin, then you don't truly believe in God, even if you think you do. And if you do good, you're working for God, even if you don't realize it.' There are obviously a bunch of sects with different beliefs, and generally most religious people seem to selectively choose the parts of their religion to follow, but he's especially bad for that. He was handed his Bible, that one prayer, and the Ten Commandments, told that faith in God saves and that God loves everyone, then set free on the world. His faith is basically him going 'I was told that God is good and I think this is good. So God would surely support this.' finally able to read the parts of the Bible where God calls for collective punishment and supports slavery 'Well, I simply don't think He would do that.'

I like to think that when the Nakba was going on in 1948 (it is still going on), North was informed of what some Christians (Zionists) believe about Palestine being promised to the Israelis and sort of aggressively confronted North Pyongan about it to make sure he wasn't an idiot.

North: I heard some people think the Israelis have a right to ethnically cleanse Palestinians because the Bible says 'god' promised the land to them. What do you think about that?

North Pyongan with the most withering look he has ever given anyone: Korea, those people are from New York and Eastern Europe. The only thing 'promised' to them is sunburn.

Believe In Me

North Pyongan had intended to devote himself to completing the project his sister had started for him, then visit Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin to reassure them that the talks were going well, and they might soon be able to go home.

And then, the morning after his talk with Korea, the American Eighth Army launched one of its most devastating artillery barrages since the war began, even outmatching the fire directed at the PVA on their last offensive.

They threw themselves at the center of the Peninsula, targeting a height just west of Haean-myeon that they had been attempting to claim since their summer offensive began, sending in waves of Rhee's puppet army, freshly retrained and back on the line.

All along the front, fighting broke out again, a band of puppet soldiers even storming the neutral zone at Kaesong, ambushing a platoon of the PVA's military police stationed there to make sure the KPA and their own soldiers wouldn't repeat the mistake they had before. Their commander had been cut down, and another soldier grievously wounded. Hours later, the Jeep with their negotiating team in it was strafed by an American plane on its way to the talks. By the next day, the front was aflame once more, the Americans were denying they had anything to do with it, and the fragile peace that North Pyongan- and maybe even Korea himself- had been daring to hope for had crumbled before their eyes.

It made him want to falter. To send South Pyongan or SH or Kangwon to speak to the boys while he hid, to avoid stealing their hope from them again.

But Korea wasn't faltering. He seemed different than before North Pyongan had been sent on his mission, looking he and the other provinces in the eyes even when they weren't having conversations as intense as the one before.

And after filling them in on what had happened earlier, he had gone to speak to the military police platoon personally, the first time he had willingly engaged with any soldiers in weeks.

So North Pyongan could do this. If anyone needed a guide right now, it was Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin.

"I can come with you this time," South Pyongan offered as they finished setting up the completed project, and started across the eastern hills. "I did most of the work, so Korea can't bite your head off if I do."

She hadn't left his side since two nights ago, when she had burst into his hospital room and almost broken his ribs. Not in a hug this time (his sister showing affection in front of others took much more than a few days' separation), but in a wrestling grip as she berated him for 'trying to meet God.' Only Kim Yong-hwan and her medical gloves had been able to beat her off of him.

North Pyongan couldn't help but notice that Korea had been unusually lenient, allowing the Southern Pyongan to help out in the military hospital, even though it was clearly just an excuse for her to stay close to him, and even assigning North Hamgyong to finish their project yesterday (something North Pyongan was sure they would hear about tonight).

He knew the order to separate themselves hadn't been repealed. And it shouldn't be. Perhaps it had been partly another test- Korea attempting to force him to challenge his decisions.

But it had also been necessary. North Pyongan couldn't follow anyone anymore, not even his sister.

"It's alright," he said, and this time he meant it.

South Pyongan raised an eyebrow. "For sure? I know you're pretty upset about the talks falling through."

"They haven't fallen through yet," he said firmly. "And we voted against accepting them anyway. If the Americans' intentions for peace aren't honest, then trying to negotiate with them will just drag the war out. I wish we could end this with less violence, but it's more important to finish it as soon as possible."

He blinked slowly at her, and she blinked back, communicating in a way the bodyguards tailing them couldn't hear.

The Pyongans had been reunited for a second time. Their Countryhuman and his brother were still waiting to be.

They stopped at the base of a hill. "I could still come back you up."

"I'll be fine." North Pyongan smiled at his sister. "I don't need you to."

She shifted foot to foot, her eyes dipping to the ground. "Okay. I guess I'll see you tonight then."

He touched her arm, and she made a face before heading off with the two men assigned to her, already chatting casually with them about organizing a football match with all the other guards.

But he saw her glance back over her shoulder. He gave her another smile, though he wouldn't pretend it didn't still feel like he was a board having a nail pried out of it whenever they parted.

After asking his bodyguard that hadn't stayed to guard the project area to hang back, North Pyongan started up the hill.

The birds in the trees sang their late summer songs as he threaded through the foliage, following a narrow footpath through the greenery. The sunlight dappled the forest floor with golden light and shadow, and with each step he took through it, he grew heavier with dread.

He wouldn't have Liaoxi here with him this time. The Chinese woman had been gone by the time he woke up, unable to leave even a note. Though Korea had said (with a glare that he couldn't quite understand) that she had asked if he would tell him she said goodbye.

He didn't know if she or her sister and China would return. But even if she had came back right now, he would still have to do this alone.

Tae-min and Han-jin might be their boys, but they were his people.

He found them in one of the crude dug-outs carved into the hill, where they had been living since Han-jin had been discharged from the hospital almost three weeks ago. He'd dug it with Chagang, making sure they had a place to stay while he worked with Korea to get the materials he needed, both of them dipping into their personal funds to keep the burden off of their State.

The curly-haired peasant boy was sitting under a tree outside, staring blankly into the forest, Tae-min nowhere to be seen. He tensed as North Pyongan politely cleared his throat, before going slack again.

"You're back," he said, and even though he no longer sounded as empty as he had in the hospital, despondence still layered his words. "Did your super-secret military op succeed?"

"Yes. I can tell you about it later." North Pyongan looked around. "Where's Tae-min?"

"Inside. Sleeping." Han-jin drew a finger through the dry dirt on the ground. "He sleeps a lot lately." He paused, then wearily admitted, "I think I do, too."

North Pyongan refused to lapse into awkward silence to search for words. "At least after today you'll both be able to sleep somewhere more comfortable. Please go wake Tae-min up."

Han-jin climbed to his feet. North Pyongan didn't miss the way he rubbed his chest as he crawled into the dug-out, soon emerging with Tae-min, clutching his hospital-issue cane.

He dipped his head, not saying anything as he rubbed the sleep from his eyes. But he couldn't wipe away the dark circles painted under them.

"Have you two been eating?" the province asked.

Now that they were both registered civilians and out of the hospital, Tae-min had received a ration card for his disability. But Han-jin wasn't injured enough. He could work- it would just be difficult for him to perform the manual labour he knew how to. With the food situation, they unfortunately had to be as stringent as possible with distribution.

Tae-min nodded, and Han-jin said, "A Worker's Party member's been bringing us stuff on top of Tae-min's rations." His eyes flickered before he shook his head. "And blue noona brought some rice on Liberation Day."

South Pyongan had told him about that. He knew she'd been given the extra rations by their distributors.

But the Party member bringing them extra worried him, considering Korea was the other person he had asked to watch out for the boys. He would have to speak with the Premier soon, and make sure at least some of their Countryhuman's rations were going to who they were supposed to.

"That's good," he said. "Do you have everything with you?"

"We don't have anything," Han-jin said dully. "Just…"

He and Tae-min's eyes slid to each other, then away.

North Pyongan made sure to keep his voice firm. "Alright. Follow me then."

The boys followed without protest. The silence behind him made the province uneasy.

The two had been… off ever since that day Tae-min had overheard Han-jin begging North Pyongan to help his friend. Not exactly unfriendly or cold, but more… awkward. North Pyongan kept looking back to make sure the uneven terrain wasn't too much for Tae-min. It allowed him to catch glimpses of the boy stumbling, Han-jin reaching out to steady him by the elbow before flinching back like he'd been burned.

They had been strange about touching before, pulling away from each other whenever someone glanced at them. But not when they thought no one was looking.

North Pyongan had thought Tae-min had been more embarrassed than angry, but perhaps he had been wrong.

'Please let them get through this. They can't lose each other.'

He no longer had to avoid speaking to God, but as the prayer crossed his mind, he still felt guilty.

He couldn't ask Him to resolve the boys' issues. North Pyongan was the one here, so it was up to him.

"We should take a break," he announced when they had just left the foothills and started towards the southern slope of Mount Taesong.

"You don't need to do that for me," Tae-min said, surly. "I'm fine."

"There's nothing wrong with needing to rest." Remembering what he'd thought about doctors having to be slightly manipulative, he added, "I do. I'm still recovering from my mission."

A spark of curiosity kindled in Han-jin's despondency. "What happened?"

"I… almost drowned." Korea had told him not to tell any of their people that he had died. While he didn't completely understand why, he figured it was best for the two boys, if he wanted them to…

'Oh.' Perhaps he did understand.

"I'm not quite healthy again yet," he said, which was true.

Kangwon said his insides were healed, but his outsides hadn't quite caught up. Several of his burns had become infected, just like Pak Ga-ram's leg, and his cousin had had to cut off a fair amount of waterlogged flesh to stop it from developing necrosis. It wasn't bad enough that he couldn't walk, but it was enough to make him feel like a ship's hull being scraped for barnacles whenever he did.

“We can both rest,” he said to Tae-min.

The boy looked at the ground, but nodded.

They reached a spot where the trees that spilled off of the mountain had been clear-cut, leaving stumps. Tae-min lowered himself onto one, wincing. Han-jin reached to help, and he leaned away, making the peasant boy withdraw like he’d been struck.

“I need to piss,” he mumbled after a heartbeat of uncomfortable silence, heading up the slope without another word.

Tae-mine’s gaze remained fixed on the ground, not looking over his shoulder until Han-jin had almost disappeared, just missing the look his friend cast back at him.

North Pyongan fidgeted on his own stump, reaching for something that wasn’t there before he clenched his fingers.

“Are you two alright?” he asked gently.

It was obvious they weren’t. But Tae-min understood what he really meant.

“Yes.” His knuckles whitened. “Han-jin’s just being an idiot.”

After a second, he heaved a sigh, leaning over his cane like a much older man. “Don’t listen to me,” he muttered. “He isn’t the idiot. I am.”

“Do you want to tell me about it?” North Pyongan ventured. “Doctor Kangwon said neither of you were comfortable opening up to him.”

He had sensed the tense energy between them just as North Pyongan had. But trying to coax it out of them had gotten even Kangwon nowhere. Eventually, his cousin had just told him to let it go, that it was something they needed to work out themselves.

North Pyongan had a feeling he knew something he didn’t, but he couldn’t tell what.

“I don’t want to talk about it,” Tae-min muttered, avoiding his eyes.

“It might make you feel better,” the province said. “I might be able to help.”

The boy’s gaze flicked up to his, and he almost seemed to hesitate, like the idea was tempting.

Then he shook his head, looking at the ground again. “You won’t. There’s just… something wrong with me.”

North Pyongan shook his head. “There’s nothing wrong with you. Even if your leg will never heal, you can still lead a good life. Plenty of veterans from the Anti-Japanese People’s War lost limbs, and they’re just as cherished as everyone else.”

He debated about adding the next part, then decided he would. The two boys had grown up in a religious town, and while he knew they felt like they couldn’t depend on God to deliver the justice they wanted, they did at least partially believe. The words might bring a little comfort.

“I won’t tell you that God has a plan, and everything happens for a reason,” he told him. Even if he believed it, he had realized long ago that was almost never a comfort to those going through grief, even other believers. “But I will say that no matter what happens, so long as you do good, He loves you. And Korea loves you, too.”

He placed a hand over his heart, letting him know he was included in that.

Tae-min drew his good leg up to his chest, burying his face in it.

“I’m just… I feel so useless,” he said shakily. “I can barely walk. I can’t even go get my own rations. You had to get special permission for Han-jin to be able to pick them up. He does that, and he gathers wood for the fire, and makes the fire, and fetches water and cooks the food, and I…” His arms wrapped tighter as he drew his other leg up, his cane abandoned.

North Pyongan understood. “You feel like you can’t do anything for him."

The boy nodded miserably. "I hate that he feels like he needs to protect me, but he's right. Ever since we've been kids, he's had to look after me, even when it gets him in trouble. With Kang-sim…" He trailed off, then murmured, "Han-jin's always been better than me at everything. Working the fields, helping out around the farm, making people like him. Sometimes… I think Father wished he was his son instead."

The words struck a chord in North Pyongan's chest. "Do you resent him for that?"

"Yes," Tae-min said. "No." He sighed. "I don't know."

"You resent yourself," the province murmured, and he nodded reluctantly.

"At least I used to be able to help him with his schoolwork, and get Father to stand up for him when he got in trouble for beating Kim Kang-sim," Tae-min said quietly. "Now I can't do anything."

North Pyongan knew the boys weren't the same as he and his sister. But they had grown up together, and remembering Han-jin's sincere desperation in the hospital as he pled for him to help his friend, even at his own expense, the province felt comfortable telling Tae-min, "I don't think he resents you, either."

"I know he doesn't," the dark-eyed boy murmured. "Han-jin's… He's too good for that. He's too good for me," he added, quieter.

North Pyongan thought of his own fears about not being strong enough for his sister, or how recently he had felt like he was disappointing Korea, letting his country down again and again.

But his sister had never blamed him for making her take on his sins for him, or for not being strong enough. And in the end, Korea still trusted him to do better, to pick up his pace and walk with him in the vanguard. Even after his decades of not being enough, his Countryhuman was still willing to trust him to change, and to make sure he never became something he couldn't.

“I don’t think we’re ever not good enough for the ones that love us,” North Pyongan told Tae-min, and the boy inhaled sharply. “God, our friends and comrades, our… your parents. If we don’t feel like we’re enough for ourselves, then we should try and do better. But I don’t think we should ever question if we’re deserving of their love."

“Please… stop using that word.” Tae-min had hid his face in his hands, but North Pyongan could still see that it was flushed crimson in embarrassment.

He smiled, reaching over to touch his shoulder. “You’re good enough, Oh Tae-min.”

The boy let out a shaky breath, trembling as he pressed his face into his knees. North Pyongan pretended not to see him sliding a hand up to wipe across his eyes.

Cracking sounded from the woods, and Tae-min shot up, unfurling to try and sit normally, wincing as his leg straightened.

“There was a guy sort of lurking up there,” Han-jin remarked as he trekked back down towards them. “Is he your secret service, or should I be worried he was spying on me peeing?”

He stopped, narrowing his eyes as he took in Tae-min, his cheeks still tinged red as he determinedly avoided looking at him.

“Was he saying weird things about me?” the farm boy asked North Pyongan suspiciously. And perhaps with a touch of real anxiety.

“You’re the one who says weird things,” Tae-min muttered, climbing to his feet. “Let’s get going.”

He started to limp away. Han-jin looked at North Pyongan.

“All good things,” he assured him, praying he had managed to get through to the other boy.

It took another half hour to reach the area he wanted- a small dip low in the eastern foothills of Mount Taesong. The area was sheltered, but sunny, and not far from one of the hidden market areas.

It didn't look as scenic as it could have, since the undergrowth had been cleared away, and the grass trampled on. But both of the boys stopped when they saw it. Or rather, what stood in it.

“A house?” Han-jin asked, a note of tentative hope in his voice.

It was more of a shack, with wooden walls, no windows and a tin roof. But there was a roof. And a proper door.

“I’m sorry it isn’t what you’re used to,” North Pyongan said, knowing that both Tae-min and Han-jin had been raised in impressive homes on Oh Kyung-tae’s land. “But I told you I would work something out for you.”

Tae-min looked more put out than his friend. “And I said we didn’t need you to pull strings for us.”

“I didn’t pull any strings,” North Pyongan replied. “The State is trying to provide as many people with housing materials as we can. I just made sure you got yours.”

“Couldn’t someone else have used them?” Tae-min looked down. “We’re not even from here.”

“You’re not the only refugees,” the province told him. “And if people trust us enough to deny the enemy propaganda and brave the bombings, then we need to prove to them that their faith isn’t misplaced.”

“But-“

“Tae-min,” Han-jin interrupted. “Stop being so stubborn. I can’t…” His fist curled. “Neither of us can build a house right now. And living in the ground isn’t good for you. If Comrade North Pyongan went through the trouble of doing this for us, we shouldn’t complain.”

Tae-min bit his lip, but reluctantly nodded. “Thank you,” he murmured.

North Pyongan shook his head. “Thank Comrades South Pyongan and North Hamgyong. They’re the ones that built it.”

He would leave out he and Korea’s personal contributions. Tae-min already felt guilty enough.

“And a few comrades in the Worker’s Party and Democratic Women’s Union donated what they could.” North Pyongan gestured at the house. "You have a cooking pot and bowls, and blankets for bedding. And a divider sheet, since the inside isn’t big enough for two bedrooms.”

Now even Han-jin looked hesitant. “Is it… really okay to accept all of that? I mean, I’m not ungrateful, but…”

“Our government organs exist to help our people,” North Pyongan told him firmly. “No one gave anything they couldn’t afford to. And if you feel like you have to, you can make it up to the Women’s Union.”

“How?” Tae-min asked warily.

North Pyongan couldn’t hide his smile. “I got you jobs.”

The two boys blinked, exchanging stunned glances.

“…Both of us?” Tae-min ventured.

North Pyongan nodded. “The Women’s Union is organizing efforts to build houses along routes that our soldiers and the Chinese often take to offer them somewhere to rest. They’ll be cooking meals and repairing uniforms for them.”

With the updated security measures that didn’t allow anyone to offer a place to stay to someone without proper documents from the local People’s Committees, it allowed their soldiers to still have somewhere to rest.

“The women will feel safer having men there to watch over them.”

And most of them were missing sons and daughters that had been sent to the frontline. Two orphaned boys barely on the cusp of manhood would definitely stir one or two mothers to look after them.

Many refugees at least took something with them, or someone. Family heirlooms, clothing, a wife or parents. But Oh Tae-min and Hyun Han-jin truly had nothing but each other. Connecting them with the local community would ensure that someone would be able to look out for them, even if North Pyongan was called away by Korea.

This idea had been SH's. He had asked a few of his cousins to keep an eye out for jobs for the two boys, and after having attended the Premier's talk to the Women's Union on Liberation Day, where he had directed the roadside houses to be built, she had come by the hospital to share the idea with North Pyongan yesterday, then shot off to arrange things.

"You'll keep an eye on anyone suspicious, and help the women with their tasks," he continued. "Han-jin, you said you know how to sew. And Tae-min, this will be your chance to learn."

"I could teach you," Han-jin said eagerly.

"Or one of the women could," his friend muttered, dimming his enthusiasm slightly.

"Either way," North Pyongan cut in. "You'll be employed. You'll both have ration cards and an income."

Plenty of the women were only volunteering, since they already received stipends from being dependents. But a few had wages organized by the Women's Union. North Pyongan didn't know whether SH had pulled any of her own strings to make sure the boys would be included in that, since she had dodged the question when he asked. But the important thing was that they would be getting paid.

Both the boys were frozen in disbelief, not comprehending his words. Tae-min's knuckles were clenched tight around his cane.

“I got you something else, too.” North Pyongan passed by them, opening the door to the house, and taking one of the items he had left there earlier.

He took a deep breath, and turned around, presenting it to Tae-min, whose eyes widened.

“A new cane?”

“Doctor Gangwon made it for you. And he made this for Han-jin.” North Pyongan pulled a wooden tiger figurine from his pocket, holding it out with the other hand. “I thought it might help you feel more at home if you had something more personal.”

North Pyongan couldn’t help but feel a little anxious as Tae-min hesitantly took the stick, running his hands along the smooth maple wood branch that the province had found for his cousin to carve, examining the magpie head the top had been worked into. Han-jin turned his tiger over in his rough hands.

Neither were overly elaborate, but they were well made. Gangwon might be too shaky to make stitches, but he could still wield a carving knife with skill.

“I know it’s not much,” North Pyongan said, trying not to let his nerves colour his words. “But it’s something.”

“Yeah,” Tae-min said quietly as he wrapped his hand over the new cane. “It is.”

Han-jin looked at him, then down at the little tiger in his palm, curling his fingers around it.

“I… don’t know when we are going to be Reunified,” North Pyongan admitted, refusing to collapse under the weight of their sorrowful looks. “I don’t know when you’re going to be able to go home.”

He couldn't do what Korea did- look them in the eyes and promise them it would be soon, even when he didn’t think it would be. He wasn’t strong enough to bear their disappointment when their hope was taken away again.

But he could be honest.

"But Korea, the Worker's Party and our People's Army are all working hard to make sure that you will," he told them. "You can count on them to do everything in their power to bring peace to our country.

"And until then, you can count on me to watch out for you." He spread his hand over his heart. "Please never feel lost or alone. You aren't. I'm here for you. And even when I'm not, I'll make sure that you only have to reach out, and you will receive the support you need. I promise."

Maybe he wasn't worthy of their belief. But he could do his best to become worthy of it.

"Why would you do this for us?" Tae-min asked quietly, running his thumb over the beak of the magpie.

North Pyongan replied with confidence, "Because I want to."

"We… don't have any way to pay you back."

"Tae-min," Han-jin cut in. "He doesn't need us to pay him back. He's just doing it because he cares."

The boy blinked solemnly at North Pyongan, letting him know he understood. The province dipped his head.

"I do," he confirmed. "I don't need repayment, and it isn't a burden to look after the people I care about."

"We aren't even from your province," Tae-min protested, his words raspy.

"You don't have to be," North Pyongan replied. "Korea is doing away with provincialism. Someone from Jeju Island is just as important to North Pyongan province as someone from Sinuiju. You may not be from my province, but you are still my people."

"But…"

“Tae-min,” Han-jin firmly interrupted him again. “Not everything has to be about debts. Did Mister Oh ever expect me to pay him back for putting me through school?”

Grief flickered in the depths of Tae-min’s dark eyes. “No.”

The farm boy nodded. “Right. Me and Pa did our best to, but I never had to.” He hesitated, then reached out, gingerly placing a hand on his friend’s thin shoulder. “Sometimes people just do things because they… care. Yeah?”

Tae-min’s muscles had tensed at the contact, and he refused to move his gaze from the cane. But he didn’t shrug the other boy’s hand off.

“Yeah,” he conceded, his voice a bit choked, finally lifting his eyes to North Pyongan’s. “Thank you. Really.”

North Pyongan made himself smile, his heart aching. “Thank you.”

‘For placing your faith in me.’

He helped the boys settle in, then spent the rest of the day hunting for more sturdy branches for Gangwon to carve for the lame. He felt light, but strangely heavy at the same time, his heart full, but his soul weary.

It wasn't enough, he knew. As much as the boys appreciated what he and his comrades had done, nothing but victory would be enough.

And not even truly that. He could never bring their parents back to life, or their families or neighbours. He could never make it so that the massacres committed by the Ganghwa Commandos had never happened. He could never bring back the home they had lost.

‘Our people are our God,’ Korea had said.

But God was easy to serve. His Commandments might not always be simple to follow, but they were clear. His word might sometimes become muddled by man, but in the end, His directive was straightforward- be good, do good. Believe. And what was good was decided by Him, one being, set in stone and undeniable.

How did you follow the word of a god with millions of voices? How did you do good for a god that had uncountable different opinions of what 'good' was?

The people of Sinuiju, rallying against a man who claimed to be godly while he fought for his own selfish gain and thought it right. A good man letting himself be lead to something he knew was wrong because he was hurting from the loss of a son, a son who had likely been good also, and only misled by the influential trying to cling to their power. Christians on the steps, willing to call down fire on their neighbours because they had been told they were being oppressed, and Christians in the crowd, willing to tear them apart to stop them.

The people of Ganghwa, fighting over whether or not Kim Kang-sim should be punished for his crimes, even those that agreed he should be divided on how. A father that stood by while his son committed atrocities, and used his wealth to commit his own, but still held enough love in his heart to weep over his body. A father who was willing to have another's child executed to protect his own. A priest that was willing to let a monster go free, and a woman who went to church every Sunday willing to lie on the Bible to make sure he wouldn't.

A man willing to help a boy and his sister, set him on the path to religion, then sell him out forty years later for a few won because it was what he thought their God would want.

The people of all Korea, split between those who wanted to be free, and those that only wanted money and power, and would sell anyone and anything, including their country, out to see it.

And even though that split was nowhere near proportional, even if the few who truly didn't want a free and prosperous Korea couldn't be considered to be on the path with them, those that were were still divided.

Factionalists like Jo Man-sik, Nationalists like Kim Ku, right deviations and left deviations, people who thought they knew what was best and what was good and how to get there.

Tae-min and Han-jin, hurting, grieving, confused, and vengeful.

North Pyongan had read the Bible now, front to back, twice. He knew God was vengeful. He knew He suffered no slight.

But it was easier to ignore that aspect of Him, to focus on the calls of 'love thy neighbour' and ignore the pages that demanded an eye for an eye. He didn't have to re-read them.

But he couldn't ignore when their people did it. And if he didn't deliver what they desired- vengeance, justice, peace- they would make it known.

He would never have to face God's disappointment unless he died. But if he let their people down, he would have to look them in the eye every day and know that he had failed to serve them properly.

North Pyongan stood watch outside the bunker as the moon rose high overhead, not letting his cousins replace him.

Korea returned late, whistling a soft signal as he slid from the trees and into the shadowed clearing, stopping in front of North Pyongan.

His province stood, keeping his voice low so as not to wake his sister stretched out on the ground at his feet.

"You want me to worship a God that asks for everything."

He couldn't see the expression on his Countryhuman's face under the shadow of the mountain.

But Korea didn't hesitate as he said, "I want you to guide our people, who deserve everything."

North Pyongan took in his words, then slowly brought his hand up to his brow in a weighty salute.

Korea gave him a long look, then padded past him, disappearing inside the mountain.

North Pyongan supposed those divided voices were why he couldn't be a follower. He had to hold firm in his beliefs and what he believed was good, not only to make sure Korea never strayed from their path, but to prevent himself from being torn apart by the desires of the god at their heels.

In the end, the commandment he had to carry out was the same either way- be good, do good.

Believe.

North Pyongan accidentally giving Tae-min a 'God loves you even if you're gay' speech without realizing himself (nor will he ever, even when officiating their 'wedding') that Tae-min is gay.

Another iiiiinteresting thing I noticed while checking Wikipedia for my maps is that not anywhere do they mention in the English article for the Battle of Bloody Ridge that it was staged coincidentally at a time the talks were going well, and that the US lied about not being involved, claiming it was only the South Koreans at first, even though they had actually began a limited operation the day before. I know with enough certainty to stake my limbs on it that if the DPRK had done that, the article would mention it. I am confident I would not end up like that limbless fetish girl.

Teaching and Learning

1919

"Can you believe that Pak Won-ho? 'Why shouldn't my father own half the land from here to Busan?' I don't know, maybe because he's in Japan half the time? What an ass."

"Says the boy whose father owns half the land from here to Pyongyang."

"Yeah, but I don't think he should. My father is a prick."

Hwanghae smiled as he listened to his two students bicker over landownership, flicking to the final page of the book he had been reading.

Only Choi Jung-nam- a landlord's son- was his actual student from the high school. The other- Suzuki Yoshi- was a girl that he had found teaching herself to read at an advanced level, and volunteered to assist.

The two were part of 'Professor Hwanghae's Extracurricular Club,' which was an elevated way of saying they met in an abandoned shack on the edge of Seoul once a month so he could lend them banned books, and discuss topics that he couldn't with the other high schoolers for fear of imprisonment from Japan. Or worse, fear of being fired.

"Well," he said, cutting them off as they discussed exactly what they thought of Choi Jung-nam's father. "I was only able to get my hands on one book this month. My minders have been reaching new heights of vigilance lately."

Indeed, it had been most difficult to sneak out this night, and had involved an awkward drop from a second-story window. Luckily, he had landed in a pile of fallen leaves, and his precious spectacles had been uninjured.

“Think it has anything to do with those rumours?” Choi Jung-nam wondered.

“Rumours?” Hwanghae adjusted his glasses.

“How is it you manage to scrounge up banned books, but you haven’t heard people talking about there being a hunt for Provincehumans?” Suzuki-san asked, brushing aside a strand of escaped hair. “Everyone’s talking about the bounty that was put out on them. Your guards are probably making sure no one tries to kidnap you to collect it.”

Hwanghae raised his eyebrows. He had searched for information on his fellow provinces before, of course, and even managed to find that one was working nearby, in the old City Hall. But the letter he had sent had not been returned, and on the others, he had never managed to find anything more substantial than hearsay. He had assumed that they were all employed elsewhere, under Japan’s supervision, as was the case with him and South Chungcheong, the one he had attempted to contact. Perhaps one of them had gone rogue recently, resulting in the bounty.

“I’ve been hearing different things,” Choi Jung-nam said lowly, glancing around the threadbare shack. “In Father’s circles, they’ve been saying that they’re looking for Korea himself.”

“Korea!?” Hwanghae burst out.

Gracious, the country himself had gone rogue? Then again, he had no idea if he hadn’t already been. One would think that if the Korean Countryhuman was supportive of Japan, the foreign country would take advantage of that fact and have plastered pictures of them all through the news. Since that wasn’t the case, there was a good chance that the country had instead done something such as ‘escape.’

Hwanghae shook his head. "We don't have enough information to speculate on rumours. Though if you’d like to information-gather, I’d appreciate hearing what you find next month.”

“Sure thing, Prof.”

“Of course, Hwanghae-sensei. I can ask around at the newspaper.”

If either Choi Jung-nam or Suzuki-san had ever found referring to a boy that looked to be slightly younger than them (and was also a good foot shorter) as Professor or Sensei, they never mentioned it. Though some of Hwanghae’s less open-minded students had.

“Very good.” Pushing aside thoughts of rumours and bounties, Hwanghae placed the book on the table. “Who wishes to read it first?”

Suzuki-san went quiet when she saw the small, beat-up paperback, and Hwanghae quickly found a mental folder that he had misplaced.

“Oh, apologies, Suzuki-san,” he said, abashed. “Your father was an intellectual in the Communist Party, was he not?”

In his exuberance at getting his hands on a Japanese translation of the much-contested ‘Communist Manifesto,’ it had slipped his mind that that was the reason one of his students was here in Korea in the first place.

“You don’t have to read it, if you don’t wish,” he quickly informed them. “Unlike some of our other material, there could be severe consequences for getting caught reading this one.”

He winced after he said it. Of course, the Japanese girl would be aware of those consequences.

Most of the banned literature Hwanghae smuggled to the two would only result in an imprisonment for Suzuki-san or a fine for Choi Jung-nam, if his father decided to step in. But due to the recent crackdown on leftist ideas, more and more banned books leaned that way politically, and the punishment for reading them could be even harsher.

Hwanghae could never put aside his thirst for knowledge in favour of fear, but he also couldn’t expect his students to do the same.

“No,” Suzuki-san said after a moment, taking the small tome and flipping through it. “I suppose I should take a look at what ideas were so important that Otou-san had to be executed for believing in them.”

“Me, too,” Choi Jung-nam said quickly.

Hwanghae couldn’t help the proud smile that spread on his face. He had truly chosen well with these two. When Choi Jung-nam had handed in an essay on why he thought Japan’s Occupation of Korea was detrimental to both of their people, instead of reporting him (as he was expected to) Hwanghae had instead asked if he wouldn’t like to meet up to discuss those ideas in more detail, and also turn in a different essay so he wouldn’t be expelled and perhaps fined. And when he had encountered Suzuki Yoshi surreptitiously filching a book on mathematics from the local store, defending herself by saying it was unfair that poor women couldn’t receive proper schooling, the teacher had instead bought it for her, and offered to give her that schooling. He had even pulled a few strings to get her a job at the paper.

It wasn't much, but he hoped by nurturing their more open-minded, progressive natures, there could be at least two more intellectuals in the world that didn’t simply go along with what those in power decreed.

“I can lend it to you once I’m done,” Suzuki-san was offering to her fellow student. “Or if you’d like to read it first…”

Choi Jung-nam awkwardly ruffled his hair. “I was thinking maybe we could, uh, read it together? I know this spot by the river where no one would see us. S-So we wouldn’t get arrested, y’know?”

Suzuki-san flushed, tugging on a strand of her chestnut locks. “I’d like that. How about after your classes tomorrow?”

“Cool!” Choi Jung-nam exclaimed, then cleared his throat. “Yeah, that sounds great. I’ll bring some lunch.”

Hwang politely cleared his throat, and they both jolted, looking like they’d forgotten he was there. He hid a smile as he changed the topic.

“Have you started thinking about your university admissions yet, Choi Jung-nam?”

It was the boy’s final year of high school, and since there were no academies of higher learning in Korea, he would have to leave the country, most likely to Japan.

“Father still wants me to go to Tokyo,” he muttered, kicking at the leg of the rickety old table. “But I’d rather stay here and try to make a difference.”

“You won’t be able to make a difference if you don’t receive an education,” Hwanghae pointed out. “Nothing gets accomplished without intellectuals. You’re an incredibly bright boy, one with the finances to seek a higher education. You must take advantage of that. Don’t you think Suzuki-san would if she could?”

“You should go,” the Japanese girl agreed. “You have the privilege to. I’ll be cross if you don’t use it.”

Choi Jung-nam sighed. “I know, but-“ He froze. “Do you hear that?”

Hwanghae froze as well, inner ears staining. There. The slightest crunch of gravel from the overgrown path outside.

“Quick, into the pantry,” he whispered. “Someone is coming-“

“Someone is already here,” a woman’s cocky voice said, and the door slammed open.

Choi Jung-nam jumped in front of Suzuki-san, blocking her from the newcomer. Hwanghae stepped between them. As professor, it was his job to protect his students, even if he had all the fighting ability of a wet rag.

“Shut up,” the person in the doorway hissed at the shadow behind them. “Keep on guard.”

“Yes, sir,” the same woman as before agreed, and the stranger snapped, “Don’t call me that.”

He stepped past the threshold, and shut the door, strafing the occupants with a glare before settling on Hwanghae. “Hwanghae province?”

“Y-Yes?” Hwanghae ventured, heart pounding in his chest. By the furtive movements and whispers, combined with the cloak which covered the male before him, he assumed it wasn’t someone from the Kempeitei or the government. But that didn’t mean that it was someone without ill intent.

Wait. The face in the shadows of that hood was pale, far paler than that of any human. And the eyes reflecting the candlelight looked large and white. The rumours that Choi Jung-nam had mentioned…

Hwanghae blinked. “Korea…?” he ventured.

The person *‘tch’*ed, casting a look at the human students before pulling his hood down.

Hwanghae’s hypothesis had been correct. It was the Korean Countryhuman. Maybe more important questions should have been on his mind, but all he could think was, ‘Aha! So that’s why Japan never had him in the papers.’

Instead of the flag of Chosen, that which displayed the Japanese rising sun, his face was emblazoned with the Korean Taeguki. That certainly wouldn’t have been good optics for someone trying to impress that Korea was completely under his control.

“It’s me,” Korea grudgingly confirmed, simple words for such a monumental moment. “I’ve come to free you.”

The myriad of questions that had been bubbling in Hwanghae’s mind were dispersed with frightful quickness.

His brows shot up. ”Pardon?”

“I don’t have time for this,” the country growled. “We need to get away from Seoul, and you’re coming with us.”

“Why?”

“Because I said so.”

Ah. A man of few words.

“I’m going to need more to go on than that,” Hwanghae protested.

Korea gritted his teeth, looking once more at the humans. “Can they be trusted?”

Hwanghae looked at them, Choi Jung-nam staring at Korea with an expression of awe, and Suzuki-san hidden behind him.

“Of course,” he said readily. “Choi Jung-nam is one of my best students, and Suzuki Yoshi-“

“’Suzuki?’” Korea cut him off with a dark tone. “She’s a Jap?”

Oh, that couldn’t be good. Hwanghae sidled a little farther in front of the two students.

“Yes, she is. And she’s also one of my-“

“Come out,” Korea ordered, pulling a pistol from his cloak.

“Let’s not do anything rash here!” Hwanghae protested, raising his hands. He was beginning to understand why Japan had put out a bounty on him. One didn’t simply obtain a Japanese-made gun peacefully.

Suzuki-san stepped out from behind Choi Jung-nam, hands clasped tight in front of her, but head held high.

“Yes, I’m Japanese,” she confirmed. “But I have nothing to do with the Occupation.”

“You’re here, aren’t you?” Korea returned.

The atmosphere in the house was like a powder keg, simply waiting for someone to light the fuse. Hwanghae could only dart looks between the two, unsure of what to do. He couldn't lay hands on his Countryhuman, but he also couldn't allow him to lay hands on his student.

“Only because the government executed my father, and my mother had to flee here from the shame.” Suzuki-san bit her lip, then stepped closer to the Countryhuman, her palms outspread before her, avoiding Choi Jung-nam’s attempt to catch her. She was visibly nervous, but putting on a respectful face.

Hwanghae noted the way Korea’s fingers tensed around the grip of the gun. “Ah, Suzuki-san…”

“It’s alright.” She stopped a few feet in front of the pistol barrel pointed at her chest, then dropped to her knees.

“What are you doing?” Korea barked.

Hwanghae realized what she was doing as the girl bent over, placing her forehead on the ground in full dogeza.

“I’m sincerely sorry for all the trouble my country has caused yours.” Her words were soft, but clear. “If I could take responsibility for him, I would. But I can’t. I can only apologize on his behalf. Moushi wake gozaimasen, Korea-san.”

The country had pressed himself up against the door, flinching back from her apology.

“Apologies don’t fix anything,” he muttered, not looking at her. Hwanghae had the feeling her bowing was making him distinctly uncomfortable.

“I know.” The girl hadn’t moved from her prostrated position. “But they’re all I can offer.”

“Get up!” Korea snapped. “Stop doing that.” Thankfully, the gun was now tucked closer to his body, protectively instead of threateningly.

Apology given, if not accepted, Suzuki-san obediently got to her knees, and Choi Jung-nam stepped forwards to pull her to her feet, putting a guarding arm around her.

“I’ll vouch for her,” he said firmly. “Suzuki-san won’t breathe a word about you being here, or what you’re doing.”

“I vouch for her as well,” Hwanghae quickly added. “She’s an exceptional student and bears no love for the Japanese authorities.”

“Alright, fine,” Korea grumbled, still backed up against the exit, as if frightened by the girl’s remorse. “Just don’t do that again.”

“Sorry.” Suzuki-san bowed again, lightly this time. “I wanted you to know I was sincere. We don’t all support what His Imperial Majesty or the Crown Prince are doing.”

Korea still wouldn’t look at her fully, looking at Hwanghae instead as he tried to recover his former bravado. “I don’t trust her, but it doesn’t matter. Japan has probably guessed what I’m doing by now, anyway.” He narrowed his eyes. “Knowing won’t be able to stop us.”

“What are you doing?” Choi Jung-nam asked excitedly.

“Freeing my provinces, then my people.” Korea gazed directly at Hwanghae, commandeering demeanour having made a full return. “We’re going to organize a revolution.”

“You plan to overthrow Japan?” Hwanghae blinked in shock.

“Not just Japan,” Korea growled. “Everyone that ever collaborated with him, and all that lord their wealth and status over the people. We’re going to free Korea completely.”

Hwanghae couldn’t help but think that his choice of illicit reading this month had been timely. “Do you have any idea how difficult that will be?”

The country dismissed his concerns. “No more difficult than what our people suffer everyday.”

Much more difficult, actually! It was simple to suffer. Seeking an end to that suffering was much more of a challenge. Though Hwanghae supposed he understood what Korea meant, and was just being pedantic from the astonishment of it all.

“That’s amazing!” Choi Jung-nam exclaimed, eyes alight with eagerness. “And he wants you to help, Prof!”

Hwanghae recovered, pushing up his glasses. “I’m afraid I just can’t do that.”

Korea glowered at him. “And why not?”

Choi Jung-nam cried, “What are you taking about, Prof?! You have to! You resent Imperial rule just as much as us.”

“And I would be willing to help your revolution with information work,” Hwanghae conceded. “But my talents aren’t suited for engaging in combat, and most likely living wild in the outdoors. I would better serve you here, distributing pamphlets and influencing the minds of our youth.”

“And how exactly are you going to do that when Japan locks you up?” Korea crossed his arms. “I’ve already Liberated three of my provinces-“

“Heyyy,” the same girl from before called from outside, followed by a boy shushing her.

“-so it’s only a matter of time before Japan starts raising security on those who remain in captivity,” Korea finished, ignoring the interruption. “Do you really think he’ll let you keep your job when there’s a chance I could come for you?”

Hwanghae pursed his lips. He was right. His minders had already started to step up their surveillance. He might not even be able to sneak out next month, let alone distribute more leaflets or banned materials.

It was a genius move, really. Even if it hadn’t been Korea’s intent, he had pretty much guaranteed that any provinces he encountered would have to join him, as what he was doing would risk whatever small freedoms they enjoyed.

“Hwanghae-sensei.” Suzuki-san stepped forwards, ignoring Korea’s fierce glare. “You have to go with him. Isn’t this the kind of thing you want?”

“Well, yes, but…” Hwanghae gestured helplessly.

He had always believed that freedom would be something delivered to him by someone else, someone with arms training, biceps, and 20/20 vision.

"If you're worried about us, don't be. We can take care of ourselves," she assured him.

"And we could even help you from here," Choi Jung-nam chimed in. "Or I could come with you!"

"No," Hwanghae said firmly. "You must get an education. If you feel the need to take up arms, wait until after you graduate university."

"He's right," Korea said unexpectedly. "Once we're free we'll need specialists to rebuild. Right now, you can contribute best by learning and spreading ideas to the other students, while we begin to organize militarily."

Hwanghae raised a brow at that. So the boy wasn't quite as impulsive as he seemed. He was actually thinking ahead. Far ahead.

Choi Jung-nam had deflated. Suzuki-san blinked comfortingly at him. "Don't be disappointed, Choi-san. We can fight back in other ways."

Hwanghae really had no other choice, but he still had to say, "I'm not quite the revolutionary you were most likely hoping for."

Korea stared at him for a disconcerting amount of time, eyes narrowed, then asked, "Were you the one who printed flyers about the March First Movement?"

Hwanghae blinked, surprised to have that brought up now. "I believe there were many who did that. But yes, I wrote some. Suzuki-san used her internship at the newspaper to have them printed for me."

Korea glanced warily at her, and she dipped her head. "And would any others use the word 'indubitably?'"

The province pursed his mouth in a moue, studiously ignoring his students muffled laughter. “Most likely not. I have a feeling I was one of the most educated advertisers.”

Korea nodded, as if confirming something to himself. “I read your pamphlet. You would have risked punishment from Japan for that.”

Indeed. Hwanghae could vividly remember the way his hands had shaken as he typed out the call to action, and how nauseous he had felt for the next few days, waiting to find out if Suzuki-san had succeeded at her task or if the Kempeitai were about to break down his door and have him removed from the school. And also possibly life.

“But you still did it,” Korea continued. “You put out the call to unite our people, and they listened.”

“Not that it succeeded,” Hwanghae said, not without a touch of bitterness. He had hoped that that would have been the day that Japan or at least his leaders, might be swayed by the speeches of the organizers.

“Because words aren’t enough.” Korea’s gun had finally left his hand as he straightened up, squaring his shoulders. “They’re a start, but they aren’t what will free us. For that, we need action. And we need you. You have the makings of a revolutionary. If you come with me, I’ll turn you into one.”

Hwanghae had to admit, there was something rousing about the way he said that. And clearly words hadn’t been enough. While he had great faith in the power of language, he also knew when to admit that power, however great, wouldn’t succeed.

“Professor Hwanghae!” Choi Jung-nam grabbed his arm.

Suzuki-san took his other one. “Hwanghae-sensei!”

“Very well,” he sighed. “Not that I truly have a choice. If I’m going to lose my position, at least it won’t be due to being fired.”

“Yeah! That’s the spirit, Prof!

“Ganbatte, sensei!”

“Let’s go, then.” Korea turned for the door.

“A moment, please. I need to say my goodbyes.” The Provincehuman turned to his students, who seemed to realize for the first time that joining Korea would mean they wouldn’t see him again.

“We’ll miss you, sensei,” Suzuki-san said quietly.

Hwanghae nodded, feeling suddenly choked. “I’ll miss you, as well. Choi Jung-nam- make sure you go to university.”

“I will,” he murmured, looking down.

“And Suzuki-san- keep up your internship. Don’t let them pressure you out solely because you’re a woman.”

“I won’t, sensei.” She wiped her eyes. “And if you ever need anything printed, you know where to go.”

He nodded, taking a deep breath. “Both of you, continue your studies. You’re my favourite students, and I’m very proud of you. Remember to always search for truth, and question what you’re told. Your best defense is-”

“Critical thinking,” they chorused.

“And your best offense is-“

“Our intellect.” The three chuckled at the classroom call-and-response.

“I’ve taught you well,” Hwanghae said with no small amount of pride. “Make sure you grow into fine, intelligent adults.”

“We will, sensei.”

“For sure, Prof.”

“Alright,” he said, wiping his suddenly misty glasses as he turned to Korea. “I’m ready.”

“Finally-“

“Wait!”

Korea glared at Suzuki-san. “Oh for the love of- What?”

The girl wrung her skirt in her hands. “I just wanted to say, please don’t think we’re all like the army or the government. There are people in Japan that know what they’re doing- to you and us- is wrong. And they’re fighting back. So please don’t think we’re all the enemy.”

“I have yet to be proven otherwise.” Despite how icy Korea sounded, the uncomfortable look had settled over his countenance once more.

“Then I hope one day you feel you are.” Suzuki-san had picked up the white and red book off the table, holding it to her chest like a talisman. “We want to see Japan free of our government as much as you do. Please remember that. That’s all I wanted to say.”

She bowed slightly, and Choi Jung-nam patted her arm.

Korea hesitated, then left the house without another look at her. “Come on,” he said gruffly to Hwanghae. “Enough stalling.”

When Hwanghae had arrived at the shack that night, he had crossed into it a teacher. Now, as he stepped back over the threshold and into the early fall air, he left a revolutionary.

—

1951

Hwang arranged himself in the recording booth of the underground Broadcasting Station, reviewing his notes once more, making sure he had all his facts right, while attempting to deny himself the satisfaction of examining the portable wire recorder stationed on a nearby side table.

He nodded in satisfaction, tapping his papers on the table he sat at, his eyes straying towards the grey box with its switches and currently unoccupied recorder heads. An Armor Model 50, manufactured by the American General Electric Company, likely having been sold to the Republic of China at some point during World War II, that had now made its way into Korean hands.

'Portable' was truly a poor descriptor. It could be lifted, certainly, but then again, so could Hae. Yet he would never describe her as portable.

The box was too hefty, and even though it didn't require a source of electricity to work, it was still a burden for war correspondents to haul around the battlefield. Hwang had coordinated with them before, and while they hadn't gone so far as to complain, he knew they would vastly appreciate a more compact way to record audio.

He'd always been enamored with the concept of audio recorders, both for the human ingenuity that had gone into inventing a way to transfer waves of sound into coils of steel, but also for the practical value. Music, pre-recorded classes, dead drops, espionage. The applications were practically unlimited. If they had possessed audio recorders during the Occupation, they could have recorded lessons for their people, limiting the amount of time spent in their homes, and so the danger their presence brought them.

Of course, the night classes would always be more effective with Korea and the Provincehumans delivering them face-to-face. But they also could have left behind messages of encouragement to keep morale up when they couldn't do it in person. And the vast amount of speeches Korea and the General had made during their years at war could have been recorded for posterity, instead of written down from memory or copied from faded transcriptions done by soldiers whose shorthand was nearly indecipherable. Hwang had always wished to transcribe Korea's words, but had never had the supply of paper or writing utensils to do it.

But an audio recorder would have solved all those issues, especially in the later years, when models such as the one next to him had become available. They would be even more useful if they were reduced in size, perhaps able to fit in a pocket. The components would have to be downsized, and the batteries made smaller. But they would still need to be able to maintain a good charge if they were to be used in the field.

It made Hwang a bit glum to know that the Soviets or Americans would likely beat them to that, and that his people wouldn't be able to focus on pursuits like those for some time. Every mind would need to be devoted to methods of cleansing contaminated soil, creating more effective fertilizers, and any other invention that could quickly improve their quality of life amidst and after the bombings.

He could remember a time towards the end of his period as a teacher at Jungdong High Scool when a Japanese 'colleague' had shown him a newly acquired Mikami brand camera, and not-so-subtly implied that a country such as Korea could never hope to produce technological marvels such as it.

Hwang had bit his tongue on retorting that perhaps his people would have more time to invent if the vast majority of them didn't have to spend their days slaving in fields so that the man's belt buckle could strain the way it did. Which was wise of him, since he had gotten in enough trouble for not-so-subtly implying that the Japanese camera looked a remarkable amount like an American Vest Pocket Kodak, which had been invented some years earlier.

That was the kind of rhetoric that Imperialist nations liked to spew- that they deserved their position of authority because they were more advanced and civilized than the nations they occupied, on account of the latter's failure to produce grand inventions that changed the world.

And barring the way they purposefully stunted education in those occupied countries (it had taken a decade of Occupation for a university to be built in Korea, and even then, Korean attendance had been limited, and engineering and scientific courses hadn't been offered until just before World War II had officially broken out), the colonizers also ignored inventions that had changed the lives of the people living in those countries, and likely their own without even realizing it- the advanced tools and stone-quarrying methods that came out of the African continent; the many techniques of Indian fabric production; the homi, heated greenhouses, rain gauge, practices of seaweed and soybean cultivation, and a thousand other inventions that Hwang could and would attribute to his own country. The Imperialists also chose to overlook the fact that it was their exploitation of those 'lesser' countries that allowed them to invent many of their own creations, and that kept those countries from inventing their own.

By shifting the burden of production and resource extraction to colonized countries, those in Japan or America were left with more time and capital to invent, while Koreans, Puerto Ricans, and Indigenous Americans were left with less. And by using cheap foreign labour, as well as stealing their own workers' surplus value, corporations in Imperialist countries could spend millions on development, creating commodities to keep their masses content, while those providing the resources and labour went without.

Of course, that kind of focused innovation was useful, and necessary in the modern day, where humanity tended to no longer be grouped in family clans or tribes, only needing to provide for their immediate group. With most people united in nations, they needed to be able to constantly innovate, to find new ways of feeding, clothing, and housing millions, along with everything else that was needed to maintain a stable, healthy populace.

Which was where Socialism came in. By providing basic necessities for their people, and putting the means of production in their hands, they would have far more time and capability to focus on creation, and that wasn't mentioning the added motivation of their efforts now being for themselves instead of a foreign nation or domestic boss. While the State would turn their surplus value back over to them by using it for those necessities, and to invest in focused innovative projects. Not for capital, but for quality of life, and without stunting the development of any other nation.

'North Hwanghae, focus.'

Ah. Hwang could hear Korea mentally scolding him. That meant his train of thought had escaped him again.

The point was that having to devote all of your resources to survival left very little time to create for pleasure. And for the recent past and foreseeable future, the vast majority of Korean efforts had to be devoted to survival.

For even longer, it seemed, with recent developments.

The door opened, and Hwang jolted away from the audio recorder, hands innocently behind his back.

He had expected his interviewer, but it was instead one of his cousins.

"SH?"

"Is she here yet?" The woman glanced around the small booth. "No? Good."

Hwang blinked as she darted forward, attempting to step back, but stymied by the table.

"SH-"

She only grabbed his collar, straightening it out. "I'm not going to bite you," she chided.

Her voice was light, but a strained current ran under it.

Hwang cleared his throat, a touch ashamed. "Of course not."

He wasn't afraid of his cousin. He understood why her outburst at Hungnam had occurred, and knew he wasn't in any danger from her.

But she had been… tense lately. And with much of his time being spent at a POW camp, with easy access to American prisoners, he was always slightly on edge, waiting for her to attempt to persuade him into allowing her to do something… unsavoury.

"I'm aware you wouldn't bite me," Hwang assured her. "I'm not your brother after all."

When she didn't answer, brushing invisible lint from his shoulders, he ventured, "How are things between you two, by the way? Has he attempted to… converse with you at- Urk!"

SH slid the knot of his red tie tighter against his throat. "Honestly," she *'tsk'*ed. "Didn't I straighten this before you left the bunker this morning? How did you loosen it already?"

"Perhaps we've gone a little too far in the opposite direction?" Hwang wheezed, and his cousin granted him the mercy of breathing again, loosening the knot to a respectable degree.

'Refrain from asking about North Hamgyong. Noted.'

He'd hoped to discover if his quarrelsome green cousin had checked in on his sister as Hwang had advised. Asking him certainly wouldn't produce an answer.

Well, not one that wasn't 'fuck off.'

"Really," SH sighed, pretending that she hadn't just choked him as she adjusted his cufflinks. "You came almost straight here. How are you already a mess?"

"I honestly could not tell you." Hwang guiltily tucked in the other half of his black suit jacket that he must have pulled out while reading, as with his tie.

"For someone who's always reminding us to be presentable for the public, you're so messy sometimes. You really need to follow your own advice."

Perhaps it was a good thing Hwang had mostly learned to hold his tongue during his Occupation days. Otherwise he might have gotten choked again for pointing out that certain other people could follow their own advice about certain other things, such as emotional vulnerability.

SH plucked at his jacket, fixing a wrinkle, then stepped back, satisfied. "There. You're presentable again. Keep it that way, please."

"I will," he vowed. "My interviewer should be here soon. And, ah, thank you."

It wasn't as if he was going to be on camera or anything, but journalists tended to be two things- observant and nosy. And while whoever was going to interview him today may not address his state of dress in the article itself, they very well could share it with their comrades. And considering certain goings-on, appearing even slightly nervous or rumpled wouldn't do.

"You're welcome," SH said.

"But that isn't the only reason you came here."

The smile his cousin had worn since she walked in tightened slightly.

"No," she admitted. "We received word from the enemy. They say that our clarification came too late."

"Ah." Hwang adjusted his glasses. "I can't say I didn't expect it, but… It is unfortunate. Perhaps we should have been more clear initially."

SH's jaw feathered. "It wouldn't have mattered. America was just looking for an excuse."

"As ever," Hwang sighed. "How did Korea take it?"

SH looked at him steadily. He dipped his head.

Well. At least they wouldn't have to fear a return of his bad (worse) mood and self-imposed isolation.

Though still. Hwang had to wonder if it was solely because he had expected it, as he had, or if…

No. It wasn't his place to speculate.

"Did he say if I can share that in the interview?" he asked.

"He wants you to," SH said, then looked over her shoulder as the door opened.

Hwang's eyes widened as he saw the person standing there.

“Ms. Cho Sok-young?”

“Comrade North Hwanghae.”

The woman bowed at the waist, and SH made her departure, her eyes narrowing as she passed her, undoubtedly thinking about what Hwang had relayed about her experience in Sincheon.

He noted with worry that her knuckles turned an even paler shade of white before she left, though he was promptly distracted by Cho Sok-young hustling forward so she could clasp his forearm, and accidentally shaking hers instead.

“I didn’t expect you to be my interviewer,” he said with anxious excitement. “Comrade Kim Sun-hi informed me you were considering joining the Mobile Broadcasting Unit a few months ago, of course, but Kangwon never mentioned you had actually done it, even though-“

He cleared his throat before he could ramble any further.

His cousin had met with the woman a few times in between offensives, in order to provide grief counselling, and observe her mental state.

Did that sound too clinical? Perhaps. Anyhow, their last session had only been three weeks ago, and all Kangwon had said was that it seemed she was mentally sound.

Cho Sok-young smiled sheepishly. “I told him to keep it secret to surprise you. I hope you don’t mind.”

“Of course not.” Hwang realized he was still pumping her arm up and down, and promptly released her, apologizing. “How have you been? Have you been eating? Are you well?”

She looked well, though in comparison to her state the last time he had seen her- as they went their separate ways, her carrying on to Kanggye with the broadcasters, and he about to undertake his arduous march to Chongjin- anything would’ve been an improvement.

Her long, tangled black hair had been snipped to just below her chin, and brushed straight, her bangs tucked back behind her ears, of which precisely one lobe was missing, a victim of the mountain winter. She might've been a tad more slender, due to the lack of food, but at the same time she seemed healthier, not hunched over or shaking. And the shadows under her eyes and haunting her cheekbones had vanished, leaving unblemished brown skin.

And yet her eyes were the most noticeable change. From the moment he had met her in that field to the moment they parted, they had either been rolling wildly in her head as they gleamed with terror, or shining with tears as she stared dully into space.

There was still a sorrow in their dark brown depths, as was only expected after what she had been through. But they no longer resembled those of a frightened prey animal.

"I am well, thank you," she said, and her voice, too, was calmer than he had ever heard, not tinged with desperate fear or weighed by grief. "I'm not a broadcaster yet, only a correspondent-in-training. But I think I'm going to be."

"Excellent," Hwang said with enthusiasm, taking a seat at the table. "Broadcasters- all journalists, really- are more important than ever in our struggle as the enemy spreads slander against us. We need you to tell our people the truth."

"And I'm more aware of it than most." Cho Sok-young smoothed down the black skirt of her choson-ot as she sat across from him. "I think that's why I was sent here today, despite not being fully ideologically educated yet. That and…" She looked down, fiddling with her goreum. "I know you."

Hwang suddenly realized she must be feeling as awkward as he was.

They had only ever interacted when they were both at their worst, exhausted, terrified, and wounded, physically and emotionally. He had supported her for a thousand ri, she had shared her most traumatic experience with him, he had kept watch over her while she slept, patting her arm whenever she stirred with a nightmare, and she had clutched at his uniform and sobbed into his chest when they parted.

But they hadn't exactly had a conversation before now.

He cleared his throat nervously, trying not to let that be another thing to impede his interview prowess. "Well, shall we begin?"

Cho Sok-young looked relieved. "If you're ready."

He assented, and she reached over, setting up the wire recorder.

"Just so you know in advance, if I go off on any tangents, you have permission to cut them from the final material," Hwang informed her.

Cho Sok-young sounded slightly bemused as she said, "I'm sure everyone will want to hear as many words from our Provincehuman as possible."

Hwang wished that were true. But experience told him it was not.

He was fully aware of his tendency to ramble, and how… enthusiastic he could be while doing it. It had gotten him censured while teaching under Japanese rule, gotten him praised while teaching nowadays, and gotten him pointed glares from Korea at Party meetings.

And it certainly didn't come in handy for interviews or informationals. Honestly, he was relieved when he'd heard SH would be joining him in communications. He'd long told Korea she should. He was skilled at the behind-the-scenes portions of information and publicity work, but his cousin had a optimism and confidence (and brevity) to her that lent themselves well to public speaking.

He had volunteered for this interview today as part of his effort to gain more expertise in an area he was weak in, but no matter how good he became, he knew that SH would always have him beat on at least one count- people would much rather hear things from a pretty woman than a pencil-thin man who was squint-eyed even with his glasses.

Hwang adjusted his lapels a final time, issuing a stern directive to himself to not let his nerves or love of speaking send him on a verbal detour, then folded his hands on the table as Cho Sok-young counted down to flipping the switch on the recorder.

"Thank you for agreeing to an interview, Comrade North Hwanghae," she said as the reel whirred.

"Of course," he said, biting down the urge to correct her on his name. "As someone who is heavily involved in Party information work, I'm well aware of how valuable our war correspondents are to our efforts. Any request both Korea and I can fulfill for you and your comrades, we will."

There. Not too many words, not too few. And the perfect amount of context provided.

"And we truly appreciate it," Cho Sok-young said, glancing down at her notebook open on the table. "To start with, would you be willing to provide a statement on the current state of the ceasefire talks at Kaesong?"

"I would be." Hwang inhaled subtly, keeping his voice even. "As I'm sure you're aware, the talks have been called off."

Cho Sok-young nodded grimly. "Our side was the one that withdrew, correct?"

"Indeed." Hwang shifted in his chair. "The intention was to call them off for the day in protest of the Americans' handling of our complaints over their violations of the talks. Not only did a band of their puppet soldiers invade the neutral zone and cut down a valued allied commander in cold blood, but one of their planes opened fire on a vehicle of negotiators on their way to discuss peace."

When admitting to it, the Americans had said their Jeep wasn't painted with the proper identifying marks. While Hwang hadn't been able to confirm or deny that, and as such wouldn't speak on it, he would say that if their positions were reversed, he would hope his own pilots would show a bit more restraint if a singular vehicle of the same make of the kind that had been visiting the neutral zone for the past month or so came from the same direction it usually did, flying white flags.

He didn't share the information with Cho Sok-young, nor did he share that the attack against their military police quite possibly could have been carried out by Rhee's army or one of the southern reactionary gangs with a complete lack of awareness from the Americans (though he was skeptical that an armed brigade could invade a heavily-surveilled neutral zone without at least one commander giving tacit permission). It wasn't wise to give your enemy any benefit of the doubt, especially when they were already giving themselves plenty.

"And not only that," he continued. "But just two days ago, a United Nations' plane bombed Kaesong directly."

Cho Sok-young bobbed her head seriously. "We heard. The enemy is accusing us in their media, aren't they?"

More than she knew. Hwang was careful to keep his finger on the pulse of the cables they received of American news headlines, no matter how much it made him want to shake whoever ran The New York Times until he had knocked some sense of journalistic integrity into them.

"Yes," he agreed smoothly. "Despite only a limited investigation conducted under cover of night, they seem convinced that one of our planes made it past their radars to bomb our own city."

"And do you think there's any possibility of that?" Cho Sok-young brushed her hair behind her damaged ear, clearly uncomfortable voicing the question.

Hwang would say that when he had thought Hae had been calling him cynical, he had more than been able to see that. It wasn't so much that he was, it was just that he thought about all outcomes and possibilities, which could come off that way.

He was aware that a ceasefire wasn't entirely popular amongst the upper echelons of their military and government, or even vast swathes of their soldiers and civilians. And with how Korea had apparently reacted- or not reacted- upon hearing that the Americans had called the talks off entirely…

He would admit (to himself, not to anyone else) that the possibility of them bombing the zone themselves had crossed his mind.

Yet he still told his interviewer, “No,” confidently. “There isn’t. If we were looking for an excuse to call off the talks, the Americans had already given us several- the attack on our brigade and their refusal to properly investigate, as well as their firing on our negotiation team. And not to mention the new offensive they launched at the front. Any one of those things would be grounds for us to step away.”

He wasn’t entirely sure that Korea would never violate the results of the Provincehumans’ personal votes. But he knew he wouldn’t go against a decision made by their Party.

And he had seemed genuinely frustrated upon learning that Rhee had eagerly interpreted their call for a break as a permanent one, rushing off to direct the radio in Beijing to announce it was only supposed to be for the day that very night, as well as making sure the message to Ridgway hoping for a continuation of the talks was sent immediately this morning.

Cho Sok-young looked comforted by his words, nodding in relief. “I’m sorry to even ask.”

“No, no, I understand,” Hwang placated. “It’s important to clear any doubts in people’s minds, especially with the propaganda directed against us.”

If no one had heard any, then enemy lies shouldn’t be brought up at all. But with the sheer amount of broadcasts contaminating their airwaves, and leaflets being dropped over their country, those falsehoods needed to be crushed before they could seed doubt.

“Did you know that before this most recent offensive of theirs, just as Comrade Nam Il issued his statement about discussing the current line, and our sub-committees were starting to make gains, Ridgway released an interview in the US News where he professed that we had no intentions on making peace?" Hwang asked with professional neutrality.

Cho Sok-young shook her head, eyes wide, then quickly said, "I hadn't heard."

Hwang felt the urge to discuss all of the press communiques the Americans had been issuing, such as those they had sent to the Japanese press, informing them they were seeking a line between the current front and Manchuria, just days after telling their own press they had no intentions on land grabbing, well within him. He pushed it down, forcing himself to stay on topic.

"That's right," he said with an effort. "Just as they said from the very day after we adopted the agenda for the talks that we were only attempting to use them as a excuse to build forces. But who has been training the southern puppet army in the interim, only to unleash them on us at a moment when an agreement seemed near?"

He winced slightly. Usually call-and-responses were for the classroom or particularly fiery speeches, not interviews.

"The US," Cho Sok-young murmured, quickly scribbling something on her notebook.

"Exactly." Hwang straightened slightly. "Since the talks began, they've been using the slightest excuse to pause them, and made it quite public that they didn't expect them to succeed, preparing their civilians to accept the lie that we would attack our own military police or bomb our own land. Even now they're refusing to admit any hand in the latest offensive, placing the blame solely on the reactionary army."

They were apparently completely withholding the fact that their army was involved, acting as if Rhee's had conducted the attack without permission, though with how their Command had been completely turned over to the Americans, that was near impossible. And Hwang knew for a fact that the American army had already been conducting preliminary operations the day before.

Cho Sok-young blinked at that. “How can they not know their own army is attacking us?”

“They’re thousands of kilometres away,” Hwang replied. “Even our children are face to face with the atrocities the American Eighth Army is inflicting on Korea. But theirs have no inkling of what their own soldiers do. The only source they have is their own news, and the press embargo MacArthur placed on them at the end of last year makes that incredibly untrustworthy.”

Not that media that depended on the bourgeois to survive was ever trustworthy. No matter how unbiased it claimed to be, it would always lean one way- towards capital.

Hwang saw an opportunity to say something he’d wanted to earlier, and added, “The investigation into the shooting carried out on our military police even barred United Nations’ correspondents.”

Cho Sok-young wrote something else in her notebook. “Is there any word on whether or not America will return to the table?”

Hwang fought not to flatten his lips. “Yes. I’m afraid this won’t be new information by the time this interview comes out, but you are one of the first to hear it. The Americans have taken their interpretation of our break and ran with it, rejecting the missive hoping for them to show reason.

“The talks have been broken off completely.”

They had been broken before, of course. But the Americans had been the ones to do it. There was only so long they could spend refusing to discuss peace over minor matters before they seemed unreasonable to the international community. Now that they could spin it to seem like Korea and China were the unreasonable parties, and their armies were embroiled in fresh combat that ‘had nothing to do with them,’ it seemed less likely they would return anytime soon.

Cho Sok-young closed her eyes. Hwang lifted a hand, hesitating on whether to touch hers in comfort, then quickly set it down as her lids slid open.

“I see,” she said, with a waver under her neutral interviewer’s voice.

Hwang awkwardly cleared his throat. “I believe when you take an objective look at the facts, it’s clear that this was their intention all along. While we’ve been striving for peace, they’ve done everything in their power to stymy it. And while Korea is always open to discussing a ceasefire should our opponents decide that they wish to negotiate in earnest, we have no need to go begging for one. We were prepared for this possibility, and both our troops and our Chinese comrades are ready to continue the defense of our homeland.”

“And…” Cho Sok-young glanced at her book. “Do you have any words for those soldiers?”

Sensing that the most serious part of the interview was over, Hwang relaxed slightly, heading into the usual reminders for soldiers- how to effectively utilize terrain, the importance of mortars in the defense of the many hills the enemy was trying to capture in this latest push, conserving every bit of ammunition they could, and taking proper care of their firearms, as well as going over tactics learned from the days of the Anti-Japanese People’s War.

He would admit that he wasn’t as much of an engaging storyteller as South Pyongan. He had a tendency to overexplain and delve into every facet of the situation to make sure the listener had proper context.

But during the push to Busan, a young soldier had come to him after seizing the ridge at Obong-ri for the first time, and excitedly told him that he'd suggested following one of the tactics Hwang had shared with him on the way to his unit, and it had successfully allowed them to capture their target. So he was careful to go into at least a little detail on his experiences with mountain warfare.

He finished off by encouraging them to stand firm and recapture any heights taken by the enemy immediately. He knew he wasn’t able to light a fire the way Korea did, but it would still do their comrades good to know their Provincehumans were thinking of them, especially for any of the soldiers from he and Hae's province.

After, he used the chance to address their writers, encouraging them to produce higher quality articles for the military magazines, as he had been, and to keep their creative focus on the war.

The interview lasted for around an hour, at which point Cho Sok-young glanced at the audio recorder and said, "I think that's time. I wouldn't want to keep you from the war effort any longer."

"This is a part of the war effort," Hwang assured. "As Supreme Commander Kim Il-sung says, 'To stop broadcasting is as catastrophic as stopping Korea from breathing.' And in that metaphor, that makes our broadcasters and correspondents our lungs. I'm honoured to help keep the oxygen of information flowing."

He was proud of that one. Yet he had the feeling that South Pyongan was going to tease him for it anyway.

"I assure you we're the honoured ones, to be trusted with our country's breath." Cho Sok-young dipped her head. "Do you have any final words for our comrades listening?"

Hwang cleared his throat, trying to project confidence as he addressed the wire recorder. "You should feel that no difficulty is too large to overcome, and no sacrifice too great to make. So long as we carry forward with the spirit of those revolutionaries who spent their lives fighting against the savagery of Japan, giving their all and never faltering, we will prevail against America and his puppets now. Long live Korea."

"Long live Korea," Cho Sok-young murmured with emotion, then flicked the switch to the 'off' position.

Hwang exhaled, his shoulders loosening.

That was what their people had needed to hear on Liberation Day, in person, not over the airwaves. And from their Countryhuman.

Yet the Premier had denied his request to force Korea up on the stage, allowing him to… Hwang felt like the word ‘hide’ would likely get him injured if Korea ever found out he was thinking it. The Premier had allowed him to sequester himself away in a broadcasting booth, not even finishing his speech with ‘Long live.’

‘Well, nothing for it now.’ Hopefully Hwang could convince Korea not to do the same on the Day of the Foundation of the Republic.

Cho Sok-young was exhaling as well, trembling slightly as she wound the spool of wire up.

“You did well,” Hwang moved to assure her, the small room now seeming too quiet without the sound of the recorder.

“Thank you,” the woman said politely. “I was a bit nervous.”

Strange how she could be nervous giving an interview after all she had been through.

Then again, he supposed that applied to him, too.

“I couldn’t even tell,” he told her.

“You did well, too.” She sat back down, hands in her lap. “I don’t think you went on many tangents.”

Noticeably not ‘any tangents.’

Hwang nodded, still proud that he had managed to limit himself, but unsure of what to say now.

They had fallen into a comfortable rhythm while conversing an interviewer and interviewee. But now the atmosphere seemed a bit awkward again.

Should he inquire? He wasn’t as sensitive as Kangwon, so he likely shouldn’t. But if he didn’t inquire, wouldn’t it seem like he didn’t care?

“Can I ask you something off the record?” Cho Sok-young said before he could make his decision.

“Of course.”

She looked up from under her lashes, expression grim. “Do you really think we can win?”

Hwang knew- even if he wouldn’t admit it to his cousins, and certainly not to Korea- that Reunifying their country with their army had stopped being a possibility awhile ago. They were overextended, their supply lines could barely reach the front where it was now, let alone if it were extended into the south again, and they had no way to hold more of their shoreline than they already were.

He wouldn't say it was impossible. Experience had taught him that that very few things truly were. A small band of guerrillas could become an army of thousands. Laws and programs that had seemed like paintings of tteok could become reality. A near-blind boy forced to watch what he said while he was used as a puppet by Imperialists could become a general and true professor whose only concern when speaking was to not annoy his listeners.

But it was highly unlikely.

Not that he could share that with Cho Sok-young. Avoiding any mention of even the possibility of defeat was necessary.

“We will win,” he assured her. “The enemy lacks the strength to even reach Pyongyang now, let alone wrest the north from us. And with our Chinese allies, new cadres, and more soldiers and civilians being awakened ideologically every day, we are far better off than we were last fall.”

Aside from the supply issue.

“And as I said last October, our General Kim Il-sung, the Worker’s Party, our people, and Korea remain. And will not give in until we have reclaimed every inch of land stolen from us. We won’t let the enemy win.”

Cho Sok-young lowered her head, the lines around her eyes easing. Hwang, too, felt a sense of ease at the words.

Even if they couldn't Liberate their southern countrymen the way they had aimed to, they would still be Liberated. In all of the things that he had once considered impossible, only to be proven wrong, there were two common denominators- their people and Korea.

"Thank you," the woman said quietly. "And… I promise this is even more off the record, but…" She took a breath, raising her eyes to his. "Will the people that destroyed my hometown be punished?"

"Many of them already have been," Hwang said carefully. "But yes. The Korean people will not accept being Reunified under a reactionary government. Those with the blood of innocents on their hands will meet their comeuppance."

It would be more difficult, both counteracting what would surely be United Nations attempts to sabotage any vote they had, as well as their monitoring afterwards, likely using any exercise of their justice system against traitors as an excuse to label them as a violent regime necessitating further economic embargoes.

But Hwang knew their people would not tolerate letting their torturers go free. And neither would Korea.

They hadn't in Sincheon, from what he hadn't been supposed to hear.

Cho Sok-young dipped her head, her expression unreadable. Was she relieved that those who had hurt her had been killed, and those like them would be punished? Or had she moved beyond her sheer terror, and now only wished for an end to the violence?

Perhaps Kangwon or SH would have been able to tell. Hwang couldn't.

"Have you not been back to Sincheon?" he worked up the courage to venture.

Cho Sok-young had flinched at the name, like his sister did. "No," she said after a moment. "And I- I don't think I ever will."

"Why not?" Hwang asked before he could stop himself, quickly adding, "There's no need for you to answer that."

“It’s alright,” the woman said softly, holding her goreum in a hand. “I’ve spent my entire life there, but… When I think about going back, seeing the reservoir I used to swim in, the house we lived in, the- the place where I got married.” She took a shuddering breath.

“It’s all covered in blood now. Even the people.” Her slender throat bobbed. “I knew him, the man that-" Her knuckles clenched around the ribbons of fabric. "Not well. I’d only seen him around town, hauling firewood for sale. But I knew him. And I knew the woman that killed him. She was my neighbour. And I- I’m so glad she did, but when I think about going back there, and never knowing who around me has our neighbours’ blood on their hands, who deserved it, I-“

She drew in a sharp breath, her eyes filling with tears, making Hwang flutter his hands in distress.

“I’m so sorry,” he said anxiously. “I didn’t mean-“

“It’s alright.” Cho Sok-young inhaled deeply, then exhaled slowly, a technique Hwang knew had came from Kangwon. “I’m alright.”

“Are you?” Hwang asked, wishing he had asked it first. “Not as a pleasantry, but truly- are you alright?”

“I… No. I don’t think so,” she answered, voice cracking. “I miss my parents and my sister and my Ju-taek. I miss my home and I… I miss who I was before all of this.”

Hwang didn’t know what to say to that.

Cho Sok-young took another shaky breath. “But I will be. I just need more time and… distance.”

Hwang shouldn’t have told Hae to return to Sincheon. He shouldn’t have even suggested it.

He wished he knew what to say to comfort the woman before him. He wished he could console her and help her through her grief like Kangwon or SH would have, or even just offer her a shoulder to cry on like North Pyongan.

He wished he were more like his sister.

But all he could do was hand her a crumpled handkerchief and say, “I’m sorry.”

Cho Sok-young dabbled at her eyes with the cloth. “Don’t be. You saved me. If you hadn’t found me in that field and brought me to Kanggye…”

She shook her head, as if shaking away the grim possibilities. “I never really thanked you for that.” She bent at the waist, her hair sliding from behind her ear. “Thank you, Comrade North Hwanghae. And I’m sorry for my behaviour during that time. I acted improper, and I held you back. I even separated you from Comrade South Hwanghae and let her…”

She trailed off, and now Hwang could easily read her expression, so reflected was it in his own heart.

“Don’t allow yourself to feel guilty for that,” he said, even though he had trouble with that himself, even after his talks with Hae. “Both Comrade Hae and I were fulfilling our duties. And both she and I are fine.”

She raised her face hopefully. “Nothing happened to her?”

“No,” Hwang said after a moment. Nothing as truly terrible as what had been done to the woman, and nothing she needed to hear about, anyhow. “And she accomplished quite a bit of good in her time there.”

“That’s…” Cho Sok-young’s face crumpled, new tears welling, in relief now. “That’s good. I’m glad.”

Hwang nodded decisively. “Don’t burden yourself with our decisions. Focus on recovering.”

The woman nodded thankfully. “I’ll try.”

“And feel free to call me ‘Comrade Hwang,’” he finally mustered the gumption to say. “Most people do. And I think you certainly have the right.”

“Alright,” Cho Sok-young said shyly, pushing her hair behind her ear again. “But in that case, you should call me by my first name.”

“Oh no, I couldn’t possibly-“

“I don’t have anyone to call me ‘Sok-young’ anymore,” she quietly interrupted. “I would appreciate it.”

Hwang hesitated. The concept of calling a close-to-middle-aged woman by her first name made him want to hide under the table.

But since he didn’t know how to extend any other comfort to her, it was the least he could do.

“Very well then… Comrade Sok-young.”

He flushed in embarrassment, and certainly couldn’t manage to leave off the ‘comrade.’ But a small smile graced the woman’s face.

“Thank you,” she said softly.

Hwang escorted her out of the Broadcasting Station, promising to keep in touch. He watched her walk away with the wire recorder case in one hand, and her notebook under her arm, before exhaling and departing for Kim Il-sung University to meet with his fellow teachers to pick up the books on sign language they were helping him hung down, and the Student Corps, most of whom had survived the occupation of the city, and were now throwing themselves into their educations once more.

He wished he could do more for Ch- for Sok-young. And for the students from the south who hadn’t heard from their families in months. And his sister.

Even Korea was at least able to make people forget their emotions for a moment by redirecting them elsewhere, rousing them to fury or hope. Hwang couldn’t even do that.

He shook himself, putting his thin shoulders back and adjusting his glasses with purpose as he left the city with his bodyguards.

His clinicism was just another weak area to improve. When a student fell behind on division, he would give them a list of equations to work on every day, until the methodology for solving them became second nature.

Yes, he was fully aware that there were very few things more clinical than comparing consoling those in their grief to solving math problems. Which was just more proof that he had to work on his emotional side.

And he would. He would push himself, doing what he could until being empathetic and comforting came naturally. He may never be as skilled in the field as his sister, but he could at least feel like he wasn't letting people like S-Sok-young down.

And he would start by promising to go to Sincheon in Hae's place.

My poor baby Hwang has the least amount of province POVs so far (Ryanggang excepted).

As Hwang says, there was one university in Korea, but it wasn't founded until 1924, and only let limited amounts of Koreans in, and also didn't include classes on engineering or science until World War II, at which point Japan wanted cheap (and expendable) Korean labour for the war effort. If you ever notice that a lot of Korean scientists from that era (roughly 1930s-1960s) studied in the Soviet Union, it's because their own programs were deliberately hamstringed by Japan to prevent their development.

Also I've literally never mentioned this but Seoul was called Keijo during the Occupation. I just have everyone call it Seoul 1) because North and comrades definitely wouldn't call it by the Japanese name, and 2) for simplicity.

Easier Alone

North stormed towards the bunker, viciously smacking a low-hanging tree branch out of the way.

Seeing South Hamgyong standing at alert in the dark with her gun pointed at him didn't improve his mood.

"It's me," he snapped, even though he knew he'd forgotten to make the signal, and should be glad she was being vigilant.

She immediately sensed his mood, frowning as she stowed her gun. "Korea are you-?"

"Shut up," he growled, stalking past her.

"You could stay out here with me and talk," she suggested.

"No." North wrested the wheels to the side, tearing the heavy steel door open. "And if you leave your post I'll put you up against the wall."

SH aborted her step towards him, her sigh cut off by the door slamming.

The flashlight beam coming from the end of the hall abruptly disappeared as South Pyongan ducked back into the female provinces' room. North was tempted to follow her, to use on-the-spot-sparring to soothe some of the restless itching under his skin. His province was hiding from the possibility of a lecture, not a fight, and would probably welcome the violence as much as him.

He made himself stop at his door. Hae would be sleeping. And he had to stop giving in to his temper. He shouldn't have to release his anger. He should be able to deal with it.

'Dealing with it' meant slamming his door and locking it, not against China now, but against SH or Kangwon trying to irritate him, and pacing back and forth in his small cement room with no light.

His blood boiled in his veins, making him bare his teeth at the wall as he spun around, kicking his bedroll out of the way in an attempt to win more space.

He didn't want to be in here. He wanted to be in the office, working to try and distract himself. But the General had sensed his growing restless fury and firmly told him to get some rest for Foundation Day tomorrow.

North didn't need rest. He needed to kill Japan and America. He needed to tear them limb from limb and crush them into dust.

It wasn't the situation at the frontline. The Americans were saying they'd accomplished their goals with the last offensive, but it was just a bluff. North had lost a few heights, but his soldiers and the Chinese had regained most of the important ones. The line had barely shifted, and the Yanks had finally come clean that their troops were involved in the attack. And it wasn't the talks still being suspended. He'd expected it, especially since he'd read that damn news article.

It was the fucking San Francisco Treaty.

The talks had been going on for four days. Right now, twelve hours behind Korea, the treaty could be being ratified. North should be pleased that Japan's 'right' to his country was finally being officially renounced.

He wasn't. Not when the only voice that had mattered in the treaty's creation was America's, when the it would allow Japan to rearm and remilitarize, now under American auspices. Not when it turned a neighbouring country into an American military base, guaranteeing that the planes and ships that were using it as a launching base to kill his people would become permanent. Not when it denied he and his people the reparations they were owed, and when he and China, whose countries and people were Japan's greatest victims, hadn't even been invited.

Not even the reactionaries or the Chinese Nationalists had been, and North would have despised if they had attended, if South's puppet government had been granted that legitimacy by the United Nations while their rightful governments weren't, but at least maybe then someone other than CCCP, Czechoslovakia, and Poland might have protested. Rhee might have the Yankee boot too far down his throat to, but Chang Kai-shek had fought the Japanese personally and might have stood against it.

North paced back and forth with jerky motions, barely able to get two and a half strides in the room was so small.

That was why the Yankees had sabotaged the talks. They had dammed near admitted it. On the same day as Nam Il had announced they were willing to compromise, the Wall Street Journal, a rag that catered to capitalists, had ran an article informing their bourgeois readers that CCCP suddenly announcing he would attend the conference was a plot to throw a spanner in the works of the treaty by demanding 'Red China's' attendance. If China's people had signed a ceasefire in Korea, it would have made them appear reasonable, like they wanted peace. It might have given China a voice against Japan.

They had outright speculated that America's intent was to make demands that North and China would refuse to accept, such as not settling on the 38th Parallel. So when North had forced himself to be reasonable enough to concede to that unacceptable demand, and it had seemed a deal could be made before September, America couldn't allow that. 'The State Department would prefer no ceasefire deal until after the San Francisco conference ends.'

And now it was. And North And South and their people wouldn't get the reparations they were owed or the peace they needed.

He sensed the wall coming and turned sharply on a heel.

It hadn't even been them America had been concerned with keeping from the conference. It was China. Korea wasn't the end goal of his invasion of their country. It was China. It was CCCP. They had been kept from the treaty, kept from the conference, because America wanted Japan rearmed and wealthy, planting the seeds of future conflict by refusing to make clear which country the Kurils belonged to, so that Japan could be used against CCCP in the future.

Korea had been denied justice because of Japan, and he couldn't even take any grim satisfaction in the fact that the other country would now experience what being colonized felt like because he just had to be class conscious and understand that being owned by America would just make the Japanese proletariat's job harder, and leave Japan alive for longer.

He couldn't stand to think of that smug bastard sitting at that conference as he was told he didn't have to repay Korea for what he had done to them. All of his villages burnt to the ground, all of his comrades hunted down and butchered like dogs, thousands of his women and workers stolen away to another country to be violated and exploited, that jangseung with mechanical kanji carved into it, 'PUNISHMENT FOR DISOBEDIENCE.' Every single one of those punishments and the ones that had came before. Coughing blood onto the floor from a broken jaw, holding South while he sobbed over his snapped wrist, his leg lying limp, disconnected from its socket and aching even now, that stupid scar and 'something worse.'

And now the country that had done all of that, the one that deserved punishment, was being released from it. Being put under an American trusteeship wasn't enough, it would only make Japan's working class suffer, and as much as North wished he could blindly hate them the way he had used to, he couldn't. The people that had done it had been pardoned, allowed to keep their power. The country that had done it had been pardoned, allowed to pretend that he hadn't invaded Korea, hadn't slaughtered their people, stolen their names and land and language and culture, locked them up and made them suffer for thirty-six years. He had been told he owed Korea nothing for what he had done to them.

And he could remember what he had done. North knew it. Japan hadn't changed. If he had, he wouldn't have let himself get off so easily. He would have begged to be put to death.

Japan remembered. He remembered and was under America's control. He could remember that cold cement room and what had happened in it and he could tell the other country.

North grabbed at the scar on his chest, nails digging through the fabric of his uniform as he spun.

He should have killed him. He had left him alive for his people and because he had thought the Countryhuman would die anyways, either in the flames of the war he had started or at the hands of his own people.

But he hadn't. He had killed himself and somehow survived, like some sort of sick joke against North specifically, in a different form, but alive, the same, and now under a master whose boot wouldn't be so easily overthrown.

He didn't care if it was a fitting punishment for a man that considered himself a god to now be the one under someone else, to be forced to obey. It wasn't enough. He wanted Japan dead, he wanted him and his memories destroyed until there was nothing left of what had been done to he and his brother except for in their minds. And then they would Reunify, and the memories would be solely Korea's, locked away forever.

He should have killed him. He should have killed him he should have killed him he should have killed him he should have-

North's stride carried him too far and he smacked into the wall face-first, pain lancing through his eye sockets. He rebounded, snarling out loud at the cement as he drew his fist back to strike.

His arm froze, trembling in the air, and with an effort he pulled his hand back to his side, abruptly spinning away and slamming his eye shut, taking deep, slow breaths in the pitch black.

He wasn't a child. He wouldn't lash out at an inanimate object that would only injure his own hand and nothing else.

The stupid breathing technique that Kangwon had once tentatively suggested never worked. It only made the itching under his skin worse and the heat in his blood build with an awful pressure, like bellows stoking a fire.

North went back to pacing, trying to calm himself.

He had spared Japan because he had to. He could hate that, but not that he had. It had been what was best for his people. He still knew that. Like the ceasefire.

The conference was almost over. It was unfair that he hadn't been invited, and that Korea hadn't been consulted in drafting the treaty. But he couldn't change that. He could only win his war, have his government be recognized as the rightful government of Korea, and open negotiations with Japan to get the reparations his people were owed.

Not in person. He knew he couldn't be trusted in the same room as Japan and his cold, feline eyes.

And one day, the people of Japan would rise against their fallen 'god,' and he would be gone. And America would be, too. Korea would be one and no one else would remember.

He had to get control of his temper. Anger was good, but he couldn't allow it to make him act so immaturely. He couldn't allow things he couldn't change to affect him like this.

His hands curled into fists, blunt nails breaking scabs on his burnt palms. 'I should be able to-'

He couldn't think about it anymore tonight. Tomorrow was the Day of the Foundation of the Republic, and even if it seemed like another fucked-up joke that the treaty that would allow Japan to dodge paying what he owed to Korea was being signed a day before his Foundation Day, he couldn't let his people see it affect him. The anger was good, it would help. But only if it was sharpened like a spear, not wild and uncontrolled.

North flopped down on his bedroll, pulling off his eyepatch and rubbing at the scar under it.

Then he begrudgingly sat up, carefully removing and folding his tunic, undershirt, and pants before putting on his identical long-sleeved undershirt and pants. He would have to wear his spare uniform tomorrow. The dress one would have been better, but it had been unsalvageable. And he felt uncomfortable requisitioning the materials for a new one he would only wear for a couple days a year.

'At least I didn't wear it to the inspection of the Parallel,' he thought with dark humour. He would have glowed in the dark on that first night.

The pressure inside him was still there, but the itching had eased somewhat. North exhaled, staring at the dark ceiling, ignoring the soft knock that came at his door an hour later, and SH's softer, "Goodnight," barely audible through the steel.

Even without China and his provinces here, North still couldn't rest easily. He found himself straining to hear the sound of the front door, listening for any sign of intruders, and for his provinces.

It was stupid. He knew whoever was on watch wouldn't let an enemy get the best of them. SH had known it was him coming, but she'd still been on guard. If any of them thought there was a real threat, they would all be mobilized and ready to face it in a second.

And he knew it was stupid that he couldn't sleep when China was here. Even if he didn't have a five-inch thick steel door between them, he knew the other country wouldn't do anything. He'd had his chances- on Bukhan Mountain, in Seoul, at Chorweon, on the battlefield, on that road outside Anbyeon. And he knew he wouldn't hurt his provinces either. He'd slept in the City Hall shelter with them before. There was no reason to. He wouldn't gain anything.

But still that little voice whispered in North head, 'What if he did?'

He didn't have to gain anything. Japan had never truly gained anything from his 'lessons.' Even if he had those twisted expectations from North, there hadn't been anything he'd gained from beating South, too.

If China did hurt his provinces, either for some murky purpose or just because he wanted to, it would be North's fault. It was his duty to protect them, to make sure nothing like what had happened under the Occupation happened to them again. And even if he had to put their people above them, as he had during the tactical retreat, if something happened because he hasn't been cautious enough, because he had let his guard down…

If China did anything to his provinces, he would have to destroy their alliance. And he knew just as he couldn't trust himself to be in a room with Japan, he couldn't trust himself to handle it diplomatically. If he ever found out that the other Countryhuman had assaulted one of his female provinces, or hurt any of them…

North would kill him here and now. He would collapse China and throw all of the Chinese people into chaos, leaving them prime for America to conquer. Korea would lose an essential ally, and likely CCCP, and he would forever be painted as traitorous and unstable, if he survived the onslaught from the hundreds of thousands of PVA soldiers stationed in his country turning on them.

And North knew he would still have to do it. He couldn't let someone get away with harming his provinces, even if he was his only ally.

He knew by now that China wouldn't do any of that. But when the cost would be so high if he did, how could North allow himself to rest?

It was good he had left. He couldn't sleep when he was near him, and he couldn't sleep when he wasn't.

He didn't know if the other Countryhuman was coming back. With how quickly Liaoxi had to leave, still half-dead on her feet, he doubted it. He hadn't received any word about the trial or anything else from him. Only a letter on Liberation Day, cordial and impersonal, like the fake letters he'd given him before, just more proof he hadn't been in Korea.

He must have come to his senses and realized that no debt was worth risking his country for. Especially not when he had to deal with North's temper and… everything else. Maybe he had told his Premier and Chairman how the Korean had been treating him, and been forbidden from returning.

Good. It meant North Pyongan wouldn't grow any closer to Liaoxi. North regretted telling China he would tolerate anything between the two until the war was over. He couldn't risk his province developing feelings for a foreign Provincehuman, not when he was starting to improve. Not ever.

It was more than relationships between Countryhumans being difficult. The more North thought about it, the more sure he was that they shouldn't happen at all, personal or political. Ming and Qing both taking Joseon as a tribute; CCCP and his annoying embraces and how he knew what foods North's provinces liked best; America holding his brother captive, what Japan had done to he and South and all their provinces, a thousand other examples throughout history. China.

Countryhumans weren't meant to have any sort of relationship with one another. They were meant to stay in their own borders and protect their people, and leave the international politicking up to their politicians.

North knew he could never do that. Even if it was how things should work, it wasn't. He needed to represent his country. And more than that… He hated the idea of passing his responsibilities off to others, letting them speak for him.

But he also hated that Japan could remember what it felt like to carve him open while he screamed, and that America had put his arm around his brother the day he had Divided them, and that the last time CCCP had visited, he'd given North kompot from a different flask and told him it didn't have sugar in it. He hated that he had letters from the Soviet and China wishing him a happy Liberation Day in his bag in the corner, and that he would likely be receiving more tomorrow. He didn't want them to know him and he didn't want to know them.

He shouldn't have sent that letter back then.

It was good that China wasn't coming back. He didn't want him to. He didn't want to worry about diplomacy or debts or that their people weren't as delineated as he wanted them to be or why he put up with North. He just wanted to focus on the war, focus on winning freedom with his people like he had for decades. The only other Countryhuman he ever wanted to see again was his brother, for the short time before they were both just Korea.

North's back ached, deeper than the skin. He pressed it harder to the bedroll, curling his legs up to his chest, then stretching them out, lying straight in the dark as he tried to force himself under.

It was easier when it was just him.

Showing North Japan cutting him open with a tachi and CCCP hugging him* 'Can you tell me the difference between these two pictures?'
North, deadpan- 'They're the same picture.'

Father tells me we will die in a tsunami eventually. He is leveraging this against me to try and make me move, along with how long it's taking me to relearn Japanese. But it doesn't work because every time I am filled with righteous fury. Why do I have to re learn Japanese, Father? I am going to learn how to curse people.

Never Again

"KOREA! KOREA!"

North shot bolt upright off the floor, Tokarev in hand before he was even fully conscious, heart pounding like the fists on his door.

His provinces were right outside, which meant he didn't have to clear the hall, leaving him free to tear the door open and launch himself into it, grabbing the nearest person and shoving them behind him as he placed himself between them and the entrance, pistol pointed, ready to destroy the threat.

He blinked, seeing no one standing in the grey square of pre-dawn light that led to the outside.

The dregs of sleep drained from his mind, and he grimaced, remembering what day it was. He turned to glower at his provinces, who were all- Kangwon included- clustered behind him, eyes glinting in amusement.

"Happy birthday!" they chorused loudly, Hae vigorously waving a red bandana in the air from where he had tossed her.

"Really?" North demanded.

"What?" South Pyongan grinned cheekily. "Did you think you were safe after last year?"

"I would think you would know better than to try this stupid prank when we are at active war," North growled, irritated by how fast his heart was still beating.

They'd done this on his first Foundation Day, too, startling him from the half sleep he had finally forced himself into in preparation for the events, and tried to do it the year after. He had been ready for that one, but with how furious he'd been last night, and with last year…

Sang's eyes soft and sad. 'Korea. Please let us do this."

Anyway, he'd forgotten to be prepared.

"Shouldn't've ruined our fun in '49 then," the annoying woman drawled. "Or woken up earlier."

"We did have an unfair advantage this year," Hwang pointed out from over her shoulder. "I was already awake on watch."

"This had better not become a tradition," North growled. "If it does, I'm shooting one of you. And it's going to be you," he directed at South Pyongan.

"We're making it a tradition," North Hamgyong grunted from the back.

His cousin grinned. "Maybe I'll even let you get a shot in. Y'know, as a birthday present."

"It isn't my birthday," her Countryhuman grumbled, finally stowing his gun. "It is the DPRK's Foundation Day. Don't hug me," he warned Hae.

She pouted. "But everyone should get a hug on their birthday."

"Not my birthday," North repeated, retreating back into his room. "Now leave me alone. I need to get ready. And you do, too."

He looked at SH, who dipped her head and hustled her cousins off, reminding them to wear their best clothes, gently guiding Hae as she tried to sidle after North.

He huffed, shutting his door.

He would never understand why they (and their people) insisted on trying to foist this on him as his birthday. He hadn't been born on September 9th. He hadn't been born at all. He had been formed, and there certainly wasn't anything to celebrate about August 22nd.

'Come on, North. Please? It's our birthday.'

‘That’s why we need to try again!’

“Tch.”

North dressed in his less-worn tunic, straightening his cuffs and hem, and smoothing down his pockets.

As he wrapped his belt around his waist and pulled it through, his jaw clenched. Even buckled as tight as it would go, it still hung loose.

He would have to make a fourth extra hole with his knife. But he knew the action would sour his mood. He would wait until he was with his Premier, then do it.

Until then, he cinched it as tightly as he could, and tried not to think of belts festooning his arms and torso, and the acrid smell of napalm and white phosphorus as he left the bodies they had belonged to behind. And how they were still waiting for him.

How many of those he would speak to today had lost someone at the Raktong or on the way south? How many were waiting for him to bring someone left behind home?

North reached into his bag, even though he knew he shouldn’t, removing three items. A sketch of Seoul, carefully folded, a small shard of pottery with flakes of maroon blood still clinging to it, and a small rock that was apparently shaped like a heart.

He turned the last one in his fingers, trying to see the aorta.

He’d never understood Gyeonggi’s fascination with stones. During the Occupation, the boy had collected so many he’d started to have trouble keeping pace when they were on the march. So North had made him dump them all out, keeping it to a strict ‘one-rock’ policy. He couldn’t understand why his province would want to keep useless objects around, even if they were pretty. But Gyeonggi had looked so dejected that he had promised he could have a collection when they had a house.

North knew exactly how many people were waiting for him to bring them home.

Gyeonggi had known as he handed him the ‘heart’ last Foundation Day, just like Sang and the others had. He had seen that look in their eyes as they tried to pretend they could still reach Busan. They might not have known he was going to send them off.

But they had known North was going to let them down.

And he still couldn’t see the heart in the lopsided grey stone.

He placed it back in his bag with the shard and sketch, fingers reaching for something else, the one thing he had kept on his person after giving the materials in his secret compartment to his Premier for safekeeping.

He stopped himself. His people needed surety and hope. He couldn’t think about the past today. At least not the things he would change from it.

North shook himself, leaving his room, where he immediately ran into SH and Hwang lurking outside.

“Korea,” the latter said, standing at attention with a serious face.

“What?” North sighed, sensing he was going to be irritated.

His province placed his hand over his heart. “If I may be so bold as to advise you, I believe you should make a public speech today. They’re much more effective at raising morale.”

“I am,” North said.

“I wouldn’t go so far as to imply that not giving an address publicly on an important national holiday lowers morale,” Hwang babbled on, not hearing him. “But making one certainly raises it. On top of that it’s beneficial for our people to see that you’re not suffering too badly under the aerial bombardment-“

“North Hwanghae,” North cut him off firmly. “I am making a public speech today.”

“Oh.” Hwang blinked, looking mildly put off. “But I made a speech of my own to convince you to.”

“I don’t need it.”

His province pursed his lips. “Can I give it anyway?”

“No.” North turned to SH. “Is that why you’re here, too?”

“Me?” she asked innocently. “No. I’m just here to tell you I finished the project. Which I would have told you last night, if-“

“Good.” North turned on a heel. “Everyone in the GAZ in five minutes or you’re walking.”

SH sighed as Hwang asked which project North was talking about, only to be told it was secret.

“Even though there’s no reason for it to be,” SH said, loudly enough for the Countryhuman to hear.

“The reason is ‘I said so,’” North tossed back.

In under five minutes (four minutes and fifty-five seconds in South Pyongan’s case), the provinces were all piled into the GAZ, North had fended off another attempted hug from Hae, and they were rolling toward the city.

Once they left the trees and came around the ridge of Jangsan, North could confirm with his eye what he already felt. The bombings had started early.

To the distant west and south flew formations of enemy planes, black against grey, already started on Sunchon and the stretch of terrain between Pyongyang and Hwangju, severing the rail tracks that led to the south again.

They would be especially heavy today, just as they had been for the past few weeks. At first so the Yankees could destroy everything they could in case of a ceasefire, and now to punish North’s people for breaking off the talks, even though it had been them that had refused to come back, even after Nam Il had called for an open investigation into the Kaesong bombing and the release of all documents between them to the UN.

Their proposal had been rejected, of course. But the Americans weren't being blamed for refusing to return. Korea was, for refusing to grovel for them to come back.

And now they had to be punished for it.

There had been seven hundred sorties yesterday alone, ravaging the coast from Kosong to Wonsan, strafing the frontline, targeting their tunnels from Haeju to Nampo, and cratering the Sunan airfield again. North knew they could expect more today.

They were always worse on holidays.

A light mist hovered over the fields, sparser over the dead patches where napalm and bombs had 'gone astray.' Yellowing stalks of corn grew tall in the distance, waving as unseen people moved through them, plucking fully-grown ears, as they would well into October. The harvest of the most important crop- rice- wouldn't begin until later in the month. But the emerald carpet of soybeans around them was already being picked through, and would continue to be until the corn was done. Then the barren plants would be cut down and tilled back into the earth like the fields of golden wheat already had been, rushing to get the winter wheat and barley planted before the frosts set in.

They were coming. The days were getting shorter, the mornings were taking longer to warm up. North could feel the ache starting to settle into his bones again.

It had been a relief, for those few years, not to feel the weight of dread hanging over him, and crushing his chest as winter crept closer. Or at least having it not weigh as heavily.

The pale light of dawn showed that the peasants were already in the fields, hoping to get what harvesting they could done before the early fall sun burned away the dew and drew the planes their way.

And maybe for one other reason. The men and women all seemed to be working coincidentally close to the road. Close enough that it was easy to raise their hands and call out, "Happy Foundation Day, Comrade Korea!" as North drove by.

A few of the children (who seemed far too enthusiastic to have been woken up early on a weekday solely to gather the various namul planted between the fields and the road) ran after the truck on stubby legs, crying “Long live!”

One older boy even sprinted after the vehicle for several metres, before North rewarded his efforts by slowing down, allowing him to lob a pear through the window with the last of his strength and gasp out, “Happy birthday, Comrade Korea!” before falling to his knees on the dusty road.

“Thank you!” SH shouted at him from the back bench, accepting the pear from North so she could cut it into slices for the other provinces. “You could humour them, you know.”

“I did,” he replied, keeping his eye on the road. “I waved and thanked them.”

“You could’ve stopped.”

North *‘tch’*ed, briefly glancing behind them to see the victorious boy being piled on by his peers, jealous that he’d actually managed to get something to their Countryhuman.

There weren’t any pear trees nearby. And there were too many other harvestable vegetables.

He could tolerate the sheer assortment of home-cooked meals, hand-knitted clothing, and miscellaneous charms, jewellery, and useless trinkets that were sent to him and his provinces before the war, even if he didn’t know what to do with them.

But now with their food situation dire and production so difficult, his people needed to keep everything they could for themselves. A few weeks before last Liberation Day and this one, he'd had the Party issue multiple directives in every magazine, newspaper, radio broadcast, and public announcement he could, telling the masses that if they felt they had anything to spare, they should share it with their neighbours or donate it to the State, and if they really felt they had to give their Countryhuman something, to send him a letter telling him about any issues they were facing. And they had sent out more reminders for Foundation Day, when the bulk of presents usually came.

"I'm not giving anyone else a chance to pay tribute."

SH sighed in the way that someone about to repeat something they'd said several times over would. Because she was. Annoyingly.

"It's not 'tribute,' Korea. They're presents."

"Tribute would require the bestowing being compulsory," Hwang said from beside her, handing Hae's slice of pear to her while SH leaned out the open window to pass the rest to South Pyongan, North Pyongan, and North Hamgyong in the truck bed. "But since you sent out that notice not to gift you anything, that means any gifts you receive are given purely out of personal desire."

And that 'personal desire' was because he was their country, and they felt like they owed him. Even when they didn't.

North might have accepted that most of their people that had given him presents during their first Foundation Day, or the second, had done it out of thanks, solely because they wanted to celebrate the first Korean state to ever belong to the Korean people, and out of appreciation for how long North had fought for that.

But now…

Just like his provinces, they knew he had let them down. They had never owed him anything, but now they knew that. They only wanted to give him things because they felt like it was expected.

North's knuckles whitened around the hardened rubber wheel. "I don't want anything."

"Not even a pear?" SH reached over the back of the seat, holding the fruit slice up to his face.

"If you put your fingers near my mouth, I'll bite them off."

"O-kay then." SH sat back, handing the final piece of pear to Hae, who eagerly devoured it.

North eyed her. Her usually round cheeks were starting to look slightly hollow beneath the bandages covering them.

Kangwon leaned around Chagang, smiling knowingly. “A smile might’ve been nice, at least.”

North turned his head so he could glower at him, as South Pyongan shouted from the back, “Better wait for the sun to rise in the west first!”

She yelped as North hit the brakes, sending her tumbling into side of the truck bed.

“Pothole,” the Countryhuman deadpanned, pressing on the gas again as his province cursed him out.

Once in Pyongyang, North headed directly for Jonsung complex, meeting with the Premier and receiving his customary letters from CCCP and Joseph Stalin, as well as something that made him side-eye the man.

The lines around his black eyes crinkled. “You said the masses shouldn’t get you anything. Nothing was said about personal comrades.”

“It was implied,” North huffed, refolding his new white dress uniform and crisp black pants.

Kim Il-sung just smiled. “Happy Day of the Foundation of the Republic, comrade.”

Neither of them mentioned how many holes were in North’s new belt.

He left the uniform with his Premier for when he needed it tonight, and tucked the Soviet messages into the pouch on his now properly-fitted belt. He would read them later. After last night, he didn’t have any interest in foreign words, even those from comrades.

When Peng Dehuai met him in the city to congratulate him on his Foundation Day and deliver letters from Mao Zedong and Zhou Enlai, North didn't ask if he had any others for him.

As he marched through the streets, forcing himself to take main roads and not slink away from his people's eyes, he almost kept expecting China to pop up, appearing from nowhere like he always did to harass him.

But North knew he wouldn't.

Pyongyang had been emptied of nearly all its people, and no one could enter any city freely now- it put them at too much risk. But a population of over five hundred thousand reduced to only essential workers was still in the thousands. They lived in one-story houses on the city's edge, or in underground bunkers turned to factories, or had permission to travel in from the caves in the hills every day. But they were there.

And it seemed like every single one of them was waiting for North.

A unit of Rehabilitation Corps women swarmed him as he made his way down Stalin Street, five of them latching onto his arm at the same time to eagerly wish him a 'happy birthday,' before their commander hustled them off to fix a bridge. A group of men with strips of cloth around their foreheads walked with him for a few blocks on their way to the paper mill. Outside the flattened school district, a gaggle of dirt-streaked children surrounded him like a flock of sparrows, asking rapid-fire questions until he reminded them that children were supposed to be safe in the hills, not roaming the city.

They shrieked in faux-alarm, taking off down the streets in a chorus of laughter.

"Happy birthsday!" a younger boy lisped as his older brother dragged him away.

Ssi-bal. North wanted to be on the frontline right now. Last year had been his ideal Foundation Day- celebrations in the cities for his people to enjoy while he was on the frontline, only having to put up with a few personal well-wishes, his soldiers too preoccupied with combat to insist it was his birthday or try to force presents on him.

*'It would have been ideal if we had won.'

North grit his teeth, forging on.

The delays turned a thirty-minute walk into an hour, though it didn't bother him. His purpose today was to meet with as many people as possible after all.

But first, his province.

Gangwon sprang up from his hospital cot as North finally gave up waiting and slowly opened the door.

"Korea!" he said, eyes wide. "S-Sorry, I didn't hear you knock."

"It's fine." North said, then had to repeat himself. The overexaggerated, slow lip movements that Gangwon needed to understand his words didn't come naturally to him.

"Happy birthday," his province said, hustling over to the side table, where he picked up an object wrapped in red cloth. "I m-made you something."

He turned around, presenting it to North, who stared at it with his eye narrowed, then at the other man, communicating in a way he didn't need to hear to understand.

"It's n-not a waste of resources," Gangwon quickly clarified, then admitted, "It is… kind of useless. B-But I was using it to practice, so even if it's useless to you, it's not like it was completely useless."

"Don't chew your nails," North ordered loudly, and he yanked a green fingertip away from his mouth.

The Countryhuman unwrapped the object, revealing…

"A wooden tiger?" He skeptically held the figurine up.

"I had to pract-tice to get the proportions right for Hyun Han-jin's housewarming gift," Gangwon stuttered. "Do you like it?"

He was much more nervous than Kangwon or North Kangwon had ever been. But North could still see that echo of his brother and who they'd used to be in his expression as he anxiously watched him, waiting to be told he'd done a good job.

"It's well-made," he praised, because it was. "Are you steady enough to hold a scalpel yet?"

Gangwon deflated slightly. "N-No."

North's jaw tightened, though not at him.

They had been lucky to make it out of the Occupation without any lasting effects. Physical ones, at least. And those were what mattered. South Gyeongsang had her pinched wrist nerves from sewing, washing dishes, cooking, cleaning, and all the other repetitive tasks she'd been forced to do, and North Chungcheong had complained about an old sprain twinging at the Raktong.

But the female province could still wield a gun and hold a pencil, if not for extended periods of time. And North knew the male one wouldn't have complained if it was serious. And even North Hamgyong's back problems, which had made him wake up swearing during several winters, almost completely immobile until Kangwon worked at him with his hands, had stopped causing as much trouble once his body had grown.

If North let himself feel it, he knew his own body would be a knot of aches and pains, even outside of winter. The jaw he held suspicions had never set properly, his many-times-broken wrists, the ribs that had been kicked in too many times to count, and the equally countless times his toes or fingers had been broken. And his hip, of course.

But he didn't. And so it didn't affect him.

They had escaped thirty-six years of Occupation and war relatively unscathed. And in five of them, America had beaten one of his provinces into submission, broken another's nerves, and made him permanently deafen himself.

And taken North's eye.

He would pay for it.

North pulled out Stalin's letter, stared at the white envelope, then nodded decisively, using the short stub of pencil he'd brought to write on it, showing the words to Gangwon, though he was still driven to say them out loud.

"It's progress," he said. "You couldn't have carved anything last year, let alone this." He held up the simple, but not crude, tiger. "By this time next year, you'll be able to operate again."

He could see the accusing question in Gangwon's hooded eyes. 'And by this time next year will the war be over? Will we have everyone back?'

North made himself not look away. "You'll be fine."

Gangwon's lower lip trembled in the way Kangwon's always had- and still did- when receiving praise. He did look away, ducking his head to hide his blush.

North examined the little wooden tiger again. It didn't look anything like the Joseon-era paintings of foolishly grinning felines with bulging eyes, made to mock the yangban. It was carved to look real, sitting with its back straight and its tail wrapped around its paws, almost seeming to lean forwards. Its striped face was intense, special attention clearly paid to its eyes, which were fixed with ravenous intent on some invisible prey.

He pocketed it just as the door opened, placing himself between Gangwon and the intruder, then immediately wishing he hadn't.

"You," Kim Yong-hwan said venomously, her eyes narrowed like that of the tiger.

"You dare address your country like that?" North asked coldly. "I should have you expelled from the Party."

"Do it," the woman shot back. "Make my workload a little lighter. Then I'll have more time to hunt you down. Do you know when the last time I saw you was?"

North didn't flinch. "After the end of the enemy's counteroffensive in June."

"After the end of the enemy's counteroffensive in June," Kim Yong-hwan repeated scathingly. "And how many thousands of tons of bombs have fallen since then?"

"A few," North sketched. 'Hundred thousand.'

The nurse's lips pinched until they were roughly the size of a needle's head. "You are coming with me. Now."

North huffed. "Fine."

Kim Yong-hwan looked suddenly wary, and Gangwon's eyebrows shot up.

"Fine?" the woman said suspiciously.

"Fine," North repeated, moving away from his province. "I'm wearing white for my speech tonight. I don't want to bleed through it."

"Did you say… s-speech?" Gangwon asked hopefully.

Ssi-bal. His provinces had been talking about him with each other. He had been sure they were, but it still irritated him to have his suspicions confirmed.

"Yes. You'll be there. I don't care if you can't hear."

"With how loud you bluster, he could hear you if he had no ears at all," Kim Yong-hwan said dryly.

Keeping in mind that he didn't enjoy intimidating his people, even when it was the world's most grating nurse, North simply said, "You have fifteen minutes. It starts now."

The hallway was more lively than when he'd came in, almost every door open, faces peering from them that lit with excitement when he emerged.

"Comrade Korea!"

North made his way down the hall though grasping hands and shouts of his name (and that irritating 'happy birthday'), reaching out to accept forearm clasps and accept letters from wounded soldiers and their family members.

'Too many family members.' And too early. They had known he would be here. And since he had been… absent when it came to their soldiers lately, it had to be because they expected him to visit Gangwon.

Which meant word of him was spreading.

Kim Yong-hwan bullied her way through the crowd, not letting North stop for a second, even when Pak Ga-ram limped to his door on crutches and cheerfully passed him a letter.

"You're delaying Comrade Korea's exam!" she snapped, wisely not informing them of the real reason he was here. "You can fawn over him later."

Under her breath she muttered, "I warned those new girls not to go spreading it around you were here. Tell Comrade South Hamgyong I want more 'no gossiping' posters for the hospitals and I want them to be as threatening as possible."

Normally North would be glad to linger and run down the minutes on Kim Yong-hwan's allotted treatment time. But his wounds needed to look as well-tended as possible today, so he apologized to the patients, promising to speak to them after, and kept pace with the nurse through the grey halls.

She kept eyeing him, like she was expecting him to try and make an escape. But he matched her stride until they reached the sterile examination room, which was already prepped.

Kim Yong-hwan slammed the door on the commotion outside, then removed her face mask, rubbing her hand over her eyes.

The woman was usually blunt and brisk, but she had been more snappish than usual.

"Is everything well in the hospital?" North asked, though if it wasn't, Kangwon would have told him.

"Just the usual. Too many patients, not enough supplies." The nurse waved a worn hand. "We'll get through it. No more trying to delay this."

"No antiseptic," North ordered, making a mental note to ask An Il-rae to make sure her comrade was getting enough rest. "Just clean and bandage them."

"I'm sorry." Kim Yong-hwan arched a brow, back to imposing. "Are you the Head Nurse here?"

"No," North replied icily. "But I am your Countryhuman. And you are running out of time."

The nurse *'tch'*ed, launching into action, grabbing a fresh face mask, slipping on hospital gloves, and snatching a roll of bandages and jar of fresh water, leaving the bottle of antiseptic where it was.

North took the opportunity to remove his tunic, maneuvering it over his head to cover his front, as usual.

He tensed as she sat on the edge of the cot with him, instructing him to turn his back to her. The position wouldn't have been as bad if he'd still had two eyes. But as it was, he had to fight the urge to turn his head to his blind spot every few seconds, knowing he would be chastised for moving.

The chill air of the hospital brushed against his burns as the bloody fabric around his torso was carefully unwrapped and set aside.

"You've been keeping them in fairly good condition, at least," Kim Yong-hwan said as she appraised the rugged topography of his blue skin. "Though I can see a bit of pus here. Would it kill you to disinfect them once in awhile, and not just reuse the same bandages? Or at least let Comrade Kangwon do it for you."

North would rather all his wounds become infected than let Kangwon clean them again.

He kept his mouth shut as Kim Yong-hwan continued to chide him, trying not to twitch too much. He hated not being able to see her hands, even if he could feel them brushing at his burns with a damp cloth.

"Do it harder," North ordered. "The scabs are going to break open anyways."

His jaw clenched as his point was proven, a new pain spreading across his lower back.

"Oh those bastards," Kim Yong-hwan hissed in annoyance. "I just cleaned there."

North could tolerate her hands more than Kangwon's. She worked with a clinical precision, and needed no more reminders to apply as much pressure as needed. Any light touches came from a physician's desire to not worsen his injuries, not from… anything else.

"Once you aren't needed as a war surgeon, would you consider becoming a personal physician?" North tried to sound neutral.

"For you?" Kim Yong-hwan snorted. "I would rather become a bovine veterinarian and jam my hand up a cow's arse every day. With full respect, Comrade Korea."

North *'tch'*ed.

"Just let Comrade Kangwon do it," the nurse said, dabbing at a final spot on his side. "That boy's the only one that actually wants to take care of you."

"I don't need him to 'take care of me,'" North grumbled. "I just need a doctor for check-ups. And for someone that doesn't want to take care of me, you harass me about it enough."

"I want my Countryhuman to be hale and hearty," the nurse retorted. "But if I could snap my fingers and have it done, I would.

Turn around. And stop hiding your chest like a blushing maiden."

"It seems like you forget how to show your Countryhuman proper respect," North said frostily, reluctantly complying. "Would spending a year in a mountain village in Chagang province as part of the Mobile Medical Corps remind you?"

"If I didn't have to deal with you squirming and pouting at me?" Kim Yong-hwan asked. "Yes."

North curled his lip at her as she started to work on his chest, scrubbing at the burns on the edges of his scar.

He was less tense now that he could see her as she worked, enough to pull out a few of the letters the hospital occupants had given him, reading through congratulations and well-wishes written on scraps of paper.

It gladdened him to see that Pak Ga-ram asked him to congratulate North Pyongan for him, and mentioned that the province had came by a few days ago. He had never had an issue with being empathetic and checking in on their people. But it was still impressive that he'd done it without South Pyongan.

The sailor would be being released in a week or so, and sent to the shore batteries on the east coast, keeping his feet firmly on dry ground from now on, as he had requested.

Still, North was vaguely irked as he read through all the messages. He'd asked for any complaints they had that he could solve, but the closest any got to it were multiple soldiers asking him to have them released early so they could return to the front, and one man mentioning that the hospital food could be better. And North was fairly certain that was a quip.

He knew realistically that most main complaints still weren't things he could solve directly. The food issue, the housing issue, the lack of medical supplies and ammunition at the front. Anything he could do about it, the Party was already doing, or thinking of ways to solve it. They were preparing free winter clothes for the displaced, they were trying to get housing materials to those without shelter, they were building more local factories. North couldn't stop the napalm from torching their crops, or conjure rations and supplies from nothing.

But he wanted something he could fix.

He jolted suddenly, jerking back from Kim Yong-hwan, snapping, "Don't!"

She sat back, arching a brow at him. "It needs cleaned."

"I'll do it." North put a hand over the curved burn running down his torso, even though four hands wouldn't have been enough to cover it.

The nurse examined him, then sighed. "Fine. But I'm watching to make sure you do it well."

North did, meticulously scrubbing at the gash, gritting his teeth at the feeling. It still didn't hurt- the ever-widening edges stung, but where it had carved into his flesh and muscle was still blackened and dead. It just felt… wrong. It put an uncomfortable pressure on his insides, making him think about Kangwon's worry about it developing to a fourth-degree burn, the kind that ate into bone.

An injury to their land apparently wasn't supposed to be able to do that Countryhumans, but then again, no country had ever been bombed like Korea was being bombed. Not even Japan, Germany, or Britain during the last World War.

North finished cleaning where the burn curved around his side, looking up in time to see Kim Yong-hwan's mask slip.

Her sharp brows were furrowed as her eyes traced his scar down to the burn, her lips pressed flat, but no longer in irritation.

North would take a proper medical course when this was over. He would be his own doctor.

The nurse's severe expression slammed back into place like the door of a prison cell as she realized he was done.

"I notice you sit still well enough when you're the one trying to work," she said archly.

North stayed silent until she was done rebandaging him, then stood, shrugging on his uniform.

"I'm done here. Go back to harassing your other patients."

"They don't need me to harass them. Oh, and Comrade Korea?"

He eyed her warily.

"Happy Foundation Day." Kim Yong-hwan gave him something that was almost a dry smile. "I'm glad to see you stopped sulking."

"I don't 'sulk,'" North sulked.

"Mhm," she skeptically hummed. "You didn't use to, at least. So I don't know why you started this year."

Because back then it had only ever been losing the battle. He had always known they could still win the war. But this time…

He had let them down completely.

"But I'm glad to see you're over it," she continued. "I won't be able to make it to the speech, but save me a few words."

She opened the door, releasing him from her clutches.

North couldn't stand her.

He did his rounds around the hospital, speaking with the ill and injured soldiers, thanking them for their service, encouraging those who would return to the frontline, and reassuring those who would never fight again.

They thanked him for his care with tears in their eyes, and he felt like a fraud.

It was his fault they were here. It didn't matter if it was an American bomb, a reactionary bullet, or a virus that had put them in the hospital. They wouldn't be here if the war had ended when it was supposed to. If he hadn't hesitated.

Every single man and woman that would never walk again, that had to learn how to write with a different hand, who would never see with two eyes again was because of him.

But he knew he couldn't hide out in the office all day. They were here because of him. So he had to be here for them.

Keeping that thought in mind, he left the military hospital, visiting City Hospital One, then the local ammunition factory, and every other factory he could reach on foot. He visited the market spaces in the hills, unannounced, so not too many could have time to gather. Crowds would attract the planes.

He walked the outskirts of Pyongyang, visiting every dug-out and cave he knew of, searching for more. He made sure to visit North Pyongan's two wards, making sure they were settling into their job of guarding the aid station on the north road, and fighting off the attempts of the women there to treat him like a visiting soldier who needed a bowl of tofu jjigae and his uniform washed.

"Really, Comrade Korea," an older woman with a hairnet trapping her curly black locks fussed. "We just made it, and there's plenty. My own family made the tofu."

"I've already eaten," North lied. "Save it for our soldiers."

"Can we at least sing you a song?" another woman asked from the window of the small rest house.

'Why don't we just celebrate today? I can sing you another song.'

'I don't want a song. I want to get us out of here.'

"…Alright," he acquiesced now. A song didn't waste anything. And this wasn't the same as back then.

"Oh! Tae-min can sing, too!" Hyun Han-jin enthusiastically volunteered his friend. "He has a great voice!"

"Hyung!" the other boy snapped, but was too late to stop the older women from dragging his chair over to them, and making sure he knew the words of the song they'd been practicing.

As they sang 'Flag of Victory,' North thought of its composer, Kim Soon-nam, another defector from the south, and a participant in the Taegu Uprising in 1946, another case of workers rising up against the American Military Government, and being put down for it.

It was good he had escaped. Otherwise he would have been executed alongside the thousands of others by Rhee's dogs before the KPA came, and Korea would have lost a patriotic composer.

But his wife and child had remained. Had they fled Taegu when the war had been waging in it? Or had they been killed?

How many of those from the south had came here to save their lives, confident that North would free their families for them? That they could go home soon?

Hyun Han-jin and Oh Tae-min seemed to glare at him, their eyes saying, 'You should have gone to Ganghwa when we begged. You should have Liberated us when you were supposed to.'

They combined with the rich smell of tofu jjigae to hollow out North's insides, the singing fading to a buzz in his skull.

"Thank you," he said when they were done, swallowing the saliva flooding his mouth so his words wouldn't sound wet. "I'm sure our soldiers are pleased to have such talented people looking after them."

"We all need to do what we can," the woman with the hairnet said cheerfully. "We'll make sure you and our comrades can keep fighting on."

"And we'll do whatever we can to help, too," Hyun Han-jin chimed in, his friend still hiding behind him in embarrassment at having to sing. "We're really grateful for everything you and everyone else here have done for us."

'Not enough,' his brown eyes said. 'You didn't do enough.'

North felt his shoulders twitch, wanting to hunch, and fought the urge to back away. “I am grateful to have such patriotic men and women be apart of our struggle. I’ll make sure you all get to go home soon, to a free Pyongyang and Ganghwa.”

‘Liar,’ they said.

North declined another offer of jjigae, trying to leave without looking like he was fleeing, his shoulder blades itching as their eyes followed, burning into him.

As the day wore on, he could feel himself winding tighter and tighter. Now none of the people he spoke to seemed excited to see him. Their mouths twisted into smiles and their faces lit up. But their eyes remained cold and judging, piercing into him as they sang and handed him paper words they didn’t mean. Every thin child and exhausted mother in small shacks, every old man in the refuges for elders, every crippled soldier and southern refugee seemed to watch him with judgement, even as they wished him well.

‘You said we would be Reunified by Liberation Day, you said the talks would succeed, you said we could go home, you said we would win.’

‘You said we wouldn’t get hurt again!’ his brother cried, hand to the blood on his temple.

“Korea-“

“What?!” he snarled at SH.

She blinked back at him, unfazed as she held the sack of letters he’d given her to pass off to a soldier to bring to Jonsung complex. "I think I should come with you to the Mangyongdae School.”

“No need,” North clipped, turning away.

She followed him down the riverbank. “You’re not the best with children on a good day, and today-“

“I am fine with children!” North barked, spinning to her, then sucked in a breath, turning back. “There is nothing wrong with today. Go finish preparations for the performance. If you screw up, I'll put you up against the wall."

"We don't threaten execution for mistakes!" SH reminded him.

North ignored her, skin prickling as he headed for Mangyong Hill.

He'd saved the orphanages for last, now that the sun was starting to set, hoping they would have worn themselves out during the day. He knew he couldn't tolerate dozens of children at full energy right now. He had managed to make it through the others.

Now he had to withstand Mangyongdae.

North went around the village at the base of the hill. He knew it was unlikely, but the idea that he could run into any of those people that had been there thirty-two years ago, that had looked at him the way they had...

He couldn't bear to see if that look had changed.

Like the other orphanages, delaying his visit hadn't accomplished much. As North entered the underground classroom in the school complex, any lethargy the children had been feeling instantly dissipated, and they threw themselves at him like a small tsunami, the younger ones speaking over each other in squeaky voices, clamouring to ask questions and wish him happy birthday, only just remembering to flutter the red pennants they'd been given as their teachers tried in vain to rein them in.

The older children hung back. North tried not to look at them.

The Mangyongdae School For Bereaved Family of Revolutionaries was a high school, one for the children of those killed fighting against Japan, to teach them how to grow up into revolutionaries just like their parents. And now it included the children whose parents had been killed fighting against America, or had a living parent in active duty, but no other relatives to take them in.

But with just how many children had been orphaned, the younger siblings of those old enough to attend secondary school had been sent here, too. For now.

"Leave Comrade Korea alone," one schoolmistress chided, swooping in to snatch up a girl whose hand had been trying to reach into North's belt pouch. "Sorry for their manners."

"It's fine," North said, glad he'd removed the bullets from his pistol before entering the first orphanage.

It was good for them to see their Countryhuman before they left.

The other Socialist nations- CCCP, Romania, East Germany, amongst others- had volunteered to take in their orphans and keep them safe until the war was over. Already they were preparing to send some over to orphanages in Europe or eastern Russia, and a few to China, despite his nation-building still being ongoing.

North despised having to send his children away, like so many had had to flee during the Occupation. But he knew it was for the best. Their education was at risk when classes were always being interrupted by air raid alarms, and they were living underground. They could learn under a sky that wasn't filled with death, and bring what they learned back to their country to rebuild once the war was over.

'And when will that be?' the high school children seemed to ask. 'When will I see my brother or sister again? When I'm old enough to be a war veteran, and they no longer speak Korean?'

The younger children didn't know enough to blame him. Their eyes were wide, filled with innocent enthusiasm to see their Countryhuman, unaware that their parents were dead because of him.

But the older ones knew.

"The children practiced hard to prepare a couple performances for you," the schoolmistress said, the girl still squirming in her arms. "We'd be honored if you stayed for it. But I understand if you don't have the time."

North didn't want to. He wanted to escape the eyes gazing at him accusingly, and the ones that should be.

But he agreed. Songs and letters were the only gifts he would accept today.

He was led towards the school's theatre, two children latching onto his hands to eagerly pull him towards it. North couldn't quite hide his flinch as the boy's small hand gripped his own, reflexively gripping it tighter, trying to prevent his hold from growing slack. He almost couldn't make his fingers loosen when he saw him wince.

Yes. Better to get them away from the planes and their bombs. They could relearn Korean, so long as they were alive.

The younger children put on a song and dance that was more impressive for how hard they had clearly practiced, and how passionate they were than any skill. North sat in the front row, surrounded by the high schoolers, trying not to meet their furtive glances or open stares.

It was harder when they took to the stage, looking directly at him as they sang to him. Unlike the children, they would be able to tell if he didn't meet their eyes. So he was forced to gaze back as they sang to him about smashing the enemy, about freeing their country and victory, the lyrics blending into all the others he had heard today, constructing a charge. He wasn't sitting on a schoolchild's pew with a girl in a red ascot clinging to his side- he was sitting in a defendant's chair at a people's court.

And they had found him guilty.

He clapped for them when they were done, told them they had done well and were doing well, to make sure they worked hard to grow up into fine revolutionaries. He reminded them what their parents had died for, and told the younger ones that no matter where they went, they would always be Korean.

They smiled and laughed and handed him notes written in pencil and coloured chalk or wax, congratulating him on Foundation Day and his birthday, and North fled the second he had the chance, bursting out of the stifling underground, walking as swiftly as possible so he could get far enough away to start running.

"Comrade Korea!"

A sudden surge of panic rushed through North, the distinct feeling he was being hunted. He itched with the desire to run, but made himself stand firm. He couldn't face the audience tonight if he couldn't face a single child.

He turned to see a lanky boy jogging through the trees towards him. He was one of the high schoolers, maybe fifteen or sixteen, with brown hair shaved close and big, wire-rimmed glasses perched loosely on his flat nose. He had been sitting a few people over from North on the pew, one of those casting him frequent short glances, looking between him and a clipboard.

"Is something wrong?" North asked, and the tension in his voice could easily be blamed on thinking something was.

The boy halted a few feet away, bringing his hands up to his chest, a thick paper held in them. North could read names on the back, spaced haphazardly, all in different handwriting, and make out the shadow of something in the other side.

"I, uh, we made you a present." The boy ran a hand across his head with a rasping sound. "Well, I made it. But everyone else signed it. And the idea was collaborative. Sort of."

He flipped around the paper, holding it out for inspection.

It was a watercolour sketch of North, standing before a green and gold cornfield. Paektusan rose into the blue sky in the background, mottled in emerald, brown, and white. There was a flagpole in his hand, the flag of the DPRK fluttering atop it. The Countryhuman was looking up at it, his expression intense.

"I would have given it to you sooner," the boy said, feet shifting. "But I've never seen you so close in person before. I needed to finish the expression."

He was lying. North could see light scuff marks under the crimson and navy watercolours, and the fresh pencil lines of his angular eye and serious lips where a smile had been erased.

"Why?"

The boy blinked at his suddenly aggressive tone. "Why…?"

North knew he should just shut his mouth and accept the painting, but he couldn't. "Why are you giving this to me?"

"Because it's Foundation Day?" He sounded a bit puzzled. "It's your birthday. And I know the Worker's Party said you didn't want any presents, but we figured there wasn't much of a difference between a letter and a drawing. And…" He fidgeted. "I've actually been working on this for awhile."

"It isn't my birthday." North knew being combative with a high schooler was exactly the sort of thing that made SH say he wasn't good with children. But he couldn't take it anymore. "This is the day our state was founded, not the day I was born."

"But… you're the one that founded our state," the boy pointed out, looking around at the hillside like he thought he might be being tested.

"No," North corrected. "Our people founded our state. Premier Kim Il-sung, the deputies of our People's Assembly and the Supreme People's Assembly, our comrades in the Worker's Party and all the masses."

And the only reason they had done it on this day was because Rhee had already declared the Republic of Korea two months earlier. A Korean state shouldn't have been proclaimed until there was only one Korea.

"I was only one person in all that," North growled. "This day isn't about me- it's about our state and the people in it. The workers, the peasants, the army."

"But you are the state," the boy said, starting to sound uncertain, unsure of what was going on. "And we already have days for all of them. We've got May Day, Army Foundation Day, Party Foundation Day," he listed on his fingers. "If this isn't your birthday, when are we supposed to celebrate it?"

"Why do you need to celebrate it?" North retorted. "Why do you all insist on getting me things? What's your name?"

"Uh, Mun Guk?"

"Mun Guk." North drew himself up, glaring at him. "Why did you make this for me?"

Mun Guk looked down at the painting. "I just made it for myself originally. But then I thought you might like it. Mmm." He thought for a second. "My mom always tried to get meat for my birthday, 'cuz it was something special. I don't know about everyone else, but I think that's why I wanted to give it to you. Everyone should have a day they get special things."

"I'm your country," North insisted, prickling. "You give me things every day. Every time you go to work or pick up a gun or go to class to learn how to protect and build or nation, you are giving me something. There is nothing more special than that."

Forgetting that fact would lead to taking those actions for granted, like so many other countries did. It wasn't something they deserved- it was something they earned.

Mun Guk pushed his ill-fitting glasses up. "But that's not really the same, is it? I mean, if my mom… If she could still make me meals, and we had enough meat to have it every day, I'd really appreciate it. But she'd probably want to do something else for my birthday then. I might not care, but she would."

North wanted to pace in place, but made his feet stay rooted. "There isn't any reason to feel like you need to do things for me. I just said you all do enough."

"But I don't really feel that way." Mun Guk fiddled with the corner of the paper. "I mean, I'm not old enough to fight yet, and I can't work in a factory, or make posters. I'm just a student."

"You are the future of our country."

“But you’re out there fighting every day,” the boy said. “I mean, you’re our Countryhuman, so you’re kind of all those things, right? Party member, soldier, office worker. It’s like how we clean the classroom at the end of the day. Mrs. Min and the other teachers work hard to teach us and take care of us, but we can’t do much for them. So we give back how we can.”

He said it in the tone of a student quoting his class representative.

That was… better than if he had simply said it was because North was their Countryhuman. He did work hard, he knew that. It wasn’t enough, but he did try. It was better than his people simply wanting to give him things because that was what Joseon had expected, and Japan, for the ‘virtue’ of what he was instead of the virtue of what he did.

But it was still wrong thinking.

“It is my duty as your Countryhuman to work for you,” North told the boy firmly. “You owe me nothing for that.”

Especially when he had failed in that twice.

‘Thrice.’

Mun Guk shrugged. “Maybe not. It’s not like we owe Mrs. Min. But it feels nice to do things for her. And…”

The boy shifted foot to foot, glancing around the woods as he fidgeted, then sighed.

“Please don’t tell my dad I told you this. He might beat me when he gets back. But…” His eyes slid away as his voice lowered shamefully. “He said in his last letter you were disappointed we haven’t managed to free the south for you yet, and that I should do something to cheer you up, if I could. That’s… probably another reason everyone wants to give you stuff.”

North barely heard his last words, unable to fully disguise his gape of dismay and disbelief as his heart stopped.

His people thought he was disappointed in them?

“Why does he think that?” North demanded.

Mun Guk shrugged uncomfortably, but he already knew. His lack of personal announcements, avoiding his soldiers and anyone else he could, his perfunctory broadcast on Liberation Day. His absence from the frontline didn’t help. Even though he hadn’t been able to fight for risk of jeopardizing the talks, he hadn’t even visited for August Fifteenth. He had squirrelled himself away in a broadcasting booth, then crept back to Jonsung complex, hiding behind paperwork, leaving his provinces and Premier to speak to their people.

Of course they thought he blamed them. He was their Countryhuman. They always heard about the efforts he was making for Korea, and even with how often he and the Party repeated that no one was above criticism, it still wasn’t first nature to find fault with your country. Of course the military commanders that had made the decision to pause after Seoul blamed themselves, even though he had been the one to allow it. Of course when he hid himself away and refused to speak to anyone, they thought it was because of their faults, not his.

Kim Yong-hwan had been wrong when she said he never acted like this before. He had. Every failed offensive in Korea or Manchuria, every comrade sacrificed and village reached too late had made him want to curl up somewhere dark where accusing eyes couldn’t find him.

But it had been routine to split the units after a loss, to disperse and regroup. And his unit was used to him disappearing into the woods or mountains, remaining nearby, but unseen, unheard, until he had finished criticizing himself, and emerged with steely determination once he was ready to face them with a new plan.

He couldn't do that now. He was a politician. His absence never went unnoticed. And his silence could be more damning than words ever were.

He still found it difficult to remember that it was a pencil in his dominant hand, not a gun. That his suit was more important than his uniform.

And now his people were blaming themselves because of it.

"When you write your father next, tell him I'm not disappointed in our People's Army," North managed to force out past his locked jaw. "Or any of you. I know our soldiers are giving it their all, and so long as they continue to do that, and make their best even better, I could never be disappointed in them."

He would tell them himself tomorrow at the front, and have it broadcast over the radio and sent as a general order. They couldn't think their country was disappointed in them, not when they had given so much for him.

Mun Guk nodded, unaware of the turmoil raging inside him. "Does… that mean you don't want the painting?"

"I want it," North said immediately, snatching it from him, examining it with a new eye. "You have skill."

Mun Guk dipped his head a little shyly. "I'd like to be an artist and a soldier someday."

"Have you ever seen Paektusan before?" The mountain looked almost like the real thing.

"No. But I had dad send me a few sketches. Him and mom were in the KPRA."

North lowered the painting. "You should send more art to the front. You and the other schoolchildren. Our soldiers need to remember what they're fighting for."

'The future.'

Mun Guk's eyes lit up. "So you really like it?"

"Yes," North said, ashamed his questioning had made the boy think otherwise, but unable to apologize when any explanation was too…

"Haha! Yes!" Mun Guk suddenly leaped in the air, fist-pumping. "I mean, uh, thank you for your praise Comrade Korea."

He reversed course by rocketing himself into a deep bow.

North bit down on telling him not to. He'd been antagonistic enough.

"You earned it." He nodded towards the underground shelter. "Now get back to school and keep working hard."

"Yes, comrade!" Mun Guk saluted sharply, then tore off back into the forest.

North took a deep breath, looking at the painting again, his white watercolour eye focused intently on their flag.

What had Mun Guk erased his smile for? Had he been replacing it with the solemn expression of a general whose gaze had been turned inwards, contemplating his own faults? Or a pointed accusation as he stared at their flag the same way he had stared up at that stage?

North had to remember that he wasn't just the General anymore. He was the State as well. His people would find meaning in what he did and didn't do, even if it was the wrong one.

They couldn't afford to doubt themselves. Not the soldiers at the front or the patients in the hospital, not the peasants working the fields to make sure they were fed or the workers driving themselves to produce more of what was needed to keep Korea going. None of the Korean people could.

North turned, heading towards Mangyongdae village with renewed purpose, one last stop before his speech.

'North, can we just celebrate our birthday next year? There's three hundred and sixty-four other days we can try and escape on. Please?'

'…Fine.'

North needed his people to believe in themselves unerringly, so that even if his feet ever faltered on their path, theirs wouldn't.

He hadn't faltered since 1918, and he was still working to make up for that.

He never could again.

North is a few bad conversations from snapping on a good day. His birthday is not a good day.

The Taegu Uprising started because 1) of the general hatred of the trusteeship and Americans putting the people that had supported Japan back in charge, and 2) the US Military Government liberalized the markets and allowed people to buy and sell rice freely. Then because of the glory of the free market, because Korea was going through a food shortage, rice rose to astronomical prices, starving people. The US realized they'd screwed up a few months later and started to collect rice again, like Japan had done. But the people making money off expensive rice didn't want to do that, and the people who had no rice didn't want to do that, so they weren't able to collect much, and a couple hundred people starved to death. The Americans said if they didn't have rice, they should eat fruit or vegetables, showing that they had no idea of one of the most basic facts of any East Asian country, let alone Korea- rice is life. Then a cholera outbreak made the US restrict access to the Taegu area, but they didn't supply the necessary materials for a quarantine (like medical supplies) properly. So people were sick and starving worse because food couldn't get in. The September general strike spread there, and in October, protestors rallied against the police and government, demanding rice. The police fired on them, killing two, and the demonstrations grew to thousands. They attempted to take over the police, but the officers killed hundreds of them. The protests turned violent, with the houses of officials and police officers being stormed. The provincial politicians all resigned, and the other government employees joined the strike, demanding an end to the American occupation. Doctors and nurses joined in, refusing to treat wounded police. The US sent in tanks and declared martial law, causing even more violence, until eventually the uprising was put down, and workers were forced back to work. The protests and resistance to the police spread all around Gyeongsang province, seeing officers killed, stations burned, and government offices sacked. But still, far more civilians were killed. The police cheered when they put down the people they were supposed to protect.

Also I can't find the original source for this claim, so don't believe it wholeheartedly, but I found a secondary Korean source saying a police chief had been directly split in half with an axe. Which is funny if true. Get him.

An Unbreakable Promise

The Moranbong Underground Theatre was heavy with anticipation. North could feel it crackling from behind the curtain, the hall echoing with a storm of murmurs and shifting bodies, the sound of hundreds of people waiting to see their Countryhuman.

The smell of sweat lingered amongst the set dressing and racks of brightly-hued clothes that filled the backstage, though the singers and dancers had finally retired after their all-day performances. They would be sitting in the front row now, the entertainers becoming the audience.

North took a deep breath, smoothing his pockets down over the white breast of his uniform. He looked in the full-body mirror, making sure his gold buttons and epaulets were spotless. He'd foregone both the olive flat cap and peaked general's hat he could have worn. His people needed to see his face.

But not all of it. He lifted the item Kangwon had given him this morning from the dressing table, tying the strings behind his head and adjusting it, the action familiar now.

His reflection gazed steadily back at him, that shameful wound concealed once more by the red star of his flag, the eyepatch no longer frayed and stained, but an unsullied white and crimson.

North tucked the old patch into his pocket. It wasn't sullied. The blood on it came from he and China's people, and had been shed for him. He would keep it as a reminder of that, and more.

The curtain rustled, and he looked up to see SH descending from the stage, her long crimson skirt swaying. The white silk of her jeogori glistened in the dim light, the sleeves capped in red, like they'd been dipped in blood.

"It's all set up," she said, tugging lightly on her goreum ribbon.

“It’s a full-house.”

North had seen on the way in.

“Good,” he said, though his chest tightened. “Are the correspondents ready?”

SH nodded. “Hwang says there’s three of them. One of them is bound to pick up good audio. And the cameras are ready, too.”

North wanted his words to be heard across the Peninsula. But had hesitated when Hwang suggested filming his speech for their future documentaries, thinking about the effect if there were permanent recordings of his other speeches, how it would make his people feel to look back at them, to see how sure he was-

‘This will be the last Liberation Day that we spend Divided.

‘We must Liberate them by this one.’

‘Soon we will push them from the south, as well.’

-and know that he had been wrong. How would they ever be able to believe that confidence again?

But he hadn’t been wrong every time. And he wouldn’t be this time.

‘We will return and whether it is now or later, we will win.’

Even if it wasn’t the decisive military victory he had wanted. They would. And all of his people needed to hear that.

“Then await your cue.”

SH dipped her head, and he moved by her, ascending the stairs to the stage and approaching the curtain barrier between him and the audience.

He stopped before it, barely able to see through the gap between the fabric panels to the people filling the theatre. Men and women in black suits and threadbare shirts, choson-ot ranging from colourful silks to plain white and black, olive uniforms and pressed workshirts. Those from all walks of life, but almost all Korean. There were no Soviet advisors or foreign press, and only a few Chinese correspondents.

This was for Korea's people.

North couldn't see their eyes past the glare of the stage lights, but his chest tightened further as he anticipated them turning to him.

In his head, he could hear South's voice from all those years ago, only three years after formation.

'Please?'

That had been the beginning, the precursor to 1918, the only time he had ever betrayed his people, before he even truly knew how much of a betrayal it was.

'So let them.'

Giving up on only one day was still giving up. And North couldn't do that. Not again.

He swept aside the curtain, emerging onto the stage. The stage light focused on his form, and the whispered conversations cut off like they'd been guillotined.

North surveyed the crowd, hundreds of people packed onto wooden benches and overflowing to line the walls, not with ticketed seating, but first-come-first-serve, aside from the performers and his provinces, who filled the balcony with his Premier and Kim Tu-bong, two of the few politicians here. His sharp eye picked out the cameramen- one in an opposite gallery, one in the middle aisle, and one crouched off to the side of the room.

They all stared back at him expectantly from the darkness beyond the stage.

There was a different quality to the silence than there usually was. Not solely anticipation, but something more anxious.

North knew why, and he cursed himself again for being a coward.

He straightened, drawing in a subtle breath as he prepared to fix it.

“Comrades.”

His voice filled the hall like the impact of a drum, as confident and assured as ever. The anticipation sharpened.

“Soldiers, peasants, workers, members of all political parties, students, men and women guerrillas, southern refugees.” North was able to pick out several of each group in the crowd, making sure to lock eyes with them, that they knew he saw them.

“Five years ago, you united to vote for our people’s committee members in the first elections in Korean history. Four years ago, our Provisional People’s Committee and People’s Assembly were established, the first Korean government to be led by those it serves. Three years ago, our entire nation came together to deny the puppet government rigged up in the south, electing five hundred and seventy-two deputies to the Supreme People’s Assembly, from north and south in the first all-Korea vote. And three years ago, the men and women that you chose to represent you crafted our Constitution and elected Kim Il-sung as our Premier, the first man ever chosen to be Korea’s head of state.”

Heads raised to the balcony, looking for him, though most remained facing North, anxious to find out what the history lesson was leading to. The Countryhuman put his arms in a military brace.

“Three years ago today, by the will of all Korea, the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea was founded. For the first time in our five thousand year-long history, Korea was in the hands of the people that built it.”

Already he could see shoulders shaking on some of the older audience members, the ones that had been alive for the Korean Empire, and had always known that Japan wasn’t the beginning of their suffering. The foreigner had inherited the locks, but the chains had already been there.

"It should have ended there," North continued, moving with steady steps past the forms concealed by white sheets that were set around the sides of the stage. "Korea should have been finally independent, finally able to chart our own course with the hands of our people firmly on the reins. We should have been free to build our nation into something greater than it has ever been."

His voice grew darker, though no less audible as he let his fists clench. "But it didn't end there. Our voices were ignored. Our demands that Korea's future should be decided by Koreans were silenced. Using the bloody mechanism of the United Nations, the Imperialists kept our country Divided, and propped up Rhee's puppet government in the south, aiding it in its slaughter of hundreds of thousands of our patriots who fought against their decrees. The same people that fought against Japan so ardently for all those years, cut down by their own countrymen. The same ones that sold out our nation to collaborate with the Japanese, still in power, still dyeing their hands red with the blood of the people."

The crowd rumbled in dissatisfaction.

"And it isn't a phenomenon that happened solely in the south." North's lip twitched with the urge to curl. "Not only did the reactionary puppets lay waste to our villages at the 38th Parallel, killing livestock, torching factories, spiriting away our women and killing our men. But when the Imperialists finally showed their grand ambition to conquer all of Korea, they committed those same heinous acts across our entire nation, from Busan to Chongjin. I am confident in saying that in this room, every single person lost someone to the reactionaries and their masters, or knows someone that did."

He spotted the lowered eyes and clenched teeth, and knew he was right.

"In the forty-seven days that our capital was occupied by the enemy, over fifteen thousand innocent men, women, and children were slaughtered, tortured and thrown into pits. Hung by their necks, beaten in the streets, and buried alive, forced to endure some of the worst humiliations in the world before being thrown aside like trash, like nothing."

North didn't bother keeping his voice cold. His people were angry, and so was he.

"But it would be foolish to hold the reactionaries solely at blame," he told them. "They are weak, cowardly. When we took their power and privilege, they kept their heads down and acted like patriots until the moment that the puppet army arrived. Only then were they confident enough to show their teeth, and bury them in their neighbours' necks.

"And the puppet army is the same. They started this war, but when our People's Army went south, they fell before them like stalks of wheat. And in every engagement, they have done the same, no matter what their masters do to stop them. Two weeks ago, after just being put back on the line, their 36th Regiment was repulsed, breaking and running, unable to seize their target without foreign aid."

It had been seized. But a speech wasn't the place to say that.

"If it hadn't been for one country, we would have routed them entirely last year," North declared, anger surging in his chest. "By now, Korea would be free and Liberated. We would have the future I described to you.

"But we don't. Because of one nation. The same nation that was bombing Korea before war was even officially declared. The same nation that taught the reactionaries the savage methods they use to kill our comrades, used first on their own oppressed. The same nation that used the United Nations, the very thing that is supposed to uphold international law, to break it, to embargo and starve our country, to poison our people and destroy our homes."

North's volume rose as he listed that country's crimes. Behind him, he could hear the curtain ripple as SH walked onto the stage. But every eye remained fixed on him.

"The same nation that stole our provinces and holds the South of Korea hostage even now. The same country that Divided us!"

"America!" a woman called in a high-pitched wavering voice, and the cry was caught, hundreds of people screaming out the name of the country destroying theirs.

"AMERICA!" North confirmed in a shout, stepping towards the nearest veiled object, drawing the crowd his way. "The same country that did this!"

SH reached up from beside him, tearing the sheet away with a flourish to the gasps and cries of the audience.

North didn't look. He'd already seen the canvas.

A painting of a small rural house, with the table set for lunch, bowls of rice, kimchi, and soup next to a cup of tea with steam coming off it. Another lay cracked on the floor, the liquid inside meeting the blood soaking the edge of the canvas and sprayed across the counter. Two men stood with their boots in it, tall, fair-skinned and sharp, one blond and one brunet. The brown-haired man held a baby by the leg, his thick fingers squeezing the chubby limb hard as it wailed in silent, red-faced pain. A woman with long black hair reached desperately for him from the corner, her expression even more anguished. The men's faces were frozen in cruel half-smirks, and it was clear what was about to happen, and clear that the mother in her cheery pink apron wouldn't be able to stop it.

North took the second as SH walked to the next hidden canvas to look up towards the balcony, finding Hae with her face buried in the Premier's shoulder.

"Don't look away," he said to her and the others that instinctively closed their eyes. "Don't look away from any of it."

SH tore the next sheet away, revealing a row of men hanging at the ends of ropes, their faces purple and eyes bulging. Not any of those North had seen, but others.

"This is what they are doing to us," North said as SH revealed scene after scene of carnage. "And you know that. While no American soldier has set foot in Pyongyang for nine months, and none ever will again, they are still doing this to our brothers and sister in the south, to those in their POW camps."

SH revealed a painting of a teary child in a dark tunnel, a woman curled around him, blood seeping from her slack mouth, and a foreign shadow looming in the tunnel mouth behind her with gun in hand, and another of a burning mass that a closer look revealed to be bodies in a pile. The silhouette of a man reached from it, his head tilted back to the sky, his mouth open in a scream as he burned. Dark shadows loomed around him, and an empty gasoline canister lay forgotten on the ground.

"We cannot afford to look away. Even when they can't set foot in the north, they still murder us by the thousands with their sicknesses and their bombs."

SH revealed the second-to-last painting on the far side of the stage- a person sitting upright in a chair, completely naked, though it was impossible to tell what sex they were. They were too burned. Only one bloodshot eye remained, staring out with an unfathomable amount of agony.

SH's voice was soft but clear. "The man who gave us permission to paint this passed during the sketching process."

There was a horrified realization in the eyes of a performer in front, and North nodded in grim confirmation.

"None of these paintings are fiction," he told them. "Every single one of these was painted by a artist interviewing someone who either witnessed it or spoke to survivors." He nodded to the woman covering her child. "The massacre at Nogun-ri, where American soldiers smoked cigarettes while they fired on innocent women and children for two days straight. The boy shared his story with one of our People's Army as he was escorted back to his village. He is still in the south. Haksong County, North Hamgyong province."

SH swept her red-tipped sleeve at the burning man for him.

"Twenty-eight people were dragged into the mountains and lit on fire." He turned back to the first painting. "Sincheon County. A quarter of the entire population was killed off. Sixty-eight percent of Ryongdang-ri, eighty-seven percent of Mangung-ri, every single man in Ryangjang-ri. Pregnant women were cut open by bayonets, hundreds of civilians were locked in an air raid shelter and set on fire, peasants were dragged through the streets by wires."

For once the eyes were off him, now unable to look away from the scenes of horror. He could see Hae at the edge of the balcony, her big white eyes focused on the painting of the woman.

"And all of this was done by America and his puppets."

North stepped aside, putting out a hand, and SH carried a final canvas to the center of the stage, the one she had made, working determinedly alongside other artists in the Party ever since the end of August to get it done in time. Her knuckles clenched in the fabric this time before she ripped it away.

America leered out at the audience. Surrounded by darkness, he seemed to loom over the viewer, a gun clutched in one of his blood-soaked hands, droplets of scarlet falling to the forest floor. His mouth was twisted in an unnatural smile, but the single blank eye that peered through the shattered lens of his aviators was predatory. He seemed to look out at the other paintings of the horrific things his soldiers had done with unaffected emptiness.

North had already heard SH's account of her escape from the POW camp. But he grit his teeth at the reminder of what, exactly, she had been grappling with alone in the woods.

He made himself speak, facing the crowd again. "Every single action taken by the American soldiers and their puppets can find its blame at his feet. He and his leadership are the ones that seek to dominate our country. They are the ones that use the United Nations to wage war against us. They are the ones that send their soldiers to massacre our people and burn our land, and they are the only reason Korea wasn't Liberated by last Liberation Day."

He shouldn't have allowed the break last June. He shouldn't have hesitated last January.

But America shouldn't even be here.

"He is the one that Divided Korea!" North flung a hand at the painting of the country that had stolen his brother.

SH reached out, very deliberately knocking the canvas over to hide the vicious striped face before disappearing behind the curtain, leaving the spotlight on her Countryhuman again.

"But this is our country." North looked out at the audience, who were still staring at the paintings with rage and sickened fear.

He knew it was a risk to show them something like this on such an important day. Just what exactly America and his puppets were capable of.

But he had faith in his people.

"Do you know why we keep fighting in the face of this horror?" he asked them, stepping out farther than the scenes again. "Do you know why we keep fighting when we know that this could happen to any one of us, or those we love?"

A few gazes were torn back to his.

"Because we have been through this before." North strafed them again, meeting the understanding of women with deep wrinkles and greying hair, and men with old battle scars. "Japan has done this very thing to us. Before the Americans ever got here, the Japanese were burning our villages, raping our women, and starving our people. They sought to colonize us. And through trickery and the cowardice of the monarchy, they succeeded.

"Every single person here knows what it was like under Japanese Occupation. They owned every aspect of our lives. They controlled our police force, our markets, our government, and us. They tried to take everything from us. They made us bleed for over three decades.

"But we still fought." North raised his head, looking directly at his General. "Supreme Commander Kim Il-sung and I, and thousands of our brave men and women took up arms against the Japanese and their collaborators. And every one of us has seen something that makes it hard to sleep at night."

An endless onslaught. Corpses mutilated beyond recognition, babies that were nothing more than bundles of skin and bone, men with all their limbs severed, nothing more than stumps. That woman with her body bloodied and hollow, words carved from her twisted neck down to her empty womb.

'OBEY.'

"But we kept fighting." He lowered his head back to them. "We kept fighting knowing that that same thing could happen to us. We kept fighting no matter how many family members were imprisoned or killed, no matter how many of our people were cut down in cold blood for simply demanding an end to a unjust Occupation. And we will keep fighting now, no matter what America does to try and destroy us."

His voice grew louder, his pulse racing. "Because for a revolutionary, the blood shed by our enemy doesn't quench our fire- it only fuels it. We do not cower when our kin are killed- we take revenge. We do not lay down our arms when the gun turns on us. We fight, and if we die, we die with our weapons in hand, knowing that we gave our lives for a better world."

He stepped forward, his fists clenched. "America wants to destroy us. He wants to bring us to our knees and do exactly what Japan did- to steal our culture, our resources, and our freedom. But he isn't strong enough to do that. His army fell before ours on the way to the Raktong, and without his control of the sea, he wouldn't have been able to stop us from reaching Busan. And even with that control, even with all his planes and bombs and superior technology and violence, he still couldn't stand against us and our Chinese comrades. He isn't strong enough to break our line or recapture our capital.

"So he thinks to wear us down. He thinks that all he needs to do is burn our country to the ground, to raze our factories and our fields, to murder enough of us that we fear to fight on, that we tuck our tails between our legs and give in to his demands. He thinks that we are desperate enough to come crawling to him for a ceasefire.

“He is wrong.”

The word hit like a hammer, making a few people flinch forward, not back, excitement gleaming in their eyes.

“We are not desperate,” North said, beginning to pace the edge of the stage, still facing the crowd. “We have told them time and time again that if it comes to a protracted war, Korea is ready to fight it. And we are ready to win.”

Victory wasn’t about superior firepower or uninterrupted supply lines. It wasn’t about the number of allies or aerial control. It was about one side making enough sacrifices that they could no longer keep fighting. Under the punishing aerial and naval blitzes North and China’s armies had lost far more than the Americans and their United Nations ‘allies.’

Two hundred thousand. The PVA had crossed that number now. And North knew his own casualty reports well.

When you added in civilians, he thought the number might be in the millions.

But ‘enough’ sacrifices didn’t mean ‘the most.’ It only had to be as much as one side could bear. Like at Chorweon, the 63rd Army reduced to scraps, not inflicting half as much damage on the American division, but still coming out victorious.

And North could bear far more sacrifices than the Yankees ever could. And so could his people. They were used to being the overpowered force, the one that fought with handmade grenades and scrounged firearms while their enemy came with all the technology that stripping resources from other countries could afford. They were used to dozens giving their lives for a single objective.

They were used to the struggle. And North knew that China’s were, too.

The Americans weren’t used to struggling. They weren’t used to losing, or giving ground, or fighting for something. Maybe they had been once. But not anymore.

"We fought Japan for thirty-six years!" he shouted. "Our soldiers grew up with nothing. Nothing but the belief that if they kept fighting, then one day they would win! And we did. We stood against Japan, never faltering, and we drove him and his followers from our country!

A woman in a middle row's mouth opened in a silent gasp, like she wanted to scream with triumph, but couldn't break the building tension in the theatre.

"For thirty-six years, Korea struggled against Japan with no state of our own, no government, no ration distribution, no standing army. Two years is nothing." North wheeled, the tips of his boots projecting off the edge of the stage. "Three years would be nothing. Neither would five, or ten, or twenty. Even if America's war wasn't unpopular with the rest of the world, even if he had unlimited money, weapons, and manpower, enough to keep this war going for a hundred years, we would fight.

"Ten, thirty-six, a hundred, a thousand!" North listed in a rising volume, until he was almost screaming. "Korea would keep fighting! We would fight until every single blade of grass was burned to ash, until the last person standing! Because so long as even one Korean is alive, Korea is alive!"

Every single person in the crowd leaned towards him, eyes catching the lights above, enraptured.

"WE WILL KEEP FIGHTING FOR AS LONG AS WE HAVE TO. WE WILL KEEP FIGHTING UNTIL WE WIN. UNTIL KOREA IS REUNIFIED AND FREE!"

No one could hold back now. Before North's words had even finished echoing, his people were crying out, leaping from their seats with shouts of determination and fists thrown in the air in joyous elation.

North panted lightly as he gazed out at them, finding no trace of the earlier anxiety, no hint of fear or despair.

This was what he should have done on Liberation Day. Instead he had let them stew in uncertainty and guilt because he had been afraid of what they thought of him.

But he wasn't what mattered.

"But this fight won't last that long!" he called when the roar had quieted slightly, and the hush immediately fell again, no one sitting back down, but gazing up expectantly. "It won't last for thirty-six years. It won't even last for ten. And do you know why? Do you know why the Americans will give up before then? Why Rhee's soldiers crumble and break no matter what training they are put through?"

"Why!?" a man in the back shouted.

"Because they aren't fighting for something," North answered fiercely. "They fight because they are told to, because their rich and powerful tell them it is right to die for conquest and capital. And if they do fight for something, they fight for hate.

"They hate us," he told them. "The reactionaries hate us because they've been told we wish to take their freedom away. And the people that told them that hate us because we do want to take their freedom away. Not their freedom to live, but their freedom to exploit others. To receive the spoils of land that they've never worked in their lives, to feast on food bought with money made off of the workers and peasants, while the people that deserve that money, that worked hard for it, starve. And the Yankees hate us because we aren't them. Because we are 'coloured,' and because we refuse to let them treat us the way they treat Africa and Latin America, and the rest of Asia. Because we won't bow.

"But we fight for love." North placed a hand over his heart, leaning out over the crowd. "We hate the enemy for what they've done to us, but that isn't why we fight. We fight because we know what it's like to have nothing. Because we know what it is to be slaves in our own nation. We fight so that no one else will ever have to experience that again. We fight so that every child will grow up with enough to eat, and never have to hear the word 'war.' So that one day every single person will be able to live a happy, prosperous life, without fear of bombs, bullets, or swords.

"This woman, Ra Hye-in-dongji." He gestured to the canvas behind him, the one painted off of Hae's experience. "When her son was murdered, she didn't give in to despair and throw her life away. She fought. She eliminated the Yankee that did it so that he could never harm another woman's child again, and when she died, she gave her life so a comrade could get away.

"That is why we fight! For love. For love of our country, for our neighbours, for our children and children we will never meet. For their freedom and ours. And that is why we will keep fighting, no matter what is done to us!"

He inhaled steadily. "That is why I fight. Because for the first time in our history, the Korean people have a Korea that belongs to them. Not to any king or emperor. You."

Korea met the gaze of every person that he could, finding tears glistening in the eyes of miners and farmers and office workers. Of women in silks and women in cotton. Of men rough with age and fresh with vigour. People from every single facet of life, but all Korean. All his.

"And I will keep fighting for you, no matter what," Korea vowed. "No matter what is done to me."

He held a hand up under the stage light, bright white light illuminating the clean but severe burns mottling his palm and wrist.

"I promise that Korea will never stop fighting for his people."

It was one promise he knew could never be broken.

He swallowed. "I'm very proud of every single person that has carried us so far, through the Japanese Occupation, through the trusteeship, through the founding of our state and the building of our nation, and through this war. Of every single person that has fought in whatever way they can. It is because of all of you that I know America will never get what he wants. I know we will be Reunified and Liberated."

Heart pounding in his chest like a drum, Korea thrust his fist into the air, blood dripping from his burnt palm as he shouted, “Long live our People’s Army! Long live our Worker’s Party and every other party fighting for freedom! Long live the peasants, workers, and intellectuals! Long live our people’s committees and Supreme People’s Assembly! Long live General Kim Il-sung!”

He sucked in a deep breath, no longer caring about making it subtle as he screamed with every ounce of conviction in him, “LONG LIVE THE KOREAN PEOPLE!”

The scream came back louder, and with no less conviction, from the throat of every man and woman, soldier and civilian.

“LONG LIVE KOREA!”

Korea's blood sang as the call was echoed over and over, “MANSE! MANSE!” from hundreds of throats, not a single one hesitant or afraid.

He knew his people wouldn’t give up. They wouldn’t have even if he had kept silent. But now they knew he wouldn’t give up either.

If there were three hundred and sixty-five days in a year, then every single one of them should be spent fighting for freedom. And if you already had it, then they should be spent fighting to keep it.

Korea didn’t bow. Korea didn’t grovel or beg for peace. Peace was not given- it was won.

And Korea didn’t give up. Not when he had people depending on him.

“MANSE!” he roared, elation thrumming through every inch of his body, driving away the prickling under his skin and almost drowning out the ache inside of him.

“MANSE!”

—

“MANSE!” China gave in to the urge to scream alongside the crowd, cupping his hands around his mouth, but still going unheard in the fervent roar of imagined victory.

North obviously didn’t hear him, just as he hadn’t seen him lurking against the wall beside the stage, even though he was on his seeing side. The Chinese Countryhuman was too concealed by the shadows and people between them, including the cameraman.

China tore his eyes away from his friend to scan the crowd, faces wizened and young, thin and thinner, lined with hardship, but all emitting the same light as they gazed up at their country with tremulous smiles and tears streaming down their cheeks, still chanting that same refrain of ‘long live’ with utter whole-hearted devotion.

It was familiar enough to send a pang through his erratically-racing heart, even as he was drawn back to North, examining his expression for any sign of arrogance as he stood above a sea of people that would do anything for him.

His friend perched on the edge of the stage, his chest heaving as he gazed out at his audience, face glowing like his snowy uniform. His mouth was open, not quite in a smile, but fangs visible, and there was a wild light in his eye.

Not the spark of power, of someone that knew he had complete control, but the same glow his people were emitting. As hard as China searched, he couldn’t see any hint of ego or smugness at the position he was in.

Instead he looked as devoted as any man on his knees before an altar.

China uttered a breathy laugh, and Liaoxi, who had looked over when he shouted, paled above her mask.

“China,” she said tightly. “No.”

He turned to her, smiling widely, making no effort to disguise how fast he was breathing or to slow his heartrate. “Forgetting Zhilong-gege's name? And no what, meimei?”

“I recognize that look in your eye.”

“Zealousy,” Liaotung said dryly, her hands tucked in the pockets of her wide-legged civilian pants.

China’s smile widened further. “What’s wrong, Little Sisters? Afraid I’ll once again bleed myself dry?”

Liaoxi stared up at him, unsmiling under her mask.

“I won’t give anything I can’t afford to give,” he placated, already looking back at North.

His friend looked like he might cant directly off the stage and into the sea of people that had flooded up to its edge, crowding to be closer to him. But instead he reached down, holding out his hand to a young man in student’s attire. He didn’t hesitate to take it, the first to be hoisted onto the stage, though others followed almost immediately.

Not in an unorganized rush, trampling each other in their haste. The crowd thrummed with excitement and the kind of energy that made China’s blood hot and his feet want to paddle, but stayed organized, climbing up to join their country without pushing or shoving, moving to embrace him.

China had expected to like North once he met him, and hoped that he would. Yet it was a bit *un*expected, exactly how much he liked his new friend. He couldn't say he was displeased- he didn't dislike surprises.

But it did put him off when he hadn’t been able to predict something.

'I suppose this one's pleasant enough at least.'

“Well, what do you think?” he said, watching a middle-aged man help an elderly woman up next to him, assisted by a woman dressed in a simple choson-ot.

“About what?” Liaotung asked warily.

As North gave himself over to his people, disappearing into them, China looked back over to his ‘little sisters.’ The three stood alone now as those near them were drawn to the stage like moths to the sun.

“It’s obvious there’s not going to be a ceasefire anytime soon,” he said, his words harsh but tone mellow. “It might not be thirty-six or a thousand years, but I don’t think our Korean comrades are going to get the peace they want expediently. But we could.”

“You wouldn’t call the army back.” Liaotung crossed her arms. “Not now.”

“They might not go back,” China admitted. “But we could. We could wish our comrades a happy Foundation Day, then return to our country. It’s where we should be, after all.

“So what do you think?” He tipped his head, smiling. “Is our little adventure over?”

He made no effort to disguise what he wanted. He had already let them know. But he searched their faces just as intently as North’s.

This time his provinces didn’t look between each other before answering.

“No,” Liaoxi said confidently. “It isn’t over until we defeat our foe.”

Liaotung didn’t answer as quickly, but she still nodded. “We don’t go home until our soldiers do.”

China’s lips stretched more. “Are you sure? Even though we’re missing out on our own nation-building?

He had things to do. He should be there to observe his people’s efforts, and give a nudge when needed. To support the redistribution of land and passing of laws and peaceful settlement of their country. He should be secretly communicating with Tibet and learning sign language, finding out what art Xinjiang wanted to pursue and making sure she was happy as his ‘little sister,' and taming Qinghai. He should take his victory in the United Nations' trial and stop risking his country.

His Chairman had reminded him of all that, though he never could've forgotten. And he had cried into his shoulder, mourning his son. China should be there to comfort him, to help him shoulder his grief.

He ached for home. For the narrow streets of Beijing and the dry deserts of Xinjiang, for the lush rainforests of the south and cold mountains of the north. For the steamed buns the woman by the water always gave him for free, and the way she always chewed him out when she found money in her pocket after he'd already left, for Jin's fried flour rolls and Shaanxi's ribbon-dancing, and for the music. China loved all music, but nothing spoke to him the way the erhu or guzheng did, especially when they were being played by people who never could have hoped to learn even four years ago.

And more than any of that, he ached for his people. For spirited political arguments over the table and entertaining street children in exchange for information, for celebrating holidays with them like this, dancing and singing in a free China at last.

He could go home tonight. He could hand North his present, promise him he had a comrade in him, and go home. And next month he could throw himself into his people like his friend was. He could let them bury their faces in his chest and hold his hand and dance with him until the sun came up and know that for the first time, China belonged to them.

He could never get this past year back. He could never get any of the years he might spend here back. His people might think they had him in Hebei.

But he knew they didn't.

His fingers brushed the waxy edge of the paper in his sleeve, and the rough jade stone, brushing over the smooth edge where part had been carved away.

"So what do you think, meimei?" he softly repeated. "Do you want to go home?”

There was no hesitation from either of them.

“No,” Liaotung said firmly. “We need to avenge our comrades. I can’t go home and politick when I know our people are here giving their lives.”

“And I can’t accept the peace of our freedom when I know for theirs our comrades still strive,” Liaoxi agreed, and if her eyes searched the balcony for someone, well, who could blame her? “Even if you order us to go, we won’t do so.”

China searched their serious eyes, looking for some sign that they were just saying what he wanted to hear.

He didn’t find it.

Face splitting out in a grin, he burst out in a giddy laugh, reaching out and pulling them closer before they could escape, holding them tight as Liaotung struggled and Liaoxi accepted her fate.

China, still grinning, looked up from between them, catching a glimpse of North through the knot of people clinging to him. An old woman held his face in trembling hands, both her eyes and his wide and rapturous, brimming with the reason they all fought.

He could go home.

But where was the fun in that?

Mao Zedong: You promise you're coming right back after Korea's Foundation Day?

China: Yes. =‿=

Mao Zedong, knowing full well he's not going to be seeing him again anytime soon: long-suffering sigh

All the paintings mentioned are inspired by real reports . Though Ra Hye-in and her story are fictional, there were accounts of babies being torn from arms and thrown on the ground in Sincheon. And when you get drenched in napalm, your body forms a black crust. Your skin is literally too crispy to move, or it will crack. An American whose unit got hit by friendly fire said his unit's skins crisped and peeled back like 'fried potato chips.' It wasn't one man or woman, but many. They would get stuck standing, sitting, or lying down, unable to move. And there wasn't any recovering.

This isn't for shock effect- it actually happened. This is what America did. And I wish all American soldiers would suffer what they put billions of others through.

Warmth

For the first time in… awhile, North's steps were light as he led his provinces back to the GAZ's hiding spot in the middle of the night. And sitting behind the wheel as they teased and chattered amongst each other didn't make him want to itch out of his skin.

It tingled instead, overstimulated from too much touching, but better than feeling like he was going to explode. The mounting pressure inside of him had been temporarily replaced by something that warmed instead of burned. He was able to drive at a steady pace through the countryside, not even begrudging too badly that his Premier had refused to let him set foot in Jonsung complex to do paperwork, telling him to get some rest instead.

North knew tomorrow would bring the prickling back, and the edges of the ache would no longer be dulled. He would have to look over budgets, examine the new damage done to Pyongyang, review casualty reports from the front, and hear more of the lies their enemy was spreading about them. By the end of it, he would be a knot of tension and fury again.

But with less guilt.

He knew he was be right. Some of his people blamed him. They had to.

But even more didn't. And once they all heard his broadcast on the radio tonight and tomorrow, they would know that he hadn't been wrong because he was overconfident or naïve- he had been wrong because he truly believed they could do it. And he knew they could have, if he hadn't hesitated.

But he had. And he knew they still could. And they would know he knew that. He wasn't disappointed in them, and when he looked at them, it wasn't with accusation.

It was with love.

“Koreaaaa.”

Eyelids dipping, North hummed, “Mm?”

“Say ‘Ahhhh.’” SH reached from the back, nudging something against the corner of his mouth.

He actually opened it, before his teeth clacked shut as he shook himself, twisting to glare at her.

“Don’t patronize me.”

“Almost got you that time,” his province sighed, slumping back with an apple slice in hand. She handed it to Hae, where the fruit vanished into her mouth.

“Make sure you brush your teeth when we get back,” North ordered. He had brushed his before the speech.

“Applesh are healthy,” Hae mumbled around it.

“You still need to brush your teeth. And don’t talk with food in your mouth.”

“Guy with one eye?” South Pyongan called from the truck bed. “How about we keep it on the road? I’m way too tired to crash, and it’d probably just put you in a pissy mood again.”

She braced herself this time as North took them off-road for Jangsan in a sharp turn.

“Learn how to drive!” his province shouted cheekily.

North made sure to take every turn across the open terrain (including the ones he didn’t need to make) incredibly wide.

As they entered the trees around the mountain, the hairs on his arms started to rise, dispelling some of his lightness.

Something was wrong. His eye scanned the forest, squinting into the darkness under the trees.

There had been an ash branch hanging over the path this morning. North had driven around it, reminding himself to cut it tomorrow. It was gone now.

He tensed, debating stopping the truck. But anyone on the mountain would have already heard them coming, and if a branch was broken, whoever had come this way was likely in a truck. There were soldiers constantly patrolling the nearby road. Surely they would have spotted an enemy vehicle. Still…

"Remain on guard," he said lowly, and the provinces ceased their chatter, readying their weapons.

As they neared the clearing, North could see a dark shape though the trees, sitting crouched before the bunker where the GAZ usually went. A vehicle, like he'd guessed. And not one of theirs.

"British," North Hamgyong grunted quietly from the back. "Looks like a- Oh, fuck me."

"Shh!" North sharply hushed, but had already realized why his province had said that before Chagang even announced, "It's China's Jeep."

North abruptly hit the brakes, sending South Pyongan into the back of the cab on accident this time. As she grumbled to herself, he blinked, dumbstruck, as the doors on the Willys MB Jeep opened, and Liaoxi and Liaotung climbed out, yawning.

China slid out from the driver's side a second later, arching his back in a stretch.

"Oh good, you're finally back," he called, as if just noticing the GAZ idling there. "I was beginning to worry I'd have to make my dear Little Sisters sleep on the cold hard ground so I could have the bench."

Liaoxi and Liaotung side-eyed him.

"You should really have an extra set of keys made for us," their country said casually.

“Suffer,” North Hamgyong quietly grumbled.

China gave that same irritating smile as always through the windshield at North. “Well, are you going to park, or just sit there wasting gas while you stare at me?”

SH quickly leaned forward to whisper in North’s ‘ear,’ “Korea, please don’t run him over.”

North silently maneuvered the large Soviet-made truck into the clearing, trapping the small Jeep in, and jumped out, ordering North Hamgyong and South Pyongan to disguise it with the tarp. China had apparently brought his own, as Liaoxi and Liaotung set about doing the same to their vehicle.

The Korean didn't say a word as he passed China, unlocking the padlocks on the bunker door. He had to call Chagang twice to get him to help, and he moved like he was in a dream when he finally listened.

North would allow it tonight. He still felt light-headed.

“When did you get back?” he clipped to China, not looking at him.

“Around an hour ago,” the other country said breezily. “My Comrade Peng told me you were giving a speech tonight. I wish I’d made it in time.”

North was glad he hadn’t. It was embarrassing enough to remember there had been Chinese war correspondents watching.

He bit his tongue on the word that sat there, swallowing it as he heaved open the steel door, beckoning his provinces in, except for North Pyongan, who volunteered to keep first watch.

North watched Liaoxi look towards him, then turn for the bunker as South Pyongan loudly declared she would stay with him.

He would allow that tonight, too. Better her than the foreigner.

His provinces wished him a last happy birthday as they went to bed, Hae finally getting her hug in. As North went for his room, SH wrapped his arm in a quick embrace from behind.

“Happy birthday, Korea,” she whispered.

“Tch.”

She chuckled, releasing him as she whisked down the hall.

North pushed open his door, immediately spotting the painting. It sat against the far wall, leaning against his bag.

A small bellflower growing out of blood-soaked, blackened soil. It radiated a subtle glow from its boldly-drawn white petals, as did the large crimson 'RESIST!' written below it.

The rough draft of one of SH's newest posters, without the ‘Made in USA’ boot hovering above.

North huffed fondly as he set his sack of letters and lantern down, deciding to scold her for getting him something tomorrow. She deserved a little leniency after he’d made her and her fellow artists scramble to make those paintings.

He turned to shut the door, then jolted, leaping across the room, almost directly into the other wall.

“No welcome back?” China said, smiling at him from just inside his room. “I would’ve expected at least the threat of having my head blown off.”

He shut the door, and North tensed, the small room suddenly feeling smaller, making his lungs tight. He couldn’t breathe until the other Countryhuman had moved away from the exit, leaving a clear path to it. North sidled slightly forward, enough that he wouldn’t have to pass China to escape.

“How did the trial go?” he asked stiffly.

“You didn’t read the Soviet transcript? Or my own aide’s?”

North had. His teeth grit.

“What happened to Song Kum-jeong?”

China shook his head ruefully. “I don’t know anything more than what happened. Guilt at seeing me, maybe?”

North scrutinized him, looking for some hint of a lie. But there was a look in his leaf-shaped eyes that made him think he truly regretted the woman’s death, even if it had been… convenient.

Perhaps America had tortured her into giving a confession. Just because it hadn’t been visible didn’t mean it didn’t happen. He doubted the American would have let anyone examine her. She could have snapped after what she’d been through, making her hurl herself down the church stairs.

Or maybe it really had been guilt as she realized she couldn’t sell out a comrade and put her country at risk of losing their biggest ally.

North would choose to believe it was that one.

“It’s probably for the best,” China said quietly. “I doubt she would have wanted to live in a world without her son.”

North wanted to protest. He didn’t. Even if he couldn’t comprehend it, with Ra Hye-in on his mind, he knew SH’s words were true.

The woman hadn't given into despair. She hadn’t let the Yankees cut her down in her neighbour’s house so she could die with her husband and child. She had kept going so she could avenge her son.

But she had wanted to die.

“Anyway,” China carried on into the silence. “I’ll tell you all the details tomorrow.”

“Before you leave.”

The Chinese country arched a brow. “Was that a question or a statement?”

North didn't answer. Despite the verb suffix he'd used, it was both.

"Either way, I won't be leaving tomorrow."

The Korean crossed his arms. "What are you doing here?"

"I wanted to give you your birthday present," China said, which didn't answer his question. He rummaged through the bag at his side, pulling out something wrapped in red cloth. "It's past midnight now, but I think it still counts."

North eyed the package warily. "This isn't my birthday."

"Really?" China asked. "But I heard your provinces say it was. I suppose I was misinformed. Oh well. I still have your present here."

"Open it."

China sighed. "Knowing you, you'll feel better if it's in your hands."

"You don't know me," North retorted.

He cautiously took the fabric bundle and immediately realized China was right. The object inside was clearly a knife.

He unwrapped it, revealing a curved blade as long as his forearm. It was a husa knife, like China's, but with a hilt made out of silver and wrought in the shape of a tiger instead of a dragon, its pointed tail curling under it, and the blade emerging from its snarling jaws.

'What is it with people and giving me tigers?'

Then again, he had gone by that title. But while Gangwon knew that, China shouldn't. And when he thought about the history of the Korean tiger…

"Traditionally, the tiger is used to represent our upper-class," he said, testing him.

"Tradition bores me," China said flippantly. With a sly, knowing smile, he added, “And that isn’t what it meant to the Japanese or your revolutionaries, is it?”

Ssi-bal.

“How do you know about that?” North demanded, receiving only another smile in answer.

Whatever. There had been bounty posters in Manchuria, too, and the name had been known by Chinese soldiers. He supposed it wasn’t too unbelievable.

Squinting critically, he turned the blade in his hands. Set in one of the silver eye sockets of the hilt was a small green stone, jade or something like it. But...

“It’s missing an eye,” he pointed out, pleased to discover a flaw.

China leaned over, examining the empty space where another jade orb should be.

“Aiya,” he said regretfully. “You’re right. Well, I suppose the road between Yunnan and Pyongyang is a long one. And you strike me as the type to prefer function over ornament, anyhow.”

North certainly never would have requisitioned a weapon that looked like this, despite how well-made he’d always thought China’s looked.

He held it on a fingertip, testing the balance, then tried to bend the blade. It was steel, with a durable spine and good flexibility, not brittle or weak. Pressing a finger to the pointed tip only needed the slightest pressure to draw blood (China *‘tsk’*ing as he did so), and the edge was equally capable of slicing his thumbpad open.

“It’s well-crafted,” he admitted, rubbing the blood from his digits before holding it out. “But I can’t accept this.”

China tipped his head. “Why not?”

North grit his teeth. ‘As if you have to ask.’

“I can’t afford it.”

“You don’t have to afford it.”

“This is a husa knife,” North pointed out.

“En, the same as mine.” China slid the golden hilt from his long uniform sleeve for a second. “If a little less shiny.”

“Your Achang people make these using traditional forging techniques. They’re all handcrafted and unique.”

China looked a little smug. “I’ll make sure to tell them word of their craft has even spread to Korea.”

North only knew from Koreans that had operated in Yunnan in China’s factions during the Occupation. Oh Myong-nam always developed a wistful look in his eye when he spoke of the Achang’s peoples work. And how much their blades cost.

“These are expensive,” North said bluntly, still holding the blade out. “And I am at war. I can’t waste money on frivolous things.”

“I would argue that a new blade isn’t very frivolous when at war, especially when yours is starting to dull.”

North looked down at the knife on his hip. It was starting to wear, each sharpening session taking longer to coax a cutting edge from it. “I can get a new one from a supply sergeant.”

He’d been meaning to. He just couldn’t make himself do it when he could still get use from it.

China smiled. “And will that be before or after it lets you down on the battlefield and gets you stabbed?”

“I can’t even go to the battlefield right now,” North muttered resentfully.

If the break in the talks lasted any longer, that would change.

The Chinese country still made no move to take the knife back.

“You could just take this one. It wouldn’t drain your supplies. And mine have already been used on it.”

“Which is why I need to pay for it,” North stressed. “Which I can’t do.”

He was starting to become convinced that China was doing this just to lord his financial situation over him.

China hummed. “How very capitalistic of you to want to add a transactional quality where one doesn’t need to be.”

Irritated, North demanded, “How is it ‘capitalistic’ of me to want your people to get paid for what they made? That’s literally what Socialism is about."

One of China’s eyebrows rose slowly. “…They did get paid. I paid my friends in the Achang villages to make me a blade, so I could gift it to you. I hate that I have to ask this, but you are aware of the concept of a birthday present, yes?”

“I know what a birthday present is!” North snapped. He had to put up with enough of them, didn’t he?

“Then I don’t see what the problem is.” China tucked his hands inside his sleeves. “It’s already paid for, it didn’t take from your resources, and it’s not something that will just take up space.”

But it didn’t make sense. North people’s and provinces’ presents did, whether they felt like they should still pay tribute, just enjoyed being irritating, or… because of what Mun Guk had said. And CCCP only brought him things as bribes to convince him to join the Soviet Union. Even if he didn't like any of their motivations, they were at least understandable.

He held back his question again. He didn’t want to know what China’s answer would be.

“If anything, giving you this is a little selfish,” China continued as North glared at him. “I’d prefer knowing that the person who has my back in combat has a knife that could at least pierce paper.”

North's tension eased slightly at the sensible words. He'd always had to nag North Gyeongsang to keep his dagger sharp during their early years, worried about it failing him in combat. His argument had been that he was so uncoordinated, he'd end up tripping and impaling himself if it was sharp.

He had never forgotten to sharpen it again after his dull blade slipped off a piece of a wooden stake he was carving and almost taken his thumb off, though. North had almost beaten him when he found out it hadn't been completely severed like he'd been shouting it was.

Something panged in his chest.

Of course it would make China nervous to know the person covering him on the battlefield wasn't properly equipped. And North did need a new knife after over a year of engagements. And he knew he wouldn't be able to force himself to get one until it did let him down on the field. Though he wouldn't get stabbed.

North reluctantly drew the silver knife back to his side. "Fine. But if you expect something in exchange for this at some point, you aren't getting it."

China gave a harrowing sigh. "Even if I attempted to call in a favour for it in the future, you could just say no. You don't believe in debts after all, right?"

He smiled at him, making North 'tch.'

The Korean slid gave the blade a last once-over, then slid it into the plain bamboo sheath it shared the cloth with.

"Another gift for you." China pulled something from his breast pocket. "Though it's more of a souvenir, and not from me."

North stared at the picture of a familiar Chinese man standing in front of a small wooden house, like those he'd seen in Chinese villages. There was a scar on his forehead, but his face was lit with a broad grin. His arm was around a woman smiling just as wide as him. She might have been solely described as comely, if it weren't for the thick ropes of scars running down her arms and across her neck, exposed by her light blouse. Her colouring couldn't be known for certain in the black-and-white photograph, but North knew she had hair like the night sky and eyes like the clear waters in the mountains that reflect the moon.

"Comrade Yao Song received a medical discharge," China told him. "His center of balance didn't come back after that head injury. But I think he's doing well enough."

North unrolled the small scrap of paper that came with the photo, seeing that information there, along with an announcement that Yao Song and Li Meihua were getting married on their National Day next month, a wish for a happy Foundation Day for the Korean, as well as a near victory, and a few lines of prose. The same poem he'd recited in the trenches.

North couldn't make himself reread the words before he slid the photograph and paper into his own pocket. He remembered them too well already.

'This time I hope to be the hand in a foreign land.'

It should have been Meng Yuyu that took this photo.

"When are you leaving?"

"In a few seconds," China replied. "Unless you want to let me sleep over. I think your large green province is thinking about killing me in my sleep."

"I meant when are you leaving for your country?"

China smiled. "I'm not."

North opened his mouth, then closed it, looking away. "You should."

"Probably," the other Countryhuman agreed. "But I still owe your people. And I'd hate to leave you with no one to annoy you."

Maybe it was because North still felt too light from earlier, but he couldn't work up the energy to shout at him. His hand tightened on the knife sheath.

"We… aren't going to be able to Liberate my country militarily." His chest clenched as he admitted it out loud so frankly. No shouting, no emotions running high. Just that cold, terrible fact.

"Not for awhile, at least," China acknowledged.

"And there isn't going to be a ceasefire anytime soon. They'll never accept our proposals, and they'll never propose anything we can accept."

"It's looking that way."

North met his eyes. "It's going to be a long war."

Smiling, China said, "Then it's a good thing you'll have good company."

The Korean country looked away, crossing his arms over his chest, gripping the knife tighter.

What was he supposed to say to that?

Words rose in his throat, but he choked them back. He wasn't grateful that China was risking his own people's safety for his.

But for some reason, he also wasn't trying to scare him away again.

—

With her teeth brushed and her pajamas on, Hae skipped merrily down the hall to Korea's room, not hesitatin' even a second before pushing open the big heavy door.

She caught a glimpse of Korea standing there all awkward-like before all of a sudden he was on the other side of the room.

"How many times have I told you to knock?!" he hissed, shoulders up like a cat's hackles. She'd always thought he looked real cute when he did that, but knew that probably wasn't what he was goin' for.

"Oops, sorry," Hae chirped, even though she didn't know why he looked so embarrassed. He wasn't changing this time or anythin'. He was just standing there with Comrade Mao Zhilong, and not even too close, either. He'd been keeping the same distance Hae did from North Hamgyong when he came home from workin' on cars all sweaty and gross.

Hae also got all sweaty and gross working in the fields. But soil smelled good- engine grease didn't.

"Don't leave and knock now," Korea grumbled, makin' her stop doing exactly that. "What do you want?"

Hae eyed Mao Zhilong, standin' there all innocent.

"Hello, Little Tiger," he said, smiling at her. "I see you wore that blush you found tonight. You look lovelier than ever."

Hae knew he'd been the one to put it in her hand. But if she told him that, then she'd have to admit she'd accepted something from him. And even if Korea said it wasn't a bribe and she could keep it, she didn't want to do that.

But the compliment still made her happy. Both her cheeks were all burnt up now, but she'd overcome it by putting the pink blush on her bandages. Pyo said it looked like she was bleedin' pink, but she thought it looked real cute.

"Thank ya!" she chirped, then narrowed her eyes. "But you're not sleepin' with Korea tonight. Ah am."

"Why would he be sleeping with me?" Korea demanded aggressively. "And who said you were sleeping with me?"

"Oh, sorry." Hae looked at her Countryhuman, widening her eyes and battin' her lashes. "Korea can ah please sleep with you tonight?"

He glanced at Mao Zhilong. "No. You get out of here."

He was talking to him, not her.

'Hehe.'

"Very well," Mao Zhilong sighed, trudging for the door. "My hopes for a sleepover go unfulfilled for another day. Sleep well, Little Tiger. And happy birthday, comrade."

Korea looked away from his smile, and Hae happily shut the door behind the foreign guy.

"Korea," she said, turnin' to him, hands behind her back as she looked up from under her lashes. "Can ah pleeeeease sleep with you tonight?"

"We are at war," he said sternly. "A soldier shouldn't be asking to share a room with their commanding officer."

Hae pouted. "But we all used to sleep together durin' the Occupation."

"We slept beside each other because we had no choice," Korea corrected. "Now we do."

The province's lower lip pushed out as she moved her shoulders side to side, lookin' up at him hopefully.

He gave a big ol' sigh. "Fine. But let me get changed first."

Hae beamed, darting into the hall to wait, grinning wider when the lock didn't clang behind her.

Victory! She'd had an entire list of reasons he should let her cuddle with him tonight- it was his birthday, she was in a lot'a pain, she'd been workin' real hard on the harvest lately. But she'd had hope she wouldn't need them.

Korea always got a li'l loopy after letting their people love on him. SH said he was 'blissed out,' which was one of those things Hae didn't repeat 'cuz she thought it might get her cousin in trouble and might make Korea try to be less loopy, like she'd been worried talking to China might do.

But nope! He was still calm enough to let her back in when he was in his pajamas (undershirt and pants that looked the exact same).

Hae waved at the end of the hall where Mao Zhilong was lurkin' first. She really didn't dislike him. He'd given her candy and blush after all. She just had to be extra careful not to let herself get bribed.

She bounced into Korea's room, watching him arrange the bulgin' sack of letters with his bag.

"Can ah read the letters from everyone?" Hae asked.

"We'll go through them tomorrow night," Korea said. "With the postal service interrupted, the ones from North Hamgyong and Chagang won't get here for a few more days. We'll finish as many of these as possible and start fixing any complaints before then."

Hae nodded happily as Korea finished squishin' his stuff into the corner. Her smile fell as she saw SH's painting sitting with it.

It wasn't that she didn't like it. She liked it a lot more than the other ones she'd been painting lately. There was less blood.

She just…

Hae shook herself. Korea was lettin' her sleep with him! So she should be happy.

Even if she had to tell him something she knew would make her *un*happy, she should be cheerful until then.

"I don't see why you want to sleep in here," Korea was mutterin' as he looked at his bedroll. "You didn't even want to go into the bunker in the first place. And this is worse."

His room really was tiny. If two'a Hae laid down on the concrete floor, she could almost reach wall-to-wall.

"It doesn't bother me if ah'm with you, Korea," she said sincerely.

“Go to sleep,” he mumbled, laying down on the floor. Right on it.

Hae pouted. “Korea, ah don’t want to take your bed. We can share.”

She didn’t mind stealin’ all the blankets ‘cuz Korea didn’t like them anyhow. And because she did it on accident. Usually. But she’d feel bad if he got back problems because of her.

“No,” he denied her. “Lay down so I can turn off the light. And if I wake up with you off of the bedroll and clinging to me, I will suffocate you.”

Hae beamed. But he wouldn’t forbid her from sleepin’ in his room again.

She vibrated in place, then threw herself at him, unable to help herself. Korea *‘oof’*ed as she buried her face in his chest.

“What are you doing?” he growled, trying to pry her off. “What’s wrong with you?”

Hae wanted to tell him she was just glad he was happy again- Okay, maybe not happy. She knew Korea wouldn’t be happy until the war was over and the Southern One was back (for some reason).

But she was glad he was acting more like himself, instead of all tense and distant. Hwang called him ‘avoidant’ when he got like that. Hae didn’t like that word one bit. The only other time she’d really seen Korea like that was after Seodaemun, beatin’ himself up over things he couldn't change.

But now he was back to talking to folks and cheerin’ everyone up, which meant he was back to normal amounts of tense. He wasn't distant. Korea was just like that.

Hae knew celebratin’ with their people would fix him up. It always did. Which was why she didn’t get why he didn’t on Liberation Day. SH said not to ask, though, so she wouldn’t.

She knew he’d get mad if she told him that was why she was so happy, though, so she just nuzzled him harder, until she got a whiff of his Korea-smell through the burnt meat smell.

She inhaled real deep until Korea actually put effort into gettin' her off him.

"How many times do I have to tell you to stop sniffing me?" he demanded. "Knock on doors before you enter and don't sniff me."

"Okay!" Hae said, even though she knew both things would probably happen again.

Korea knew, too, 'cuz he huffed grumpily before reaching to turn off the lamp. Hae dove for the bedroll before he could, snugglin' in just as the room went dark.

'Click!' and then it was the two of them in the dark. The really small, tiny dark. Even smaller than Korea's storage room. Even smaller than-

'Nope!' Hae shut her eyes, tryin' to let the good dark scare away the bad thoughts.

It wasn't as easy as it used to be.

Soft weepin' in the streets and that small 'pop' from the grenade. The choking smell of gasoline and the wet 'shnk' sound that nail made as she pulled it out of Kim Moon-sik's skull, the feeling reverberating up her arm and into her head, hammering itself even deeper to her.

Hae took a deep breath, like Kang said to do, letting the new air in her lungs wash away all the stale stuff, makin' her feel a li'l less heavy.

"Korea," she said quietly when she was ready. "Ah want ta go back to Sincheon."

He was quiet for a moment while Hae's heart played drums in her chest.

"Why?" he asked eventually, in the way he did when he was lookin' for an answer in particular.

"'Cuz… Ah think ah should." She fidgeted with her fingers. "Ah'm their province, so ah should be there for 'em."

Like Korea. The theatre had felt real dark before he came out, even with all the dancing and singin'. People had been scared and worried.

But that had all gone away once Korea gave his speech, and let them touch him. Everyone that left the theatre had either been cryin' good tears or as loopy as Korea as they wandered home. No one was thinking about all the awful stuff they'd seen in the paintings or the real things that happened to them. And they weren't thinking about 'Merica or the Southern One, either. Just about winnin'. Korea fixed them the same way they fixed him.

Hae knew she couldn't do the exact same thing as him. But he did always send her when he wanted someone cheered up. She could try and do that in Sincheon.

"Hwang said he'd go for me," she said. "But…"

She hadn't seen that painting of Ra Hye-in before tonight, even though she was the one that gave the instructions to the painter, telling him what she'd been told by everyone in Sincheon and Hye-in herself. She hadn't wanted to.

But Ra Hye-in hadn't looked away. She hadn't killed herself or put her head down and hid until the reactionaries were gone. She'd fought, and took out that guy herself. And she hadn't ran when she got the chance. She'd helped Hae, even though the province didn't want her to.

And Korea hadn't hid today, even though she knew he wanted to. Korea didn't hide. He faced things because him and Ra Hye-in were both brave. And Hwang was brave for leaving Hae in Sincheon and helpin' Sok-young and making that broadcast an' going all the way to Chongjin by himself, and offerin' to go back for her.

Hae had to be brave, too.

"Ah can't look away."

“No,” Korea said after a moment. “You can’t.”

Hae squeezed her eyes shut tighter. “Will you come with me? Please?”

“Yes. I need to.”

She relaxed a li’l. “And… can ya tell me ah’m doin’ the right thing, Korea?”

“You know you are,” he replied. “You don’t need me to tell you.”

“It’d make me feel better.”

He sighed. “You’re doing the right thing, South Hwanghae. Our people need to see you.”

“Mhm.” His words gave her the courage to open her eyes just a bit. The pitch dark seemed a li’l warmer.

But it was still dark.

Hae inched sideways, until half of her was off the bedroll and pressed against Korea’s side. He tensed, but she could tell he was still feeling loose because he didn’t push her away or noth- anythin’.

He was warm and solid, and even though he breathed so light she couldn’t hear it, she could feel his heartbeat through where they were pressed together, like she’d been able to the day he put her on his back and carried her up out of the hole.

“Thank you for comin’ to get me, Korea,” she whispered. “Happy birthday.”

He didn’t answer the words she said next, ‘cuz he never did. All he said was, “Still not my birthday,” all grumbly.

Hae was okay with that. Korea didn’t need to answer, because he was letting her sleep by his side and not lettin’ her face Sincheon alone. He was warm and brightened up the dark for her, just like the sun. And even if the sun was a li’l distant sometimes, it always came back.

Hae snuggled happily into her Countryhuman, wrappin' her arms around herself.

Even if going to Sincheon brought all the dark thoughts back and made her dreams bad again, she could face it, as long as she had her Sun to burn them away after.

My babiessss <3

CCCP: And for you, son, a hat, since you never wear one in winter and I wish for you to be warm.

North: I Won't Play Your Sick Games, Old Man.

CCCP does want him to join him, but he doesn't try to bribe him. He just sees it as a foregone conclusion. His gifts are given with good intent, but North is always thinking, 'Another bribe... Will his despicable tactics never cease?' The only reason he accepts food from him is because the provinces unionized so they could finally eat food that wasn't cooked like they were still at active war.

White Masks

1913

"Now let's see how pretty you sing when we're alone."

South felt the prick of something cold through his shirt, and froze in his struggling, his back pressed to the guard's chest as he dragged him out the door. Did that mean what he thought it did?

'No no no nononononono-'

They hadn't even been trying to escape this time, he'd just been singing for North and they'd tried to run when the door had opened, they wouldn't have if the guards had just left them alone and-

His eyes went to his brother, who was on the floor, still clutching his wrist.

'Help!'

Something in North's expression broke, his eyes widening as anger flooded him and his bloody lips peeled back from his teeth, going from furious to enraged.

Suddenly South was on the floor as his brother barrelled into the man, driving his head into the doorframe with a 'crack!'

South went scrambling back as North, instead of shoving the guard out of the shack, dragged him in.

'No! Get him out!' he wanted to shout, but instead he blurted, "North! He has a knife!"

His brother seemed to know because as the two went tumbling to the floor, rolling around, he was reaching a small white hand for it. The man struck out, but North caught his wrist, teeth bared as he tried to stop the knife from cutting his throat.

South wanted to move, to try and help his brother, but he couldn't, frozen in place. He hid his face, unable to watch.

'Please God, help him, don't let him die, please don't let him-'

There was a pained yelp, a clatter, a cry from his brother that was almost exultive, and South quickly looked up to see him diving for the blade as it skittered across the floor. His injured hand gripped it tight, and his eyes lit up before the guard grabbed his ankle, yanking him back.

North's jaw smashed into the floor, making South wince, but he didn't seem to care, letting the man pull him back, twisting to lash out with the little blade.

He must have hit because the man shouted, jerking back, and South caught a glimpse of red on his face before his brother was on him, driving him back, straddling him as he stabbed down with the knife over and over.

The guard's shouts of anger turned to pained cries, like the sounds South and North had made earlier as he beat them. South wanted to cover his head, but he still couldn't move, watching droplets of blood spatter the floor.

He recognized that look in his brother's eyes, vicious and determined, the same one he'd had as he had smashed that Japanese that tried to drag South down from the tree into the stones outside.

Then suddenly there was blood, more than the droplets, spraying out across the room, across North. South pressed himself further into the corner, praying it wouldn't hit him, too, as the man's screaming turned to choking gurgles, convulsing under his brother.

Instead of apologizing or falling back as he realized what he'd done, North gripped him tight with his knees, plunging the knife into his neck again, before with one last burst of strength, the guard jerked sideways, and he went tumbling across the floor.

The man stopped twitching, going as still as South and the guards in the doorway. North was the only one still moving, forcing himself onto his knees, still gripping tightly to the knife.

His eyes went straight to South. Blood dripped down from his chin.

South feared he might throw himself at the other two men, but instead he started to spit and retch. The saliva that came from his lips was just as red as the blood.

He must want water. But South couldn't even make himself look at the bucket in the corner, let alone move to it. His eyes were locked on his brother, and the man he had killed.

"Stop fucking looking at me!" North suddenly screamed, not at him. There was a wild, unsteady light in his eyes as he glared up at the remaining guards.

One stepped forward, lifting his baton, and South's heart sank.

But the other one stopped his friend, curling his lip at South and his brother. "Bad day for you, chosenjin- Japan-sama's already in the country."

Now South's heart froze like the rest of him as a whimper left his lips.

'No please, not again, please no-'

Usually they got at least a few days between the beating from the guards and the beating from Japan, at least a little chance to recover.

North launched himself at them, slamming into the closed door instead. But it didn't stop him. He banged and hammered on it with his fists, probably hurting his wrist even more, but it didn't even show on his face. His eyes were still alight with that vicious look and South thought he might claw the doors to splinters if he had to.

And then what? He spilled outside and the guards beat him again. And then he'd be even more beat up by the time Japan was down with them.

"North," South croaked, and his brother immediately stopped, turning to him, chest heaving.

"Are you okay?" North demanded, striding towards him.

South liked the way he always asked, even though he knew the answer. But this time as he asked the words, all he could see was the red staining his teeth, lining his gums.

His brother reached for him, like always. He was still holding the knife. Blood dripped from his hands. It was caked under his nails and ground into the lines on his palms.

South couldn't help it. He flinched.

North stopped, confusion flickering in his eyes. He looked down at his hands, like he hadn't even realized he was covered in someone's life. He clenched his fists like he was imagining killing another Jap, before tucking the knife away and wiping his hands on his pants.

The blood only smeared around, leaving bloody handprints on the thin fabric.

"Sorry," his brother said, and something in his voice made South finally unfreeze, shame flooding him.

"No, I'm sorry." He steeled himself, making himself take his brother's bloodstained hands, even though it left his own wet and warm. "It's not like I have to worry about you getting my shirt dirty."

He smiled, hoping the joke was good enough to convince his brother that was the real reason. He tried to pretend it was.

"At least once Japan's done punishing us, you might get some new clothes again," he added. "Like- Like last time."

His words fell flat as he remembered his brother being tossed back into the shack after having been forced to listen to him snarl and cry out as he was beat by four men outside. The little spot of blood on his sleeve that wasn't his.

Their clothes could be soaked in their own blood, torn to shreds and grimy with dirt. But the second his brother had gotten Japanese blood on him, he was allowed new ones.

North got up, and South eyed him, fearful that he'd go for the door again. But instead he went to the water bucket, bringing it back.

"You should drink," he said, his voice raspier than usual as he broke the ice.

South thought of the red lining his teeth. "Don't you-"

"I'm fine. They might do something to make sure we can't get any more snow."

That was true. And North didn't get thirsty the same way South did.

And he didn't seem to mind the taste of blood.

"Thanks." South drank the last sip of meltwater, feeling more ashamed than before. "And thanks for... stopping him."

He kept his eyes on the floorboards, trying not to look at the corpse in their prison.

His brother nodded, sitting next to him, exhaling steadily. South bet he'd gotten his ribs broken again.

He didn't want to get any more blood on him, but he wanted to be close to his other half. So he leaned into him, feeling the drying blood on his brother's side soak into his shirt. He tried not to shudder as North rubbed a bloody hand over his back, the liquid clinging unpleasantly to the fabric, heavy and chill in the freezing air.

He did his best not to look at the body, at the little cut that scored down his cheek from North's first blow, and the blood congealing on their floor, seeping down into the cracks. Or at the man's eyes, glazed over.

But he was looking at South, almost accusingly, like he was blaming him for not stopping his brother.

'What was I supposed to do?' he cried out in his head. Out of all the times they'd wrestled, South had never even won once.

'Something,' the man seemed to say. 'Something to save me.'

'You deserved it. You hurt us. You were going to hurt me more.'

'Something to stop your brother from becoming a murderer.'

South squeezed his eyes shut, pressing closer to his brother.

'He already was.'

The last two times had been different. The first time had been so quick. South had felt that hand on his ankle, then suddenly it was gone, and he'd looked down to catch just a glimpse as North smashed the man's head into the cobbles that final time. Then he'd had to keep climbing, like his brother told him to.

And he hadn't even seen the second one. They'd been cut off from the gates by five whole men, and when it was clear they couldn't get out any other way, North had driven him back towards the shack to make a stand in the doorway.

South could still remember the heavyset man trying to force his way in to him, how his dark eyes had suddenly widened as North got back up to drag him back, even though he was far tinier. There had been that commotion around the corner of the door that South couldn't see, then that awful 'crack.'

But this time, there was no way to get around it, no way to pretend maybe it was only a concussion or something else, that Japan was just lying or being dramatic when he said they were being beaten for killing 'Japan's followers.'

North had killed someone. Three people. South knew they deserved it, especially this guy, but still... Wasn't killing bad, no matter what?

His brother's eyes were focused on the corpse, his face blank. What was he thinking?

'Probably that it felt good.'

Oh, they were so going to be haunted now.

"North," South whispered. "When Japan comes, are you going to try and use that knife on him?"

"Yes," he said, not looking away from the man he'd killed.

"Can you... please not?"

"What?" Now his other half tore his gaze from the corpse.

"If you attack Japan, it's just going to make him more... angry." That wasn't really the word for it. The Countryhuman didn't really get angry. He just got more violent. "And he's already going to be mad enough."

"I can't just sit back and let him beat us," North growled. There was still red on his teeth.

"You're already injured, and we haven't had enough food and water in awhile." Their last meager portion of grain sat heavy in South's stomach. "It won't work."

"The longer we stay in here, the weaker we'll get," North retorted. "Attacking Japan has never worked before because he's bigger than us, and stronger. But this-"

His hand went to the knife in his belt, touching it almost reverently.

"Is an equalizer." His eyes gleamed with excitement. "It gives us a chance."

A chance for what? If North killed Japan... South couldn't say it would be a bad thing, but the punishment after would be. If the beating for killing a random guy was painful, then the one for killing the Countryhuman himself that the Japanese outside spoke with so much reverence about, would be excruciating.

They might even be executed.

But South knew his brother had set his mind on it, so he only lowered his eyes. "Alright. But please try not to get knocked out again. It really scared me that last time."

His brother's hand clenched on the blade, his gaze returning to the dead man. "If it works, then neither of us will ever be knocked out again. And I'll never let you be scared ever again."

A life without fear. That sounded nice. South couldn't even imagine it.

"Hey." He sat up. His brother's hand grasped for him again before returning to his lap. "Smile."

"What is there to smile about?" North asked irritably.

"We're together," South said, lips turning up despite himself. "And you've got blood on your teeth. I want to get it off."

It took a little bit of cajoling (and sticking his fingers in his brother's mouth), but eventually South got him to show off his teeth. He sat up on his knees so he could reach them with the hem of his shirt, rubbing at one of North's fangs with it.

"Your shirt tastes awful," his brother grumbled around it.

"That's the taste of a year's worth of sweat, brother," South said cheerily, trying not to think about what was coming soon.

It could have been more years' worth. But North had given him the new clothes he'd gotten last time. His own shirt probably tasted like... Well, three years of blood, sweat, tears, and other fluids was worse than one.

North made a face as he swiped the fabric over his gumline, trying to get every last trace of Japanese blood off. "And now you'll have saliva on it."

Honestly, South probably already did. He'd thrown up a few times from being kicked so hard in the stomach, and he was kind of a... moist crier.

"Well, hopefully Japan will get us both new shirts now, too." He gestured to his matching bloodstained clothes with his free hand before using it to cup his brother's chin. "Now stop talking, you're making this hard."

North nipped at his finger with his non-pointy teeth, making South giggle, despite knowing that in a few more hours, maybe even minutes, they'd be cleaning more blood from each other.

He tried not to think about the looming threat of Japan or the body in the corner or the blood on his brother's hands. None of it mattered. When it was over, they'd still have each other. South knew his brother had killed those people to protect him.

And he knew that the blood on North's teeth would never be his.

—

1951

North was almost thankful to hear that Kaesong had been strafed by an enemy plane again. It allowed him to launch immediately into work, breaking out of the awkward state he'd been in since waking up and having to face China after the... embarrassment of last night.

He took the initiative immediately, demanding an investigation that very day while the sun was still out, sending the letter personally so that the matter would be taken more seriously. The United Nations sent investigators, and they were able to take a good look at the machine gun slugs peppering the dust and the sides and roofs of houses. And still-

North slammed out of the Signals Headquarters, fuming.

"No such luck?" China asked as he stormed past him, away from the camouflaged building.

"What do you think?" the Korean snapped back.

"I think they probably said the results were inconclusive, and they have no way of proving whether it was one of our planes or theirs." China kept pace with him as they returned to the city proper. "Though I suspect they're leaning towards 'ours.'"

"It was a damn B-26," North growled. "My civilians heard it strafe their houses."

Any lightness he had been feeling last night was long gone, replaced by that prickling fury again, as he'd known would happen. Already he couldn't remember what relief felt like.

"Ah, but you forget," China said lightly. "Communists are tricksy and can't be trusted."

"That description fits one of us," North muttered, side-eyeing him.

"Aiya, I'm not twenty-four hours back and you're already being cruel to me," the other country sighed. "Remind me why I came back at all?"

"I don't know," the Korean grumbled. He rubbed a hand down his face, then shook his head. "Tell me about the trial."

"We could discuss it over rations later," China suggested.

North wasn't eating his today. He needed them for something else.

"I'm leaving for Tosan soon," he said instead.

Raising a brow, China said, "That's near the front. Not planning on running off on your own to fight again, are you?"

North glared at him. "I have an issue to resolve."

"What kind of issue?"

One of the ones from his letters. North had woken up earlier than usual to scour them for complaints, and was pleased to find that the people that hadn't handed them to him directly were more willing to give him something other than praise and well-wishes. He had already sent his Provincehumans off to their provinces to resolve those they could.

He was less pleased by what some of the complaints were about. Some soldiers in the KPA responsible for recruitment had been beating civilians to coerce them into joining. With how many new recruits there were, and how desperately the front and coastal divisions needed them, they weren't getting proper ideological training, leading them to commit anti-people acts, thinking they were doing the right thing, or just revelling in the power a uniform gave them. It was more common in small localities like Tosan, with less Party and Civil Affairs oversight.

It couldn't be allowed to stand. The reactionaries were the ones that needed to wield violence to conscript soldiers. How many stories of that had they encountered on the way south? And how many of their men had been stolen away when they retreated from the north?

The People's Army had to be for the people. The fish couldn't live without its stream. While they needed more manpower, it would be easy to get, so long as the recruiters impressed upon their targets the wicked goals of the enemy, the destruction they'd already visited upon them, and that the KPA was fighting for them. None of which beating them in the street contributed to.

Despite how irritated he was, North was gladdened that someone had written to him, knowing he would help. It meant that they knew the criminals were aberrant elements, and not operating with permission. He was looking forward to finally having a problem he could solve.

And to showing those idiots that there was always a more decorated uniform.

He had no desire to inform China of his internal affairs. Or have him tail him to the front to visit his soldiers after.

"It's none of your business," he clipped.

The other Countryhuman pushed out his lower lip in a way that North felt was purposefully mirroring Hae. "Does that mean you're leaving me behind so soon?"

"Yes. So hurry up and tell me about the trial."

China sighed, but followed him to the bank of the Taedong below the brown slope of Moran Hill, where no passerby would overhear. North had to deal with him getting comfortable for a whole minute, folding his legs under him like an old man about to tell a story.

"Do you have any wine?" he asked, smacking his lips.

North sent him a death glare.

"Fine," China sighed. "Youth these days."

As he launched into his account of the United Nations trial, North listened carefully, refusing to sit down.

The vote had been supposed to be a closed session, with the contents shared only between the delegates and their leaders. But both Wu Xinquan and Yakov Malik had sent their transcripts of the meeting to North and his Premier, since Korea was involved. He listened now for any differences in their accounts and that of the Countryhuman before him, especially when it came to the parts involving Song Kum-jeong.

But through China's far more grandiose way of speaking, and his peppering in of self-flattery, North found there were none. It all matched. No one had seen anyone approach her, no one had seen her move. Before her outburst she had been quiet and meek. The only detail China added was that she looked at him with shame.

"How did you hear about her death, by the way?" China asked when he was done. "I had to send Comrade Wu to find out what befell her, and he didn't until after he wrote you."

"Yakov Malik told me in his letter," North grunted. "He did the same thing."

Thankfully. Otherwise, the United Nations might have buried her entirely.

"I see. And did the Soviets say anything else to you about it?"

"No." CCCP had only said in his note that he was 'remorseful' America's actions had led to the death of another of North's people.

"Hm," China hummed thoughtfully. "I can't think of anyone else that would want to help me out. Perhaps Yugoslavia. But I don't see how he would've. I didn't take my eyes off her for more than a few seconds."

No matter how North looked at it, it didn't seem like China had anything to do with her death. If he was telling the truth.

Would he kill one of North's people to save his own country? North... would, if their positions were reversed. Nothing was more important than his people and country.

Still, he knew he would despise the other Countryhuman if he did the same. And he knew he would.

"Regardless, I'm at least partially to blame." China's voice drew North's attention back, softer. "She wouldn't have been there if I hadn't revealed myself to her."

He looked North in the eyes, unsmiling. "I'm sorry, Chaoxian. I would have brought her home for you if I could've."

North looked away, out at the low grey-green river water as it flowed slowly by at their feet, running his thumb over the silver tiger hilt at his waist.

"You aren't to blame," he muttered after a moment. "America is. I should be able to have whoever I want in my own damn country."

Not that he did want China here.

"That trial shouldn't have taken place at all."

And Song Kum-jeong should have been safe in Seoul with her son, the flag of the DPRK flying over the City Hall. The war should have been over.

North grit his teeth, refusing to let the thought rotate obsessively in his mind again.

The war wasn't over because of America. It had started because of America.

And Song Kum-jeong was dead because of America.

"En," China said quietly, smiling again as he gazed across the river.

North didn't like the atmosphere that had settled over them. His voice sounded too loud as he asked, "And they didn't try to hold you there for interrogation after it was done?"

China shook his head, accepting his subject change. "My aides gave short statements while I had a little conversation with America."

North's eye widened, but China continued as if he didn't notice.

"But they didn't seem so eager to conduct any follow-up calls or question me. I think the United Nations was more than willing to pass the whole thing off as solely a suicide."

"Did you say you had a private conversation with America?" North cut in.

"I didn't tell you?" China thought for a moment. "Ah. I suppose I didn't."

"What did he say? What happened?"

"Not much," the Chinese Countryhuman said flippantly, as if he hadn't had a personal conversation with the country that was bombing North's and killing their people by the hundreds of thousands. "We mostly just traded barbs."

"Did he say anything important?" North demanded.

"Mmmm." China tilted his head. "I got the feeling he doesn't often say anything important. You've met him before, haven't you?"

Only when he had Divided Korea six years and one day ago. North had (grudgingly) invited America and Douglas MacArthur to his first Foundation Day as a gesture of goodwill, but both of them had turned it down without reply. Even when his representatives had gone, he'd never been invited to any of the United Nations discussions during the trusteeship. He had been told that inviting one Korea over the other would show bias in their decision-making. And America had said that South didn't want to attend.

North knew he was lying. His brother wouldn't have passed up the chance to see him. Even after their... less than pleasant parting and their silence at Division.

'Life is a game. And I just won another round.'

North's teeth ground together, feeling that same hot rage as he'd felt back then boiling in his veins. The way America had smirked at him, knowing there was nothing he could do to stop what was about to happen, even though North knew he could have taken him, even in the body of a child. He'd taken on Japan, after all. The only thing stopping him from keeping his brother were politics.

'Stick with me, kid, and you're gonna do great things.'

No. America hadn't said much of anything important.

"I did consider killing him," China said conversationally. "But I decided the cost might not be worth the satisfaction. I'm sure you know what I mean."

North slid a glance at him. The other country was still sitting cross-legged, and his smile was neutral.

Did he...?

No. No one should know about Japan but his Premier, his provinces, and South. Even if America had had it Commanded out of the southern provinces or heard it from Japan himself, he wouldn't have told China.

"Killing him wouldn't solve anything," North said decisively. "It would only get an atom bomb dropped on my country."

"And likely mine and our Soviet comrade's," China agreed. "So I kept it to civil conversation, more or less. I doubt you'd find it interesting. He didn't even slander your country very much- most of his insults were slung at me. Though he did call you my 'little commie pal,' which I enjoyed."

He smiled up at him. North grimaced, making the Chinese country nod. "Just more nonsense, really."

'Nonsense.' Like the letter North had refused to read in Gyeongmudae.

"Is that everything then?"

China dipped his head. "Everything important. I'm sure you made the same observations I did- Yugoslavia's dislike of CCCP hasn't made him completely unprincipled, it might be worth it to establish deeper ties with India, the rest of the United Nations is less-than-enthusiastic about the chance of a war with me, and there's a bit of a schism between Britain and America."

"I wouldn't count on that for anything," North dismissed. "Any friction between them is probably personal. They're both allied empires- they'll never truly split when it comes to politics. If America decides to go to war with you, the United Kingdom will join."

"Mm, family matters, most likely," China agreed. "Tricky, aren't they?"

North glowered.

"That's why I don't have any," the other country said. "But it could be fun to poke our antagonist over them. And don't worry about a war against me- the world has decided China is innocent."

He fluttered his long lashes in a way that was probably supposed to match that.

"And if America fabricates more proof?" North demanded. "What then?"

"Then I disprove that, too. At the cost of going to London again." China made a face. "But regardless, my country will be fine."

North couldn't whole-heartedly believe that. He knew America wouldn't give up on war with China.

'Life is a game. And I just won another round.'

Countries like that, people like that, didn't take losing well. And if Song Kum-jeong hadn't given into her conscience...

"Just be careful."

China smiled. "Is that an order?"

"Yes," North replied gruffly.

"Then I suppose I have to be." China stretched as he stood, unfolding his long legs.

"I'm leaving now." North spun on a heel, halting as China called after him.

"One more thing," he said, seriously enough that the Korean looked back. He wasn't smiling, making him face him fully. "If America told you a joke, would you find it funny? This is a serious question."

Doubting that, North replied, "No."

"Even if you had a sense of humour?"

The Korean glared. "No."

He did have a sense of humour, but even if it matched America's exactly, he would never find it in words coming from the country that was destroying his and massacring his people.

China nodded decisively. "Neither would I. Not with sincerity, anyhow."

"Is there a point to this?"

"My impression of America is that he's the type of person to change his attitude on a whim," China answered. "I think he's the sort to sabotage his own long-term plans if he sees something he wants more in the moment. That could work out well for us, or very, very poorly."

If he set his sights on something or someone else, he might move on from China- and so from Korea- or at least stop screwing around when it came to the talks. Or...

North felt a chill run down his spine.

China nodded gravely. "We're his goal right now. I would say the 'restraint' he's shown so far is because he doesn't want to irradiate his future resource hubs. But the prize he truly wants is CCCP. If he decides this plan has hit too many snags-"

"He might decide to abandon it," North said grimly.

"And I doubt he would want to go out on a loss. I got the feeling he doesn't take those gracefully." The Chinese country tilted his head. "Of course, few people do. But there's a difference between disdaining losing because of what it means for your goals and the people depending on them, and simply being upset that someone ruined your fun. I suspect America is the latter."

China lowered his voice for his next words, his eyes narrowed.

"And countries like that are dangerous."

—

South paced back and forth in the parlour, waiting for the sound of the front door flying open.

Every step make his skin chafe painfully against the soft white cotton of his jeogori and loose-fitting pants, even though they were the clothes that hurt the least to wear.

But he couldn't stop. When he sat still, all he could feel was anxious energy building up under his skin, building and building, making him feel like-

'BANG.'

South jumped, even though he'd been waiting for the sound, and he knew America wasn't mad. Not yet.

'I'm the one who should be mad.'*

The other country's footsteps sauntered down the hall, heavy on the wooden floorboards. He hadn't taken off his shoes again.

"Hey, kid," he said as he rounded the corner into the parlour. "You wanted to talk to me?"

South spun to him, mouth opening and closing uselessly.

"Nice fish impression," America noted. "Carp?"

"Did your soldiers bomb Kaesong?"

America's smile fell. He stared at him over the back of the couch. South's heartbeat beat in his temples.

"No," he said eventually. "The Reds did, trying to pin it on my guys."

South's jaw clenched hard before he added, "My Doughboys did shoot up the place by accident a coupla days ago, though."

Sick relief, despair, and something else swept through South at the same time, making his stomach churn.

"Why?" he demanded.

America shrugged. "Don't know, kid. Might've been a mistake."

"No, why didn't you tell me?" South had given him plenty of time. It'd happened on the 10th, and came out the next day, which was when he'd been told, too. He'd given America all of the 11th and most of the 12th, but he hadn't came until he asked him to.

"I was waiting to see if we had all the facts, Southie. I don't want to go around spreading misinformation- I'm not a commie."

"But your press told people North's army and the Chinese were lying the day after it happened," South protested.

America paused, looking at him calculatingly. "And who told you all this, by the by?"

"Someone from the UN." South swallowed. "I met him in the city yesterday and he told me I should know."

America bobbed his striped head. "Okay, okay. Just making sure you weren't talkin' to anyone you weren't supposed to."

He laughed, like it was a joke.

South didn't laugh. "I should've heard it from you."

America's smile fell. "Maybe curb the tone a bit, kid. Why don't we sit down and have a drink?"

"No." South stepped back as he came around the couch. "I don't want a drink. I want the truth. You promised you'd always be honest with me."

"I am being honest with you, South," America replied, not stopping his advance. "If I wanted to lie, why wouldn't I have done it when you just asked?"

"Because you knew I already know." South's chests felt right as he backpedalled around the coffee table, putting it between them. "If you're being honest, tell me why your pilot shot up Kaesong."

"I said I don't know, kid." America sounded irritated now. "How am I supposed to be honest if you won't believe the truth when you hear it?"

"Because it's not the truth!"

South knew he should shut his stupid mouth, but he couldn't. They'd been so close. The talks were going well, North's people were making confessions, his brother had tugged back on their connection. It was going to be over, it was going to be over and now-

"Why didn't you tell me?" South's breath came fast as he kept moving away, circling around the couch now. "Shooting up the Reds' Jeep, the attack on Kaesong, the offensive-"

"I did tell you South," his ally said firmly. "I told you an offensive started the day it did."

"You told me Rhee's soldiers were the only ones doing it," South accused.

"Yeah, because I have to work under something called 'con-fi-dent-i-a-li-ty,' kid," America said, sounding out the word like he was slow. "I broke it for you before when I told you the chinks joined the war, but I'd rather not go around blabbing when I don't have to."

"You still should have told me!"

"You don't care, South!" America suddenly snapped. "Every single time I try to talk military with you, I can see your squinty little eyes glaze over. Don't act like you're suddenly interested now, and don't act like I'm trying to pull the wool over your eyes when you would know my guys were in on the offensive if you paid any damn attention to your army. You can't call 'em 'Rhee's soldiers,' then act surprised when you don't have a single Goddamn clue what they get up to."

South flinched as his ally quickened his pace, storming after him. He stumbled as he ran around the table, knocking his shin painfully.

"In fact, it might not've even been the Reds that launched an attack on Kaesong," he growled. "It might've been your fucking loose cannons trying to sabotage the peace talks that I've been working my ass off for."

"How am I supposed to believe that?" South cried. "How am I supposed to believe any of the other stuff when I know you lied this time?"

America chased him. "I didn't lie, South! It was a miscommunication. Wires got crossed with the investigators and my Air Forces, and the press got trigger-happy. It was a mistake. Are you the only one allowed to make mistakes?"

"No," South denied, shaking as he ended up behind the couch again. He knew the other man wouldn't do anything to him, but he wished he'd stop moving, just let the furniture stay between them so he could breathe and think.

"Really?" America challenged. "Because you've made a shit-ton of them. Letting the provinces fall into enemy hands when you ran away to Busan, forgetting to Command them to catch the doll when she escaped, sneaking out to meet North. And hey, I know I promised not to bring it up, but if you're going to act like this-" He flung a hand at him. "-when I make a mistake, then I kind of have to. I'm sure you know what I'm thinking about, Southie."

"And how am I supposed to believe that?!" South cried, almost tripping on the carpet. "If you let me think it was Rhee's army that started the offensive and North's that shot up Kaesong, how am I supposed to believe Kim Chong-won wasn't in Busan?! How am I supposed to believe you really didn't-!"

"South."

South cut his words off at America's warning tone, scrambling back around the couch. He bumped it as he did, excruciating pain shooting through his burned side as he gripped onto the furniture to steady himself.

"How am I supposed to believe you?!" he cried, voice breaking. "I want to. I really really want to, but it's all too- too convenient!"

"'Convenient?'" America demanded furiously from across the table. "Do you want to tell me how it's 'convenient' that the truce talks that I set up keep getting interrupted, South?"

South opened his mouth, then sank his teeth into the side of his cheek, the gross taste of copper filling his mouth.

It was convenient that only three days after China had been found innocent, America had launched a new offensive. It was convenient that a band of soldiers had attacked Kaesong on the same day, even if they were Sou- Rhee's. North might have been lying about Taejon, and he might have thought he wasn't. But he was right that America controlled the army. It was convenient someone might have bombed the neutral zone and it was convenient that the Americans definitely had.

"Come on, South," the foreign country challenged. "Tell me why you think it's convenient."

South didn't answer. America's voice lowered, and so did his head, looking at the Korean over the tops of those bottomless aviators.

"Is it because you think I'm planning to leave Korea to go to war with Red China?"

South froze, his insides going cold.

America took a step forward, and he turned and ran, throwing himself at the open door. He hadn't even made it to the hall when a heavy force slammed into him, arms wrapping around his waist.

South yelped, struggling wildly as all the times Japan or their guards had picked him up and thrown him around flooded his mind, slamming him to the ground, punching him, bending his arms back and-

"South, hey calm down." America's voice was suddenly calm and soothing in his 'ear.' "I'm not gonna hurt ya, kid. Just making sure you don't run into the streets like a loon."

The Korean's breath came shallow and hot, trapped between the wall and the other country's broad chest. His burn throbbed where America's forearm was pressed against it.

"I'm gonna let you go now, okay?" His voice rumbled through South's back. "No running kid, you're all good."

His weight moved away, and South slid bonelessly to his knees, gasping in unsteady breaths as his forehead *'thwack'*ed against the plaster, remaining there.

All his limbs felt like meat jelly, his insides hot with fear that he knew he shouldn't be feeling.

"Y'know," America said, sitting next to him with a grunt and leaning back against the wall. "It kind of hurts a guy's feelings when you act like he's going to piledriver you over nothing."

"I'm- I'm-" South couldn't get the words out, his lungs still straining for air no matter how much he pulled in. "I c-can't breathe. I can't-"

America sighed, then his hand thumped South forcefully on the back several times, until the Korean started to cough. The convulsions seemed to restart his lungs, and as he leaned his fevered brow against the cool wall this time, they worked like they were supposed to, clearing away the little black particles that had been floating in his vision.

"You're a bit dramatic sometimes, you know that, right Southie?" America said. "You don't need to take off like a coon at high noon just because I ask you a simple question."

It wasn't a simple question. South knew the implications of what America had been asking. If he said 'yes,' it was the same thing as admitting he thought he might betray him.

'We are the lesser prize in his game.'

'Korea is NOTHING.'

South stayed silent, squeezing his eyes shut.

"I'm not snapping my cap," America continued. "In fact, knowing you're afraid of that clears a few things up. Let me guess- the purple broad told you that?"

Alarm shooting through him, South sat up. "How'd you know that?"

"She actually told me awhile ago," the other man said flippantly, slinging an arm over his bent knee. "All smug, y'know? 'He'll never trust you now, your evil ambitions will be crushed, blah blah blah.'"

"W-When was that?" South asked cautiously, thinking of bandages poking out of a violet sleeve.

"Awhile ago," America dismissed. "I didn't see a point in bringing it up to you. Figured you had too much sense to listen to her, 'specially after I warned you to be on guard for any of them trying to put a wedge between us." He sighed. "There's nothing I hate more when a dame who thinks she's always right actually is."

"I..." 'Do trust you,' South wanted to say. The words wouldn't come.

"South." America turned to him. "I told you I don't want to go to war with Red China. Hell, I didn't even want to go to war against North. Do you think I like being here? The electricity flickers, you don't have any good channels, it smells like dust and poverty, and I sort of have things to do back home. You know just last week, I signed a mutual defense pact with Australia and New Zealand? I woulda liked to be in 'Cisco to get a few drinks with 'em, but I had to go there after for the Treaty with the Jap. And I clearly can't leave you alone for that long, or you'll let every Tom Dick and Harry convince I'm the Devil or some shit. Did you even know that I had a mega flood back in July? Kansas is growin' gills, and here I was in Korea, drinking the night away with you."

South flushed in shame. "I'm... sorry. I didn't-"

"No, you didn't," America agreed, clutching his shoulder with a firm grip as he pulled him closer. "South, I'm giving my all for this war. For you. Because you needed my help. Why would I send my guys to go fight chinks in China when I've got my hands full here, if I didn't have to? You already know I won't leave you. Unless you were the one lying when you told me that."

"No," South muttered, averting his eyes to a whorl in the floorboards. "I know you won't leave me."

America nodded firmly. "You know I want peace. You know I won't leave you. You know I wasn't lying about Kim Chong-won because literally everyone in Busan confirmed I was telling the truth. So who are you going to believe- the bitch who's tried to take your head off more than once, snuck around behind your back, and you know lied to you about that little hick being the only Hwanghae, or me? The guy who's been squatting in your country for over a year just to make sure you don't get kidnapped by commies or cry yourself to sleep at night?"

South thought of the look in South Chungcheong's eyes as she barged into the parlour in Gyeongmudae. He'd been bleary from drink at first, but her words had sobered him up.

She'd been so serious, so intense, as she told him what America was supposedly planning and demanded that he Command her to find out the truth.

But she'd still been cold and haughty. Just like when she told him Hwanghae had been merged. And just like when she'd said those words about S- Rhee's army selling Korean women, and America's buying them.

'And regardless of whether or not I am telling the truth, do you not think some of the masses would think I was?'

She'd admitted she would lie to people just to turn them on America and Rhee. She had lied to him. He knew she couldn't be trusted. It was why he'd told himself to let it go.

But after all this...

"I just..." South hung his head in his head, squeezing his temples under his palms, feeling his unsteady pulse beat against them. "We were so close."

"I know," America soothed, his grip turning soft as he rubbed his shoulder. "Which is why North and Red China sabotaged the talks. They've been making a fuss over stupid shit from the start. Now that they know I'm on to them, they switched to the big guns, something to make me and my guys look bad instead of them."

He shifted onto his knees, pulling South's hands away from his face.

"But they're the ones that broke away," America said, gazing down at him. "Look, kid, I don't know what that UN dolt told you, but my Doughboys weren't responsible for the bombing. And sure, they did shoot up the Reds' Jeep. After they were too dumb to mark it properly. And an offensive was launched. But we're at war- the armistice isn't signed yet. I don't see the commie setting down their arms. If we don't keep *strik*ing-" America punctuated the word with a squeeze. "They'll get overconfident and beat us to the punch. You don't want to lose more turf, do you?"

"No," South muttered, running a fingertip over the swirl in the smooth wood.

America nodded. "Exactly. And yeah, one of my guys shot up Kaesong. By accident. And how can you blame me or my guys for thinking it was the Reds? It sounds exactly like something they'd do. Heck, they did do it with that bombing. We told 'em it was a mistake and said we were real sorry. We shouldn't have to kowtow, too. An American doesn't get down on his knees for anyone but the good Lord.

"Think about it, South- if they really wanted peace, why wouldn't they just grin and bear it?" He arched an eyebrow. "What would you do if the commies bombed Kaesong by 'accident' and admitted to it?"

South hesitated, then murmured, "Sign anyway."

It was just an accident, and it didn't sound like anyone had got hurt. And even if it wasn't an accident, the sooner the war was over, the sooner nothing would be getting shot at.

"Righto." America flashed a smile, then went serious again. "But you know we can't just do that, South. Because we know it wouldn't be an accident for them."

His lips twisted as he seemed to think about something. South traced his finger along the whorl, over and over again.

"Come with me," America said after a moment, hauling him up by the arm. "I got something to show ya."

South followed, his eyes on the ground as they walked past his guards. He heard one of them snicker as they saw his red-rimmed eyes.

The sun outside was too hot and bright. It beat down on him, bringing out the cooking smell again.

South wanted nothing more than for it to set so he could lie on the cool dust and grass again. But he hadn't been able to bring himself to lay in his yard since last month. He didn't want to overhear anything else he didn't want to. He didn't want to investigate- he just wanted to be told the truth.

As they walked down the road, he could hear the sound of the market drifting from a few streets over. The sound of people chattering and cart wheels on hard-packed dirt.

The sounds were cut off as America's door closed behind them. South took off his shoes, following him into his office.

He glanced around, looking for... He didn't know.

There was a shiny new black phone on the desk, and a scattering of papers and writing utensils- pens, pencils and their piles of shavings, and a long, white quill.

America swept them all aside, into a drawer that he slammed shut before lifting something from under the desk.

South's blood went cold as he lowered his gaze from the large grey box.

"Don't worry, kid, I'm not gonna whip out any more orders you forget giving," America assured as he pulled a reel out of a case, setting it up. "And double don't worry- that little conversation is nice and safe under lock and key."

In America's hands.

"Now," he said, his finger resting on the 'on' switch on the other side of the machine. "I've got a radio broadcast for you."

Raising his head, South asked, "A broadcast?"

He wasn't allowed to have a radio in his house. He was only allowed near one back when he was calling for the provinces. Otherwise North and his men might try telling him lies over the airwaves.

South felt a prickle of shame. He'd protested that a little, wanting to listen to music. But maybe America was right- he really was swayed too easily.

"Yep. Got this baby a few days ago." America patted the wire recorder and its reel. "It's from North's birthday bash."

South's eyes widened, excitement rushing through him, even as dread did, too. If America wanted him to hear it...

"I was sort of going back and forth on showing this to you," America confessed. "I know you were a little nervous about the ceasefire, and I didn't want to crush any hope you might have. But you're right- if you should know something, then I should tell you.

"Now, a small warning," the other country said, pinching his fingers together. "But I'm pretty sure this is a recording of a broadcast of a recording made in a cave or something. So it's just a tiiiny bit fuzzy. So keep any questions or comments for the end. Ready? Okay onetwothreego."

South sucked in a breath as the switch was flipped, and the wire started to be pulled from spool to spool.

"Every single person here knows what it was like under Japanese Occupation."

Despite himself, South's heart leapt as he heard his brother's voice come from the recorder. Grainy, crackling, but him, settling into his 'ears' the way only North's could, even as he grimly announced the ways that Japan had used to rule them.

"They tried to take everything from us. They made us bleed for over three decades."

South felt a flash of bitterness. What did North know? He'd been free for two of those decades. He'd only had to deal with Japan for nine years. South had done it for twenty-seven.

Japan hadn't taken everything from them. He'd never taken his brother.

'North did that.'

"But we still fought," North carried on, oblivious to his brother's feelings. "Supreme Commander Kim Il-sung and I, and thousands of our brave men and women took up arms against the Japanese and their collaborators."

Talking about his 'General' again, the man that had stolen him away from South, along with CCCP.

"And every one of us has seen something that makes it hard to sleep at night."

'Not as hard as it is for me.' Alone in that dark room, alone in the brighter room after, alone in Chongqing. North had the provinces. South had had no one to press their back to his and tell him it would be okay. He still didn't.

"But we kept fighting. We kept fighting knowing that that same thing could happen to us. We kept fighting no matter how many family members were imprisoned or killed, no matter how many of our people were cut down in cold blood for simply demanding an end to a unjust Occupation."

South could taste something sour on his tongue. He hadn't needed North to fight- he'd needed him to stay. And he bet everyone else's imprisoned family members had, too. Maybe they wouldn't have been imprisoned if their troublesome relatives hadn't fought.

But the bitterness was nothing compared to the feeling that ran through his blood and bones as his brother continued.

"And we will keep fighting now, no matter what America does to try and destroy us. Because for a revolutionary, the blood shed by our enemy doesn't quench our fire- it only fuels it. We do not cower when our kin are killed- we take revenge. We do not lay down our arms when the gun turns on us. We fight, and if we die, we die with our weapons in hand."

The audio recorder crackled.

"He thinks to wear us down," North accused, and he could only still be talking about America. "He thinks that all he needs to do is burn our country to the ground, to raze our factories and our fields, to murder enough of us that we fear to fight on, that we tuck our tails between our legs and give in to his demands. He thinks that we are desperate enough to come crawling to him for a ceasefire."

Ice trickled though South's legs as his brother said, "He is wrong. We are not desperate. We have told them time and time again that if it comes to a protracted war, Korea is ready to fight it. And we are ready to win."

What was he talking about? They were desperate! Bombs were still falling all over the Peninsula, still scorching South as they hit the frontline. And even in Busan, which should've been safe, people were starving. He knew the market was mostly empty, people not allowed to enter the cities freely and peasants too scared to work the fields, even with the planes targeting North. And all the food that was harvested was going to the army. The chatter he'd heard earlier had been people trying to find a stand where cabbage for kimchi didn't cost a year's wage. Refugees were living in shanty towns on the city's edge, if they had houses at all, military checkpoints lined every road, orphans ran wild, and people were attacking each other in the streets for even the hope of a meal. They'd never been so desperate.

And he knew it had to be worse in the north, where the Communists ruled and the bombs fell every day. If North had been charred by the Raktong, now he must be...

But still his brother's rough voice announced with the confidence he'd always had as he talked South into another escape scheme, "For thirty-six years, Korea struggled against Japan with no state of our own, no government, no ration distribution, no standing army. Two years is nothing. Three years would be nothing. Neither would five, or ten, or twenty."

South's heart sank as the number grew larger.

"Even if America's war wasn't unpopular with the rest of the world, even if he had unlimited money, weapons, and manpower, enough to keep this war going for a hundred years, we would fight. Ten, thirty-six, a hundred, a thousand!"

North was screaming now, in a way even South had never heard in their shack. Unrestrained in a way that made his fingers bruise his own skin.

"Korea would keep fighting! We would fight until every single blade of grass was burned to ash, until the last person standing! Because so long as even one Korean is alive, Korea is alive!

"WE WILL KEEP FIGHTING FOR AS LONG AS WE HAVE TO. WE WILL KEEP FIGHTING UNTIL WE WIN. UNTIL KOREA IS REUNIFIED AND FREE!"

A cheer rose up to meet his words, making South startle back from the recorder. The background had been so quiet, he hadn't realized his brother was speaking to an audience.

But they were there, screaming like him, a wild, feral roar that made him think of North's cry all those years ago as he seized that guard's knife.

His brother's words had been terrifying. He was telling every single person in that room, every single person in Korea, that he would keep fighting even if it cost them all. And that they had to keep fighting, too. No normal person could hear that and think it was a good thing.

And yet the audience wasn't screaming in fury or fear. They sounded... joyous. Exultive.

The crowds in Seoul and Pyongyang hadn't cheered that way for South. Even though the news he'd brought them had been good. He couldn't imagine what they would do to him if he went out into Busan and said what North just had.

But he knew they wouldn't cheer.

America flipped the 'off' switch, and the reels stopped spinning. South stared numbly at the recorder.

"That's all?" His voice rasped like his brother's.

"That's all." America leaned back against the desk. "Does that sound like someone that wants peace to you, Southie?"

"...No."

But then again, North had never wanted peace. He'd never wanted to stop fighting. To stop getting their food and water restricted and taken away. To stop antagonizing their guards and picking fights and trying to escape even when they knew it wouldn't work. To just behave.

And the one time he had had ended on March First.

His brother was violent. South had known that ever since he'd seen the look in his eyes as he stabbed that Jap to death, uncaring of the blood soaking his hands. He might've known it even before then, in that second year, when he'd killed his first man and said it felt good.

"No," America confirmed. "It sounds like someone that's deluded himself into thinking he can win. That he can stand against the most powerful country in the world for a thousand years."

He gave a harsh bark of laughter, wiping a mock tear from under his aviators before sobering.

"But let me tell you something, Southie- he can't even last the winter."

South knew he was right. His eyes did tend to glaze over when America started talking in military jargon, just like back when North was telling him about the fight against Japan.

But he'd paid enough attention to know his brother's supply lines were screwed, and his factories and stuff were destroyed. America had bragged just a few days ago that his pilots had blown up almost nine hundred vehicles in one day.

The south was doing bad enough, from what he knew. If the war continued into winter everyone up north was going to starve. And North would let them, just because he hated America too much to give up. Just like he'd always gotten South beaten with him just so be could get Japanese blood on his hands again.

"I know I told you a ceasefire would work out for us, Southie," America continued apologetically. "I was really gunning for one. But after hearing this..." He shook his head. "Honestly, maybe it's a good thing the Reds broke away."

"It's not," South rasped. "It means the war might not end before winter."

He didn't want people to starve just because of his brother's delusion that he could still win.

"And that's a crying shame." The American shook his head. "But think about it- you heard North. And you heard those folks in the audience. What do you think'a them?"

"They're crazy," South said numbly.

They had to be, to be told them and everyone they loved might all die fighting, and then to cheer like it was something to be happy about.

"Right on the money." America snapped his fingers. "Must've been hundreds of people in that room, and none of them bothered to say, 'Hey, I'm not dying for commie conquest,' or even, 'I don't want to die for nothing.' Or, 'why don't we not say we can win a thousand year war against the guy with nuclear bombs?'"

America grinned, and South stifled a shiver, digging his fingers into his arms.

"I'd say the Reds have probably killed off all the normal people by now," the American said, tapping his finger on the wire recorder. "Everyone left is, well, left. And they're all as deranged and bloodthirsty as Northie."

Bloodthirsty. South thought of the red lining North's fangs, and his stomach roiled. That was a good word for it.

"Which means things might not turn out so good for you if we work out an armistice," America continued.

South's grip on his arms tightened. "Why not?"

"Well, if I won, you'd be Reunified right away," the other country explained. "But an armistice isn't the end of a war. It's just the end of the brawling. We'll still have to work out POW swaps, set up a DMZ, work out terms and conditions, and don't even get me started on the elections. Especially since I've got to keep an eagle-eye on them for ya to make sure the commies don't trick you." America waved a hand. "We're looking at a few months before you can Reunify, maybe longer. Plenty of time for North to decide he wants to get even with you for everything you've done."

Mouth dry, South said, "But I haven't done anything."

'Maybe do something then. End the war.'

'That isn't up to me.' And wasn't he already doing something by confronting America like this? Even if he'd been wrong to do it, he'd tried.

"I know that, kid. You've only done things for the good of the nation. But do you think North would see it that way? And what do you think he'd do if he didn't?"

South's insides twisted in knots. "North wouldn't hurt me."

"Are you sure?" America raised a brow. "Even if he knew about Jeju? Or Seoul? Or the prisoners?"

The Korean opened his mouth, then found his words. "He doesn't know."

"He could find out."

America's words were bright, casual. But they made every single one of South's veins freeze over. The other country's inky black aviators stared into his soul.

South knew his brother would never hurt him. Yes, he'd left him to Japan, and it could have killed him. But he wouldn't. He'd always helped South to the water bucket after another of his outbursts had gotten them hurt, and he brought him water when he was sick. He took his beatings for him when he could. And even if that was just what he should have done, since it was his fault they were getting punished in the first place, South was still thankful that he had.

But at the same time, he could still see that man's blood in North's teeth, caked under his nails, and feel what he had as he reached for him, bloody knife in hand.

"You're right," South managed, and his voice didn't sound too shaky. "North... definitely wouldn't get that I had to do that stuff."

He saw the rage that burned in his single eye as blood poured from the other. Not for himself- for them.

"And I... don't think he'd take it well."

"Nope," America said cheerfully. "Even though I'm sure as sugar he's done way worse for his commie masters."

South knew he had. His brother had killed enough when he was malnourished and small. And he'd told him about all the battles he'd fought in the army, all the lives he'd taken once he'd finally got something even better than a knife- a gun.

And South knew it was good North had killed all those Japanese soldiers. They'd deserved it. But still, a chill ran down his spine as he thought of his brother with all those guns and all that power.

And a recording of South.

"So who are you gonna trust, South?" America asked, cocking his head at him.

He shouldn't have even had to ask. South should have known. Putting everything else aside- how there was no good reason why the American country would want to go to war with China, how he was missing things in his own country to be here with South, how he knew South Chungcheong was a liar...

North had left. America had stayed.

He knew the other country had a violent streak. He liked watching pigs get slaughtered at the market, he got excited talking about enemy casualty reports, and he wanted to watch bombs falling on the north on his birthday.

But South couldn't see him coldly wrenching a child's hip right out of the socket, or stabbing a man over and over with wild fury in his eyes. He hadn't even hurt him today, even after South had been so so afraid of him finding out what South Chungcheong had told him.

He might be a little bloodthirsty. But he wasn't Japan. And he wasn't North.

And he wasn't leaving.

"...You," South murmured, looking down at his socks. "I trust you."

America clapped him on the shoulder. "Good kid. But I want you to listen when I say this-"

He crouched slightly, his voice going cold as he locked eyes with South from behind his dark shades. "I don't want any more episodes like this, alright? I know you've got a few screws loose up here-" He rapped South on the head. "But you don't have to go making that my problem. Not when I do so much for you."

South nodded guiltily. He couldn't imagine how he'd feel if he flew across the ocean to spend a year in a foreign country, and the guy he'd done it for had started screaming that he couldn't trust him.

'Again.'

"I'm sorry," he said shamefully. "I wasn't thinking. I'm just... I just... It's a lot," he finished lamely.

America nodded sagely. "I know, kid. Which is why I'm not mad. Just letting you know this is your last straw." He thought for a second. "Or mine. One of us is outta straws."

South dipped his head again.

He'd try not to freak out like this again. America was right- he shouldn't have to deal with his... episodes. Not after he'd spent a whole year trying to win the war for him.

"Good kid." The American knuckled him playfully. "But that doesn't mean I don't want you speakin' your mind- I just don't want you screaming it. If anyone ever tries to sell you some snake oil again, you come from to America, and he'll clear things up. Don't let it fester next time."

"I won't," South promised. "I was just..."

'Scared.'

His friend nodded sympathetically. "I get it, kid. But you've got to stop thinking everyone wants to leave you just 'cuz your bro did."

South couldn't hide his flinch.

"And you need to stop letting people make you doubt yourself. You know me. Who even was that UN guy?"

"I don't know," South admitted. "I think his name was... English. Maybe?"

He wasn't good with names, let alone foreign ones.

America nodded. "A Brit, actually. What?" he said to South's look. "You didn't actually think I didn't hear about him, did you?"

South guessed it made sense he would have. It was Smith and Wesson that let the man talk to him when he chased them down in the street, after all. Of course America had heard.

"I had to spend these past two days tracking him down," his friend continued. "That's why I was a bit sparse. It freaked me out a little, especially since he left the country as soon he spoke to ya."

"He wasn't a Soviet spy or anything, was he?" South asked in alarm. "I made sure he showed his ID card to my guards, and they said it looked real."

"It was real," America soothed him. "But just because someone says they're with the UN, doesn't me a you can trust 'em with your wallet. Why do you think he told you that crap, Southie?"

"He said the UN 'wanted to make sure South Korea was getting accurate news.'"

America shook his head. "He wasn't working for the UN. He was here for Britain. And between you and me-" He lowered his voice to a whisper. "The old man's going senile."

South's eyes widened. He hadn't known that could happen to Countryhumans.

His friend nodded grimly. "Sometimes he even forgets he's not the empire that rules the world anymore. Which means he's not the sharpest on the uptake when it comes to spies in his government. And I'd almost guarantee that guy was one of them."

"But..." South looked away, but America read his mind.

"He was telling you the truth," America admitted. "The truth that I would've told you yesterday if I didn't have to hunt him down. But South."

He put his hand on his shoulder again, holding tight. "You know as well as I do that Communists are crafty. Even in the once-in-a-blue-moon they tell the truth, it's only ever for an angle. And they almost got you this time."

South hung his head, ashamed. "Sorry. I'll be more careful who I talk to."

He knew North's spies could be hiding anywhere in Busan, and CCCP's spies could be hiding anywhere in the world. And he knew it was what America wanted to hear.

"That'd be the smart thing, kid," his friend said. "I'll make your guards know not to let any nosy-nellies corner you in the street again, no matter how insistent they are. And you won't have to deal with this much longer. If the Reds won't give into a ceasefire now, they will once winter's done."

He showed his teeth in a smile. "I'm sure of it."

South nodded. "Do you think... I should start calling for Gangwon again?" he asked as America put his recorder away. "I mean, if North does have him, I'd... kind of feel bad leaving him there until spring."

He didn't know Gangwon was with his brother willingly, if he was. Yes he'd been with North's army when they invaded, but South remembered him as nervous and shy. He could've been bullied into it.

And if he was like Kangwon... Maybe he'd actually like South.

America straightened suddenly, pondering. Then he grinned, wide and white.

"Y'know, kid, that's a great idea," he said, slapping the top of the desk. "I bet he might even have some insider information for us."

South's heart skipped a beat as his tentative hopefulness died, and he immediately wished he hadn't suggested it.

"We might even be able to prove it was the Norks and their chink friends that staged that bombing before," America continued.

South made himself relax. Right. That was probably all his friend wanted. There was nothing else Gangwon might be able to tell him.

'You hope.'

He shook his head. No. He knew. He knew because America had proven over and over again that South could trust him. No matter how many tantrums he threw or mistakes he'd made, the American was still here.

North had never wanted peace. From throwing himself at their guards to running off into the wilderness to fight, to starting this war. His brother was violent and bloodthirsty, and the Communists had only made that worse.

'Blood doesn't quench our fire- it only fuels it.'

He'd said it himself, hadn't he? They were all bloodthirsty. North, the provinces, the commies. They were all too full of hate for America, for Rhee, for South, to realize that they could just stop fighting. That they didn't have to die.

South... knew his brother would never want to hurt him. But what if he let the others do it? Or what if he snapped? What if he heard about Jeju and Seoul and the commie prisoners getting executed and he just...

'Crazy.' He'd looked crazy as he murdered their Jap guard. And crazy people did things they didn't want to do.

'You know that all too well, don't you?'

'Shut up.'

If North found out about that stuff, he might hurt South, even if he didn't want to. And South knew if they worked out a ceasefire that... was too good for the commies, he would find out.

One more winter. One more winter and North would give up. Or everyone else would at least. And once his brother was alone, he'd realize how crazy it was to want to fight America down to the last person.

And then South could talk to him. He'd explain everything and North would understand. He'd understand he was his brother and he loved him and he'd only done everything for them, to get him back. Then they could be Reunified. No more fighting, no more war or violence.

Only peace.

'Please brother- see sense before then.'

He knew by now it was a vain hope.

After all, blood had only ever fuelled North's fire.

Another merciful chapter title explanation- white masks in bian lian opera symbolize deceit and treachery. Also t he North POV of the flashback was in No Right in book one, if you want to compare them.

You know- 'Why is the blood on my lips only acceptable when it's mine? Why is it only okay for our clothes to be blood-soaked when it's our own they're drenched in? Why is it okay for there to be blood on my hands so long as it's not yours?' and such.

The New York Times article saying the investigation of the strafing was inconclusive has the vibe of 'Like God, shut upppp. Those bullets could have came from anywhere. Why does it have to be one of our planes? Yes, some civilian said he heard the plane shoot his house, but some other chick who was asleep at the time said it could have been a mouse, sooooo.' And the one admitting the US is responsible for the bombing is paywalled. I am uncovering depths of American history-shrouding likely only seen before by American librarians.

I'm going to watch Nanjing Photo Studio once it becomes 'available' (I will never pay for media in my life). I thought about watching it in cinema, but then I considered that I cried watching the Barbie movie and that maybe a full breakdown plus the possibility of right-wing protestors being there were not a good combination for me. This is called emotional regulation and making sure my family's only daughter doesn't go to prison.

Making Your Own Bravery

They reached Sincheon in the early morning, just a li'l after Hae would've got up to pick plants for harvest season if she'd stayed back in Pyongyang. They tried to stay off the roads on the way, just in case the surveillance planes were looking for more trucks to bomb, and because they had big craters in them.

There wasn't any glow in the sky. Just the sun creepin' on over the horizon. The cool fall air smelled like-

Burning flesh.

-woodsmoke and damp soil. Tails of smoke rose over the town, too thin and light to be houses. Or people.

As their truck rolled to a stop on the outskirts, Hae peeked out the windshield at the rows of houses and scattered huts. Some of them were missin' roofs and walls from the bombings, but some of them were nothin' but crumbled black boards and mats of straw, rotted from sitting out for so long.

Korea's keys jingled as he slid from the driver seat of the Jeep (he said he brought China's truck because he didn't want the GAZ to get bombed), and Hwang jumped out from next to Hae. SH twisted around from the front, squeezin' her hand before she left, too.

Hae peered out the open door, lookin' at the ground. It was just dirt, a li'l dusty now that rainy season was over.

But her feet didn't want to step on it. She could still see patches of burnt black and red shining wetly in the weak light.

"South Hwanghae," Korea said impatiently.

SH hushed him, then smiled at Hae. "Take your time, Hae."

She'd come back from her province because she said Korea an' Hwang weren't sensitive enough to take care of Hae. But Hae knew Korea was right, and she shouldn't be wasting time. A general had to take care of people, not the other way 'round.

Her boots thumped onto the ground, makin' her flinch. A shiver ran through her, sending her insides pricklin' and all the hair on her body standing up. For a moment, she almost thought she could hear the distant screams and soft weeping again.

But there was nothing. Just birds chirpin' as the sun rose.

Hae wasn't used to feeling this way. She didn't like it one bit.

She reached for SH's arm, but Korea knocked her hand down.

"No weakness," he reminded her over her cousin's scoldin'. "No flinching, no crying."

"No lookin' away," Hae finished, wishing she sounded braver.

Korea nodded seriously. "The people here have been through enough. They don't need to feel like they should be comforting you. They need someone to look to for reassurance. Act like a general."

Hae bobbed her head, pickin' at her elbow before smackin' her own hand away.

"Comrades!"

They turned to see a tanned, middle-aged man jogging towards them from the Security outpost. Hae lit up.

"Comrade Jae-soon!"

She ran at him, then screeched to a halt a few feet away, shootin' a guilty look back at Korea.

Not very general-like to launch a flyin' hug at a Public Security Corps comrade.

She held out her arm instead, and he shook it real excitedly, making her entire body shake, too.

“It’s so good to see you again,” he gushed. “Comrade Korea told us you made it through everythin’ okay, but the folks in the squad were still real worried, even after I read your letter to them.”

“Ah’m okay!” Hae assured him, happy to see he was still alive. “America didn’t torture me or nothin’. He was just real annoyin.’ How are all our militia comrades?”

“You know we made it to Kuwol Mountain to join up with the guerrilla units there,” Jae-soon said proudly.

“And you didn’t lose anyone?” Hae asked hopefully.

Jae-soon hesitated, then looked past her, salutin’ as Korea came over.

“At ease,” their Countryhuman said. “And tell her.”

“We… lost five women,” Jae-soon admitted, making Hae’s heart sink. “An older woman got sick, one took her own life, and the other three had been… injured by the miguk-nom. They didn’t make it.”

“You didn’t tell me that in your letter,” Hae protested.

“I didn’t want to upset you.”

Well she was upset. And she wished he hadn’t told her now. She wished she didn’t have to know.

But she did.

“South Hwanghae is a general in the Korean People’s Army,” Korea said in his General voice. “You do not have to worry about upsetting her.”

Hae blinked away the burnin’ behind her eyes, nodding. “Ah’m real sorry to hear that,” she said, tryin’ to remember how she’d sounded when she was giving orders before. “But you did a really good job keepin’ everyone else alive, comrade.”

Jae-soon closed his eyes, nodding. “We all did our best. It was knowin' that we were carryin' out a task our province assigned us, and that our country was dependin' on us that kept us goin'."

"That was what kept me goin', too," Hae told him, glancing at Korea.

That and knowin' he was going to come save her.

"Comrade Jung Jae-soon." Hwang scurried over, clasping his forearm. "Good to see you again."

"Comrade Hwang, it's been awhile." The officer bowed to SH. "And it's an honour to have Comrade South Hamgyong visit."

"Comrade SH, please," SH said, standin' next to Hae.

"You told me you investigated the situation thoroughly?" Korea cut in.

Jae-soon dipped his head, more professional now. "I know a few people that would feel better hearin' from Comrade Hae. And by now we all know where the worst of the crimes happened."

He raised his head, staring across the town at somethin' Hae couldn't see, his eyes all distant.

Then he shook himself like Pyo shook off water after swimmin'. "Follow me."

Sincheon Town was busier than Pyongyang, on account'a it not being much of a target.

'Anymore.'

People were heading down the street with baskets of fruits and vegetables on their heads, off to sell them at market, and a few kids in white uniforms were marchin' off to school in lines. They'd used to go alone, but now a few women and Public Security officers walked with them, their eyes flicking around nervously.

Hae could see people out in the fields, surveyin' the rice paddies to figure out when to drain them, and workin' hard to sow rapeseed in the fallow fields. They had to get as much as possible in every harvest this year, since they'd been interrupted by the enemy last year. If the Yankees didn't sign a ceasefire, they'd need all the rations they could get to make it through the winter.

She wished she could join them and forget about everything except for the feeling of dirt under her fingers and tryin' to keep the ox going in a line so the rows would be straight.

Hae had always liked Sincheon. She liked all their towns and cities and villages. But Haeju and Sariwon were more city than the farmin' town. Sincheon had had enough farmland to be comfy, but enough people that there was always somethin' interesting for Hae to see or someone to chat with.

There weren't so many now. Even though the town was a li'l more busy than Pyongyang, people had still been evacuated to the hills, and the markets were still hidden out on the outskirts. The square was almost empty as they followed Jae-soon through it.

Something on the platform in the center caught Hae's eye. She didn't want to look, remembering what she'd seen the last time she looked up there.

Kicking legs and gross gagging sounds and cruel smiles that turned to alarm as Hae, Jae-soon, Kwang-seok, and the others burst out and attacked. Trying to saw through the hemp rope while it twisted under her knife as the man struggled, no matter how much she told him to stop. She'd been fast enough, but not all of them had.

This time it was only a bunch of papers nailed to a notice board, covered in writing. She knew what they were because Korea had told her about the list the Party was makin', and had passed on to the Women's International Democratic Federation.

Names. Thousands of names, all belonging to the people killed in Sincheon. And she thought that might just be the list for the town.

There were more names on the newsboard to the side of the square, too, these ones coming with pictures and drawings. Most of them were topped by bigger words, callin' out to whoever walked by- ‘MISSING,’ ‘LOST,’ ‘COME HOME.’

Hae found herself walking that way, even though she hadn’t told her legs to take her. Maybe if she knew what the missing people looked like, she would recognize them if she ran into them in other parts of their province.

She tensed as a hand touched her shoulder, but it was only Hwang comin’ to stand next to her, his eyes wandering over the board with hers.

Some of the photos were faded, and Hae could barely read the writing for them. But some looked new, like someone was putting one up every day.

Hae knew one of them.

“You still haven’t found Comrade Pong-su?” she asked, looking over her shoulder at Jae-soon.

He was staring at a portrait of a pretty woman with dark, curly hair. Her lips were pressed flat, but her eyes were squinched up like she was trying’ not to laugh.

“No,” he said, and the one word was so sad that it made Hae’s heart ache.

Min Pong-su had been real nice, always inviting her in for dinner after she and Jae-soon had finished wrasslin’ with the landlords during the Agrarian Reform. He’d said she went missing after he rushed off to deal with the reactionaries.

“So many women,” SH murmured from behind them.

Hae looked closer and realized she was right. There were portraits of men, like the ones her and her cousins had to take when they were officially recognized as Korea’s provinces. ‘For postrerity,’ Hwang said.

But most of the ‘missing’ signs were women. Family photos like SH was always trying to get them to take- sittin’ on chairs, holdin’ babies in their arms, with older kids at their feet and men standing behind them, but folded down so they couldn't be seen- or real small, like they'd fit in a locket. There were sketches, too, some of them so messy that Hae had no idea how she was supposed to recognize the people if she saw them.

Wives, sisters, mommas, grandmommas, daughters. There was a tacked-on note begging for anyone that had met an eight-year old girl named Hyang-hwa to report right away to Oh Hyang-gol at his address. Hae read through what she'd been wearing, and when she was last seen.

October 18th, last year.

Hae tried to imagine a little girl wandering through Sincheon the way she'd arrived to find it, fires flickering across town, the harsh sounds of laughter drowned out by screams, and lumps of burned meat in the streets.

She knew it wasn't very general-ly of her to do, but she couldn't help but hug herself. She hoped someone had found her. Someone nice.

Jae-soon reached past her, tearing one of the notices from the board. A picture of a man with the word 'MURDERER' slashed across it in red ink.

"Who is that?" Korea asked. He sounded cool, like the names and photos didn't upset him, even though Hae knew they did.

"Yang Chun-yoon," Jae-soon said, tossing the crumpled photo to the ground. "He was with the Taehan Young Men's Association. His widow refuses to believe it. Or that he got what he deserved."

Korea asked for the widow's address, while Hae stared up at the names of the missing and dead.

How many of them had she seen while she was in Sincheon? How many of the names up there were comrades she'd worked with before the war, or were the screams she heard while skulking through the shadows? How many of the photos were people she would have recognized if they weren't so bloody or burnt?

She wondered if that first person she'd ran into was up there, the one that had really made her realize what she was walking into.

"South Hwanghae."

Hae jumped, turnin' to Korea. She hadn't heard him calling, even though she always heard it when he said her name.

He was giving her a look. "We're going."

Jae-soon nodded, his eyes still fixed on the picture of his wife. His fingers brushed her black-and-white cheek before he walked away.

"Korea," SH hissed quietly as they followed. "Be more gentle."

"Don't coddle her," Korea said, just as low. "This isn't about her. It's about them." He jerked his head at the names.

SH still didn't look happy, but Hae was glad she had Korea to remind her to keep movin'. If he wasn't here, she would'a just kept staring at the boards all day, trying to find names she recognized and memorize faces she didn't.

She hurried to catch up to Jae-soon so it looked like she was helpin' lead. But as they headed towards the edge of town, her belly started to twist up inside as she realized where they were goin'.

The Sincheon County Worker's Party Committee office.

Their guerrilla unit had made sure to avoid it, 'cuz it was the building the Yankees were using as their headquarters. They'd had enough people to cut communications wires and save a few hundred civilians, but not enough to go up against all the foreigners, reactionary groups, and the Southern One's army.

But they had heard what happened there.

As they rounded the building, Hae's eyes strayed towards the opening of the Party air raid shelter. It gaped like an open mouth, the concrete blocks around the entrance stained black.

A group of people were already behind the building, wearing helmets and markin' out a spot on the ground with rope, like construction workers. Hae recognized one of them, and ran forward, relieved to get farther away from the shelter.

"Comrade Ji-ha!"

Un Ji-ha brightened as she saw her, and even though Hae stopped and put out her arm like a good general, she got pulled into a hug anyway. And it was rude not to hug back, so she did, tight.

"Comrade Jae-soon told me you were coming today," the woman said, pullin' away too soon. "I was hopin' I'd be here when you came by."

Ji-ha looked a bit different- a scar crossed her brown cheek, and her hair had grown out from its bob, long enough to put in two short braids. Hae wondered if she'd want a hair cut from her. She was skinny, but pretty much everyone was now. Hae had got a li'l pudge back after the camp, but that was just 'cuz her body had a real good 'starvation response,' like Kang said. And-

"You're wearin' a Public Security uniform!"

Ji-ha looked down at the sash around her arm. "I decided to sign on after the army returned. I couldn't stand just going back to workin' my garden. I want to protect our town, and they need people with experience."

"And people we can trust," Jae-soon added grimly. "And she's still a terror with that shovel."

Ji-ha spun the tool around by the handle. It was a li'l rusty, enough that Hae thought it might be the same one she'd used to brain guys last year.

"I've turned it to less violent pursuits now." Her smile died as she looked back at her work crew. "We're digging for more remains."

"From the trench executions?" Hwang asked from behind Hae.

"Mhm." Ji-ha's pretty eyes were dark. "After they filled up the air raid shelter, they took to digging trenches out here for them.

Burnin' or buryin' folks alive. We've already recovered over five hundred bodies, and we're still findin' bone fragments."

Rows and rows of bones in piles on white sheets, each topped by a skull with wide empty eye sockets that stared into the camera, hoping they could find out who they'd been when they were alive. More bones scattered at their feet, the ones that couldn't be sorted into a skeleton.

Hae looked over the field that stretched out to the open farmlands. A lot of the dirt was freshly churned or had that look that meant it'd been dug up before settlin', the grass short and spiky on earth that rose in small waves.

Another shiver ran through her.

"Is Comrade Kwang-seok workin' with you?" She craned her neck as she tried to distract herself.

But Jae-soon and Ji-ha gave each other looks that made her heart sink.

"What?" she asked, even though she didn't want to know.

"Comrade Hae." Jae-soon removed his cap, holding it at his waist. "I'm sorry to tell you, but Comrade Choe Kwang-seok died in a bombing raid in July."

Hae closed her eyes tight, clampin' down on the tears that tried to escape.

She could still see the young officer's face as they stood outside Kim Moon-sik's barn, his expression all sincere.

''The well-being of the Republic is more precious than life itself.' We all stayed here knowing we could die.'

And now he had. Not even in all the carnage the Yankees and reaction'ries brought with 'em, or fightin' with the guerrillas on the mountain. Just from a bomb some deathbird spat out. Like Korea had said- even when the miguk-nom couldn't set foot in Sincheon, they still murdered them by the thousands.

“The Yanks were targetin’ our oxen while they were at pasture,” Jae-soon said, all gentlelike. “He ran out to scatter them.”

“He made it so they only got one,” Ji-ha added softly. “And him.”

“Then he died savin’ our people,” Hae said, and her eyes burned fiercer as she remembered what she’d said to him back then. “He did a good job.”

SH stepped closer to her side while her comrades nodded gravely. “He did.”

“I hope more measures have been taken to avoid a repeat of something like that?”

Hae shot a look over at Hwang, frownin’.

‘Not what you’re supposed to say.’*

“And I’m very sorry for your loss,” he quickly added. “Comrade Hae told me much about Comrade Choe Kwang-seok. He will be missed.”

“We wouldn’t let him die in vain,” Ji-ha assured him, holding her shovel close. “The farmers all know to only let the livestock out to graze at night now. And the state farms were already doin’ that.”

“And everyone else is still alive, last I checked,” Jae-soon said, tryin’ to cheer her up. “Even Old Man Beom is still kickin’.”

That made Hae feel a li’l better. But she couldn’t stop thinking about how she would never see Kwang-seok again, and his family would never see him again, and the families of everyone that had ended up shot dead in the trenches would never see their families again and-

SH’s shoulder brushed hers, ‘cuz Korea wouldn’t like it if she held her hand right now.

“Well,” her cousin said, bright, but not in a way that made it seem like she didn’t care about what had happened to Kwang-seok. “We have a lot of places to visit today. We should get started while it's still early."

Ji-ha nodded, drawin' herself up. "Comrade Korea wanted to hear for himself some of what happened here, right?"

Korea dipped his head. "I've read the report made by the Women's International Democratic Federation thoroughly. But it is my duty as your country to investigate directly. I would have come sooner, but I've been committed to the war effort."

"We understand," Jae-soon assured.

Hae looked down at her clasped hands guiltily. Korea probably would'a come to investigate for himself awhile ago, durin' the break in January, if he hadn't been waiting for her to be ready.

She wasn't ready. She hadn't been ready for what was happenin' in Sincheon last year, and she wasn't ready to remember it now.

But Korea would be ready, if he was her. So she had to be, too.

"I have someone here now that can tell you what happened here." Ji-ha cupped her hands around her mouth and called, "San-gon! Come here a minute!"

A young boy helpin' stake the wooden pegs around the dig site looked over, then down at the pegs he was holding, hesitatin'. But an older man took them from him, and he trudged over, a li'l reluctantly, Hae thought, even though he should be excited to see Korea.

"Can ah help you comrades with something?" he asked, still looking over at the site.

Ji-ha put a hand on his shoulder, rubbin' it with her thumb. "Do you think you could tell Comrade Korea what happened to you? It'll only take a minute, and you can get right back to diggin' after, alright?"

San-gon almost looked like he might say no, then glanced at Korea and bit his lip.

“Mama wanted us to keep our heads down when the armies showed up,” he said, real quietlike. “Pops was in the Worker’s Party, my brothers are in the army, and ah’m in the Children’s Union, so we knew they’d probably try an’ mess with us. Ah wanted to fight, but Pops said we needed to wait for the right moment to leave town, and Mama said so long as we stayed quiet, they wouldn't find us. But…” He shrugged helplessly. “Someone sold us out an’ told them. Not even three days in.”

‘Someone like that Ku Chun-guk,’ Hae thought, and her fists clenched, wishin’ she could kill him again.

“They showed up at our door- some youth group thugs- and beat Pops to death.” San-gon looked down at his hands. “Smashed his head in with Grandmama’s ol’ brass kettle. Ah… wanted to stop them, but Mama was holding me too tight.”

Hae looked at Korea, thinkin’ he’d say something. But he stayed quiet, watching the boy expectantly.

“We got lucky,” San-gon said, even though it didn’t sound like he really thought that. “They didn’t do anything too bad to Mama. Just pawed at her a li’l.”

His small fists still clenched like Hae’s as he said it.

“Then they dragged us out here.” He gestured to the turned-over field. “They’d already been burning folks, so we knew what to expect. Mama threw herself at one of the boys an' tried to take his gun, and she told me to run. And… Ah did.” The boy looked down at his straw sandals. “Ah ran all the way to the mountains.”

He flinched like he thought one of ‘em was going to hit him or somethin’. Hae took another peek at Korea, but he was still bein’ silent.

San-gon shut his eyes tight, his face screwin’ up. “But they were there, too. They started rounding people up again.”

“To punish our guerrillas on Mount Kuwol,” Jae-soon supplied, the tendons on his neck flexin’. “They arrested almost the entire village helpin' supply us, and killed them all at Minchon-ri."

"Ah ran again," San-go said, wringin' his hands. "Into the mountains."

"And we took him in." Ji-ha put her hand on his shoulder. "He was a big help choppin' firewood. He even did a little reconnaissance for us."

"So now ah have to find my Mama." San-gon looked out at the field. "She's out here somewhere."

The work crew had started to dig. Hae usually liked the sound of shovels choppin' at the earth, but today each one of 'em made her flinch. Any second, one could hit something that wasn't dirt.

Korea still wasn't sayin' anything, even though he should've by now. He needed to tell the boy that he didn't need to be afraid anymore and that he shouldn't be ashamed. He needed to make him look less like he wanted to jump on into the hole his comrades were diggin'.

Hae looked up at him again, and this time, Korea flicked his eye to her.

'Oh.' Right.

"You don't know your mama's here," Hae said to San-gon. "She could'a made it away."

He shook his head dejectedly. "Ah know she didn't. Ah… Ah heard the gunshot. And ah didn't even look back."

His brown eyes started to well with tears, and he hid his face in the crook'a his elbow.

SH stepped forward, but Korea sent her a Look, and she stopped, frustrated. Ji-ha didn't speak their quiet talk, but she stayed silent, too, just rubbin' the boy's back, like she knew what Korea wanted from Hae.

Or maybe she'd just said everythin' she could to try an' cheer him up over the past year.

“You don’t need to feel bad that you ran,” Hae said, tryin’ to sound confident. She wouldn’t like to be told there wasn’t anythin’ she could have done, so instead she said, “The Gen’ral always says that war is like a football match. Sometimes you need to know when to retreat. We had to do that a lot durin' the war against Japan, and we had to do it a few times in this war, too.”

She couldn’t help herself from lookin’ at Korea. His jaw twitched, his expression stormy, and Hae quickly added, “Otherwise we wouldn’t’a been able to stop the Yankees from takin' all our cities. And then we would’ve all had to go back to bein’ guerrillas.”

She knew she couldn’t make Korea stop thinking what he was. But she could try. And she didn’t want San-gon thinkin’ the same thing.

“Ah left my Mama to die,” the boy croaked.

“She wouldn’t’a wanted you to die with her,” Hae said, confident about that, at least. “She distracted them so you could get away. That has to happen a lot when you’re at war, too.”

That was what Korea had meant when he’d told them all about having to let their people sacrifice themselves for them sometimes. She didn’t like hearin’ it, and she didn’t like it any of the times it had happened.

But she’d understood, once Korea had told her and her cousins that they’d have to sacrifice themselves for him, if it came down to it. He didn’t need to tell her that, ‘cuz Hae never even would have thought twice- if it was her or Korea, she’d always pick him.

“Your mama was actin’ just like a soldier, sacrificin’ herself so you could live,” Hae told San-gon. “And sacrifice isn’t about the person bein’ sacrificed for, it's about the one doin' the sacrificin’.”

He peeked past his tan arm, lookin’ a li’l confused. Hae glanced at Hwang, wantin’ him to make sense of her words for her, but Korea had beat her to it, so her brother wouldn’t give her anything but a sideways 'Sorry' look.

Another try!

"You shouldn't be thinkin' that you left her," Hae told the boy. "You should be thinkin' you did exactly what she wanted. Your mama wanted you to get away and live, and you did."

That was how it always worked for her. Even if something made you upset, big or small, you just had to think about it in a different way and it wouldn't. Hambu didn't actually want to make her sad when he acted like a jerk- that was just how he showed love. Hwang had never meant to be mean to her, he just didn't know any better yet. And whenever one of their soldiers gave their life for her on the battlefield, it wasn't 'cuz she'd been too slow to react or reload. It just meant that they loved their country so much they'd rather die than see one of their provinces even get hurt.

Of course, Hae knew it was harder to do that with big things. And it was real hard after Sincheon. She knew it was going to be even harder after today.

But she kept cheery for San-gon. "You even got to help our guerrillas fight against the reaction'ries and Yankees!" Smilin', she declared, "Ah bet she'd be real proud of you. And so's Korea. And me an' Hwang."

She put her arm around her brother's pencil-waist and pulled him forward, really hopin' he wouldn't correct her with 'Hwang and I.'

But he really was learnin', 'cuz he just said, "Indeed. Sometimes… walking away is the correct option."

He pushed his glasses up, and Hae squeezed him a li'l tighter, beamin' at San-gon.

"Ah just…" His voice broke even smaller. "Ah just miss her s-so much."

"It's okay to miss her," Hae said. "But you can't let it weigh you down, and make ya feel guilty for bein' alive."

“But what if my brothers blame me for what happened to her?” he asked, and Hae could tell he was tryin’ real hard not to sniffle. “Ah haven’t told ‘em yet, even when ah wrote them.”

“They won’t blame you,” Hae assured him. “They’re your brothers. But you have to make sure they don’t blame themselves, either.”

San-go blinked, confused. “Why would they blame themselves? They weren’t even here.”

Hae gave him a nod. “Exactly. They might start thinkin’ things like ‘Ah should’a been there to help, if ah hadn’t joined the army, ah would’a been.” She held up a finger like Hwang usually did. “But that’s wrong thinkin’, ‘cuz they signed on to protect all our people, and they’ve got to keep doin’ that. Like Korea said in his Foundation Day speech- no matter what could happen to us and our families, we keep fightin’. So no one else will ever end up like your Mama did.”

Or like any of the other thousands of people that had been buried under their boots.

Hae wanted to do something, but she didn’t know if Korea would be okay with it. She put her hand on her sheath and eyed him. He considered, then blinked. Or winked. But Korea had never winked when he had two eyes, so Hae thought he probably wasn’t winking now. It was a ‘yes’, anyhow.

“And like Korea said, too- ‘We do not cower when our kin are killed.’”

Hae went to take her knife from her belt, but found that Korea was already holdin’ his out. The old one, not the shiny silver one he wouldn’t tell her where it came from.

She took his knife and held it out to San-gon, smilin’.

“We take revenge.”

The boy wiped his forearm roughly across his eyes, then hesitantly took the weapon. It wasn’t as sharp as Korea usually kept his blades, which meant it wasn't good for the battlefield anymore. But it would be good enough if the kid had to knife a few reaction'ries.

"Revenge." He said the word like he was tastin' it.

Hae nodded happily. "You tell your brothers it wasn't your fault or their fault that your mama was murdered. It was the Yankees and-" She darted look at Korea, bitin' her tongue. "And the puppets." Reaching out, she gently bopped him on the forehead with her fist. "And tell yourself that, too."

San-gon stared at the knife a li'l longer. Then his eyes hardened, and he nodded, looking up at her.

"Ah will, Comrade General."

Hae pouted. Not even a maybe-ten-year old would call her noona. And it always felt weird to be called Comrade General when Korea was with her.

"Ah'll find Mama's body," the boy said, his voice sharper than the blade in his clenched fist. "And then ah'll get revenge for her. And for everyone."

"Then get out there, comrade!" Hae cheered, and San-gon gave her a salute before running back to the dig site.

"And don't run with knives!" SH called, alarmed.

"He's handled them before," Ji-ha assured her, watching the boy with fondness.

"Is he staying with you?" Korea asked as San-gon tied his new knife to his rope belt and slapped a hardhat on his head.

"Mm. I'll take care of him until his brothers get home." Ji-ha put a hand on her heart. "And my boy, too."

"Name?"

"Oh U-bae. Fourth Corps, 5th Division."

Korea thought, then said, “He hasn’t been in any casualty reports.”

Hae knew he read them every day, even when they weren’t at the front. It made her feel even worse for tryin’ to avoid the Women’s International Democratic Federation’s report for so long.

Ji-ha’s eyes closed in relief. “If you ever see him, do me a favour and tell him to write his poor mother more often.”

Korea promised that he would, while Jae-soon pulled Hae aside.

“That was a real nice thing of you to do, Comrade Hae.”

“Ah just told him the truth,” Hae replied.

She was happy she’d managed to perk San-gon up a bit. But she still felt… itchy. The weevils weren’t gone.

Jae-soon smiled. “It was a truth he wouldn’t hear from none of us.”

“Any,” Hwang corrected, makin’ Hae have to apologize for him.

That hadn’t been so bad. Maybe she could do this.

Hae spun to Korea, waiting. He nodded at her seriously, once.

Hae sucked in a deep breath, then announced, “Ah want to see the air raid shelter.”

Jae-soon and Ji-ha’s faces fell.

“Are you sure-?”

“Ayuh!” Hae chirped before she could change her mind.

She hugged Ji-ha goodbye, not wanting to let go. But then she did, and turned towards the air raid shelter.

She wanted to skip, but it didn’t feel right. So she marched, makin’ her legs move like Korea had given her an order.

But she couldn't keep it up. The closer she got to the gaping hole, the more it looked like a big ol' mouth that wanted to swallow her up, and the harder it got to lift her legs. Those shivers kept runnin' through her, getting stronger.

By the time she stood outside the stairs down to the shelter, the hair on her arms was raised so high it actually hurt, pullin' at her pores, makin' her itch inside and out.

"We're goin' to fill it in once the trials are over." Jae-soon's voice came from far away. "Too much talk of honbul."

Soul fires. Hae didn't believe in ghosts. But staring down at the dark hole, her body shiverin' like it was mid-winter, even though the sun had just risen, almost made her start.

"Ghosts aren't real," Korea dismissed, standin' next to her at the top of the stairs. "Go down."

"Korea-"

He cut SH off again. "This is her duty."

"Can you…" Hae made her voice small, even though Jae-soon could probably still hear. "Can you order me?"

Not a Command. She just needed to hear Korea tell her that she had to do this. Then her feet would unstick and take her down into the dark.

"No," he said coldly. "You will go down because you know you need to. Or you will not."

She would. She would she would she would. Even though the dark rectangle looked too much like the hole when Japan had first brought her to it. Even though her legs were shaking. Even though it still smelled burnt.

Hae wobbled forward, her feet takin' her down the wide concrete steps. Hwang tried to follow, but Korea held him back.

She stood in front of the entrance. The inside of the steel door was black with soot. Only the handle was clean where hands had touched so people could come investigate.

It was stupid to feel this way. She'd done way scarier stuff last year, when the people in here had been being murdered. It was stupid and so were her legs for still shaking anyways.

Hae stepped forward, and into the dark.

Right away she could feel the weight above pressing down on her, the curved steel roof, the concrete blocks lining it, the few feet of earth crushing her like a mountain, bearing down, flattening her. It was dark and dank and hard to breathe, like the hole but worse, and she knew this was what the people in the trenches had felt as they were buried alive, tossed into the ground, shovels of dirt raining down on them until they couldn't see the sun or smell fresh air and never would again.

Hae's breath came fast as the dark pressed in on her, clapping shackles around her ankles and wrists again and nipping at her like a rat.

She backpedalled, trying to escape, but bounced off of the chest behind her. She tried to cling to Korea, but he pushed her away with a hand, deeper into the dark.

Her head whirled, confused and hurt. Korea was supposed to pull her out of the dark, into the light, not shove her in. He was supposed to-

'No.' Korea would never hurt her or lock her up in the hole again. 'Never.'

The certainty of that gave her a moment to catch her breath, to make her lungs work past the chokin' feeling and bits of ash she was breathing in.

She was alright. She'd made it out of the hole. Korea had saved her from it. And she'd made it out of Sincheon.

The people here hadn't. And this wasn't about her. It was about them.

“Ah’m okay,” she said, her voice echoing, and too shaky.

Korea didn’t say anythin’ about it. “Good.” His flashlight clicked on, illuminating the huge underground shelter.

Hae squeezed her eyes shut, afraid she’d see a body, even though she knew it’d been cleaned out months ago. She knew. She’d had to see the pictures on the ride here.

She hesitantly peeked.

The room stretched into the shadows, which Korea’s flashlight beam could barely pierce. The floor had been scraped almost clean, but the walls still had patches of soot clingin’ to ‘em. It had mixed with the dust, creating small black tentacles that waved in the air, making it seem like they were inside some big furry beast.

The air raid shelter was huge, since it was the Party one. It could hold everyone who worked in the County Committee office, and a bunch’a civilians, too.

But it wasn’t supposed to hold nine hundred. And that was the number of people that had been burned to death in it.

The shivers were still wrackin’ her, making her tremble like a leaf no matter how hard she tried to stop. It wasn’t just her thinkin’ of the hole. It was something else, something that sank into her bones and wrapped them in ice.

“The sixth sense,” Hwang murmured from beside her. His voice was shaky, too, which made Hae feel a li’l better. “I’ve never felt it like this before.”

“It aches,” Hae whispered, clutchin’ at her chest. “Ah can feel it inside.”

She was sad and upset, but just like the shaking, she could tell this was something more. Not quite hers, but piercin’ her heart anyhow.

“Interesting,” Hwang murmured. “You’re feeling it even stronger than me. I wonder if…”

He trailed off as a shiver hit him, and Hae watched tears start to leak from his eyes as he put a hand over his mouth.

"Keep yourselves together." Korea's voice was steady, but Hae could tell he was feelin' the same thing she was. The fine hairs on his neck were all raised.

SH was the only one that couldn't feel it. She was trembling as she looked around at the sooty shelter, but it wasn't the same. Her jaw was locked and her palms were dripping blood. Hae wanted to take her hand, but she couldn't make herself move. She could only squeeze Hwang's back when he linked his fingers with hers.

Almost a thousand people had burned in here. Tied together in groups and shoved in, locked up, before gasoline was sprayed through the air vent, and bottle grenades followed. Hae hadn't been brave enough to watch the newsreel, but she'd seen the pictures. People standing over bodies that didn't look like humans anymore, trying to find someone that had belonged to them in a mass of blackened flesh and twisted limbs. She hoped that if San-gon's mama had survived that shot, she'd been buried alive, 'cuz if she hadn't, he would never find her, and even having to hope for that made her feel sick.

This had happened everywhere. In the militia headquarters, in the Public Security Office, in the powder houses and church. Every single one'a those people was supposed to be alive. They'd been supposed to be happy after Liberation, they'd supposed to be Reunified and be able to eat meat three times a day and work the fields in peace and no one was ever supposed to die again, and even if Hae knew that was impossible, they hadn't been supposed to die like this, beat and hurt and thrown into the dark, squished together with hundreds of other people and the choking smell of gasoline to burn.

She could smell it again, the stench of burning flesh as people screamed and Yankee soldiers laughed at their pain, and she would've fallen down if her knees hadn't been locked in place.

"Don't throw up," she heard Korea say sharply, and she realized she was gaggin' as she clutched at her belly.

“Korea, let her leave,” SH said, and there was somethin’ dark in her voice that worried Hae until she realized it wasn’t directed at their Countryhuman.

“She needs to face this without wavering.”

“She did!” SH hissed. “She came here back then, and fought. You said you didn’t have any criticisms for her, so what are you punishing her for?”

“I am not punishing her,” Korea growled. “Exactly- she fought here. She witnessed things like this. She can’t be afraid of an empty room now.”

“Ah’m not… afraid,” Hae forced out.

She wasn’t. She was hot and prickly an’- and anguished. That was the word for it. Grief was pourin’ out of her heart and drowning her, and it only got deeper as the names and faces on the signs flashed through her mind. How many of them had died here? How many missing people would never be found ‘cuz they’d been burned to cinders?

“Ah’m not afraid,” she repeated, diggin’ her nails into her palms. “See?”

She straightened up, smilin’ at Korea. It took a couple tries, but she got her lips turned up.

“Ah’m alright,” she said. But she couldn’t keep her smile. “Ah ain’t lookin’ away.”

“Good.” Korea looked off into the shadows of the shelter. “This is what hesitating does. This is what trying to avoid bloodshed you know is necessary ends in- oceans of it spilled anyway. Don’t forget that.”

Hae breathed in the burnt air, feelin’ the soot dust coat her throat as another long shiver ran down her spine.

“Ah won’t,” she promised, scabs on her knuckles bursting.

"Korea…" SH said, soft now as she reached for his arm.

He slipped away from her. "We have work to do. Move out."

Hae followed him, castin' one last look back at the shelter. There were no soul fires dancin' in the shadows, no bodies or glass shards or bits of burnt clothing left.

Just the dark.

She shuddered and scurried out of the hole, grateful when Korea closed the door behind them with a final 'clank.'

She couldn't wait until the trials were over. She hoped every single reaction'ry bastard they had would be found guilty. She hoped Korea would throw them in the air raid shelter before they filled it in.

The work they had to do was speak to a bunch'a victims. People who had seen things happen or had them happen to them. They weren't investigatin'- their comrades and the Women's International Democratic Federation had already done that. This was what SH called a 'grief circle.' Korea had done them all the time durin' the Occupation, even though they made him real uncomfortable.

Every time a village got burned or the Japanese and the collaborators did something else awful, Korea would meet up with the survivors and let them tell him their stories. They got to get things off'a their chests that they might not be able to tell regular folks, but they could tell their Countryhuman. Korea made them forget all their sad for a li'l bit, and used his speeches to make sure they'd keep fightin'.

He always said SH was wrong when she said he did it to make them feel better, and told her the reason he did it was to gather information about Japan's crimes. But they already had a bunch of information about Sincheon, so he couldn't really use that excuse now.

Hae had always liked the grief circles, even if Korea tried to keep her away from 'em. She liked watching people's tears change from bad to good as Korea used his words to make them lighter for the first time in a long time, even if it was just for a bit. And she loved seein' him be just a li'l softer than usual, letting people cry into him if they needed to.

But with every step she took across Sincheon, her insides coiled tighter, like a rope bein' round around a bullwheel.

This wasn't goin' to be Korea's grief circle. It was going to be hers. She was going to have to sit and listen to a bunch of stories like San-gon's, and like what she'd seen during the Yankee occupation. She was going to have to hear about all the horrible awful things everyone had gone through while she tried not to think about the horrible awful things she'd seen, and then she was going to have to comfort them, to make them feel better like Korea did, when all she wanted to do was cry and cry. What had happened to San-gon had almost been too much for her, and Hae knew that even though he'd had to hear his mama die for him, and he was never goin' to be able to forget that…

He had gotten off lucky. They both had.

The weevil feelin' hadn't gone away, and the shivers hadn't either. They'd faded, but they were still there, pluckin' at her spine like it was some sort of instrument, even though it was warm now that the sun was up.

It got worse when they got within sight of one of the civilian air raid shelters. It was buried in the ground on the edge of the southern fields, near the river, smaller than the Party shelter, but big enough to hold any peasants it needed to.

She guessed she should have known they'd be doin' it underground, since they weren't supposed to gather in groups over twenty, so the planes couldn't take out too many people at once. And they didn't want bombs interruptin' them.

But…

Hae's feet halted her before they reached the end of the dirt path. Her legs were shaking again.

*'Stupid, stupid.' She smacked her fist against her thigh, even though it hurt the burn there.

Korea was right. She'd been here when all the bad stuff was happening. She shouldn't be afraid now that it was over.

"Comrade Hae?"

She looked up and saw everyone else had stopped, lookin' back at her, SH, Hwang, and Jae-soon with worry, and Korea with impatience.

Jae-soon's thick eyebrows were furrowed. "Are you alright?"

"Um…" Hae looked between them and the air raid shelter.

The door opened, a woman stepping out, holding a cigarette in her shaking hands. Behind her, Hae could see the sliver of dark waiting for her.

"Latrine!" Hae blurted, spinnin' on her heels and tearing off down the road so fast she kicked up dust. "SorryKoreaberightback!"

"Hurry," he called, and he definitely knew she was lying 'cuz he sounded really irritated.

Her heart squeezed, but she didn't stop, salutin' on the run, not taking the part of the intersection that led back to the town, but heading for the river a couple hundred paces away. She didn't cross the bridge, instead darting off the road and through the namul planted between the fields and the bank, careful not to crush any of the plants, until she could throw herself down the bank and tumble to a stop next to the water.

Hae popped up, immediately wrapping her arms around her knees and buryin' her face in them.

She didn't want to make Korea mad. She didn't want to make any'a the hurt people wait any longer, and she didn't want to be actin' like such a baby. But she knew if she walked into that hole right now and had to listen to something even mildly upsetting she would burst into tears. And Korea was right, like always- if she did that, everyone would start tryin' to pretend to be cheerful so they wouldn't upset her any more. They'd keep their bad bits inside. And that was unfair. She'd made it out alive and she'd only got bayoneted and a li'l beat up. She wasn't the one that needed comforting- her people were.

Sometimes she wished she was more like Hwang. It wasn't like he knew how to make people feel better. But he knew words, and he was usually pretty good at not burstin' into tears. Even when he cried, he wasn't a baby about it. Only that one time in the City Hall shelter when he'd finally got to see her again. He had good... composure.

Hae had used to be pretty good at not bursting into tears either. But Sincheon had ruined that.

"Comrade Hae?"

Hae raised her head, makin' sure her eyes hadn't started to betray her. They hadn't so she said, "Ayuh?" to the voice that came from up above.

"You aren't actually usin' the latrine, are you?" Jae-soon called hesitantly.

"No," she admitted. The riverbank wouldn't be the best place to do it if she was. "You can come on down."

He did, stepping carefully, glancin' at the groove in the dirt where it was pretty clear someone had rolled down as he did. The older man- Well, not really. He was forty-one, which meant they were the same age- sat down next to her, slingin' an arm over his knee. Hae fixed her position so she was sittin' criss-cross, which was a li'l more professional.

"Comrade Korea wouldn't let our other comrades follow you," Jae-soon remarked after a moment. "I don't think he wanted me followin', either. I had to pretend not to see him glarin' at me."

"Korea's not bein' mean," Hae rushed to tell him. She knew Korea wouldn't want the Public Security officer knowing she was weak, but she couldn't stand the idea of Jae-soon thinking their Countryhuman was being cruel to her. "He just… Wants me to be able to face this all by myself. And ah need to."

She looked down at her lap. "But ah'm not brave enough."

Jae-soon snorted in amusement, making her pout at him, hurt.

"Why are you laughin'?"

"I won't pretend I completely understand what you two are up to," her friend said. "But Comrade Hae is definitely the bravest one around here."

"Ah'm not," Hae protested. "Ah'm too scared to go in and listen to all the bad things that happened to everyone. Ah just…" She pulled her knees up to her chest, not carin' if it made her look weak. Jae-soon had already seen her cry so hard she threw up anyhow. "Ah want to forget this all ever happened."

Jae-soon's eyes flickered as he looked down at the muddy river water, maybe seein' it how it had looked last year, when it ran red. "I think we all would."

Hae felt worse now. She could forget, if Korea told her she could. But Jae-soon couldn't. Not when his wife was still missing. Neither could Ji-ha or San-gon or Old Man Beom or any of the people that had lost someone in the air raid shelter or any of the other massacres.

Jae-soon looked back up at her. "But you aren't. You came back."

Hae put her chin on her knees, her cheeks burnin' with shame. "Ah only came back 'cuz ah knew Korea would want me to."

"Did he tell you to?"

She shook her head. "He was waitin' for me to be ready."

"So you made the decision to come back on your own."

"'Cuz ah knew it was what he would do."

That didn't mean she was brave. If she was brave, she would've been able to follow through no problem. Korea wouldn't'a got up on the stage on his birthday, then scampered away before he could say anything. She'd gone to Sincheon in the first place 'cuz she knew he would. But Korea wouldn't have broke down crying in front of their soldiers. Korea never cried.

"But you did come back," Jae-soon said. "Which means it's something you would do, too. Can I tell you somethin'?"

Hae nodded, and he shifted to face her.

"There wasn't a single point during those three days last October when I thought you weren't brave. From the moment you got there to the moment we lost you." Jae-soon stated into her eyes, puttin' his hand over his chest. "You never faltered. When we thought Pyongyang had fallen, you didn't even consider leavin'. You launched right into savin' Sincheon. Even though we had less than seven hands worth of people, and barely any weapons, you didn't hesitate to take charge. And you did it all with a smile on your face."

"Ah din't," Hae said miserably, diggin' the tips of her boots into the loose soil. "Ah started bawlin' after we killed Ku Chun-guk, remember? And ah din't know what to do when the radio said Pyongyang fell."

She'd fallen to the ground and hid her head, wantin' nothing more than to curl up in a ball and hide until Korea came to save her.

"And then you got right back up and led us into battle to save that barnful of women and children. Smilin'." Jae-soon put a rough hand on her shoulder, his own lips curved up. "I can guarantee that if you didn't show up, we would've been workin' with a lot less people. And I think it might've just been me, Comrades Ji-ha, Kwang-seok, Ra Hye-in, and Old Man Beom left after that radio announcement. But because of you and how unwaverin' you were, we all kept fightin'. Not a single person that met you here last year would say you weren't brave."

Hae squeezed her legs, hidin' her face in them.

She'd only been unwaverin' because she wanted to see Korea. She had to pretend to be brave 'cuz if she wasn't, she might never get to see him again, and even if she did, he'd be disappointed in her if she gave up. That was the only reason she was able to act like a general. But now Korea was here, and all she wanted to do was cling to his arm and let him take care of all the hard stuff for her.

"But ah can't-"

Hae stiffened, raising her head as she heard somethin'. A low buzz in the distance.

She leaped up, haulin' Jae-soon up with her as she scrambled up the riverbank so she could see the horizon. There in the sky, comin' up from the south-east.

"PLANE!" Hae hollered, hopin' the peasants could hear her. Luckily, the air raid bells started to clang across the river.

"We've got to get 'em out'a the open!" Hae spun around, taking off through the fields.

She could see the men and women that had been sowin' seeds in the harrow trails rushin' for the shelter, Korea, SH, and Hwang runnin' to meet them. Korea threw an old woman onto his back, wheeling around to get her to safety. But farther out in the field-

"The ox!" Hae cried in distress. She thought the plane might just be a shooter, not a bomber, but she knew they'd still aim for the draught animal to try and ruin their plantin'.

The peasant with the harrow was throwing the yoke off and trying to drag the ox toward town, but he was too far out, and his ox din't understand deathbirds, just that his owner was afraid, so he was diggin' his heels in.

"Ah'm comin' to help!" Hae shouted, dodging through rows of soybeans to reach the fallow fields.

"Comrade Hae!" Jae-soon shouted from behind her.

“Go help everyone else!” she called back, not wantin’ to see another comrade get murdered. “And don’t step on the beans!!”

She broke free from them, still watchin’ her footing as she charged across the freshly-harrowed fields so she wouldn’t trample any seed beds. She could hear the plane comin’ closer and see the peasant man shooting looks at the southern plains.

“Run for shelter!” Hae shouted at him. “Ah’ll get him!”

The man hesitated, lookin’ at his ox, then the plane, then ran, kicking up dust as he sprinted after the others.

Hae wasn’t so good with cats or dogs, but she knew how to work farm animals. She slowed to a trot as she reached the ox, smilin’ wide.

“Howdy!” she greeted, pattin’ it on the side, pretending she didn’t hear the jet comin’. “We’ve got to get goin’, Comrade Ox.”

He snorted, swinging his head, antsy from the farmer’s fear.

“Nothin’ to be afraid of,” Hae said, pickin’ up the dropped switch. “We’ve just got to go to the shelter for a li’l while, then you can get back to work.”

She tapped him on the side with the short leather crop, and he started to plod forward, a bit faster without the plough or harrow he was used to, but still too slow.

“Just a bit faster,” Hae said, hittin’ him harder. She always felt a li’l bad about givin’ draught animals the switch, but she knew it didn’t actually hurt with their hides.

“Hae!” SH shouted real loud from the shelter, makin’ the ox snort again.

Hae hushed him, wavin’ her cousin off with her hand. Having someone help wouldn’t make the ox move faster, just freak him out. She smacked him again, shootin’ a look to where the plane was swooping in over the fields across the river.

Its machine guns sputtered, making her heart squeeze, hoping it wasn't shooting at someone who hadn't made it to cover in time.

"Move faster, Comrade Ox," Hae said, then added, "Pretty please. We're almost there."

Just a few dozen more metres. The plane was over the river now and Hae was not looking any more. She hoped Korea wouldn't shoot at the jet and scare the ox.

Maybe he did understand deathbirds, 'cuz as the buzz got closer, the ox started to trot, his bell jinglin' as Hae sped up, skippin' next to him until they reached the edge of the field, and Korea and Jae-soon were rushing forward, covering her while she finally snatched the ox's rope halter and hauled him down the broad steps, the peasant man scurrying to help, shoving at the animal's haunches until they had it inside the shelter, just as bullets started to rattle outside.

Hae leapt for the door, but Korea and Jae-soon were already in, slamming it shut behind them. The muffled buzz outside faded, but didn't disappear.

"It will try and make another pass," Korea said immediately, halfway out the door again. "I'll keep watch."

"Korea, it shot at somethin' across the river," Hae told him. "Someone might be hurt."

"You keep watch then. I'll go check."

Hae nodded enthusiastically, even though she felt guilty for bein' glad she wouldn't have to start the grief circle yet. She slunk out after him, Jae-soon coming with her.

"Be safe, Korea!" she called as he set off for the bridge.

He shot her a glare over his shoulder. "When I am back, you will be going in there."

Hae wilted, glumly eyeing the plane as it flew over the north of the city, hopin' Ji-ha and the work crew would be alright. They probably had to hide in that awful burnt shelter.

She wrapped her arms around herself.

"See?" Jae-soon nudged her in the side. "You are brave."

Hae looked up at him, confused. "But ah din't do anythin'."

"You went and saved Pak Do-hun's ox, even though you could've been shot. Didn't even hesitate."

The province shook her head. "That wasn't brave. Ah just wanted to make sure we din't lose another draught animal to the miguk-nom. We need 'em so we can feed people, and the well-bein' of the Republic is more precious than life itself."

"And you risked yourself for the well-bein' of the Republic," Jae-soon stressed, keepin' an eye on the plane, while Hae kept one on Korea as he crossed the bridge.

It wasn't a risk. Even if Hae had got shot full of holes, Korea would've ran into the field and saved her. She'd be fine after awhile, she'd just be upset she couldn't save the ox.

"But ah wanted to do that," she said. "Doin' somethin' you want to do isn't brave. Doin' something you don't want to is."

Like Korea gettin' up on stage to talk to their people, or going to the frontline to visit all their soldiers, even though he wanted to keep avoiding them.

"You came back here, even though you didn't want to."

Hae looked down, then quickly back up at the plane. "But ah'm… afraid."

Her cheeks burned under the bandages as she admitted it. It was dumb. Korea didn't get afraid, so she shouldn't either.

Jae-soon shook his head. "Bein' brave isn't not bein' afraid." He gazed out at the town, followin' the dot of the jet as it soared towards Mount Kuwol. "You know, I didn't want to come back to Sincheon either."

Hae blinked. "You din't?"

"No. When I thought about comin' back here to my house, and what I might see when I opened the door, who I might not see…" The man took a shuddering breath. "I was afraid to dig up those trenches, too, and bring the bodies from the air raid shelters. I was afraid that some of them might be my neighbours or my friends or my…"

He closed his eyes, so Hae watched the horizon for him.

"And I was afraid durin' the American occupation, too," he continued, voice thick. "When we were bringin' those women to the mountain, we were vulnerable. The Yanks or the puppets or the reactionaries could've swept down on us at any time. And takin' care of that many people in the middle of winter with barely any supplies was harsh. I… thought about just leavin' sometimes. Just pickin' up and goin'."

Hae's eyes widened. "You wouldn't'a!"

"I might've," he said reluctantly. "But whenever the thought crossed my mind, I'd shoo it away. You know why?"

"Why?"

"Because I knew you wouldn't have. Every time I found myself flaggin' on the march or in the mountains, or hesitatin' about whether or not to come back here, you know what I asked myself?"

He smiled at her. "I asked myself 'What would General Hae have done?' And then I kept fightin', even though I was afraid."

Hae stared up at him, her heart swellin'. "Really?"

He nodded. "I wouldn't lie to you. Even if you don't feel brave right now, I promise you you are."

Jae-soon gazed out at the empty fields of Sincheon, still searchin' for someone that wasn't there anymore. "Facing the things that make us afraid is the bravest thing we can do."

Hae looked down at her hands, fiddlin' with her fingers.

She guessed… that was true. And she had gone on to Sincheon, even if she'd just wanted to run back to Hwang. And even though she wanted to curl up and hide she hadn't. She'd ran off to distract the reactionaries, too, even though her legs wouldn't stop shaking.

And maybe she'd done that 'cuz she wanted to see Korea again and she knew it was what he would do, but… Maybe it was what she would do, too. She had really wanted to save everyone.

Hae looked out at the river, where Korea was helpin' someone across it, their arm around his shoulders as they limped towards them.

Maybe if she kept being brave because she knew Korea would be, one day she'd just be brave because she was. And then maybe she wouldn't be afraid at all, just like him.

The idea made her excited. If that happened, then Korea would definitely be impressed with her! He might even pat her on the head!

"Does that mean you've perked up now?" Jae-soon asked in bemusement as Hae vibrated in place.

"Ayuh!" Hae threw herself at him, snatchin' a hug before Korea could get back. "You're right, Jae-soon- ah am real brave, and one day ah'm goin' to be even braver! Ah ain't never goin' to be afraid again! And neither are you!"

"That's…" Jae-soon chuckled as he clapped her on the back. "If you say so. I'm lookin' forward to it, Comrade General."

Hae released the Security officer and immediately took off down the road while he watched in confusion.

"KOREAAAAAAAA!"

Korea looked alarmed as she sprinted in, rapidly closin' the distance between them. “What?”

“You’ve got to hurry,” she urged, bouncin’ in place in front of him and the peasant he was helpin’. “We need to help the people here then get movin’ across the county! We need to speak to as many comrades as possible.”

“Yes,” her Countryhuman said irritably. “That’s what I’ve- South Hwanghae put that man down!”

“Can’t, plane’s comin’ back,” Hae chirped, hoisting the peasant up in her arms with an effort as the jet returned from surveyin’ Mount Kuwol. “Don’t worry,” she assured the terrified man as he clung to her shoulders. “Ah’ve got you!”

He was taller than her and she wasn’t as strong as Pyo, so she couldn’t run back to safety. But she could still waddle faster than the injured man could limp.

“South Hwanghae!”

“Hurryin’!”

Hae was still filled with shivers and weevils, and- even though she really didn’t want to admit it- fear.

But she could do this. She could face Sincheon and everything that had been done to her people ‘cuz Korea needed her to.

And she wanted to.

I think it’s fun when they try to say ‘Well the American and South Korean armies were in Sincheon (because they undeniably were), but they didn’t participate in the massacre. It was just right-wing youth groups.’ Yes. I am so sure that the American army- which had already committed several massacres at that point and has a well-documented history (and future) of not seeing foreigners as people and committing horrific rapes and tortures against them, plus British and Australian witnesses in other Northern cities that attest to mass burials and shootings by Americans- and the Southern army, which also had several massacres under their belt by that point (Jeju, Taejon, Seoul, Busan, etc.) just suddenly decided that they would sit back and refuse to partake this one singular time. Not even adding that hey, actually, sitting back and letting your allies do that (right-wing youth groups that supposedly had noooooo equipment or funding by America or Rhee (we know now that many of them did) and as such should have very little weaponry or training) when you could easily stop them would be pretty much the same as doing it yourself. If I saw a guy raping a woman, I'd bash his brains in. But if I saw a guy watching I'd off him, too. Maybe the crime isn't the same but the punishment should be.

Also you can see in the US communiques to the UN that they were targeting ox carts. This is a direct line from the Far East Naval Forces summary for Tuesday September 16th (the day this chapter takes place on): 'In the Yellow Sea, British pilots from the carrier HMS Ocean hit targets from Haeju to Chinnampo. A troops headquarters was destroyed, along with seventeen ox carts, two rail bridges, two road bridges, seventeen sampans, one building, and one large brick shed.' And these ox carts wouldn't have just been left in the open while not being used, especially with all the DPRK's precautions. It doesn't matter if one is being used to plow the field- it could be used to carry ammunition to the front. Sick people I hope they're suffering on the street or in Hell now.

Claw Your Way Out

TW: Discussion of sexual assault of women and minors. Not graphic, just the emotional aspect of it.

Hae faced the air raid shelter (Jae-soon had already taken the slightly injured and even more confused peasant inside). It wasn't as dark as it could be since the people in it had lit up a couple lanterns.

But shadows still clung to the walls like the sooty dust in the Party shelter.

'No flinchin'!'

Hae took one more look at Korea, who nodded at her before liftin' his head to the sky, keeping lookout as the plane circled Sincheon again.

She could do this.

The province drew herself up, then skipped into the shelter.

This one could fit maybe fifty people comfortably, but there were only around forty in it, sitting on cushions and wooden chairs that'd been brought in to make the place more comfortable, with a few squatting around a game of pumpkin gonu that was scratched into the dirt floor. There were two hands' worth of the peasants that had been workin' the fields, but the rest were the people Hae was here to meet.

She could tell them apart easy, and not just 'cuz'a their clothes. The peasants were used to being interrupted by the deathbirds, so having to cut and run didn't bother them none. They were just chattin' or taking a nap while they waited to get back to work.

The witnesses were different. They were fidgeting and kept dartin' glances at the door, like they were afraid someone might burst in.

And they were mostly women, like SH had said before.

A few were talking with each other, whispering and shaking their heads. Two women stood off to the side, one of them occasionally murmuring something to her friend. She didn't look like she was listenin', staring warily at the men, both the peasants and the few male witnesses, in between shooting looks at a younger woman standing in the corner, dressed in a nice sky blue blouse and skirt. She didn't pay any attention, looking down at the sling around her chest, which Hae realized had a baby in it.

The woman Hae had seen smoking outside had lit another cigarette, and was fillin' the room with the smell of smoke. She usually liked the smell of tobacco, but here, buried under the earth like this…

'Nope! Not thinkin' about it!'

"Howdy, y'all!" she chirped, trying to drown out the sound as she closed the door behind her.

Everyone bowed to her, one of the women greetin' her as she did. "Comrade South Hwanghae."

"You can just call me Hae." She knew no one would. Everyone always added 'comrade,' even the Gen'ral. She couldn't even get 'em to use 'dongmu' instead of 'dongji.' "And he's just Hwang." She pointed at her brother, who was talkin' to the peasant with the ox, and he pushed his glasses up, waving.

"Alright, Comrade Hae." The smokin' woman sounded steadier than Hae had thought she would, steadier than her hands at least. "When do we start pouring our hearts out?"

"We can collect your testimonies once the enemy plane has departed," Hwang said, really meanin' 'When everyone else gets out of here.'

Hae didn't really like how 'collecting testimonies' sounded. She caught her brother's eye, frownin' slightly.

‘Too clinical again.’

He hung his head.

Hae put her hands on her hips. “While we wait for the miguk-nom to fly off, why don’t we all introduce ourselves?”

Everyone did. She learned that the smokin’ woman was Ro Kwan-rin, the one with the baby was Ko Kuil-hwa, the one that kept lookin’ at her funny was Yang Jeong-nyeo and her friend (who was actually her cousin) was Yang Yang-sin. And the ox’s name was Plodder, which Hae thought was sort of mean. She would have called him Bulgogi.

By the time they were done, Korea had ducked back into the shelter and given the all-clear, so Hae said goodbye to Plodder and all the peasants as they left to return to plantin’.

“Work hard!” she called, really really wishin’ she could go with them.

But she didn’t. Jae-soon left to take the injured man to the medic, givin’ her an encouraging smile before he did.

“Comrades,” Korea called, his voice immediately catchin’ everyone’s attention. “I have my own investigation to conduct across Sincheon, so I’m afraid I’ll have to leave you now. But you’re in good hands with Comrades South and North Hwanghae, and South Hamgyong.”

He slid his eye to Hae, lettin' her know it was her hands he expected to hold them.

Everyone said bye, and he turned for the door. As he passed Hae, he muttered, too low for anyone to hear, “Don’t handle this how I would.”

She didn’t get a chance to respond before Korea shut the door, sealing them all underground.

Hae took a shaky breath, and she thought Kwan-rin might’ve, too.

The province exhaled slowly, then spun around with a smile on her face. “Alright comrades, make yourselves comfy. We’re not interrogatin’ anyone. We just want to hear for ourselves what the Yankees did.”

“Didn’t the foreign women already come here and ask their questions? Didn’t the government?” Yang Jeong-nyeo asked, wringin’ her hands 'round and 'round. “I thought it was done, I thought it was over.”

“This is voluntary,” SH soothed from where she was standin’ with some of the other women. “If you don’t want to share what happened to you, you don’t have to.”

“I don’t want to,” Jeong-nyeo’s voice was sort of shrill, like Gang’s got when he was real nervous. “I want to go home.”

She twitched towards the door, but her cousin caught the sleeve of her choson-ot. “Jeong-nyeo, stay. This will be good for you.”

“I don’t want to be in here with that thing!” Jeong-nyeo hissed, her brown eyes flashing.

Hae followed her glare, puzzled to see she was looking at Kuil-hwa. The young mother drew her baby closer to her chest.

Yang-sin winced, but none of the women or men stood up for Kuil-hwa.

“Don’t force her to stay if she doesn’t want to,” SH said, which was good because Hae didn’t know what to do. She smiled at Jeong-nyeo. “You don’t have to tell anyone anything.”

“But it might make you feel better,” Hae piped up, even though her belly was churnin’. What had been done to the woman to make it so she was still so distressed almost a whole year later?

Jeong-nyeo hesitated, her eyes darting between the men, Kuil-hwa, and then back to SH. Then, ‘cuz SH had a smile that made you feel like everythin’ was going to be okay, she hunched her shoulders and stepped back towards her cousin, who put an arm around her.

“Let’s sit down, okay?” Yang-sin guided her over to a wooden crate, and the man nearby respectfully stepped away. SH followed, putting herself between the nervous woman and the rest of the room.

Hae bobbed her head, pleased, though she glanced at Kuil-hwa, still confused by how Jeong-nyeo had glared at her. The mother smiled at her, a li’l sad, as she settled herself against one of the wall supports.

“Okay!” the province said, taking up a spot in front of the door. “Who wants to go first?”

No one spoke. One of the men looked at the ground. Jeong-nyeo shrank into Yang-sin. Kuil-hwa toyed with the edge of her baby’s sling.

Hae looked to SH for help. But her cousin glanced at the door, then bit her lip apologetically.

She knew Korea would be able to get someone to talk. But she wasn’t good at ordering people around the way he was, and he’d said not to handle it like he would anyway.

An idea popped into her mind. It really wasn’t one Korea would have used, and it made her want to curl up into a ball again. But it might work, if she could manage not to be a cry-baby.

Hae sucked in a breath. “Ah’ll go first then.”

Hwang’s eyes widened and everyone else looked at her, too.

A man in a hood asked, “You really were in Sincheon last year?”

She nodded. “Ayuh. Only for a few days, but ah was workin’ with the militia the whole time. Ah’ll tell y’all all about it.”

Hae launched into her account, startin’ with her and her brother meeting Sok-young on the road. She was careful to keep her tone cheery, even when she started slippin’ into the Military Report voice. If she started mumbling or crying, everyone would feel sorry for her, and start trying to cheer her up. But if she pretended none’a it bothered her, maybe everyone would feel like their own stories were easier to tell.

Her eyes burned a li'l when she talked about Kwang-seok, but she forced herself to keep smilin', only stopping to praise him.

'No cryin'!'

When she was done, one of the men spat on the floor. Gross. "Those bastards. What happened in the camp?"

"Nothin' important," she said confidently. She didn't want to distract anyone from what they were here for, and she knew Korea wouldn't want their people to know about the Southern One's part in keepin' her locked up. "So, who's next?"

Yang-sin looked at Jeong-nyeo, but her cousin shrank down.

"I'll go." The man in the hood stood up, and pulled it back.

Hae couldn't stop her eyes from widening. Burns covered half his face, not wet and bloody like hers, but dry scars that made his skin look all pruny, like Pyobu's had when he came back from his mission. His short hair only grew on the left side of his scalp- the rest of it was thick pink tissue that ran down his face, swelling his eye shut and twisting the corner of his lips before disappearing into the collar of his workshirt.

"What happened?" Hae asked, makin' sure she didn't sound as alarmed as she felt. For the first time, she really appreciated that her burns didn't work like normal ones.

"Reaction'ries lit me on fire." His mangled lips made the words slur together, and Hae could see flashes of too much tooth when he spoke. "My fault I guess- I was in the Worker's Party."

He sounded like he was trying to make a joke, but his expression didn't match it.

"Folks kept comin' to me to see if I knew when the army was comin' back," he slurred. "The Skull and Crossbones Unit caught on. Dragged me and my wife from our house and doused us in gas'line."

His good eye flickered as he looked down. “I was the only one that made it.”

The room went quiet. Hae wanted to say she was sorry, but it didn’t feel like that was enough. And she wasn’t sure if he’d appreciate ‘She gave her life for our country’ when his wife hadn’t died in combat.

Hwang saved her by being insensitive again. “Did you say you were in the Worker’s Party?”

Hae squinted at her brother while the man nodded dejectedly. “I resigned after. The masses don’t want someone that looks like this vanguardin’ them.” He gestured to his burnt face.

“No one thinks that way, Mr. Kang,” one of the women said gently. “No one but you.”

Hae nodded enthusiastically, seeing a place to help. “Ah think you still look handsome.”

Kang Dong-joon’s lips twisted more, but his eye stayed on the floor. “I’m well-aware I look like a freak. I have one eye and I look like someone tried to make kimchi out of me, but gave up halfway.”

Vigorously shakin’ her head, Hae denied, “Nope! There’s nothin’ wrong with only havin’ one eye. Korea only has one eye.”

Dong-joon blinked, and someone else echoed, “Comrade Korea only has one eye?”

‘Oops.’ Hae could feel disapproval seepin’ through the door at her back, and knew she was going to get beat with a sandal later. Or a military boot since that was all they had right now.

“Ayuh,” she said, quickly movin’ on before they could ask any more about it. She would love to tell them the Southern One had taken Korea’s eye, so they’d be just as peeved at him as her. But Korea didn’t want that. “And he doesn’t look like a freak. He’s still real handsome.”

More door disapproval.

“Be that as it may, Comrade Korea isn’t covered in these.” Dong-joon touched his burnt face.

Korea wouldn’t want her talkin’ about his burns, so Hae said instead, “But a lot’a other revolutionaries are. And ah am.” She peeled back one of the bandages on her cheek, wincin’ as the medical tape stuck to her skin. “Ah’m covered in ‘em,” she said cheerily as everyone eyed her burnt-up face with a mix of anger, sadness, and worry.

Hae didn’t want to make anyone feel bad for her, so she pasted the bandage back on, pattin’ it down.

“Mine aren’t goin’ to stick around,” she told him. “But they’re here right now. You don’t think ah look like a freak, do ya?”

Maybe she sounded just a li’l more concerned than she should. ‘Cuz actually, what if he said she did? Then her point would be gone and she’d be upset to boot.

But Dong-joon shook his head right away.

“Exactly,” Hae said, relieved. “And if they did stay around, do you think ah’d look like a freak then?”

Again he shook his head. “Comrade Hae’s burns represent the destruction the Yankee army has brought to Korea, and the resilience of our country in withstanding it. They could never look freakish.”

“And your burns represent that, too,” Hae told him. “They came after you ‘cuz you did good for our country. And you were resilient enough to survive it. Any’a our people would be happy to have you vanguardin’ them.”

The other townsfolk nodded, and she beamed at him. “And ah think the scars make you look dashin’.”

The cheek that wasn’t covered in scar tissue turned red, and Dong-joon hid his face.

“I’ll… think about reapplyin’,” he mumbled into his chest. “If they'll have me after I wavered."

"You didn't waver ideologically," Hwang said, finally sayin' something that was halfway sensitive. "You wavered on yourself. If you explain your circumstances, I'm sure you'll be allowed to return."

Hae nodded. "We'll vouch for ya!"

Dong-joon breathed in slowly, then dipped his head. "Thank you, comrades."

Hae felt silly for ever thinkin' her gap tooth would make people think she looked ugly. Dong-joon's burns were way more noticeable, but even though they were awful 'cuz of how he'd got them, she couldn't see them as ugly no matter how she looked at him.

It made her happy to see that when he sat back down, he didn't put his hood back up.

Success! Thrilled by it, Hae turned back to the rest of the room, grinnin'.

"Who wants to go next?"

It took over an hour to go through everyone in the shelter, each story worse than the last. One of the other men had watched his best friend be dragged off for snickering at an anti-American poster someone had put up, and he couldn't do anything to stop it. He'd found him later, buried in a shallow grave and sawed in half at the waist. A woman's husband had been snatched out of the rice mill and driven into the countryside. He hadn't come back. Another had to watch her fifteen-year old son be shot for trying to stop a reactionary from beating her. Ro Kwan-rin had been buried alive, and the only reason she hadn't died was because she'd been near the top and was able to make a small air hole, which explained why she looked about as happy to be underground as Hae felt.

When she thought of that, of being trapped under the earth, the bodies of her friends and neighbours underneath and on top of her as she took slow, shallow breaths for hours until the puppets left, buried in a mass grave like a corpse, Hae's lungs drew tight. It was worse than the hole. Worse than anythin'.

She hoped that shot had killed San-gon's mama.

Every time someone finished talking, it got harder and harder for Hae to think of ways to cheer them up, or at least make them stop crying. It got harder and harder for her not to.

There were only twenty-seven of them. And while it was a big number when it came to people who were hurtin', it didn't even fill the air raid shelter. But a dozen places like this one had been filled with bodies, hundreds of them. Thousands. And even more had suffered. Even the ones that hadn't had anythin' happen to them, like Yang-sin, knew people that had.

Hae listened intently to each story, not just so she'd know what had been done once the enemy had finished with her, but so she could try and comfort the ones tellin' it. The man couldn't have helped his friend- they had promised each other to take care of the other's wife if one of 'em died. The woman had done everything she could to find her husband, from following the truck to interrogating the reactionaries to putting up posters now. Kwan-rin was brave and strong and going through what she had was worth it so they could know just how evil the miguk-nom and their puppets really were.

She tried to work at the knots of pain and unravel them, or at least loosen them. But it was getting too hard to keep smilin' at them when they were finished. Her face felt like it was cracking, and not from the burns that her peeling medical tape kept revealing.

"Ah'm so sorry," she said to the old lady that had just told her in a shaking voice that both her legs had been broken by a boy she'd used to nag for runnin' in the marketplace.

"They was actin' just like the Japs," the grey-haired woman said in a thin voice as she trembled. "All of 'em. 'Twere like the years ran back."

“But they didn’t,” Hae said, walkin’ over to stand next to her chair. “The Japanese are all gone. And soon the reaction’ries and the Yanks will be, too. And they won’t be settin’ foot in Sincheon before then. This is our land and we ain’t goin’ to let anyone take it away from us ever again, even if they used to live here.”

She smiled confidently, and the grandmother let out a shaky sigh, noddin’.

“If I might ask,” Hwang cut in. “What was the boy’s name?”

“Shin Kyong-gu, Minister Shin’s boy.” The old woman spat a glob of saliva onto the floor. Grosssss. “We ran him outta town after Liberation for collaboratin’ with the Japs. But they came back.”

Hwang frowned. “I don’t recall seeing his name on the list of those charged so far. Did he escape to the south again?”

Something in the bunker changed. Hae didn’t really know what, but a few of the townsfolk gave each other looks, the old woman’s grandson included. They were using their own silent language, like her an’ her cousins did.

After a weird second, the old woman turned to Hwang, her wrinkly face unreadable.

“Ayuh. They did.”

Hwang clicked his tongue. “Then I assure you once we win this war, we will make every effort to find him and bring him to justice.”

“You don’t need to worry about that, Comrade Hwang,” her grandson said before the grandmother hushed him sharply.

“Ah,” Hwang said after a moment. “I see.”

Hae didn’t. How could they not worry about whether or the bastard that had broken an old woman’s legs was still out there or not? If he’d waited five years to come back, he would defiantly do it again and hurt someone else.

But her brother was already sayin' to forget he asked, so she tucked away a reminder to ask later.

Jeong-nyeo and Kuil-hwa were the only two who hadn't shared their experiences yet, so Hae looked between them as she said, "Who's next?"

The older woman looked away, her hands ballin' in the skirts of her choson-ot, and the young mother gazed down at her baby.

"Come on, comrades, don't be shy," Hae said, then saw SH's look and remembered to add, "You don't have to. But if ya think it would make you feel even a li'l bit better, then you should."

"I'll go," Kuil-hwa quietly volunteered. She was sittin' on the floor with her legs curled up sideways underneath her. She drew them in closer, cradling the baby in the sling.

Hae caught the way Jeong-nyeo glared at her again. SH had seen it, too, but when she furrowed her eyebrows at her, her cousin just gave her a tiny head shake.

Kuil-hwa's voice was so soft, they almost had to stop breathin' to hear her speak.

"We went to the market," she said, her eyes on her baby. "It was only two weeks since the Americans occupied us, and I knew it still wasn't safe in town. But the consumer's cooperative was shut down almost immediately, the rations still weren't being distributed, and we'd lost our pantries in the bombings. Our parents needed food. So my husband and I figured it would be okay so long as we went together."

"That never stopped them," one of the women muttered bitterly.

"No," Kuil-hwa agreed quietly. "I know that now." She took a shaky breath. "When we got to the market we couldn't afford anything. Everyone was raising prices, trying to make enough to get out of town, and no one was doing anything to stop them."

Hae got why someone would be desperate to get out of Sincheon, and she knew the miguk-nom were worse for refusing to distribute aid or keep the ration system running. But she still wished she could track down everyone that had been profiteerin' and give them a piece of her mind.

"We went to leave, but then a couple Yankee soldiers started tailing us," Kuil-hwa continued. "They followed us from the market. I don't know what they were saying, but they were jeering and whistling, and one of them was waving American money around."

Hae saw SH's jaw feather like Korea's as her eyes narrowed.

"My husband had enough, and he started yelling back at them, calling them bastards, telling them to go back where they came from." Kuil-hwa's hold on her baby tightened. "I begged him to just be quiet, told him that I didn't mind. But… he wouldn't. He was like that ever since we were kids- he couldn't stand to let someone humiliate me. And they got mad. They dragged us out to the edge of town and made him watch as they…"

She started to shake, and SH quickly went to her side as she curled into a ball around her baby.

"It's okay," she soothed, crouchin' next to her. "It's over. You're safe now."

Kuil-hwa started to cry, soft gaspin' sounds that made Hae's heart hurt.

"Oh please."

The words were loud enough in the hush to make Hae jump. They all looked to see who'd spoken.

Jeong-nyeo was standing up, her fists balled at her sides as Yang-sin tried to pull her back onto the crate.

"Jeong-nyeo-"

"No!" she snapped, shaking her off. "I'm sick of sittin' here and pretendin' like she has any right to be here with us, like she has any right to play victim."

Hae blinked, shocked. She thought one of the others might jump to Kuil-hwa's defense, but again, no one did. Only SH.

"Comrade Ko Kuil-hwa is a victim," she said firmly, something flickerin' across her eyes. "If she's telling the truth- and we are not accusing any of our comrades here of being liars- then she is just as much a victim of the Yankees' violence as anyone in here."

"Really?" Jeong-nyeo sneered. "Then ask her why she's keepin' their spawn."

Kuil-hwa flinched, wrappin' her arms around her baby protectively.

Hae didn't get it at first, but Hwang's eyes widened right away. "You're saying…?"

"I'm saying she's awfully eager to raise something that was supposedly forced on her."

All the townsfolk turned their eyes on Kuil-hwa, but now Hae realized it wasn't her they were glarin' at, but the baby. Even SH drew back a li'l, something twistin' her expression. Hae would've expected her to look at a Yankee soldier that way, but not a kid.

"Jun-seong might have been forced on me," Kuil-hwa said under the watching eyes. "But that doesn't matter. He's still mine."

"'Jun.'" Jeong-nyeo snorted hatefully. "I wonder how your husband would've felt knowing you named another man's child like it was his. You can tell everyone he killed himself because he couldn't bear the shame of not being able to protect his wife, but you know what I think?"

"Jeong-nyeo," Yang-sin pleaded, trying to grab her cousin. But she shoved her away, stalking towards Kuil-hwa.

"I think he tied that noose because he couldn't stand that his wife is a slut who goes around spreading her legs for the first handsome foreigner she sees."

Hae gaped in dismay, and Kuil-hwa shouted, "That's not true! I love Yeong-jun! I never would have chosen to be unfaithful to him. Never."

"But you're keepin' the son of the man that raped you!" Jeong-nyeo snarled. "You're raisin' the thing that the man that made him kill himself planted in you."

"That isn't Jun-seong's fault!" the mother cried, her voice echoing around the shelter. It made her son wake up, and his li'l pink face scrunched up as he started to cry.

Jeong-nyeo flinched back at the sound, fear contorting her features, like he was a full-grown Yankee soldier and not a two-month old baby.

"If you had suffered the way I had you would never want to keep that thing," she said, her voice low and shaky now. "You would've carved out your womb before you let that out of it."

"Ms. Yang." Kuil-hwa was quieter, too, as she bounced her baby on her knee. "I know what you went through, but I-"

"No you don't!" Jeong-nyeo exploded again. "If you did you would kill that thing before it grows into a monster like them and does what monsters do!"

"He's just a child," the younger woman pled. "He isn't responsible for how he was made. And I am responsible for what he turns into. My son won't be a monster. See?"

She pulled the white fabric of the sling away from his face. He'd stopped crying with her bouncin', and looked more tired again. He made a gurgling noise that Hae thought was pretty cute, and stretched out a tiny fist. He looked like any other baby she'd ever seen- round-faced and a li'l wrinkly, sort of like a dried plum.

But Jeong-nyeo's chest started to heave as she stumbled backwards, almost tripping over her own feet. She glanced frantically around the room, her eyes bulging out'a her head.

Yang-sin reached for her again, tryin' to get an arm around her shoulders. "Jeong-nyeo, it's okay. Just breathe-"

"Don't touch me!" Jeong-nyeo snapped, shoving her away. "Get away from me, just-! I can't be in here with that thing, I can't-"

She didn't finish her sentence, turning and fleeing, ignoring Yang-sin as she called for her, bursting out of the bunker and disappearing up the stairs. Her cousin followed, slamming the door behind her.

Everyone stared after them in stunned silence, Hae especially.

She couldn't understand why the older woman had said something so cruel to Kuil-hwa after they'd gone through what she thought must be the same thing by how Jeong-nyeo had been talking.

And she couldn't understand how still no one was tryin' to comfort Kuil-hwa. She was curled up on the floor, practically sinkin' into the wall with her face buried in her son's sling, and everyone was just ignoring her, staring at the dirt walls or floor like they were purposefully tryin' not to even look at her. Hwang was at least tryin' to catch SH's attention with his eyes to get her to say something, but SH was just staring at the door, her face blank. It was a scary look, but not as scary as how she'd looked at Jun-seong.

Hae looked between them all, baffled, givin' 'em a few more seconds just in case they just couldn't think of anything to say, like Hwang. But still, no one spoke or even came over to pat the shaking woman on the arm.

"What's wrong with y'all?"

The townsfolk all looked at her, a few cringin' all guiltylike, like Pyobu when Korea demanded to know who'd done Pyo's chores for her. It made Hae even madder.

"Comrade Kuil-hwa just had somethin' real awful said to her. Why aren't any of you tryin' to make her feel better?"

"It's alright, Comrade Hae-"

"No it ain't!" Hae cut Kuil-hwa off, stomping her foot as she glared at the bunker full of people. "Y'all're neighbours, even if you never met before today! You can't let someone be mean to a comrade just 'cuz ya don't like her baby. It ain't his fault his daddy was a Yankee and it certainly ain't hers!"

Everyone looked even more guilty now, and SH shook herself, comin' back from wherever she'd been.

"Comrade Hae is right," she said, returnin' to Kuil-hwa's side. "It doesn't matter if the baby is half-Yankee. Like Comrade Korea and Comrade Kim Il-sung say- 'A person isn't defined by their origins, but by their thoughts and actions.' And I'm sure Comrade Ko Kuil-hwa won't raise a man like the Americans and their puppets."

Kuil-hwa nodded, takin' Hae's hand so she could pull her to her feet. "He's half-Korean, too, and that's how he'll be raised. If people didn't talk, I bet no one would even be able to tell the difference."

A few of the townsfolk lowered their eyes.

"Exactly," Hae *'hmph'*ed. "He's just a baby, and ah don't want to see any of y'all treatin' him like he's not. Or treatin' Comrade Kuil-hwa badly. And ah want you to step up if you ever see someone else doin' it. Promise."

She frowned menacingly at them until Dong-joon stood up.

"I promise," he said, a hand over his heart. "And as a former Worker's Party member, I should have remembered our General's words and intervened sooner. Personal factionalism may be different than political factionalism, but it's no less dangerous to the fabric of our society. I'm sorry, Comrade Ko."

He bowed at the waist, and the mother dipped her head, acceptin' a few other apologies and promises to look out for her.

"Thank you," she said quietly.

Hae nodded in satisfaction. "That's better. We ain't like the reaction'ries- we can't go around tearin' each other apart."

"Thank you, Comrade Hae." Kuil-hwa hugged her son tighter to her chest. "I know my decision is unpopular. It is with my family, too, and… Yeong-jun's. But…" She looked down at her son, her dark eyes softenin'. "If I hadn't found out I was pregnant, I wouldn't have been able to go on living after losing him."

The baby reached out for Hae with a tiny fist, and she gave him her hand, vibratin' as he wrapped his stubby fingers around one of hers.

'Cute!' Not as cute as a puppy or kitten, but still cute.

Kuil-hwa's eyes brimmed with love. "Jun-seong is worth any hardship."

Hae worked her finger free, even though the baby didn't want to let her go and was surprisin'ly strong.

"Keep your head up, comrade," she said to Kuil-hwa, then marched for the door.

"Comrade Hae?" someone called. "Where are you goin'?"

"To make sure Comrade Jeong-nyeo is okay."

"Hae." SH hustled after her, catchin' her just outside the shelter where no one could hear them. "Be careful with what you say to her. Don't tell her she's wrong for what she's feeling."

"She is wrong," Hae huffed. "You can't hate someone for what someone else did, 'specially a baby. And you should be more mad about what she said to Comrade Kuil-hwa."

Hae didn't know what 'slut' meant, but SH had flinched when it was said, so it made her think of one of Chungnam's words.

"I am," SH said defensively. "It was definitely wrong of her to say that, and it's… wrong for her to think that. But it isn't wrong that she feels that way. She can't help it, and she doesn't need to be told that her feelings are irrational right now."

"Ah wasn't goin' to," Hae replied indignantly. "Ah know she's hurtin', too."

Just because she was being mean didn't mean she wasn't. It meant she was.

"I'm sorry," SH said, lettin' go of her wrist. "I know you're usually good with things like that. I just…"

She tugged at the hem of her tunic, and Hae smiled at her.

"It's alright," she said, silently forgivin' her for the way she'd looked at Jun-seong.

"Do you need any help?"

Hae looked around, then back at SH, who nodded.

"Right. You can handle it on your own." Her cousin gazed over at the river. Her fists tightened, then she went back inside.

Hae girded herself, then started down the road she'd ran down earlier, towards someone in pain instead of away.

'No lookin' away.'

The peasants were all down at the far end of the field now, so the afternoon was quiet as she marched along the dirt path. She could feel an eye on her, but maybe that was just 'cuz she knew Korea was nearby. He must have moved fast when he heard Jeong-nyeo bolting for the door.

She met Yang-sin at the intersection. The woman was rubbin' her hands together in worry, her eyes fixed on the bridge over the river.

Jeong-nyeo was sitting on the edge like a kid, her heels danglin' over the water a few feet below, her face in her hands. Hae was too far away to see, but she thought she might be crying.

"Comrade South Hwanghae!" Yang-sin spun when she heard her approach, clingin' to her shoulders. "Please go talk to her! She won't talk to me and I- I don't know what to say anyways."

Hae guessed since she thought she would, she'd been doing a good job comfortin' folks. But she didn't really know either.

“She used to be so… open,” Yang-sin said, her eyes sad as she looked over her shoulder. “She was always so upbeat and hard-workin’. She was the sweetest thing. But ever since she moved in with me, she barely speaks or eats. She won’t work the fields, and she can’t go to the market or anywhere else. The only man she can even be alone around is my husband, and she still shuts down when he enters the room. I’m…”

Tears ran down her face as she looked back at Hae. “I’m really worried for her. We grew up together, we’re more like sisters than cousins. And every time I leave for work, I’m so scared that when I get home I’ll find her…” Her voice broke. “I don’t want to lose her. Please, Comrade Hae."

Her desperation made Hae want to hide in the soybeans. What if she couldn’t help her? What if she said the wrong thing and Jeong-nyeo ended up…?

She could still feel Korea watching her, so she straightened up, smilin’ reassuringly.

“Don’t worry!” she chirped, heading confidently off. “Ah’ll make sure her condition’s just fine!”

Hopefully.

Hae forged forward, ‘cuz Korea was watching and also because she really didn’t want to leave Jeong-nyeo sitting all small and lonely on the bridge like that.

The bridge was simple, with no railings or anything fancy ‘cuz it would just get blown up again. But it was sturdy enough to hold a couple of oxen or any military trucks it needed to, so it didn’t do anythin’ more than rattle as Hae flopped down next to Jeong-nyeo on the wooden planks.

“Howdy,” she said, as friendly as possible so she would know she wasn’t here just to scold her for bein’ mean to Kuil-hwa.

Still, Jeong-nyeo muttered, “I know I shouldn’t have said that to Ms. Ko.”

Her voice was all raspy, and Hae could tell she'd been crying for sure.

"No," Hae said, because even if she wouldn't tell her she was wrong for feelin' that way, she should know she should never say something like that again. "It was sort'a awful."

Jeong-nyeo closed her eyes. "I didn't mean it. I know she isn't lyin' about what happened to her. I just… How can she keep it? She's so young, and after everythin' that happened to her, how she even stand to look at that thing?"

Hae didn't really like that she was callin' Jun-seong a thing, but she didn't want to stop her from talkin'.

"'Cuz he's her baby," she said. "And she knows it isn't his fault."

"I know that, too, but-" Jeong-nyeo pulled her legs up to her chest. "I just don't get it."

"Ah don't think you have to," Hae said after thinkin' a second. "She's the only one that has to. All everyone else has to do is support her as their comrade."

Jeong-nyeo's black bun swayed as she shook her head. "I can't. I'll keep my mouth shut and not bother her, but I can't support her."

"Maybe you could at least say sorry?"

She shook her head again. "No. I am sorry, and you can tell her that. But I can't be around her. Or that thing."

That made Hae sad. She'd been hopin' she could get them to make up, and maybe be friends. They both seemed a li'l lonely after all. Maybe they just needed more time.

Jeong-nyeo was silent, starin' off into the southern fields across the river. Hae kicked her heels in the air, watching the water flow by below, all green and muddy, tryin' to think of how to get her to talk.

"Comrade Yang-sin's real worried for you," she said eventually.

“She said she doesn’t know what to say to you.”

“I know.” Jeong-nyeo tore her gaze away to look down the road, where her cousin was still watching them, her hands clasped together. “She wouldn’t.”

Hae frowned. “Why not?”

“She’s never had to suffer,” Jeong-nyeo said eventually. “It wasn’t her ma that died, or her pa that gave her to his brother. She wasn’t the one that got sold off, or whose husband died at the front or whose daughter…”

She trailed off, then said, “I’m not jealous,” even though to sounded a li’l like she was. “I love Yang-sin. I’m glad nothing happened to her when the Yanks were here. But…” Her eyes fell to the river. “She’s never had to fight to be happy. I have. And now that I can’t anymore, she can’t understand.”

“…Ah might,” Hae ventured.

Jeong-nyeo’s eyes flickered. “I mean this with all respect possible, Comrade Hae, but as awful as you had it last year, until you’ve been…” She raised her head, lookin’ suddenly alarmed. “You said you got taken to a POW camp. Did somethin’ happen to you there?”

Hae almost said that plenty had, before what she meant clicked.

“Nothin’ like that,” she said carefully. “Ah’ve never had that happen to me.”

She’d never entirely understood what ‘that’ was until Sincheon. Even after she got all the common sense that her cousins did after the first Foundation Day, she hadn’t really ever thought about it because she wasn’t supposed to have to think about awful things anymore. And after Sincheon, and some of the things she’d seen in the chaos, she’d tried not to.

But Ko Kuil-hwa and her baby made it impossible for her to pretend she still didn’t know why Korea would always have her keep watch when they were investigating a village the Japanese army had came through, refusing to let her into any of the houses, and chase her away from grief circles, or why SH had looked at her the way she had after they'd rescued her, like she was searching for something invisible on her skin, or what her and South Chungcheong's argument that one time had really been about, or why Jae-soon hadn't let her in the barn last year.

She understood now why she was supposed to tell everyone SH had worked in a factory during the Occupation, even though she'd told Hae she'd been living in a house while she entertained people, and why Hwang had always told her to stop asking what instruments she played. And she understood that she'd been real lucky it had never happened to her.

Big Nose and his stinking breath flashed through her mind, the wrong feeling as his hand rucked up her shift coming back, even though she'd tried to bury it a long time ago.

"But ah have suffered." It felt weird to say that about the hole. The hole hadn't been sufferin'. It hadn't been anything. She wasn't supposed to think about it anymore 'cuz Korea was remembering it for her.

Sincheon was suffering. Not because she'd been beat and bayoneted and lost her tooth, but because she'd had to watch her people die. She'd had to see them burnt like chunks of meat, and see what someone's insides looked like when they were out, and had to hear Ra Hye-in sacrifice herself and had to put Kim Moon-sik out of his sufferin' herself.

The hole wasn't suffering 'cuz it had happened to her and she'd lived through it and she couldn't even remember much of it now.

But she guessed it probably was suffering to Korea and her cousins. As upset as she was whenever she saw Korea's scar or thought about how Sang had been worked like a slave or now how SH had…

Their pain was suffering to Hae because she loved them. So hers was probably suffering to them. And maybe Yang Jeong-nyeo would see it that way, too.

"Ah'll tell you all about it," she said, tryin' to sound confident, even though thinkin' about the hole, even thinking of trying to remember it made the bad thoughts well out of her and made her want to crawl under the bridge until Korea came and got her. "Then you can decide if ah can understand."

"…Alright," Jeong-nyeo whispered.

Hae pulled her legs up under her, getting comfortable and getting as close to huggin' herself as she could without actually doing it. She didn't have Korea here to make her give the Military Report, but she tried to turn her brain off the same way and not think about what she was sayin'.

She guessed it was a good thing 'Merica and the Southern One locking her up had made her think about Big Nose and the hole. She had more to report.

She'd never had to tell anyone about it before. Korea made sure everyone knew that bad things had happened to the provinces during the Occupation, 'cuz everyone needed to know why they hadn't been fightin' for them for the first decade, but he also told them not to say too much about it. Hae had told journalists and politicians and other peasants that she'd been locked up in a cellar by Japan, but nothing else.

Now she told Jeong-nyeo about Japan and the rat and the needles and the beetle and the maggoty rice Big Nose would bring her, and thinking about how it felt to swallow the wrigglin' larvae made Hae remember other things. How he would stand there and eat his good-smelling dinner while she lay in the corner, her stomach growling. How he'd mock her and call her 'chosenjin' which she'd never realized was supposed to be an insult until Hwang had told her the Japanese used 'Korean' as a slur. How he'd laughed at her the time she threw up and begged him to get her new clothes then left her to rot in her own sick until Eyebrows had shown up and bathed her.

She couldn't remember his face, just like she couldn't remember Big Nose's. But she could sort of see the way he'd looked at her then, as he stripped her down and wiped her clean with a wet cloth, apologizin' for not being able to get her a new shift, only wash the old one. The eyes under his impressive eyebrows were blurry in her head, but she knew they'd been sad. She wondered if that was when he'd decided to try and find Korea or someone else to free her.

She didn't know. She didn't know if that was at the end of the hole or the beginning. It all blurred together, just like it had when she was in it. All she had left were little bits that didn't fit together right, like a puzzle without all the pieces. The needles came after asking Japan if he liked talking to her 'cuz it made him less lonely and Korea came after that and that was all she was sure about. That and how hungry lonely bored she'd been.

Hae wanted to smile when she was done spewin' out words, but all she could do was shake. She didn't want to remember and she shouldn't have because it made her feel sick and dirty again and she didn't want to keep it.

The afternoon suddenly seemed too bright, the autumn breeze too fresh compared to the sludge in Hae's insides.

"Eleven years?" Jeong-nyeo whispered into the silence, her eyes glimmering with tears. "You were in there for eleven years?"

The number felt bigger than her memories. But Hae knew it was true. She'd met Japan on the first day she was formed and he'd pushed her into that hole then, too. Eleven years and a couple months.

"Korea didn't know about me until then," she told her. Her throat didn't want to speak, but she didn't want the woman to think he'd taken so long to save her on purpose. "He had Hwang, so he thought he had Hwanghae. He came right away when he found out."

"Eleven years," Jeong-nyeo said, the tears startin' to run down her cheeks. "God above. My daughter was eleven."

"What happened to her?" Hae held her breath.

The woman closed her eyes, the tears still comin'. Then she rasped, "We were workin' in the field alone. My husband was a landlord before Liberation, so it was our private plot we were allowed to keep. Usually Yang-sin and her husband would come over and help, but they were at work, and our neighbours were too scared of the armies comin' in from the south. I was, too. It was why I kept Su-nyeo home from school." She looked across the river, then lowered her gaze. "But I wanted to get the rice in."

Hae looked down at her hands.

"I saw the southern army comin', and made Su-nyeo hide out in the paddies. But they'd already seen me. A few split off and started askin' questions. 'Do you know if any KPA are still in the area? How well do you know Sincheon? Are there any guerrillas around?' I told them I didn't know, but they wouldn't take no for an answer. They started shovin' me, callin' me a Communist, accusin' me of helpin' 'the enemy.'" Jeong-nyeo exhaled slowly. "One of them tried to make the others stop, but another pointed a gun at him and told him to shut it. They started gettin'… handsy, and I ended up cuttin' one of them with my sickle. After that they said I had to do what they wanted or they'd kill me. If it wasn't for Su-nyeo, I would have made them. But I couldn't leave her alone.

"I did try to fight," she said, like she thought Hae wouldn't believe her. "But there were three of them, and they had guns. In the end… I couldn't stop it. They all had their way with me, even the one that tried to stand up for me."

"That isn't your fault," Hae said, confused that the woman sounded guilty. "You were lookin' out for Su-nyeo."

Jeong-nyeo's eyes gleamed with more tears. "Mm. She stayed quiet the whole time. We'd practiced before, when we had to hide in the air raid shelters, just in case. I wasn't even sure if she was still there until they'd finished up and moved on. Then she came crawlin' out of the rice. I couldn't move, and she couldn't understand what was wrong with me. She said she'd go get help and I wanted to stop her but I couldn't move."

Hae stayed quiet, letting her get herself under control. When she spoke again, her words were gummy.

"She came back with an American squad. She thought since they weren't with the puppet army, they'd help me." Her voice went flat. "She was wrong. They raped me, too. All ten of them. And they took her at the same time."

Hae's hands flew over her mouth as the woman's face crumpled, all her composure finally cracking.

"She was screamin' and cryin' and I was tryin' to get to her but they wouldn't let me go," she said through shaky gasps and tears. "She was callin' out for me but I couldn't go to her. I couldn't even tell her 'I'm here' because I was cryin', too."

Hae wanted to tell her to stop, but through her tears, Jeong-nyeo almost looked relieved, like she was spittin' out something rotten she'd been holding in her mouth for too long.

"It was the worst pain I've ever felt. Not the rape, but hearin' my baby scream like that and not bein' able to hold her. I remember thinkin' I would take a hundred men at once so long as I never had to h-hear her scream like that again." Jeong-nyeo curled up like a dying flower, pressing her face into her knees. "And now I won't. I'll never hear her scream or cry or laugh or tell me she has a weird bug to show me. Those bastards broke somethin' inside of her. She died in that field and I couldn't even hold her hand one last time. I passed out and when I woke up they were gone and so was she."

Hae hugged her, unable to fight the urge or her tears anymore as Jeong-nyeo shook with horrible gasping sobs, gripping her back tightly.

"They gave Ko Kuil-hwa a baby and they took mine away!" she wailed, her fingers diggin' into Hae's back hard enough to burst her burns. "What did I do? Oh Lord, what did I do to deserve this?! Why us?!"

Hae didn't know. She didn't know why Jeong-nyeo and her daughter, why Kuil-hwa, why her, why Sincheon. Why was it here that the miguk-nom and the Southern One's army and the reaction'ries had chosen to destroy, even over Haeju, over Pyongyang?

She knew they had a lot of Christians and landlords in Hwanghae. She knew most of the people that had fled south after Liberation came from them. But were they really all so bloodthirsty and cruel? Had her and her brother's province really grown so many bad seeds? Or was it just 'cuz they were so isolated out here that the Yankees felt like they could do whatever they wanted? Was it 'cuz they thought Sincheon was a stupid 'redneck' bumpkin town, so the people in it were worth even less than everywhere else?

She could see Ra Hye-in standing on the hill, looking down at their burning town with burnin' eyes.

"'Cuz they're devils," she whispered, clinging tighter to Jeong-nyeo.

The woman cried harder, sobbing her daughter's name over and over into Hae's chest until her uniform was soaked with it. Hae let her cry until she was all cried out, and all that was left were hiccups. Then she took her by the shoulders and made her look at her.

"They're devils," she said, managin' to sound firm last her tears. "And you can't let 'em win."

The tears kept streaming down Jeong-nyeo's cheeks, red with burst blood vessels. "I wish I died with her in that field," she whispered. "I did."

"No you din't," Hae denied fiercely. "You lived. And you need to keep livin' until we're Reunified and the trials are done and everyone that ever hurt you and your daughter is dead. You need to keep livin' until the miguk-nom are defeated for good. And then you need to keep livin' because ah'm orderin' you to."

"I can't," she croaked. "I can't keep fightin'."

"You can." Hae gripped her tighter, trying to hold her down, to stop her from leavin' for good like Jong-suk and Chaek and Kwang-seok. "You aren't allowed to make Yang-sin understand sufferin', you aren't allowed to make me sad and you ain't allowed to let them hurt us anymore. No one's allowed to hurt anymore."

Her voice broke as she issued the impossible order, and she started to cry again. She tried to stop, ‘cuz Korea didn’t want anyone to end up comfortin’ her, but knowing that he was watching just made her cry harder.

Jeong-nyeo was the one to hug her this time, and even though Hae wanted to push her away so she couldn’t comfort her, she couldn’t help but curl into her.

“It’s alright,” Jeong-nyeo hushed, stroking a hand down her back. “It’s okay.”

Her hand found Hae’s, twining their fingers together, not lettin’ go.

“I’m here.”

Hae raised her face, snifflin’ as her vision swam, and Jeong-nyeo cupped her cheek. Her tears had made the medical tape give up for good, the bandage hanging off it.

“Su-nyeo had freckles like yours,” she said, her smile wobblin’. “She used to make me kiss every one of them goodnight.”

Her thumb brushed over one of Hae’s, and her lips firmed.

“I’ll keep livin’,” she vowed, teary and rough. “I’ll keep livin’ until every one of those dog’s son bastards is rottin’ in the ground. And then I’ll keep livin’ after that. I promise if you get hurt again it won’t be because of me, Hae.”

“And ah promise ah’ll do whatever ah can to kill those bastids,” Hae promised past her tears. “When Korea Reunifies us, ah’ll hunt ‘em all down myself and git ‘em. And you don’t have to worry about ‘em ever hurtin’ you like that again.” She grabbed her hand, squeezin’ it. “Me an’ Korea will never let ‘em take Sincheon again.”

She knew he wouldn’t. No matter how long the miguk-nom tried to drag out the ceasefire, no matter how much land they tried to steal, no matter how many times they tried to get onto their shores, Korea wouldn’t let the enemy take them again. War might be like a football match, but if Hae said they couldn’t give up Sincheon, she knew Korea wouldn't.

"You just focus on fightin' to be happy," she said to Jeong-nyeo, smilin' through her tears. "And ah'll focus on everythin' else. 'Cuz Hwanghae is here for you, too."

Jeong-nyeo fell back into her arms, and Hae held her close, both of the women gettin' comfort from the other. The province wasn't worried about Korea being disappointed in her anymore, even though she'd broken down. She could still feel his eye on her.

She thought it felt a li'l proud.

How is a Marxist woman supposed to ever be at peace in the world when we are expected to read about history and current events? 'Militants in the Congo gang-raped a woman and her two 14 and under daughters and got them both pregnant,' 'Furuta Junko-san was kidnapped, imprisoned, gang-raped, tortured, and murdered for literally no reason and her murderers barely got punished and some are still out there,' 'Israelis would drug and film the rape of the wives of Palestinian activists at salons so they could blackmail them into giving up,' 'Korean women were rounded up and sold into sexual slavery to Ming/Qing/Japan/America, sometimes by their own fathers, and women in Sincheon had their breasts cut off and babies cut out of them.' Obviously you can't be afraid of every man, and those women that say the solution is to never interact with a man ever are wrong- men are not inherently violent and depraved, the patriarchy just tends to make them that way, and the only way to fix that (complete societal overhaul) can't be accomplished without working and organizing with men. We are all humans. There is nothing intrinsically male or female, and segregating ourselves only serves to other us further (no, things like woman-only train cars are not segregation, despite what some men that want to assault women on the train say; measures to keep women safe are necessary in the world we live in, I'm talking about segregating education, workplaces, children, etcetera). But sometimes at work a customer will smile at me and I can't help but wonder what it would take for him to follow me home and try to hurt me.

All Your Grief And Rage

Hae walked down the road, leaving Yang Yang-sin to run to her cousin, crouching down to talk to her. After a few words, they hugged, Jeong-nyeo clingin' to her.

She hoped she'd tell her about what happened. Even if she couldn't understand. Someone you loved shouldn't have to suffer, to be able to help you.

Korea was standing at the intersection, watching her come. She thought he might've been hidin' in the soybeans, 'cuz he glanced down and brushed a bit of dirt from his front. She didn't say anything about it as she stopped in front of him, hands behind her back.

"Korea, can we stay in Sincheon for another day? This took longer than we thought, and ah want to visit the whole county."

Korea dipped his head, then looked back at Jeong-nyeo. "Did you tell her about the Occupation?"

Hae relaxed a li'l, glad he hadn't been able to hear what they were saying. Not just 'cuz she didn't want him to feel any more guilty about not knowing she existed.

"Ayuh. Ah'm sorry, but-"

"It's fine." Korea turned away. "It looks like it worked."

Hae nodded. She took one last look at Jeong-nyeo and Yang-sin. They were standing on the bridge, talkin'.

Jeong-nyeo looked over her cousin's shoulder and gave her a watery smile.

Hae smiled back, then followed Korea.

The rest of the day was an arduous march of grief, remembered violence, and tears, though Hae made sure her own didn't fall again. She could feel her people's words and faces wanting to blur together into something like the hole, somethin' fuzzy and indistinct that would be easy to forget and hard to keep.

But she fought it back. She made sure to take in every word and sight, and to tuck them all away as they moved from place to place.

The black stains on the walls of the Public Security Office air raid shelter where over four hundred more people, maybe as much as five hundred, had been burned to death. The shells of the powder magazines in Wonam-ri where the Yankees and their puppets had locked up almost a thousand people when Korea was on his way back with the army, starving them for a week before burning them alive, too, the mothers in one building and the children in the other, and the look in the eyes of one of the three kids that had escaped as he told them how his mother had been torn away from him. The bridge to Anak County that somehow swarmed with life as the Women's Union worked to repair it again, despite how over two thousand people had been arrested and killed on it as they fled Sincheon County. The deceptively calm Nambu Reservoir where the old women that had been telling them about their grandsons being tied up and thrown into it fell to their knees wailing and spitting on the ground, cursin' 'Merica and all his devils, and where Hae plucked a single white bone from the muddy shore.

Wells and rivers and mines, teachers and schoolchildren and farmers. Myongsa-ri, where the chairwoman of the Karyon Sub-county's Women's Union had been tortured and killed; Chongsan-ri, where the So River had ran red with blood as people were shot on its banks; Chori Sub-county, where a principal had been hung before having his head sawed through.

It didn't stop in Sincheon. They drove into Anak County, then Unryul County, where the violence had spilled into. To Unryul Mine, where miners had been tortured before being shoved into a mineshaft, and the way the voices of those left almost seemed to be absorbed by the rock walls, quieter than any mine Hae had ever visited. They couldn't afford to close it down just because the ore they were mining was sometimes stained with blood. Production was too important.

Hae stared into the long, dark mineshaft that plunged down into the earth, feelin' the weight of the mountain above her, and imagined what it would be like to fall. To have her chest drilled into like the production innovators, beat and tortured for hours, before being shoved into nothing. How it would feel to float in the dark, knowing nothing but pain, before striking the rocks a hundred feet below.

She thought the impact might be a relief, and the thought made her so uneasy that she almost jumped when Korea's hand clasped her shoulder and dragged her back from the edge.

They stayed the night in the village that had been emptied out for helping the guerrillas, gettin' their permits from the local People's Committee. Hae might have asked before why they had to, since it was pretty obvious who they were, and it wasn't like they couldn't be trusted.

She got it now, though. It hadn't been strangers that had done all this. The miguk-nom had made it possible, they'd brought their guns and army and war, and they'd done awful, terrible things. They'd slashed and burned and raped their way across her province, killin' anyone they could get their bloody claws on, but targeting model workers, model peasants like Kim Moon-sik, innovators, Party members, people that were tryin' to make their country better.

But how had they known who those were? The Yankees were stupid- they didn't know how to read or speak Korean. They didn't know what the letters of commendation or the armbands said, and they didn't know who was in the Worker's Party or the People's Committees. Someone had to read for them, or tell them. Someone like Ku Chun-guk, or whoever had sold out San-gon's family. People that were naïve and selfish and had ran south 'cuz'a it, comin' back sick just like the Southern One, or who stayed here and lurked in the Chondoist Chongu Party or Social Democratic Party or Public Security or even the Worker's Party like rotten seeds just waiting for a rain of blood to sprout.

They had to be as vigilant as possible. The foreigners had been the ones puppeteerin'. But the puppets had been their neighbours.

Hae didn't recognize anyone in the local People's Committee, even though she'd used to know everyone in their province's organs. They'd had emergency elections since so many comrades had been executed during the Yankee Occupation, including their provincial chairman, Jyong-jin. She couldn't help but wonder as she looked at the kindly woman that handed them their permit if she had been one of the profiteers or informants, or if the man in the corner had been looting and killing alongside the reaction'ries.

Hae knew everyone would be smart about voting, especially after everything that happened. The ones that got elected would be the guerrillas and Party members and pastors that had helped people escape the Yanks or fought against them.

But the thought still scared her. Korea had said the Southern One was kind, but he'd been wrong. He'd been just as tricked as she had. And if Korea could be wrong, then anyone could be.

They didn't sleep for most of the night. Korea took them up Kuwol Mountain, hunting for any reaction'ries that might still be prowlin' around. Hae was almost disappointed they didn't find any, which made her feel like Pyo.

But they did find more bodies. Two skeletons in a gully deep in the trees, one with a hole in its skull and a metal spike lying next to it, and one with rotting scraps of cloth tied around it.

Hwang reached out with a hand for something nestled in the ribs of that skeleton, then drew back. Korea reached in instead, pulling a too-small skull out. SH turned the flashlight beam away, but Hae had already seen it.

Three bodies.

They marked the spot and led a few villagers back there so they could be the ones to carry 'em home. The next morning, they were laid out on a white cloth in the village center. No one could tell who they'd been. No one said they were missing people like them. If there was anyone left alive that they belonged to, they were long gone.

More villages, more towns, more air raid shelters and mass graves. Hae picked something distinct from each place to remember- the smell of pumpkin bein' steamed in Mangung-ri as they visited the tunnel where three hundred people had been buried alive; the pretty flower pin in the hair of the woman who clung to her by the water of the Ryongmun Reservoir and told her how she'd seen her husband and twenty other men be driven into it like goats and made to swim until they drowned, the li'l girls holdin' hands as they skipped down the road in Ryangjang-ri, where every single man that hadn't been at the front or with the guerrillas had been executed. She tucked all the happy things away so the bad things would be easier to remember.

Everywhere she went she made sure to listen to as many people as she could, takin' in all their dark bits- the widow whose husband had been ran through with a bayonet for trying to steal rations from the Yanks, the man whose model worker wife had been thrown into a well by the Southern army, the mother whose reaction'ry husband had came back and stolen their daughter, and taken her on the retreat.

It felt like eatin' maggots again, choking them down 'cuz she knew she had to- not because she needed them to stay alive now, but because her people did.

By the end of the day she felt heavy, swollen with dark thoughts and other people's hurt. It sloshed around inside her as the Jeep rattled down the road out of Sincheon Town again.

Hae kept her eyes closed, trying not to throw up. The gold and green fields and cow carts ploddin' down the dirt roads somehow made her feel worse than the black behind her eyelids. All she could see were the photos she'd had to look at overlayed on top of the happy scenes- rows and rows of white shrouds pulled out of Unryul Mine, a boy's pale face gazing lifelessly from the dirt, the charnel piles left behind in the powder houses when their army had first got back.

"Where are we going now?" SH asked, keepin' her voice quiet, thinking Hae was asleep.

Hae didn't tell her it was okay to speak up. She was lettin' her cousin lull her like the barncats she never got to pet by stroking the back of her hand with her thumb over and over. If she was thinkin' of how warm and alive SH and Hwang were, she might not have to keep coming back to the hole in her head.

It wasn't working.

"Onchon Sub-county," Korea replied.

"We were already there."

"We're visiting the Sincheon Rest Home."

SH's grip tightened on Hae's, hurtin'. But she couldn't make her bones move. "Korea, no."

She'd taken that page of the report, too, when Hae was trying to read it on the way here.

"It's part of this, South Hamgyong."

SH's hand left hers and the Jeep suddenly swerved, making Hwang yelp and sending Hae sideways. She didn't react, lettin' herself slump limply onto her brother's lap.

"Are you crazy?!" Korea hissed, slamming the brake.

SH disappeared from the back seat, her boots thumpin' on the ground. Korea's door opened and he snapped at her as he was probably dragged from the driver's seat. Their boots crunched around to the back of the Jeep.

"Goodness," Hwang breathed out, his hand touching Hae's head, then gingerly strokin' it.

He'd been real quiet, only askin' people a few questions so he could write them in his notebook. He was probably going to do some sort of article about all this so everyone knew just how evil their enemy was. Hae was glad he was the information work one. She was glad he wasn't in her place. She hoped he wouldn't get all upset and guilty again after having to hear all this.

Korea and SH were whisperin' too quiet to hear. Hae only caught a few words when one of 'em got ornery enough to hiss louder.

"-her responsibility," Korea snapped.

"She shouldn't have to be exposed to stuff like this," SH argued.

"She already has been. What do you think you heard in that bunker? What do you think Yang Jeong-nyeo said to her?"

"We don't know she knows. And that isn't the same as this anyway."

"She is a grown woman, not a child, South Hamgyong. This is why I wanted you to stay in Hamhung- I am not pretending this didn't happen so you can feel better."

There was a hurt silence, and Hae had to strain to hear SH say, "Korea," her voice desperate in a way she didn't think she'd ever heard.

Hwang kept pettin' her head as the silence stretched out.

Korea's "Tch" was easy to hear. He didn't say anythin' else, coming back to the front and climbing back in.

SH padded after him, hoistin' herself up next to Hae again. "Thank you," she murmured, and Hae heard her fingers brush Korea's shoulder.

Their Countryhuman didn't answer, and their Jeep drove on, SH resting her hand on Hae's bent leg.

The Sincheon Rest Home was a worker's retreat, where the people who couldn't travel all the way to town came for medical treatment or just to relax. In the past, workers had been worked half to death, and sometimes fully. They weren't allowed to rest and most of 'em couldn't afford to go on vacation, so Korea said it was important that they could now, even if they didn't have money to travel all the way to Pyongyang or Mount Kumgang. Because of that, Hae had been to most of the rest houses in their province with Hwang, since they had to make sure they were clean and comfortable, and 'cuz she actually wasn't very good at tellin' that. Anywhere she could see the sun or feel the breeze was comfortable by her, and anywhere was comfortable if Korea was there. It didn't even have to be inside.

The Rest Home was empty now. No smoke came from the chimneys on the wood and brick buildings, and no one was out enjoyin' the fresh fall air or doing exercises on the grass. Only two people stood on the dirt road outside it, a man scanning their surroundings and a familiar-lookin' woman perched on the tilted edge of a handcart.

"Comrades," she said, standing and bowing as they arrived.

"Comrade Kim." Korea held out his arm, makin' her switch out of her bow to clasp it. "Thank you for meeting us here."

"Anything to get this out there," she replied, her eyes hard. "If the United Nations won't listen to us, then I'll scream louder."

Hae suddenly realized where she'd seen her before. "Comrade I-jin!"

The woman's face softened a li'l as she turned to her. "Comrade Hae. Good to see you again."

Hae almost hadn't recognized the nurse. Her hair was shorter, to her ears instead of done up like it usually was, and somethin' about her seemed… different. But maybe it was just seein' her in a choson-out instead of a nurse's coat.

"Ah'm glad you're alive," Hae said, real relieved. The woman was in the Women's Union and the Party, and she'd worked here. "Ah thought the Yanks would'a got you for sure!"

"They almost did," she said, a hand on her chest. "They got me at the Soktang bridge, looking for Worker's Party members. But they din't finish me off. And they never found my card."

She pulled it from her pocket, smilin' triumphantly.

"I'm a li'l less of a woman now, but they din't kill me. And I made sure to help our guerrillas out."

The ‘li’l less of a woman’ comment made Hae’s stomach churn. Her eyes dipped to I-jin’s chest.

The nurse had always been sort of ‘healthy’-lookin’. She had a round face, wide hips, and a soft belly. And while she was definitely thinner, just like everyone, she seemed to be the type to have a good starvation response like Hae, ‘cuz it wasn’t like she was wasting away.

Which made the size of her chest seem off.

The nurse followed her gaze and gave her a slightly tighter smile. “Ayuh. They cut off my breasts.”

Hwang winced, and one of SH’s hands went over her mouth, the other arm wrapping around her own chest. Hae gaped in horror, her brain trying to picture how you even did that before decidin’ it didn’t want to. Korea remained straight-faced, though she could see his lip twitch angrily.

The man by the cart closed his eyes.

“You don’t need to all look so horrified,” I-jin said into the silence. “My kids are old enough they don’t need to nurse anymore, and I wasn’t planning on having more.”

Despite her words, Hae thought she was fighting to be cheerful, too.

“And what I went through wasn’t half as bad as the women here.” She looked over at the rest house, her eyes hardenin’ again.

Between SH stealin’ the report from her, her reaction to Korea wanting to take them here, and something somehow being worse than having your breasts sawed off, Hae thought she knew what that was.

Still she asked, “What happened here?” eyes wide.

I-jin hesitated. Her eyes flicked to Korea, like she was waitin’ for him to say something. He should’ve, but he just stared at her until she said, “The Americans locked up a bunch of women here and…

hurt them."

SH untensed slightly. No one asked her to say more about it.

The nurse was doing what Jae-soon had, tryin' to keep the awful truth from her. And Korea was lettin' her, even though he'd told her not to look away.

Hae opened her mouth, then shut it. She guessed it wasn't really about them treatin' her like a kid. Maybe for I-jin it was, but Korea had said himself she was a grown woman.

It was for SH. Hae might have spoken up before she understood, but now… She'd sounded real upset when she said Korea's name. And Hae had been glad that Korea hadn't heard exactly what Jeong-nyeo said to her. She would let them pretend, since she couldn't anymore.

So long as she knew she wasn't looking away.

"Follow me," I-jin said, orderin' the man- her husband, since she called him 'yeobo'- to watch the road.

They followed her through the open gates and onto the property. Some of the buildings were missin' roofs, either because the miguk-nom had bombed it after to try and cover up their crimes, or just 'cuz they didn't like to see a place still standing.

"Were you… one of the women imprisoned here?" Hwang asked, sneakin' a look at Hae to see if that was an alright question.

She allowed it. It was kind'a insensitive, but they were supposed to be hearing from people about their experiences.

But I-jin shook her head. "I left as soon as our army did. I figured I'd be more use with the guerrillas." Her sandals crunched on the brownin' grass as she led them into the dormitory where the workers would sleep on their vacations, then on the glass that glittered on the floor of the entry hall. "But I came back here right away once I heard what happened."

She stood at the entrance to the room, gesturing with a hand.

“This is where they kept most of them. Others were kept in the sheds or main hall. The Americans themselves set up in the other dormitory.”

Hae peered in, her heart sinking at the rows of bunks. They were all stripped of blankets, either by the investigators or looters, but the frames were still there. And as she set foot into the room, her skin shivered.

“They took women from all over Sincheon,” I-jin said quietly, her words echoing in the hush that felt heavier than it should. “And travellers on their way from Sariwon and Haeju, thinking the countryside would be safe. Young ones, pretty ones. They brought them here for… use. For their own army and the southern one."

Hae could see a dark stain on the floorboards under one of the beds.

“Are you… quite alright?” she heard Hwang murmur to SH.

She looked over, seeing their cousin’s chest heavin’ as more blood pattered onto the floor from her palms.

“I’m fine.”

“Do you think you should-?”

“I’m fine, Hwang,” she snapped.

“Show us the pond,” Korea ordered I-jin after a dark scan of the room.

The woman led them back outside and around the cluster of buildings. “Towards the end of the occupation they brought the remaining women out here. Several dozen from what we’ve found so far, maybe… Oh, Ms. Dan.”

Hae blinked, then looked where she was. The ground sloped away from the rest house, a desire path leading down to a small pond with green lotus pads floating on it, wilting pink buds droopin’ over the water.

A woman sat by it, not on one of the knocked over wooden benches, but half in the water, the white skirts of her choson-ot floating around her.

“Is she alright?” Hae asked. It was starting to get a li’l cold to be soaking wet in the middle of nowhere.

I-jin sighed sadly. “No. The Yankees killed all the women when they were… done with them. Herded them into the pond and threw grenades in after them. There were only four survivors that we know of. She’s one of them.”

“The other three were those who gave their testimonies to the Women’s International Democratic Federation, aren’t they?” Hwang asked.

I-jin nodded. “They’d like to close that chapter of their life, which is why I’m here in their stead. But Ms. Dan… wasn’t in her right frame of mind to testify. She still isn’t. She keeps escaping the clinic to come back here."

Hae watched her run her fingers through the water of the pond, her long white sleeves trailing in it. She started down the desire path.

“Comrade Hae-“

“Ah want to make sure she’s okay.” She might be lettin’ them play pretend, but she wasn’t going to let someone keep hurting for it.

She knew Korea approved because he followed her. But once they got close he made a noise and stopped suddenly, spinnin’ to stare back at the rest house.

Hae got a li’l bit closer, ‘til she was only a few feet away, and saw the woman was feeding a baby, her jeogori pulled up over her chest like some women that had sons had still been doing during the Occupation and how Korea had told her to never do.

“Howdy,” the province said, crouchin’ to talk to her.

The woman stopped her tuneless humming to smile at her.

“Hello.”

Her dull amber eyes peered out from behind strings of messy long brown hair. There was a look in them Hae didn’t like. They were unfocused, like she wasn’t really seeing her, and there was something dreamy about her smile.

“How are you called?” she asked, keepin’ her voice cheery.

“He called me Bonnie,” the woman replied, speaking slow and placid. “But that’s not my name. I don’t have a name.”

“Yes you do,” I-jin said gently as she came up next to them. “Your name is Dan Yeon-hwa.”

“Not anymore. I have nothing of hers left.” She looked at the still waters of the pond, her fingers skatin’ across a dusky lotus bloom. “Only this.”

Hae frowned at I-jin, who shook her head sadly.

“Ms. Dan, could you wear your jeogori properly?” the nurse asked carefully. “There are men here, and one of them is our Countryhuman.”

“There's nothing left of her to hide, either,” the woman answered, not tuggin’ it down. “And I can’t stop feeding her or she’ll cry. She sucks everything she can from me, then she screams and screams, until…” She blinked slowly. “My son never screamed like this.”

Unsure of what to say to that, Hae asked instead, “What’s her name?” peerin’ at the baby.

Yeon-hwa looked down at the infant like she’d forgotten it was attached to her breast, even though she’d just been talking about her. “She has no name either. It would be wrong to name a punishment.”

“A punishment?” Hwang asked from over his shoulder. Korea had grabbed him and spun him away from the half-naked woman, too.

“Mhm.” She smiled distantly at Hae. “I’m being punished for being unfaithful to my husband. I committed a sin, and now I'm being punished. Forever." Her voice darkened on the last word, and her eyes drifted to the still waters again.

"We know what you went through," SH said gently. "You weren't being unfaithful."

"I was. It's why Ho-il had to send me away."

I-jin winced, lowerin' her voice, even though Yeon-hwa could still hear. "Her husband banished her from his household after she escaped."

SH's jaw clenched, and Yeon-hwa said distractedly, "I didn't escape. He set me free. I ran, and they died."

Her smile grew more distant, her gaze fixed on the dark pond. "Can you hear them? Listen."

Hae listened, but all she could hear was the song of crickets out in the fields, the rustle of leaves on the poplar nearby, and the distant thump of a loose board in the breeze.

But Yeon-hwa said, "They're calling for me. They know I was supposed to die with them. They want a sacrifice."

"Ms. Dan," I-jin said firmly. "None of the women murdered here would have wanted you to join them. Do you think they would resent the others for getting away?"

"They escaped. I was freed." Yeon-hwa looked up at her. "It hurts. She has teeth."

The change of subject confused Hae until I-jin said, "I told you- she's only a month old. She doesn't have teeth."

Yeon-hwa looked down at the baby at her breast. "She does. She has jagged fangs and they're tearing me open. I'll be like you soon."

The words were cruel, but her tone was too empty to feel like she was tryin' to be mean.

I-jin crossed her arms over her flat chest, then dropped ‘em. “No, you won’t. And you need to nurse her more. She’s looking thin.”

She was right. Kuil-hwa’s baby had been round and flushed, since so long as she was gettin’ enough food to make milk, he could drink as much as he liked. But Yeon-hwa’s baby looked… not good. Her cheeks curved in in a way a baby’s shouldn’t, and her body seemed too small for her head.

“I can’t.” Her lips bent in a slow frown. “She has teeth. My other baby didn’t have teeth. It’s wrong, I know it. She’s wrong.”

SH’s hands were bleeding again. Hae got what was ‘wrong’ with the baby.

“She looks like any other baby to me,” she told the woman.

“She’s not.” Yeon-hwa looked at the pond again. “She’s a punishment. I didn’t join them, so I got this. I was set free, so I can never be free. He doomed me."

Hae shuffled her feet, lookin’ between everyone else. But Korea and Hwang were still facing the other way, SH was doing her scary staring thing again, and I-jin just looked sad.

She hadn’t had to deal with anyone like Yeon-hwa today or yesterday. A few people had been off, either distracted or twitchy, but nothin’ like this.

But she still had to try.

“You aren’t doomed,” Hae said firmly. “You’re still alive, ain’t ya?”

“No,” she answered dimly. “I died.”

“Ah thought you said Dan Yeon-hwa died.”

“She did.”

“Then why would you be bein’ punished if she’s already dead?” Hae asked triumphantly.

The woman paused. “I’m her ghost. I’m being punished for what she did.”

Hae didn’t give up. “No you aren’t. Ghosts aren’t real. And you din’t do n- anythin’. The Yankees did. You aren’t dead, and neither is Dan Yeon-hwa. See?”

She reached out, touchin’ one of the hands that was holding her baby. “You’re alive. And you’re her.”

Yeon-hwa looked down at her soft grip. “I can’t be,” she said, her dreamy voice finally breakin’, a raw edge coming through. “If I’m her… that means that everything that happened to her happened to me.”

“It did,” Hae said gently. “But you survived it. That’s what matters. The worst thing that could have happened is that you died. But you didn’t.”

A low sound came from SH, and Yeon-hwa lowered her head, her eyes on her baby.

“Some things can be worse than that.”

“No,” Hae said firmly, squeezin’ her hand. “Nothin’ is worse than death.”

She knew that the people pushed into that mineshaft hadn’t been relieved when they hit the bottom. Right up until the end, they had to be hopin’ they would make it, that there was water or… something else waiting to break their fall.

Maybe Hae had wanted to die when she was in the hole. Maybe when she had been chained up, unable to even feel her own body or know her own name, hungry lonely bored in the suffocating dark, she had wished the rats would return and nibble her into nothing. Maybe she’d just wished for it to be over.

But if it had been, and she’d died down there, she never would have seen the sun. She never would have felt its warmth on her skin as she threshed rice or caught snowflakes on her tongue or eaten bulgogi or got to bring in the harvest. She never would’ve got to learn how to read from Hwang or look for rocks with GG or have a bath with SH. She never would've got to meet the Gen'ral or Comrade Jong-suk or any of her other hundreds or more comrades that had taught her so many things. She wouldn't have been here today to cheer up Jeong-nyeo or any'a the others.

And most importantly she never would have met Korea. And if he found out, he would've felt guilty forever that he hadn't been able to save her.

"At the end'a hardship comes happiness," Hae told Yeon-hwa. "But if you give up when you're sad, you'll never get to be happy. Death is the end- nothin' can get better after that." She took her hand with her other one, lookin' into her eyes. "But if you're alive, you can keep movin' forward. You can make things better."

"I can't move forward," Yeon-hwa whispered, nails digging into her a li'l painfully. "Not when this weight is dragging me back."

"Then get rid of it," Hae said cheerfully. "Tell me everythin' you don't want to keep, and ah'll hold onto it."

Yeon-hwa's amber eyes lifted to hers. "But…"

"We need to remember what was done to us," Hae said, seein' that cellar door slam shut above her for the first time. "So we know why we keep fightin', and so we can avenge it. But if you really can't stand to remember, then ah'll remember for you."

She peeked sideways at SH, hopin' she might realize she was talking to her, too. But her cousin was staring at the lotuses, her blood still leaving scarlet droplets on the grass.

Yeon-hwa still hesitated.

"Both Hwanghaes will remember," Hwang vowed, and Korea added, "And your country," which Hae thought would have even more impact if he would actually turn around.

Yeon-hwa looked down at her baby. She'd stopped feedin', her purple lids shut now as she slept, not screaming.

"…Alright," she said quietly, tuggin' her jeogori back over her chest.

Hae sat across from her as she told her all about being kidnapped with her friend on their way home from a neighbour's, and brought to the rest home. About how she'd been torn away from her son and been cooped up with the other women in that dorm while the men came in and hurt them. How she'd had to watch her friend get sold off, and started taking care of a young girl there, having to watch the other women get abused or sometimes killed while she made the men happy, up until a Yankee soldier decided he liked her and started keeping her separate so he was the only one who could 'have' her. How she behaved herself so she wouldn't end up like the others that tried to escape, and how one night the soldier came into the shed where she was, threw a cloak over her, and smuggled her out back, far out into the fields, caressing her cheek and giving her one last kiss before setting her free. How she ran all the way into the next sub-county without looking back, and didn't know until later that the man had been saving her from being massacred like the other seventy remaining women. And then how when she'd finally made it home, injured and exhausted, her husband had turned her away, refusing to even let her see their young son, who had made it home safe.

"I left that girl there," Yeon-hwa whispered, staring at the pond again. "Yun-ji. She was only sixteen. And I just… left her there."

"You didn't know what they were planning to do to them," Hwang told her, gentlelike in a way that was finally perfect.

"No. But I knew what they had already done. What I thought they would keep doing." Her eyes had started to glaze again. "She's calling me. She wants a sacrifice."

Hae reached out, taking her thin face and makin' her look at her instead of the pond.

"No she doesn't," she said forcefully. "She was murdered an' it was awful. But if ghosts were real and she wanted anyone sacrificed, ah guarantee it would be the Yankees. Ah bet all she'd want from you would be to make it away an' live a good life. And maybe tell her family, if they don't know."

"Do they know, Ms. Dan?" I-jin asked. "We still haven't identified all of the victims. If you could help, it would be appreciated."

"They… don't know. I know they're the Pak family in Chaeryong, and I thought about…" Yeon-hwa looked down. "But I couldn't. I couldn't be the one to tell them."

"Someone should," Hae said, thinkin' of Jae-soon and his wife. "Ah know you're real upset your boy is bein' kept away from you, but isn't that better than not knowin' where he is at all?"

Yeon-hwa closed her eyes, then nodded. "Yes. When I was in there, and I had no idea if he knew how to make it home…"

Hae put her hand on her knee. "Go with Comrade I-jin and tell 'em what happened to Yun-ji."

SH's voice was hoarse. "And then forget it all."

The woman bit her lip. "I… shouldn't forget her. She would sneak into my cot after they were… done with her, and I'd stroke her hair until she went to sleep. I shouldn't forget that."

"Ah'll keep that for you, too," Hae promised. "And maybe one day you'll be alright to remember. But until then, you just focus on doin' everythin' you can to put it behind you."

Yeon-hwa's eyes closed tight, her face screwin' up. Then she nodded, rasping, "I'll try. I'll try to forget."

"You aren't alone," I-jin said, resting her hand on her shoulder. "We'll talk sense into that husband of yours yet."

"Don't take him back," SH said sharply. "Just get your son."

"I don't think he'd have me anyway," she said sadly.

"Then all you need is your boy and your comrades," Hae said, glad to see she didn't look all dazed anymore. "And your baby."

Yeon-hwa looked down at the baby in her arms. “She’ll make it hard to forget.”

“Ah know you can do it,” Hae promised, gettin’ to her feet. “Now come on back with us. Ah don’t think it does ya any good to hang out here.”

It would be like if she went back to the hole when she had to study.

“You’ll stay at my place tonight,” I-jin said. “I don’t want you wandering away from the clinic again.”

“I’d… like a moment,” Yeon-hwa said, eyes on the water again as the sun started to set. “But I will. And I won’t come back here again.”

Hae nodded happily. “Good. Ah know you’ll be okay, comrade.”

The others started back, but she stayed as Korea went up to Yeon-hwa, fine with lookin’ at her now that her skin wasn’t showing.

“There isn’t anything that can be legally done about your husband’s attitude,” he said stiffly. “But if he won’t surrender your son once you are ready, contact me.”

“Thank you, Comrade Korea. And Comrade Hae.”

Yeon-hwa turned to the water, her skirts still floatin’ lazily in it, and Hae followed Korea up the incline, both of them silent. The others had already disappeared back into the rest house buildings.

As they reached them, Hae heard a splash, and alarm spiked in her. She went to spin around, but Korea’s hand clamped down on the back of her neck, forcing her to keep looking forward.

“Keep moving,” he said, his voice flat as he stared straight ahead, too.

“But Yeon-hwa-!”

“Comrade Dan Yeon-hwa will be fine,” Korea said, his eye not wavering as he kept her walking forward. “You remember what I told you about problems I can and can’t solve. Sometimes people have to solve their own. And we would only get in the way.”

Hae felt her skull buzz with the urge to turn around and make sure the woman was okay. “But-“

“South Hwanghae, do you think I would let something happen to her?”

Hae immediately relaxed, knowin’ he wouldn’t. “No.”

“Then keep moving. And don’t look back.”

She did, and didn’t.

Dan Yeon-hwa stood as far out in the lotus pond as she could get without swimming, alone now. She gazed down at the water as it finally went still, the only movement that of her skirts eddying around her, ghostly pale as the water darkened under the burning eye of the sun. Everything was finally, blessedly silent.

Her reflection stared back up at her, its lips twisting up in a smile that wasn’t a million ri away, and for the first time in almost a year, it looked like hers.

The woman's choson-ot dragged behind her, leaving a trail of wet earth as she left the water. And this time, with the sacrifice accepted, no voice called her back, no clammy fingers wrapped around her ankles.

Dan Yeon-hwa walked away from the pond, her steps and heart finally on the way to lightening, the only thing in her hands a withered pink lotus blossom.

The sun was hoverin’ over the edge of the horizon when they got back to Sincheon, flooding the town with fiery light. People were on their way in from the fields with bushels of corn and namul on their backs, and a trio of children ran from alley to alley, gigglin’ as a tired-looking woman tried to herd them towards the outskirts, back to the tunnels.

"Korea." Hae's voice was too loud in the Jeep. No one had spoken since they parted ways with I-jin and her husband. "Can you take me somewhere?"

He followed her directions, driving the vehicle across town, and around the ridge on its edge. They got out, and Hae stared out across the fields.

Kim Moon-sik's barn had been turned to a pile of burnt scraps of wood, the earth still blackened underneath it. Hae knew she had recognized the remains of the farmhouse behind the rows of corpses in one of the photos.

All that effort, and two hundred people had still died here.

She stared numbly at the wreckage, her skin pricklin' up and down, like it had been for the past two days. It'd dulled when they were travelling in the Jeep, but it had never stopped. Would it ever? Or was she always goin' to feel this way, unable to ever work the fields or inspect the offices in Sincheon without being reminded that thousands of her people had been murdered here, tortured and killed in the worst ways possible? Had 'Merica and the Southern One made forgetting impossible in her own land?

The weevils churned under her skin, and her fists clenched.

"Korea," she said, her voice so low and dark she barely recognized it. "Ah think I'm angry."

She'd been mad before, of course. Everyone got mad, except for maybe Kang. It made her mad when Chungnam was rude to SH or Hambu was bein' too prickly, and it had made her mad when Hwang had implied she was stupid.

But she'd only been angry like this twice before, when she'd blown Ku Chun-guk's stupid brains out and when she'd thrown that bed at 'Merica. Not even the Southern One had made her feel like this when he said there'd only be one Korea and he meant him, 'cuz he was too dumb and wrong to be really angry at.

“Good,” Korea said, lookin’ at the ruined model barn. “You should be.”

“Ah don’t like it,” she protested, clutchin’ at her shirtfront. “It feels awful an’ ah don’t like it.”

She couldn’t make it go away. There wasn’t anything she could tell herself to feel better, no way she could turn it okay in her head. There was no good reason for people to kill over land and there was no good reason to cut off I-jin’s breasts or torture Kim Moon-sik or rape Jeong-nyeo and Yeon-hwa and all the other women. There was no good reason for America to tear their country apart and do this to them.

“Would you rather feel nothing?” Korea asked coldly. “Because if you could walk away from everything we have seen and heard here smiling and mean it, then I would make sure you never left this town.”

He touched his gun so she knew for sure what he meant.

“No,” Hae said, pouting at the ground. “Ah don’t want to feel nothin’. But ah don’t want to feel like this.” Her nails scratched at the bandages on her neck. "It feels bad.”

Korea turned to her, the sun's fire burnin' in his eye. “Anger is good, South Hwanghae. You should be angry. ‘The warmer one’s love of home, parents, and brothers, the more bitter one’s hatred for the enemy.’ The more you love your fellow countrymen, the greater your anger at what has been done to them. Do you think we would be here right now if we hadn't been angry? Do you think Hwang would have published those pamphlets on March First if he hadn’t been angry at being censored and leashed?”

Hwang nodded soberly, pushin’ his glasses up.

“Do you think South Hamgyong would be here if she hadn’t been angry at what had been done to her and the rest of our women?”

SH looked rattled. “I’m not-“

Korea cut her off, his voice risin’. “Do you think we would have ever been free if Kim Il-sung, Kim Jong-suk, Kim Tu-bong, Kim Chaek, Ri Kwon-mu and our other thousands of comrades hadn't been angry? If our people hadn't realized that what was being done to them was wrong and unfair and needed to change? Do you think I would be here, do you think I would have saved you if I didn't realize that?"

Hae could still see him tearing Big Nose off her, throwin' him down and savaging him, his teeth bared as he made him hurt for what he'd been about to do to her, and what he didn't know he'd done to her, and the way he'd wiped blood on his cheek as he came to unchain her. Out of all the things Hae had made herself forget, she had never forgotten that.

"No," she mumbled.

"No," Korea repeated. "When we are told that our people, people that we love, have been put through tortures, been oppressed and beat down for the simple crime of wanting to be free, anger is the only correct way to feel."

The tendons on his throat flexed as his voice lowered. "If you aren't angry, you'll be afraid. And fear is useless. At least anger gets things done."

Hae looked out at Kim Moon-sik's barn, the orange and red of the settin' sun glinting off the rusty weathervane stuck in the ground, making it look like it was burning all over again. The only sound was SH's jagged panting.

"Mm," she said eventually, wrappin' her arms around herself. "Ah'll keep it."

Hwang's arm wrapped around her, and Korea finally didn't glare him out of it. Hae leaned into her brother, watchin' the sun set.

"South Hamgyong," Korea ordered after a second. "Take North Hwanghae and speak with that Yang Chun-yoon's widow. Here's the address. Make sure she knows where her loyalties lie."

SH took a shudderin' breath, then took the paper, saluting as she left, Hwang on her heels. He looked back at Hae, and she squinted reassurin'ly.

"Korea," she said when they were gone. "Are the reaction'ries goin' to be killed once they're tried?"

"Every single one that should be, will be," he answered coldly.

She swallowed. "But… what if there's no evidence? Like the Southern army guy that had me beat? No one else saw that, and he din't actually do the beatin', so…"

"You'll testify against him, if he's still alive at the end of this."

"What if the jury doesn't believe me?"

Korea examined her for a moment, then said, "Almost anyone would believe anything you tell them. You have power. You've seen that for yourself after today. That's why I tell you to watch what you say."

"But…" Hae fidgeted. "What if they don't?"

Korea's jaw feathered. "South Hwanghae, I promise, even if we can't get a death verdict, he will spend the rest of his days labouring to make up for what he helped destroy." His eye flashed. "I will make sure Rim Gun-hon wishes he was dead."

Hae looked down, noddin', even though she didn't think she'd be able to feel completely happy if she knew he was out there, even if it was in prison. It didn't matter if he wished he was dead- he wouldn't be.

"Alright, Korea," she said, followin' him up the ridge she'd once charged down with the militia to free the women.

They stopped at the top, where she'd stood with Ra Hye-in, gazing down on Sincheon. From high up in the sunset, it almost looked like it was still on fire. But looking closer showed that the smoke was just from chimneys and cooking fires, and the uniforms belonged to the People's Army and Public Security. Lookin' close enough showed that the people down there were alive.

“Ah’m not allowed to forget any of this, am ah?” Hae asked quietly.

Korea was silent for a moment. “No. You aren’t. We need to remember.”

Remember what hesitatin’ did.

Hae knew none of his harshness here was about punishin’ her. She reckoned it was for the same reason he hadn’t let their people celebrate with him on Liberation Day, the reason she got now. It was why he kept pushin’ her and why he’d lurked outside the bunker to secretly listen in, and why they had to go to the rest house.

He was punishin' himself.

Hae grabbed his sleeve ‘cuz she knew he wouldn’t let her hold his hand, looking up at him with big eyes.

“Korea, are ya proud of me?”

He looked down at her, then answered her with a question. “At our criticism session you said you would go through Sincheon again if it meant you could save our people. Do you still mean that? After this, would you still do it all again?”

Hae gazed out at the ruins of Kim Moon-sik’s barn on one side of the ridge and the town on the other.

Sincheon had been awful. She’d been hurt and abused and had to see and hear things she hadn’t ever wanted to and no one ever should. It filled her with grief and anguish and angry weevils and other people’s hurt that she wasn’t allowed to forget. It forced her to remember the hole.

But people still would’ve gotten hurt if she wasn’t here. The awful things still would’ve happened to them. They’d still have all their hurt with no one to share it with. Hae might have been happier. But her people still would have suffered.

Even if she hadn’t been able to stop what had happened to so many of them, at least she could make the ones that survived feel a li'l better. At least she could pull them back from the edge. Two hundred people had still ended up being murdered in Kim Moon-sik's barn, but two hundred hadn't been. They'd made it, 'cuz'a her and her comrades, comrades that might have already been gone if it wasn't for her.

"Ayuh," she said confidently, lookin' back up at Korea. "If ah could save even one person from goin' through this, ah'd do it all again."

Korea's eye pierced into hers, maybe tryin' to find out if he was just saying that 'cuz he would want her to. But he knew she'd never lie to him, so he nodded, satisfied.

"Then yes," he said, putting his hand on her head. "I'm proud of you."

Hae smiled, closin' her eyes as he rubbed the edge of one of her bandages with his thumb, the weevils scattering as he did.

They descended the ridge towards town, and Hae tracked down Jae-soon to tell him she hoped he'd find his wife, and give him a big hug. She didn't want to let go, afraid that once she left she'd never see him again, but eventually she let Korea pry her off him and said goodbye.

SH and Hwang met them at the Jeep a li'l while later, sayin' Yang Chun-yoon's widow wouldn't cause any problems. Korea didn't protest as Hae meekly climbed into the front seat, squished in between him and Hwang. SH got in the back, staring off into the dark town, her face blank again as her hand massaged Hae's shoulder.

As they drove out of Sincheon and back towards Pyongyang in the dark, Hae breathed out shakily, pressin' herself into Korea's warm side.

"Permission to cry, Gen'ral?"

He sighed deeply. "If you must."

Hae burst into tears.

Low mood. But the world is still more kind than cruel.

Most of the events mentioned here are real, or adapted from real events. The twenty-one men being forced into the reservoir and made to swim until they drowned isn't, but people were drowned. Kim Moon-sik's barn didn't exist, but obviously we know people were locked in places and burned down. Some of the casualties are even scaled down because they were still discovering graves in the Sincheon area into the 90s, so they don't have the full numbers at this point. Also the Women's International Democratic Federation's report noted only three women surviving the massacre at the Sincheon Rest House (though there could be more since survivors of something like that would be hesitant to come forward for fear of their reputation). I added a fourth with Dan Yeon-hwa because I didn't want to erase the identity of a real woman.

https://archive.org/details/sinchon-museum

Content warning for pictures and paintings of bodies and acts of violence. And a note that if you read 'US cannibals' and think 'they're just accusing them of anything awful,' cannibalism is mentioned nowhere in here, I think it's being used in the same vein as 'bloodthirsty' or 'vampires.' Though you never know. Men with power over people they consider subhuman can do disturbed things, clearly.

I wouldn't be surprised if some reactionaries that had justice enacted on them were included in the total death toll. The DPRK's official line was 'fair trials and proof, don't just lynch someone for collaborating with the enemy.' But there was a period between the retreat of the Americans and Southern army and the return of the KPA that there would have been only remaining right-wing gangs and collaborators and local guerrillas in the area. And I repeat an earlier point that murdering innocent people is not the same as murdering the people that did it. And if I were one of the people from the area whose neighbours had been raped and murdered by the thousands or actual soldiers that eventually got there to see a building full of burnt children, I don’t think I would care much about the law. It wouldn't have been carried out at the behest of the government, but they also wouldn't want to lock up clearly patriotic fighters without a reason if the violence was already done. I could definitely see executed collaborators being absorbed into the official count to avoid having to punish anyone for enacting technically illegal people's justice (I think it would more be that than the 'poor optics' angle- during the war the DPRK was fairly blunt about saying 'this guy got what he deserved' because it wasn't bad optics to the general populace- though poor optics on an international scale would still be a factor). But the reactionary guerrillas were not civilians, and since it is undeniable that they committed the majority of atrocities in the area along with the American army, I find it hard to see a problem with that. I actually think it's the opposite of authoritarian to allow the people harmed to get their own justice, like the people's courts did in Seoul during the first month of the war, trying the policemen that had committed crimes against them while the KPA stayed out of it. Obviously the world can’t work like that all the time, but I think in the chaos of war that that is sometimes the most just thing. And they did keep perpetrators alive for trial, so it wasn't like they just executed everyone , and the International Women's Democratic Federation and International Association of Democratic Lawyers both investigated and gave the verdict that the main source of casualties and violence was certainly America and its allies, while the United Nations declined to investigate at all, even when demanded to, which I think speaks loudly.

The Warmer One's Love

1916

The place inside herself was far away and peaceful, disconnected from the hot summer night outside the claustrophobic walls, the stench of sweat choking the small room, and the harsh clink of porcelain.

She was far away, floating in nothing. She had no happy memories to submerge herself in. She had used to be able to think of warehouses and cooking fires and the taste of flaky fish. But there was no comfort in those now. It only dwelled in distance.

"Are you even listening to me?"

South Hamgyong drew herself up from the inside place like water from the deepest, blackest well, her eyes slowly focusing on the person that had made those memories so happy, and now made them hard to think of.

"What... was that?"

She welcomed her brother's visits because they allowed her to be her again for a moment. But every week it felt harder to pull herself from that place, to use casual speech instead of polite, to not say 'excuse me' and 'please' and 'yes sir.'

At least she hadn't forgotten how to speak Korean. She had plenty of practice at it. The Japanese 'clients' liked it when she spoke her language, just like the Korean ones liked it when she spoke Japanese. It made it so they didn't have to understand her.

Her brother's eyes narrowed. "I said 'What the fuck is that on your neck?'"

It wasn't her neck, just like it wasn't her hand that touched it in a vain attempt to cover what the collar of her kimono couldn't. It was clear they were marks from fingers.

She didn't answer, and North Hamgyong's face darkened. "What the fuck did that bastard do to you?" he growled.

"Language," she said limply.

He slammed a fist on the table, making the tea set rattle and making SH's heart jump. "Don't talk about my fucking language when some Jap fucking choked you!"

"It's alright," she said, the words sour in her mouth. "I made him pay extra for damages."

The man had scared her, suddenly wrapping his spindly-fingered hands around her throat while he was inside her. She had panicked and managed to squirm free, fleeing from him.

Her brother's eyes flashed and his jaw locked. "'Damages,'" he said as he *'thunk'*ed his teacup down on the table, the word as bitter as the minari soup she'd given him to scarf down earlier.

He was furious. He would be even more furious if he knew South Hamgyong had allowed it.

She'd managed to get into the main room, hiding in the corner. The man had been prepared to leave, irritated that he hadn't been able to finish, and vowing not to pay her or ever visit again.

South Hamgyong would have been glad to let him. She would have been glad to have the man with the slicked-back hair and glasses leave and never return. She would have been glad if he died.

But if he did, then she had just let him violate her for nothing. For free. And she would lose future funds to pay off her debt.

So she had negotiated. Made him promise not to damage her too badly for fear of reprisal from Japan for damaging his merchandise. And made him pay extra for the privilege of cutting off her air supply.

"Damages," she said lightly, sipping her green tea. It was sweet and earthy and cost far too much. But every month a fresh supply was delivered to her to serve to her customers. "This isn't that bad. It's just fresh still."

She had been hurt worse before. It was just usually where North Hamgyong didn't have to see it, or had time to fade before he visited, giving him the privilege of pretending it wasn't there. But she hadn't even been able to bathe before he arrived this time, too busy lying limp on the floor and trying to remember how to breathe. She still stank like sweat and sex. She could feel it leaking out of her pores, and knew her brother could smell it, too.

"'Isn't that bad' my ass!" he snapped, the cords on his neck straining. "You let some bastard choke you!"

'Let.'

South Hamgyong's fingers tightened on her teacup as she took another sip. "Yes, well, it's what I have to do to pay off our debt."

"You don't have to pay it off," her brother growled, starting their dance again. "You could leave."

"I can't," she said, taking his hand, though both of hers were wrapped around her cup.

"You can." He leaned forward, leading her. "I leave, you go take your bath, then on the way back from the bathhouse you make a break for the wall. I'll meet you at it, help you get over, then we're out. We are free."

South Hamgyong matched his steps in tired routine. "And then what?" she asked. "We're in the middle of the mountains with me in a kimono and house sandals, and you in footwraps. We don't know how to hunt, and one wrong plant while foraging would leave us vulnerable. We wouldn't be able to evade Japan, and neither of us can fight."

Her brother opened his mouth to protest, but she smiled sadly, her eyes dipping.

"How long until you get hurt again, and we end up right back here?"

North Hamgyong's jaw tightened, and his fingers locked around the scar on his forearm.

"It wouldn't happen again," he said stiffly.

"That's what you said last time." Before he had picked his stupid fight and led her to this.

His eyes flashed as he stood abruptly. "Last time wasn't-!"

But as he shot up, his leg slammed the table, and the teacup he'd set on the edge wobbled, and fell to the floor.

The sound was small, the slightest 'clink.' But by the look on her brother's face, South Hamgyong knew it was the sound of another few thousand yen being added to her debt.

They were both silent, her cup shaking in her numb fingers and his face frozen.

His throat bobbed as he looked at her, defiant and a paler green than usual. "I didn't-" His fists flexed as his expression firmed. "Leave with me tonight."

South Hamgyong took a sip from her empty teacup, smiling distantly. "I think you should go now. I would like to get some sleep, please."

Her brother bared his teeth at her and the broken cup, then turned and stormed to the door, banging on it until the guards let him out, and their dance came to an abrupt end.

There would be no point in trying to hide the broken porcelain. The guards always took stock of what she had, so they knew nothing was broken and she hadn't managed to get her hands on some weapon. They had already found the ripped obi from a few months ago.

She could feel what she had earlier as she watched the 'client' put his hand on the door, as she quivered in place, fingers gripping the tea pot she had snatched from the table so tightly it could have shattered, as she was filled with an awful pressure and the urge to smash it over his head.

She could hear the dark thing stirring from its hibernation, the thing that had awakened at the beginning of the year as her own fingers had almost closed around that sleeping adulterer's throat. She wanted to throw her cup at the door, to heave the table at one of the barred windows, to howl and tear at her clothes and strike the wall with her fists until her knuckles tore, to shatter the porcelain like her brother, every single piece of it. She wanted-

But she couldn't. Everything in this cage was a number, one that could keep her here longer were it to break. She couldn't even hurt herself because she, too, was a commodity. And if she degraded her value, no one would pay for her, and she would be trapped here forever.

She could feel the man's fingers locked around her throat again, and her own holding them there, her mind way down inside herself.

Dreamily, she had thought it would be nice to 'die.' Then she wouldn't have to be awake for any of it. She wouldn't have to feel teeth and fingers digging into her skin, or be choked with man-smell and floral oils or take her scalding hot baths or see her brother's disappointed, disgusted, angry face glaring over the table at her like she wasn't doing this for him, like she wasn't here because of him.

The only reason she had managed to make her body grab his wrist and remind him not to go too far had been because she knew if he 'killed' her, she might not get her money. Just like why everything in this cage was purposefully high-quality and expensive- Japan would do anything he could to extend her contract, to add to her debt. If she 'died,' she would wake up wasted and used and not a single yen richer.

She wouldn't give any of them that satisfaction.

The thing in her head growled, far lower than her brother, and South Hamgyong made herself release the teacup. Trembling with a pressure that had nowhere to go, she moved with a distant smile on her face, off to scald her skin and scream in the one place no one could hear her.

Her heel crunched on the already shattered porcelain, grinding it into the floor.

And to report the damages.

—

1951

Korea disappeared as soon as they reached the air raid shelter, off to the city to calm himself down with work, like usual. He'd radiated a black energy all the way back to Pyongyang. Though SH supposed they all had. Even Hwang had been tense and morose as they dropped him off at Sariwon.

Hae should have been left there, too, to make her way to Haeju with him. But Korea said he wanted her to keep working the Pyongyang fields. SH thought he might just want to keep her close after... all that.

The last two days flickered through her mind- women missing limbs, missing breasts, missing themselves, missing, Ko Kuil-hwa and Dan Yeon-hwa and the things that had been-

The dark thing raked its claws down the barely-standing wall, gouging lines in the crumbling concrete as it howled. It hadn't quieted since they'd arrived in Sincheon and SH had seen that board, all those faces and names, some men but mostly daughters, wives, grandmothers, sisters, women and girls made to be the victims like always.

She painted withered lotuses and broken glass and babies with horns on the cold grey wall, trying to press it back. Her fists squeezed tighter.

"SH? Are ya alright?"

Her eyes snapped open, and she found she was holding Hae's hand, like she had been since the Jeep left, crushing it hard enough to hurt, though her cousin wasn't trying to escape.

SH slowly exhaled, adding more paint to the wall. "I'm alright," she said, looking at the door to the bunker.

Hae looked at it, too, her feet shifting.

Their cousins were all in their provinces, fulfilling the wishes and solving the complaints Korea had been sent for his birthday. SH would have to return to hers tomorrow, too, leaving her alone.

"Do you want to take a bath before we go to sleep?" she asked.

Hae nodded gratefully. "Ah'm not scared or anythin'," she mumbled. "Ah just... don't want to go inside yet."

SH dipped her head. "Of course. We're all dusty from all that travelling, after all."

And she could feel the words of all those women's coating her like scum. For the first time in years, she felt like it was oozing out of her own pores again.

SH crept into the bunker, careful not to wake up Liaoxi and Liaotung as she fetched their drab military-issue towels and spare uniforms.

She was actually a bit surprised Liaoxi hadn't gone with North Pyongan to Sinuiju, considering how friendly they'd seemed to be getting. But China had been awake and waiting for them to get back, so had left with Korea, of course.

Realizing that meant no one was on watch, SH doubled back to nudge Liaotung awake, informing her. The Chinese woman nodded blearily, and SH returned to her cousin's side.

Hae was pressed into the flank of the mountain when she came out, and immediately grabbed her hand again, staring fixedly into the dark forest. SH's jaw feathered as she squeezed her fingers.

There was a new wariness to her little cousin, one she didn't like seeing on her.

She opened her mouth, then closed it, leading her into the trees.

"Are we goin' to the river?" Hae whispered. When SH nodded she said, "Kang says we're not supposed to go swimmin' with open wounds."

"Kangwon says a lot of things," SH replied, thinking about their 'chat' while hunting for herbs. She sighed. "But he's right about that. The barracks are too far, though. We'll just make sure to disinfect our wounds really well, and visit the hospital tomorrow. Then once South Pyongan and North Hamgyong get back, they can finish the bath."

They were working to get a heated one built, the kind with a wood-burning stove under a large tub, so they could boil enough water to bathe in. SH just knew North Hamgyong had chosen that design to mock her, but she wasn't going to give him the satisfaction of confronting him about it. She hadn't spoken with him alone since he'd antagonized her back in July.

"And then SH can take cold baths in winter," Hae finished.

"Hopefully we won't still be out here in winter."

Hopefully the war would be over and they could start rebuilding. And punishing the men that deserved it.

But the months of on-off ceasefire negotiations had only proved SH right- America wouldn't let them just talk peace out. Men like him didn't stop until they got what they wanted.

'Or die.'

They weren't too far from the main highway, and they only had to cross it to reach a tributary of the Pothong River. It glimmered as it ran under the shadow of the small hill on the other side, a lazy brush stroke meandering away in both directions. There was an open field between them and the road, which would be busier now that it was nighttime and any vehicles would be less likely to be seen by planes, but the embankment would hide them from any patrols that came by.

Hae stripped down immediately, tossing her uniform and peeled-off bandages on the ground, but SH's fingers hesitated on her buttons, reluctant to bare her flesh. She wasn't worried about anyone coming upon them. Even if someone that meant harm did, she had her gun this time, and so did Hae. They could just shoot him.

She just... wanted to wear her uniform.

'Silly.' She made herself unbutton her tunic. It felt dirty, in more ways than one.

"I'll do our laundry tomorrow before I go," she said to Hae, who was already dipping her toe in the black river water.

"Korea'll be mad," she warned, balancing on one foot to flick water from the other.

"Not this time." Well, maybe not about her washing Hae's uniform. But she was planning to filch his, too, so he might be about that. She was sure he'd return to change out of the one he'd worn to Sincheon.

Hae made a "Grah!" sound, followed by a splash as she threw herself into the river, and sputtering as she resurfaced.

"Is it cold?" SH asked, laying their towels out close to the water, arranging their firearms on them.

"No," her cousin said confidently.

SH padded over, stepping in, then arched an eyebrow. "Lying isn't nice, Hae."

"You like the cold," she said, smiling.

But she didn't giggle or try to flick water at her like she usually would have. She only floated up onto her back, a small spot of ghostly white in the dark tributary.

SH frowned internally, but her smile stayed on her face as she slid into the river, sighing as she submerged herself.

The water wasn't frigid yet, but it was cold enough to make her feel a little cleaner just by having it touch her skin. Though her burns took the chill less well.

"SH," Hae asked quietly, staring up at the stars. "Can you wash my back?"

"Of course." She gestured her cousin over from the deeper water so they could crouch, toes dug into the silty river bottom.

Hae was quiet as she used their hand towel to wipe her back down, careful not to be too rough with her burns. The only time she'd ever been silent during a bath was the first time, when she wasn't speaking at all. And she had never been this still.

"SH," she said eventually. "Why were most'a the folks that got hurt in Sincheon women?"

SH's hand stilled on her cousin's spine.

"Because men don't see us as people, Hae."

The words had came out darker than she'd meant, carrying the growl of the thing behind the wall.

"Oh." Her cousin's voice was small and sad, and it made SH exhale.

"Not every man," she clarified. "But the Americans and the reactionaries. It's why they want things to stay the same or go backwards- because they don't want to have to see us as people. But the majority of our men aren't like that."

She wasn't like South Chungcheong. She knew that most men weren't degenerate, craven, animalistic or any of the other insults her cousin had hurled at them through the years. And even the ones that were had been made that way by the old systems that said that women were lesser, no more than commodities. It wasn't something innately 'male.'

Yet still, sometimes when she was alone with a comrade, no matter how kind he was, she would find herself looking over her shoulder, waiting for him to try something, or think she felt his eyes crawling lasciviously over her body, even when she could see they were fixed respectfully on the center of her flag's flower.

She never wanted Hae to feel that way, especially now that she kept raising her head warily, scanning the far side of the river.

"But the Yankees..." The cloth crumpled in her fist.

"They're just wrong."

Maybe some of the ones in America weren't, the ones that had refused to fight. But she knew that for every single Yankee soldier here, it wasn't a matter of 'if' they would rape a Korean woman, but 'what it would take' for them to.

Hae nodded. "They're devils," she said, venomous in a way that was foreign to her.

SH bit her lip, unable to fight it anymore.

"Hae," she carefully began. "What did Comrade Yang Jeong-nyeo tell you?"

Hae was quiet for a second longer, and her heart sank.

"She said the miguk-nom beat her," she said eventually. "And her daughter."

"That's all?"

Hae nodded. "Mm. They beat her real bad and killed her kid."

SH relaxed slightly.

Kangwon could get on her case for not wanting to say the word, but most of the women they'd spoken to that had been... through what she had hadn't spoken plainly. They'd used the words 'hurt' or 'assaulted' or dodged around describing it entirely. No one wanted to directly acknowledge what had been done to them.

She had been worried that Yang Jeong-nyeo might be different, especially without Korea, Hwang, or any other men there to overhear. But the woman must have spoken vaguely enough that Hae didn't realize what had truly happened to her.

"There was something Comrade Yeon-hwa said that ah din't get," Hae said, her gaze on the water as SH ran the cloth across her shoulder.

"What is it?"

"Why did she say the miguk-nom were sellin' the women in the rest home? What were they sellin' 'em for?"

Relief bloomed in SH's bones, and her thighs went so weak she would have fallen if she was standing. The last bits of filth clinging to her washed away in the inky water.

"Labour," she managed after a second. "They were selling them for labour, like how women were sold to Japan during the Occupation. "

"That's awful," Hae said quietly. "Those poor women."

"Yes," SH forced out. "Those poor women."

Maybe it was wrong to lie to Hae like that. But SH couldn't make herself see it that way. Almost every woman had to grow up afraid that one day a man could take everything from her. If she took too long getting home or her family was given a good deal or a rich man needed a concubine or she needed money to live, she would have her body stripped away.

She didn't want Hae to have to worry about that. She didn't want her to be afraid of being alone, even with comrades, she didn't want her to look at the knives every single woman in Sincheon had been carrying and know that they weren't for self-defense, and she didn't want her to know just what America and the right-wing men that beat her could have done to her.

Hae had been lucky. SH had asked her careful questions once she had started talking, and she was sure she had never been violated, that what they had interrupted when they rescued her had been the first time. She had been locked away for eleven years, alone, completely at the mercy of foreign men that hadn't seen her as human, and she had somehow escaped it without that part of her being torn away. And she had been pinned down and beaten by a group of the most violent, degenerate men alive, and still avoided what happened to some women just because they'd wanted to go to the market.

And she shouldn't have to know that she had been lucky. She shouldn't have to know that every single battle they took part in risked that luck breaking.

So many women never had the chance to be innocent, or if they did, it was taken from them. If SH could keep her cousin that way, she would do anything she could to.

She wanted her to keep believing that death was the worst thing that could happen to you, she wanted her to keep believing that forgetting was easy and that she and the Jeollas had only been made to sing and dance and play games to entertain. SH wanted her to keep seeing her as pure, even when everyone else knew she wasn't.

"That's why we're lucky we have Korea," she said to Hae, putting her arms around her shoulders. "And the General and our cousins." And North Hamgyong, she supposed. "They're good men, and they'll help us Liberate all of our women. One day no one will ever remember a time Korean women weren't just as free and equal as men."

No one but them.

"SH." Hae put her hands on her arm, holding tight. "Are you angry, too?"

"I..." Her hold tightened around her cousin as her throat fought to keep her silent.

'Anger is the only correct way to feel.'

"Yes," she admitted, choking the word out in a way that almost hurt. "I'm angry."

It was like a curtain had been pulled back, torn out of the hands that so desperately clung to the fabric, as she finally let the truth behind it in. It felt like a relief to say it, to finally acknowledge it, like her ribs could at last expand enough to get a full breath.

In her cage, anger had been the sole domain of men. Of the 'clients' that choked and beat and dominated her, taking their anger at being bossed around at work or nagged by their wives out on someone that couldn't fight back, and of her brother and his dour face, smashing that teacup and picking fights, getting her caged in the first place. It had been something disgusting and unsightly.

And even once freed, and she had learned from Korea that anger didn't always have to be cold and bitter, but something righteous and hot, she couldn't afford to wear it. On women, passion was so easily read as hysteria.

But she was angry. And she thought she had been angry for a long time. When that man had fallen asleep on her arm, when that other's hands had closed around her neck, every time she had to negotiate with herself as the ware she was trying to sell or scrub her skin until it bled, every time America had called her 'doll' or when Jin-suk sobbed into her arms or she heard about some new horror that men had managed to visit upon their women, when she had seen the ruins of her city and every time her brother looked at her like that-

South Hamgyong was angry. And if she hadn't been, if part of her hadn't responded to that look in Korea's eyes as he entered her cage, blood on his hands, she wouldn't be here now.

"I'm angry," she repeated, pulling her cousin close and burying her face in her shoulder, shaking with the force of the feeling she finally allowed to flow through her. "I'm really really angry."

"Me too," Hae said, leaning her head back so their singed cheeks were pressed together. "But ah love you, cuz."

SH smiled tremulously into her burnt skin. "I love you, too, Hae. And I think you were very brave for going back there."

"Ah'll get braver," Hae promised. "And ah'll get stronger." She twisted in her arms to look at her seriously, eyes like large pools of moonstone. "Then ah'll keep you safe. Ah'll make sure no one ever hurts you or Korea or any'a our woman or anyone ever again."

"It's Korea and I's job to keep you safe," SH said, though her heart swelled. "Remember?"

Hae thought for a moment. "We're comrades, so it's both'a our jobs to keep each other safe. So you'll keep me safe, and ah'll keep you safe."

SH smiled, and for a moment the dark thing stilled.

"Deal."

—

"I want you in the fields tomorrow after reporting to the Supreme Commander," North said, not leaving the Jeep. "You'll join North Hwanghae in your province in a few days."

Hae nodded, subdued in a way that made his jaw ache, even though she had finished crying thirty minutes ago. She looked up at him from under her stubby lashes, pushing her bottom lip out.

North sighed in consent, and she leaned into the driver's seat, wrapping her arms around his waist and burying her face in his stomach, making the burn gash twinge.

"Ah hate 'em," she heatedly declared into him. "Ah hate the reaction'ries an' ah hate the Yankees an' traitors an' 'Merica an'-"

North waited, his jaw clenched. "And?"

"Nothin', Korea," she mumbled, then mumbled somethin' else he still wouldn't respond to.

He put a hand on her head, pushing her away. "Get a new bandage on your cheek."

He nodded to SH as she bid him goodnight, then drove the Jeep back into the trees.

"Stealing my transportation again?" China asked from the back seat.

"My country. My vehicle," North answered, unable to avoid tensing, even though he had expected the other Countryhuman.

"You can consider this your one warning that I don't actually need your keys to hijack your GAZ."

"Touch my truck and die." If North Hamgyong didn't get him first.

"Aiya," China sighed, draping his top half over the back of the driver's seat. "You're lucky my little sisters and I need to watch our waistlines."

North hit the brake abruptly, halting them on the highway. "Go back to the bunker," he growled, his skin prickling up and down.

It hadn't stopped, day and night, over every inch of Sincheon and Hwanghae province. Now that Hae was out of her land she was free of it. But he wasn't. He never was. And between it and the burning rage that clouded his vision and choked his throat with bitter acid every time he thought of Hae clinging to Yang Jeong-nyeo, Dan Yeon-hwa looking at the child that had been forced on her with desperate hopelessness and then conviction, San-gon clutching his old blade, or any of the hundreds of other stories and scenes he had witnessed in Sincheon and the millions of others that had taken place all over his country-

"I can't be around a foreigner right now."

It didn't matter that China's soldiers were nothing like America's or Rhee's. He was still a reminder that the war wasn't over, that they had retreated, that it was his fault that the enemy had been able to visit such destruction on his people-

"I might be a foreigner," China said, tilting his head to look at him.

"But I'm not exactly foreign to the concept of what an occupying force can do to your people. And how it can affect you."

He was on North's blindside, and he refused to turn his head to see what expression he was making. But his voice was solemn enough that the Korean's knuckles tightened around the wheel.

The Chinese country would be familiar.

"If you want my opinion- though I'm sure you don't- a tactical retreat was the only thing you could have done last year," he continued, slightly lighter.

"It was," North clipped, throwing the Jeep back into drive. "That's why I did it."

He couldn't have China thinking he was affected, beyond being furious at what had been done to his people. They had to retreat- if they hadn't they would have fallen and the same atrocities that had happened in Sincheon and were still happening in the south would be happening everywhere. The Americans and the traitors had been the ones to do it. The past couldn't be changed. North could only use it to chart a course forward and avoid the same mistakes. He had to keep repeating those words until he felt them.

"Here." China's closed fist entered his field of view, forcing North to lean to see the road. "Give these to your Little Tiger."

"She doesn't need anything," North grumbled. "And get out of the way."

China's hand touched his chest, making him flinch as he slid it into his breast pocket. North took a hand off the wheel to bat him away.

"Milk candy," the other country explained, leaning back out of hitting distance. "She likes it. And she shouldn't have a problem accepting it from you."

North *'tch'*ed, making sure the objects in his pocket really were candy.

Whatever. China would just try to gift it to her anyway. At least this way North could prevent his province from spiralling over being bribed again.

Once at Jonsung complex, North ditched China and went immediately to Pak Hon-yong's room, waking him up to make his case. But again his appeal was denied.

His General was still up, hunched over his desk by lamplight. He looked up from his papers as his Countryhuman slammed the door. "You've returned. How was it?"

North gave him a bleak look, and he nodded soberly.

"No matter how we bring an end to this war, the Imperialist aggressors will pay for what they have done to our country."

"What's the situation at the front?" North asked, bringing his chair over to sit across from him.

The Premier rifled through the papers spread over his desk, then slid a tactical map to him. "Not much has changed since you left. The line is mostly stable. The main thrust is still being made in the eastern sector."

North nodded, surveying the lines and unit identifiers.

After losing the ridge where they had repulsed the puppet army's 36th Regiment over a week ago, his Third Corps had pulled back to a series of hills farther north, between Mundung-ri and Satae-ri, taking up defensive positions there that they had spent months digging. The Yankees were moving with their puppets to seize the ridges, ostensibly to prevent North's army from using them to launch an attack on their troops west of the Haean-myeon valley.

That was likely a part of it. But North knew that America's main motivator was what it had always been- to steal as much of Korea as possible.

The offensive had only opened four days ago, with the Americans and the French launching one of their usual unending artillery barrages before sending in assault teams. North's 6th Division had held them off for the first day, but after realizing they had underestimated them again, the enemy had changed tactics and managed to seize a lesser height, which they hadn't managed to reclaim even with repeated counteroffensives. But even then, the Americans' main force hadn't made gains by the 16th or today. North was pleased to hear that while he was in Hwanghae province his comrades had even managed to replace a battle-weary regiment. Though he was less pleased by how things stood overall.

It was a stalemate, just like the war in general.

"We need to reclaim that height," he said, shoving the map away. "I should be there."

He had visited on his tour down the front, but it wasn't enough. He had seen the way his soldiers eyes had lit up as he spoke with them and how their defensive efforts grew even stronger as he passed. Everywhere he went, the line had been reinforced. But they needed more. They needed to advance.

"Comrade Pak Hon-yong hasn't yielded?" his Premier asked knowingly.

North *'tch'*ed in answer.

The talks were paused. He should be able to go to the front. But his Minister of Foreign Affairs insisted he shouldn't, since his presence could jeopardize the chance of the negotiations restarting.

"His points are good ones, in this case," his General said. "The enemy is already using moving the location as a sticking point. We don't want to give them another."

North knew he was right. Ridgeway wanted to move the talks to Panmunjom, a village farther east, insisting that Kaesong was compromised after so many 'incidents.' But it was obvious that the location hadn't had anything to do with them. All it would accomplish would be extending the process even more. And he and his provinces going to the front would just give them another excuse.

But still...

"I should be there," he repeated, frustrated.

His insides were writhing, tying themselves into knots. Every time his mind wandered back to Sincheon, to Hae and his people's tears, that tiny skull, that lotus pond and air raid shelter, a seething red engulfed his vision, setting his blood aflame.

"I need to-"

He cut himself off, hearing the note in his own voice. He grit his teeth, balling his hands on his thighs.

"I share my county's sentiment," his General said after a moment, quietly. "Perhaps you could visit Wonsan. No one could complain when you're repulsing a landing party ri from the frontline."

North exhaled slowly, trying to force his head to clear. "No," he said when he sounded steady again. "We know the enemy will take any chance to complain they can."

And he had to control this.

"I will stay here and conduct my duties as needed."

The Premier dipped his head. "As you wish. But I have been thinking about paying a visit to our comrades at the front soon, if you would like to accompany me."

North straightened, eye wide. "That's too dangerous."

He had been alarmed enough to find out that he had actually visited the front for Liberation Day last year (which he had wisely not informed him of until after). The note North had received hadn't came from Pyongyang- it had come from far closer, too close, considering his vehicle had actually almost been bombed.

The man smiled, eyes twinkling. "Then I suppose you'll have to come with me to make sure no harm comes to Korea's Premier. Maybe we'll even have the chance to fight off an ambush, like old times."

There would be no fight. If an enemy soldier even looked at his General wrong, North would turn them into mist before they knew what happened. He had no idea how he had ever let him onto the battlefield during the Occupation without having a heart attack.

"I'll come," he said, grateful for what he was doing for him, even if it made his pulse unsteady.

"Good. I'm sure you will be alright until then." He sobered, folding his hands over his desk. "Now, would you like to report on Hwanghae?"

North hesitated, then his jaw feathered. "No. South Hwanghae will report tomorrow, and North Hwanghae is going to start working on his exposé immediately. I... can't."

He said it through gritted teeth. It was a weakness, but he knew if he had to recall everything he had seen and heard there, just what had been done to their countrymen...

Korea had to do what was best for his people. And if he had to think of that again right now, there would be no way to convince himself that was remaining in a politician's seat and not going directly to Busan to launch a suicide attack on America and Rhee, tearing apart anyone that came between him and them.

His comrade dipped his head. "I understand. How fare our comrades?"

"North Hwanghae kept his composure and didn't put his foot in his mouth too many times. And South Hwanghae handled her tasks very well." Not the way he would have, but that was good. What had happened to Sincheon had already made their people angry. But that wasn't enough for all of them. He needed them healed, or close to it.

And Hae was good at that.

"And Comrade SH?"

North thinned his lips. "I warned her not to go."

They couldn't afford to look away from their people's suffering, but he knew she didn't have to see it to know. She had already been working with the women abused by the Yankees and their puppets- she shouldn't have had to be exposed to the aftermath on such a scale.

But it was... useful that she had been there for Hae.

"I'll make time to speak with them both tomorrow," his Premier said, then hesitated.

North was automatically wary. "What?"

"I don't think this is the best time to inform you of this, but..." He sighed. "I can't keep something like this from my country for a moment longer."

He rummaged through his drawer, pulling out a page from a newspaper. A quick glance at the article titles- everything from 'COMMUNIST ARMY EXECUTES THOUSANDS OF PATRIOTIC CHRISTIANS' to 'RUSSIANS SABOTAGE PEACE TALKS'- showed that it was a reactionary rag.

His eye was drawn to a headline in the corner, and his heart stilled. The needles under his skin intensified, the red mist descending over his vision again as the paper crumpled in his grip.

His General nodded severely. "Articles like this have appeared in several papers from the south. Only the 'independent' ones, so far."

For deniability, either if she ever switched sides or if North accused them of using it to try and interfere with the ceasefire.

Because that was what this was for. A subtle threat from 'independent' newspapers that only existed with the puppet government's grace, and so with America's. It could be dismissed as gossip or the accusations of a few conspiracy theorists. But North saw it as what it was- a direct message from America.

'If the talks succeed and you Reunify, you won't be able to keep this from your papers, too. Everyone will know.'

"Don't address it directly," he forced through gritted fangs. "Have the Rodong Sinmun run an article on the conditions all of Korea's provinces faced during the Occupation, and remind everyone that possession of enemy leaflets or newspapers without intent to destroy is a punishable offense. And if this leaves anyone's lips I want them to know that it is considered treason and I will treat it as such."

The Premier nodded, making a note. "The only other parties that are aware so far are myself, our agents in the south, those responsible for monitoring enemy papers, and Comrade Nam Il. He had to be prepared in case it would affect the talks."

"No," North forced out, fingers digging into his legs. "Peace will not be jeopardized over slander like this."

It couldn't be.

"Is there anything about the others?"

His General shook his head.

There wouldn't be. They were supposed to be seen as 'loyal,' 'saved from Communist hands.' Their reputations couldn't be tarnished, though North had no doubt they would face the same treatment if their Reunification came from a ceasefire. Though they would handle it better.

"I want this treated like any other enemy lie," North ordered. Even though this was one true. "And if anyone tells South Hamgyong about this I will put them up against the wall myself."

He usually refrained from making threats like that around his Premier, but he couldn't help it this time. He knew that even if every single one of their people refused to believe the slander, it wouldn't matter. She would know. And she would always wonder if they did believe it. She would always wonder if they were looking at her and seeing someone weak and powerless.

A victim.

North bared his teeth as he tore the paper to scraps, despising that the enemy could tear their pasts from them like that, uncovering things that were supposed to stay buried.

Why did his brother have to let America make him use those damn Commands?

His Premier didn't protest, like he hadn't protested when North removed those that spread that rumour after Liberation. It didn't matter if it was the truth- that wasn't why it was being said. And the only ones that had known at that point had been men that deserved to be locked away. They had deserved worse than that.

North shoved his hand under his eyepatch, rubbing roughly at the scar there. 'Ssi-bal.'

He wanted to kill America, and every single one of his puppets. He wanted to-

"Do you have my book?"

His General handed him his old leather notebook, and North removed himself to his desk, trying to drown out his thoughts with names- Kim San-gon, Yang Jeong-nyeo, Ko Kuil-hwa, Kang Dong-joon and everyone else in the bunker; Kim Myong-gum, Jong Kun-song, Ju Sang-won and the others that had survived their own massacres; Kim I-jin and Dan Yeon-hwa; Oh Pil-rae, Min Song-bin, Ok Chun-yong, Paks and Kims and Ris from all across Sincheon, Anak, and Unryul; and every single name on the lists of the missing and dead that he hadn't written down yet. He drew symbols next to the ones he could, little codes so he would know who was a martyr, who was a traitor, whose debts had been returned and whose still needed to be balanced.

He drew two bags of grain next to Yang Chun-yoon's name, then struck them through, the same thing he had drawn next to Kim Sok-won's, the same symbol that sat next to the names of allies and enemies alike. The only difference between the two was whether or not a snakelike line came before it. They both meant the same thing- 'Got what they deserved.'

He took a moment to go back through the names he had already written down, finding the sections he had filled after the 1946 and

1948 elections, and after he had regained his northern provinces, updating several- People's Committee and Worker's Party members he had still been holding out hope for, but now knew were gone- and went back even farther for some- comrades from the war against Japan that had given their lives defending Hwanghae. Next to Pak Byong-sol, a man from the later days of Korea's Army who had fought with them all the way to Liberation, Jo Pong-ok, the fourteen-year old chairwoman of the Raksan Primary School's Children's Union who hadn't given away her guerrilla comrades even under torture, and Choe Kwang-seok, who he had never been able to repay for helping look after Hae during her time in Sincheon, he drew a single messy eye. It was done in the grey of pencil lead. Only he knew it was the colour of chestnuts. Only he knew it meant 'martyred.'

He went to turn the page to resume writing the names of the deceased, and stopped, finding himself out of pages. After thirteen years and thirty-two years of names, his record was finally full.

North stared numbly at the thick, worn book, its pages swollen with decades of damp, dirt, and his people.

It wasn't like every single person in it was dead. There were thousands of names crammed into the small pages.

But too many of them were. And too many from the last year alone.

A shadow hovered over his desk, and he looked up to see his General holding another book out to him. It had a fine, unblemished leather cover, less scuffed than his had ever been.

"I noticed you were getting close to the end the last time you were writing," he said, smiling. "I thought you might need a new one."

North took it, running his fingers over the blank pages inside, smooth to the touch.

"It was made in our own paper mill this time," his General said. "And most of those pages will be filled with the names of people born in a free Korea, those from Jeju to North Hamgyong."

North stroked a hand over the cover. He was right. He had to be.

"Thank you," the Countryhuman rasped, returning to his writing, trying to stop the fire raging in his blood.

Eventually his Premier left, telling him he hoped he would get some sleep and knowing it was in vain. North kept writing until he had filled the first two pages completely, the syllable blocks so crammed together that he almost didn't need to use the symbols to obscure what was being said.

He sighed, closing the cover heavily and rubbing his scar again.

It hadn't worked. He could still feel the anger roiling under his skin, only made worse now from putting names and faces to those that had suffered again.

He needed to do something. He couldn't go fight at the front, but he still needed to do something.

He opened his first book again, flipping back to the post-criticism session with his provinces section, finding that name again, glaring at it like he could burn it out of existence.

Rim Gun-hon. A soldier in the puppet army, though North hadn't been able to find any details on him. There was a chance he wasn't even an officer, only a gang member wearing the uniform, or someone assigned specifically to the task of hunting down Hae in Sincheon.

All three options posed a problem. North knew any non-rigged jury would believe Hae about what had been done to her. But even she admitted the man himself hadn't directly harmed her, nor had she seen him harm anyone in Sincheon. Leading a reactionary gang responsible for heinous crimes was still an offense punishable by death, but after victory, the eyes of the United Nations would be on them, waiting for any excuse to depose the Socialist government North knew his people would elect, no matter what America wanted. They would look for any chance to protect the high-ranking puppets that had slaughtered for them, and use them to sabotage them from the inside. And if the man was a special agent, there likely wasn't any record of him being in Sincheon, while if he was a member of the right-wing groups, America would try and claim he was a civilian, and that anyone that had collaborated even slightly with his army or his puppets was in danger, breeding distrust and fear in North's populace, just like in the wake of their retreat in December.

'The right of justice should belong to those who are wronged.' North Pyongan had said those words contemplatively when he had returned from Ganghwa, and North agreed heartily. But he knew that even after Reunification, they would have foreign fingers trying to interfere in their system, claiming it was barbaric. They had said that about refusing to allow Japanese collaborators to participate in elections, even though that hadn't involved any violence and the people in the south had been calling for the same thing.

If they could Liberate their country through combat, it would be different. They wouldn't have to worry about appeasing foreign parties or working with the monsters whose orders had caused the carnage all across Korea. He knew America would do anything he could to stymy Reunification if it came through negotiations, just like before. It would just lead to another-

North took a deep breath. He wasn't thinking about that right now. The point was that while he was sure he could get a lifetime sentence for Rim Gun-hon, and he would be satisfied to have him spend the rest of his life breaking his back in a mine to rebuild Hwanghae province, Hwanghae wasn't. If the right of justice couldn't be given to those who were wronged, then the method should be.

He took a fresh sheet of paper from his desk drawer, then hesitated.

No. That would be too irresponsible and adventurist. It wouldn't serve the war effort as a whole, and he couldn't risk an agent getting discovered either uncovering his location or eliminating him if he wasn't at the front. Already it seemed like the Americans cracked their codes as soon as they were utilized, and another operative went dark every day. North was sure they had a leak, and he couldn't risk jeopardizing anyone else in any chain just for this.

But when he thought about forcing a ceasefire, and the months between it and Reunification giving Rim Gun-hon and others like him time to flee to Japan or America to evade paying for what they had done, living fat lives with blood caked under their nails...

A spark lit in his mind. There was an operative that was disconnected from any chains of command. One he had considered saving for a situation no one else could resolve. One who, even if discovered, wouldn't risk any other agents.

Well, he could risk one other.

North tapped his pencil on the desk, thinking.

He had no way of knowing where Pak Seo-nam was. He'd lost contact with him after the puppet government returned to Seoul, and hadn't heard from him even after they'd left again. He could very well still be in Busan. Or he could be dead.

But if he was in Busan, then North knew he would be keeping an eye on his target. He could reach him that way.

Would she even be able to receive a message from North right now? He hadn't tried, not wanting to put her at any more risk than she already was.

But this wouldn't be too dangerous for her. All she would need to do was get information to her handler. He knew from experience that she was resourceful enough to do that without being caught.

If she did get the message, would she be able to pass it on? Would she? She was loyal, but he knew she wouldn't stick her neck out for no reason. He didn't want her to.

North chewed on the inside of his lip, then nodded, starting to pen an 'advertisement.'

A civilian paid to put it in the southern paper for a week, with a real item behind it so he would be none the wiser, keeping him safe while not putting any of their agents at risk. Instructions for Pak Seo-nam not to carry out any actions himself if he deemed it too dangerous, only hunt Rim Gun-hon down and find out if he still lived. And a few signifiers so both parties would know it wasn't an order. He couldn't make it one in good conscience.

He knew the message might not reach her, and he knew even if it did, it might not reach Pak Seo-nam. The man could be dead or so deep in hiding that he'd abandoned his mission.

But North didn't think so. He was also loyal, and wouldn't crack under torture. Even if he was caught, she would stay safe. And if she thought she wouldn't, she would likely just ignore his message.

Still, even if this led to nothing, it soothed the prickle in his skin at least slightly.

He couldn't Liberate their country fully or shut America and his lying, slanderous mouth up or stop the radio broadcasts calling for his province or track down all of those accused by the people of Sincheon whose names he had written in his book and make sure every single one had two struck out sacks of grain next to it.

But he could make sure Rim Gun-hon would never hurt any of his provinces or people again.

—

SH's breath came in unsteady gasps as she leaned against the bunker door, her nails scraping at the steel behind her. The thing behind the wall panted with her, its heaving sides making the concrete bulge, distorting the images she tried to paint over it to hold it back.

She didn't understand. It should be gone. She'd admitted she was angry, she'd admitted that she was furious and she wanted to see every single man that had ever laid hands on her or any woman to be destroyed for it. She didn't have to hold it back anymore, so she shouldn't need to paint the wall, there shouldn't be a wall, there shouldn't be anything to hold back. The dark thing should be gone.

But it wasn't. And as she laid on Hae's cot with her cousin curled up next to her, her face peaceful, all she had been able to focus on was the bandage on her cheek and the burn under it. All she had been able to see was her face in the POW camp, sullen and bruised, and the way she jumped now when a branch cracked in the woods on the way back to the bunker. All she could see were the faces of all those women in Sincheon, from elders to mothers to Party members, Public Security, militia, and children, little girls.

It was always them that were made to suffer the most. When men were shipped to Japan or conscripted for the army, it was for labour. For women, it was for their bodies. They both suffered, but the men could come home and forget. The women couldn't. Even if they returned to Korea, they would be ostracized by their neighbours, like Ko Kuil-hwa, or rejected by their families or made to raise a child they didn't want, like Jin-suk had almost had to, like Dan Yeon-hwa would have to. Not even a uniform or position or gun had been enough to save them from the same fate. There was no escaping for them, there was no forgetting.

SH squeezed her eyes shut, biting down on the inside of her cheek as she tried to paint back the feeling of hands on her breasts and thighs and throat, and the dark thing that slammed on her wall with the blood that gushed from the inside of her mouth.

Her nails sank into her burnt palms, and the feeling only made it howl louder. She couldn't even paint now without it hurting because of America, because it wasn't enough that his soldiers were raping and murdering their people, he had to bomb their land until it was unlivable, too, to drive them underground like moles, to raze their fields and topple their factories.

She could still see the corpse cloths in Hungnam, and the women wailing over them, made to suffer even when they weren't the ones harmed directly.

Her country was being destroyed because men like America, countries like America, couldn't take no for an answer. They couldn't comprehend that every woman, every nation didn't belong to them, that they didn't exist solely to plunder and own. Because when they were denied, they had to take, whether it was Yang Jeong-nyeo and her daughter or Korea or her.

The thing screamed as it hurled itself into the wall and SH screamed, too, throwing her head back and howling up at the sky until her lungs gave out and she was left gasping for air.

She leaned back, sliding down the door, her palms leaving bloody paint strokes like those holding back the dark. It had gone quiet, calmed by the pressure released by her cry. Her throat felt raw, and there was a lingering sense of shame hanging over her as she heard South Chungcheong chide her for hysteria.

But it wasn't. It was rage. And she was allowed to feel it. She wasn't a girl trapped in a cage anymore, only allowed to raise her voice to sing for the pigs that visited her, or when she was muffled by bathwater. She was South Hamgyong province, and she was allowed to be furious at what was being done to their people. It was better than feeling nothing.

Her palms stung, and that felt good, too. It felt good to be able to hurt herself and know that the only thing that would come of it was Korea calling her an idiot if he saw the crescent moons carved into her pale skin, while he hid his own. No fear or anxiety over lost profit. Just a sting. It was her body, and she was allowed to do what she wanted to it, even if it was stupid. And she was the only one.

Despite the sense of relief that brought her, despite how good it felt to scream and finally admit that yes, she was angry, she was furious, the dark thing was rage and always had been...

It was still there, lurking behind the wall. And she didn't know how to get rid of it. There was a creeping feeling that she couldn't, that it would always be there until the war was won, America was dead, Korea was Reunified, and every woman belonged to herself.

And she had a feeling that even that wouldn't be enough. That even when none of her 'clients' had been able to plant a seed in her, the years in that cage still had. That they had left another stain on her, one she would never be able to wash off, no matter how cold of water she used.

Despite how the dark thing was slumbering again, and the wall had been reinforced with a riot of paints... As SH held her head in her bloody hands, she knew she would have nightmares tonight.

She thought she always would.

Oh, you thought that out of all the pieces of North the provinces have, North Hamgyong was the one that got his anger? Wrong! SH is the eldest daughter, of course she inherited his all-consuming rage. And Kangwon is the eldest son so he got the praise kink. You will notice that in every single POV of hers before this, she never uses the word 'angry' or anything like it to describe herself.

Torturing women chapters over. For now. Unfortunately the torturing of women will never truly end until society is rewritten. And even then.

I'll be on hiatus for a few days because I'M GOING TO CHINA! I said I would by this next last year, and I have succeeded. No DPRK yet. ㅠㅠ But soon. Pleaaassse.

Risk and Reward

1938

"I'm afraid any catching up will have to wait for a minute."

Choi Jung-nam and Suzuki Yoshi blinked, the latter looking uneasy.

"Were you followed?" the woman- quite a bit older than when Hwang had seen her last- asked in a hushed voice, casting her eyes toward the rotting straw door of the cow shed.

"No," he quickly assured. "But I have an important question. You both saw the news in August 1936?"

He didn't need to clarify any further. Though it was over two years ago, they both immediately understood what he meant.

"There's another Korea," Suzuki-san said, tugging at the loose strand that had escaped her bun.

"Ah, yes," Hwang recalled. "You printed some of our press releases back then."

"Hai," she confirmed. "But I already knew before your messenger came."

Hwang blinked, surprised at that. "How?"

"Give us more credit, Prof," Choi Jung-nam said with a grin. "We're your students."

"Except one of us was convinced it was photo retouching and wouldn't take the newspaper copy editor's word that it wasn't," his wife said demurely.

"Who was that again?"

Suzuki-san ignored him. "Even if I couldn't tell it wasn't retouched, I knew Korea-sama would never pose with any of my people like that, let alone Japan-sama himself."

Hwang coughed awkwardly. Korea hadn't grown... tolerating of the Japanese until years after their last contact with the Japanese woman. And he had always sent Hwang or another emissary to speak with her instead.

"Yes, well, you were correct and our newspapers spoke the truth. There is another Korea." Hwang glanced at the door, then lowered his voice. "Do you know where he could be?"

Suzuki Yoshi had served as their informant in Seoul (and Korea's excuse to return to the city) for years, locating the Jeollas' location and Gyeonggi's first one for them, as well as playing a key part in South Chungcheong's retrieval. Even after they had deemed it too dangerous to meet personally after that event, once they had started to gather Korea's Army, Korea would occasionally send one of them to see if she had any new intelligence, though he hadn't sent any members from their new combined army recently, as he didn't want any of them being observed returning to the secret camps.

The Japanese woman tipped her head now, puzzled. "Isn't that what Korea-sama wanted to meet with us for? I've honestly been expecting him ever since we were told, or at least someone that works for you."

No. And he would likely attempt to stop Hwang from asking if he was here.

"No time to explain. Do you know where he could be?"

The Japanese woman shook her head. "No, I'm sorry. I looked for information or rumours after I saw the paper, but I haven't found anything. The picture was taken in front of Chosen Jingu, but that's all I could find out."

And anyone that had seen the Shinto shrine would recognize the white shinmei torii gate that stood before the tall stone staircase. Hwang had.

He clicked his tongue in dismay. "Do you-?"

The door swung open with the crash of straw on straw and he froze, forcing himself not to jump. He turned to Korea normally.

"Ah, did I take too long?"

His Countryhuman glared at him in irritation as he holstered his pistol. "I told you to give the all-clear as soon as you confirmed they were alone."

All these years and he still wasn't convinced Suzuki-san wouldn't betray them.

Hwang dipped his head. "My apologies. I got caught up in asking how their children were faring."

He silently pleaded his former students wouldn't challenge that.

They didn't. "Sorry, Korea," Choi Jung-nam chimed in. "I shouldn't have got him talking, yeah?"

Suzuki-san bowed apologetically, making the Countryhuman tense.

"It's fine," he said quickly, then squared his shoulders, stating in an almost aggressive tone, "You are married."

Hwang had passed the good (and predictable) news on to him years ago, when the guerrilla he had sent to speak with the couple returned with it. Choi Jung-nam had asked the Japanese woman to marry him almost the moment he returned from his education in Japan.

"Yes," Suzuki-san said, almost apologetically.

Choi Jung-nam sounded more defensive. "We love each other," he said, clasping her hand. "And she's an amazing wife."

"Mm," Korea said inscrutably. "North Hwanghae, go keep watch."

Hwang moved to obey, but his country added, "And take Comrade

Choi Jung-nam with you."

The province exchanged looks with the man, who moved slightly closer to his wife.

"Are you sure-?" Hwang began.

Korea cut him off. "You were in the middle of catching up, weren't you? Go finish."

Hwang dipped his head, glancing at Choi Jung-nam as he did. The man hesitated still, but his wife brushed his arm. He briefly squeezed her hand, then followed Hwang from the cow shed and into the muggy summer night.

"Will she be okay?" Choi Jung-nam whispered as the door shut.

"You don't need to worry about her safety," Hwang assured him. "Korea has gained a more... internationalist spirit over the years."

There. He didn't think that would get him beaten by footwear even if his Countryhuman overheard.

"I'm more worried about Suzuki-san apologizing to him again and ensuring he stops using her as an informant," he said, hoping to comfort him.

Choi Jung-nam snorted, yet Hwang could still see him cast a concerned look over his shoulder as they took up position by the gate of the old chosonjip.

Even estates like this one had started to become abandoned as Japan's practices grew more draconian. In cities, Japanese companies outnumbered the Korean, and made far more capital, driving the others out of existence. And in rural locales the Japanese bought up more and more farms, while taxes drained the remaining peasants and even landlords of their harvests, going to feed the soldiers that had moved beyond Manchuria to invade the rest of China last year. People were hemorrhaging from the countryside, either in an attempt to earn a living in the city or for foreign climes- puppet Manchukuo, the Soviet Union, or Japan for the poor, or across the ocean to America for the more wealthy.

"How are your father's lands faring?" Hwang asked as the other man lit a pipe, squinting down the dark country lane to make sure it was vacant.

"Still lording over the little folk," Choi Jung-nam reported with a puff of smoke. "He even bought out a neighbour's farm last year. Rich prick. But at least I don't have to deal with it. Jung-hae's set to inherit." He scrunched his nose at his brother's name.

Hwang shook his head, bemused. "I'm surprised you never cut contact with them."

"I thought about it after I married my wife," he confessed, kicking at the dirt. "Pops wasn't too happy I chose her. Not even because she's Japanese- just because she's poor. But it's not worth the hassle. I'm a civil engineer, he's a fat sack of shit- Pardon the language, Professor- that runs roughly thirty ri of farmland. We barely ever see each other if it's not a holiday. And I usually work on those."

"And how are your children?" Hwang asked, genuinely wanting to know but also slightly concerned that Korea had seen through his mistrust and would ask for details.

"They're great," Choi Jung-nam said fondly. "Little devils, but great. Their mother's teaching all three of them to read. And I've been teaching them math."

The words filled Hwang's chest with an unexpected surge of emotion that made him suddenly misty-eyed. He could still see a young girl in a patchwork skirt mouthing her way through a stolen book, and a boy with messy hair and a dark suit bent over his desk, nose to his textbook while his peers gossiped.

"I'm glad," he said after a moment, managing not to sound choked. "And I hope you know I'm very proud of both of you. You've truly come a long way."

Choi Jung-nam snorted. "Not as long as you. From high school teacher to revolutionary." He quieted, looking down. "When I think about that, it doesn't feel like we're doing enough."

"Nonsense," Hwang tutted. "You did exactly what I instructed- received an education. Both you and Suzuki-san have learned skills that will be invaluable to us once our country is free, and I'm sure you're raising children that will be just as opposed to this Occupation as their parents are."

The man nodded. "They know it's wrong, for both our countries." His eyes flicked down with the ash from his pipe. "You know, I always meant to come join you, to fight, but after Jung-ui was born, I just..." His hands, worn from a job that could have been non-strenuous but that he chose to lend his labour to, curled into fists. "I couldn't give them an excuse to hurt him."

"I understand," Hwang said knowledgeably. "I've seen it happen plenty in the army. The idea of sacrificing themselves is acceptable, but once the danger shifts onto a loved one, it saps their fighting spirit. Several soldiers have chosen to give up the fight after their wives gave birth back home."

Choi Jung-nam looked down, and Hwang quickly realized he had said the wrong thing.

"I meant no insult," he said hastily. "I do understand. It's hardwired in human beings to protect their young, and it's a difficult instinct to fight. Humans may be thinking creatures, but that doesn't mean that fighting your instincts is simple. In fact-"

"Prof, it's okay," Choi Jung-nam interrupted. "I know you didn't mean anything by it."

Hwang cleared his throat, embarrassed. "It's likely for the best, anyhow. Korea is going to need civil engineers when we're independent. Your skills are too important to lose to war."

"What's the point of having a rich asshole for a father if you don't get to use your nepotism to force your way into a Tokyo university?" Choi Jung-nam gave a short laugh before his lips twisted. "It just stings, having to design the crap the Japanese want. I want to build houses and architecture that we want. Every time I have to submit a design plan for another Shinto shrine it makes me feel like a traitor."

"You aren't," Hwang assured him. "Almost our entire population has to work for the enemy. So long as you aren't in charge or causing harm, you won't be considered a collaborator."

Though his father might be.

"Thanks, Prof." Choi Jung-nam shook his head, pulling his eyes back to Hwang with a lighter tone. "So, want to tell me why you didn't want Korea to know you asked where the other Korea is? Can't be because he's competition or anything. That article of yours made it sound like they were friendly. Unlike certain other brothers." He made a face as he thought of his again.

"They are friendly," Hwang said carefully. "Korea only..."

He searched for the right words to say 'Now that Korea has acknowledged that his brother actually exists, he refuses to speak of him or make may other attempt to rescue him from Japan's clutches.'

Hwang had thought the decision he had made when telling them- or likely before, after the criticism over Seodaemun- would have been repealed once they had joined with the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. With a greater wealth of informants and soldiers, they would have had a better chance at rescuing his brother. Yet when the provinces had asked, Korea had simply repeated the harsh words he had back then- 'We have more important things to do.' Any further attempts to ask only resulted in him snapping that he had said he would only speak about South once.

He knew that no matter Korea's motivations, that sounded cruel, and couldn't be said to one of their people.

Hwang settled for, "Korea only didn't want to make either of you feel like you should risk yourselves to find out."

Choi Jung-nam raised a brow. "Either of us?"

"I'm sure."

His former student smirked. "So you are okay with us risking ourselves to find out?"

"In this case, yes," Hwang said bluntly. "One of our Countryhumans being in Japanese possession is unfortunate for several reasons. I believe any risk would be worth it to free him." Realizing how that sounded, he added, "Ah, but I don't want you to risk your safety. It's just that in this kind of scenario, it would be necessary. Or, ah-"

"Relax, Prof." The man waved a hand, still unbothered by his penchant for attempting to swallow his own foot. "I get it. 'Any sacrifice for the mission,' right? That's how revolutionaries are. It's why I couldn't join."

Hwang bobbed his head guiltily.

It wasn't as if he wanted them to risk their lives, or that he wouldn't feel terrible if something happened to them in their pursuit of information. But he knew an unspoken truth that he thought his cousins may not. Sometimes sacrifice was necessary. A few for the many, soldiers for the Provincehumans. Provincehumans for Korea.

'Any sacrifice for the mission.'

"Do you think they're done yet?" Choi Jung-nam asked, tapping the ash from his pipe as he craned his neck towards the cow shed.

"Let's go see," Hwang said, relieved to escape the awkward turn the conversation had taken.

As they approached, they could hear voices filtering out from the straw shed alongside the lamp light. To Hwang's relief, he didn't hear any anti-Japanese slurs.

He stopped in his tracks as he actually heard the opposite.

"Suzuki Yoshi." Korea sounded stiff and formal. "You proved me wrong a long time ago."

There was a touched smile in the Japanese woman's voice. "I'm honoured you feel that way, Korea-sama."

Hwang exchanged looks with Choi Jung-nam. He wasn't sure if the man remembered the words Korea had been referencing, but by his equally wide eyes he very well could.

He heard Korea's boots on the packed dirt floor and hurriedly whispered, "Do not let him become aware we overheard that," before hustling forward to reach the door before Korea, pushing it open.

"Ah, Korea," he said, feigning surprise. "I'm sorry, I was just coming to make sure everything was alright."

"It is," Korea clipped in the same voice he used when someone had just caught him giving away rations or doing anything remotely kind. "She has her orders. We move out."

"Could we-?"

"No." Korea shoved past him, then turned to look back at Choi Jung-nam and Suzuki-san. "Korea thanks you both for your efforts. I look forward to seeing you after Liberation."

"And we thank you for your efforts." The Korean man dipped his head. His wife almost bowed before catching herself, copying her husband's posture.

"We're telling our children about you both," she said, hands to her bosom.

"Not who you are," Choi Jung-nam assured them. "You know how light-mouthed kids are."

"But about how you're fighting." Suzuki-san looked to Hwang. "And how much we both owe you, Sensei."

Glasses almost misting again, Hwang said, "I assure you everything you have is thanks to your own hard work. I merely gave you encouragement. But thank you."

He straightened professionally, clearing his throat. "What is our best defense?"

The two smiled, finishing the old call-and-response, "Our critical-thinking."

"And what is our best offense?"

"Our intellect!" the couple chorused, then laughed like they were schoolchildren again.

Hwang grinned, promising, "We'll converse again when Korea is free," as he followed his Countryhuman.

"Long live Korea!" Choi Jung-nam called after them, throwing his fist in the air. "Go get 'em, Prof!"

"Long live Korea and a free Japan!" Suzuki-san cried boldly, her own hand held high.

Korea scrunched his face, but she couldn't see, and he said nothing to her, merely shouted back, "Long live the Korean people and their comrades!"

Hwang gave one last look over his shoulder at his former students standing silhouetted in the thin moonlight outside of the derelict chosonjip, their arms around each other, and smiled fondly.

Always fascinating, how one little thing could set a chain of events in motion. If Choi Jung-nam hadn't been brave enough to attempt to publish his true thoughts in that essay of his, or if Suzuki Yoshi hasn't attempted to steal that book, and Hwang hadn't witnessed it, none of them would be here today. The two humans wouldn't be married and three new lives wouldn't have been made.

Even if all he had given them was encouragement, a few tools, and a place to express themselves freely, he was very proud of himself for producing two fine students, and helping them find each other. And truly even prouder of them.

"If I may ask," he began when the old farm had vanished behind them, and they were on their way back to meet up with Hae and North Chungcheong. "What were the orders you gave Suzuki-san?"

Korea had been tight-mouthed as ever on the way here, though the trip had required diverting from their return to Paektusan from their recruitment mission around Taejon.

"I want her to print another round of pamphlets explaining that there are two Koreas," Korea answered without looking at him. "Japan was too thorough in his destruction and censorship. Every single one of our people needs to know without a doubt that Korea is fighting for them."

Hwang raised his brows knowingly. "That seems like a task our soldiers could have carried out for us."

Since Korea was no longer attempting to rescue his brother, there was no reason for him to risk getting so close to the capital.

"We were in the area," his Countryhuman clipped.

Hwang deliberated, then decided that the pursuit of truth was too important not to at least attempt.

"Korea, may I ask why you didn't want to ask Suzuki-san if she could find your brother's location?"

Korea was silent, the only sound the crunch of his heels on the dirt for the next minute. Hwang was beginning to think he wasn't going to receive an answer, just like on the way there, before he spoke.

"It's too dangerous. There won't be any civilian sources to get information from. The only ones that might know anything about... South-" The name carried an awkward reluctance, as ever, as if he already regretted saying it before it finished leaving his tongue. "Will be Occupation officials."

"I'm glad you don't see Suzuki-san as disposable," Hwang said delicately. "But don't you think it might be worth risking her safety in this case?"

Korea hiked his pack higher, checking behind them for pursuers. "No. She has too much information about us that could be tortured out of her. And even if she knew where... he was, I won't jeopardize any of our comrades' safety for an infiltration. If I can't free him, then there's no point in knowing where he is."

Hwang couldn't fathom that. Every little piece of information was important. Even if they truly couldn't rescue South, shouldn't they know where he was so they could reach him expediently after Liberation? Or at least to provide peace of mind.

Then again...

He thought about how he would feel if he had known that Hae existed, known she was down in that hole, even where the hole was, yet knew that an insurmountable force stood between them, one they couldn't risk crossing.

He supposed he could fathom it. Even if he didn't agree or quite understand. It wasn't like Korea to view a force as insurmountable. This was the country that had almost single-handedly infiltrated the Pyongyang Men's Prison, launched a raid on a brothel in broad daylight, attacked Namsan Residence directly (twice), and led a war party against a prison in the middle of the capital.

Hwang felt a twinge of guilt as his eyes strayed over to his Countryhuman again.

If it hadn't been for their criticism back then, would he and Kim Il-sung have saved his brother by now?

"Korea..."

"Enough, Hwang," he ordered, more heavy than sharp. "My brother will be Liberated when our people are. Not before."

"He will be," Hwang vowed, hand on his breast.

Regardless of the fact that he had never met this South, he was also still Korea. Hwang and all of the provinces had a duty to Liberate him from Japan as his Provincehumans.

And the Korea they knew loved him. He was his brother. That would be enough on its own.

They walked in silence for a few more minutes, then his Korea cut his eyes to him.

"So. How are their children faring?"

Hwang chuckled nervously.

—

1951

Surprise inspection on the Haeju People's Committee? Check. Greet the new provincial chairman (after the former had been publicly executed by the enemy)? Check. Ascertain that the Mobile Medical Units had been visiting the most isolated of Hwanghae villages? Check. Address complaints of army violence, suspicions over a defector from the south, allegations of petty theft, and assist several refugees with integrating into the workforce? Check, check, check, and check.

Hwang let out a breath as he settled onto the low stone wall that had once stood outside he and his sister's Haeju residence. Unlike most of the others, they hadn't taken over a former Japanese abode, or a chosonjip evacuated by the wealthy, but rather one of the more Western-style colonial buildings. His sister hadn't liked the small covered windows in the former options, and hadn't wanted to take over one of the more luxurious ones with an inner courtyard, so the larger, open windows had fulfilled her need for light. She also hadn't wanted to live in something Japanese. Though he had a suspicion that Western architecture would now also be detestable to her.

Fortunate then, that their house had been razed to the ground. Or Hwang would say that, if the rest of his literature hadn't been burned alongside it.

And if those ghostly shivers didn't run through him as his palms rested against the rough stone, telling him that many of their people had suffered here.

He exhaled tiredly, rubbing down the horripilation that pebbled his skin.

Once he had enjoyed feeling those shivers. When he would cross into Anju, where Joseon soldiers had once blown up their own powder houses, committing suicide in the face of the invasion of Jin, or Namwon, which the Japanese had devastated during the Chongyu War. Whether they recorded suffering that had been a part of victory or loss for Korea, they always recorded history. When so much of it was forgotten or obscured, that sixth sense (and Hwang meant that in an entirely scientific way) was proof that those battles had happened, that the lives lost had been lost.

It was difficult to consider that proof a good thing, now that his own eyes had witnessed the present suffering, and his own ear slits had heard his people's accounts of it.

He had always known, rationally, that the shivers had meant death, and quite a lot of it. And he had experienced them in places whose destruction he had seen the aftermath of. All of those villages burned by the Japanese army in the name of frightening their populace out of offering their guerrillas support, both the ones they heard of months later and travelled across the country to find, and those whose smoke they had been able to witness rising into the sky, but had been too late to save.

Hwang was never sure if his cousins had realized it, but it was usually the latter that held those crude slogans, carved into the remains of houses, jangseung, or even bodies. And as he had stared up at 'DISOBEDIENCE WILL BE REAPED BY OTHERS' gouged into the doors of a church, he had felt those shivers as his body took in the suffering of people whom he had shared meals with and taught night-classes to only a week past.

Yet the wake of the American occupation somehow felt different than that, though he knew in the end it wasn't. The Japanese had been just as brutal in their methods. As horrific as it was to admit, while all of the brutality had sickened Hwang, none of it had surprised him. Pregnant women being cut open, babies having their craniums crushed, men sodomized and hung- none of it was new. And with thirty-six years (and then some, given the unofficial control Japan had held over their nation before the annexation in 1910) in which the Japanese had time to commit their atrocities, they had amassed a far greater death toll, even without the Americans' sustained fire-bombing.

Perhaps it was the scale. Japan's violence had been spread out, with much of it committed during 'peacetime.' It had been kept relatively quiet, both to keep the eyes of the world off of Korea and to avoid overly upsetting the civilian population they were attempting to govern. Those who fought or would fight for freedom, and held the desire to look past the censorship saw what would await them if they did in the decimated villages, protestors murdered in the streets, and political prisoners vanished into the depths of prisons like Seodaemun. But the average citizen was kept unenlightened, allowed to believe that the Occupation existed unchallenged, and that if there were challengers that they were violent instigators who had to be put down in order to keep the peace. They had never been subjected to the same wholesale slaughter that their comrades in Manchuria or the Chinese had, though the façade had started to crumble once the second World War began.

There had been no façade, no pretending, in Sincheon at least, so far away from Pyongyang and the other cities on the warpath. Regardless of America's restrictive press blackout, the town wouldn't have had much attention on it. And while the violence hadn't been an outright bloodbath for the entire two months (though hearing the experiences of the witnesses, one couldn't be blamed for thinking that), it had been well known what had been transpiring. There had been no disguising of the trucks that carried prisoners into the country to die, no end to the public executions. There had been no 'There is no violence.' There had only been 'The violence is necessary.'

So much of it, and in such a short time. Tens of thousands dead in under two months.

And so much of it committed by Koreans.

Maybe those were the reasons for Hwang's newfound discomfort with the sixth sense, and why he couldn't simply feel the excitement of brushing up against the past. He could no longer think of that suffering as faraway- he had been forced to confront not with just his head, but with his emotions that every single time he felt that feeling, it meant that their people had been hurt, even if it was centuries ago.

He would like to think it was that, over it solely being shame that his sister had experienced it and he hadn't.

As he had watched her accept the feelings of their people and embrace them freely, he had to admit that he had felt an... uncomfortable emotion tighten his chest, replacing the guilt he had finally managed to unburden himself from, bringing with it a new variety of shame.

Hae had been right- sacrifice was about the person doing the sacrificing. It had been her choice to go to Sincheon. She had done what she felt she must, and Hwang had done what she wanted by carrying on. And he would do it again, as much as the thought hurt him.

Yet now he felt something that made him even more uneasy, if only because it had less virtuous origins than being distraught that he hadn't kept his word to Hae or came back for her.

As, at seeing how the people of Sincheon and the surrounding counties had looked at his sister with tears in their eyes or grateful smiles on their faces, Hwang had felt almost... jealous.

He cringed at the thought, glancing both ways down the broad side street, as if one of the passerby hurrying by might have overheard it. Flushing, he took his glasses off to polish with a cloth.

Obviously he wasn't jealous of Hae for being subjected to what she had been- having to witness the horrors in her report, losing people, and being beaten so viciously. It was more so how... close it had seemed to bring her to their people. It had been her they were focused on as they poured their hearts out, and her they had thanked, or implored to return for tea or supper. Even if they had been calling her Hae, it had been her they were seeing as Hwanghae.

Hwang knew that had been by design. While he did think Korea's approach had been overly forceful (almost cruel, one might say in their mind), he was aware why he had been pushing Hae like he had, but not the male Hwanghae. Hwang had never shied from what had been done to their province. He had went over the reports as soon as they came out, both every accusation from their government to the United Nations, and that of the Women's International Democratic Federation. He had watched the informational film reel that had been released, and gone over the transcripts of the trials that had already been held. He had told Korea he would like to hold out on visiting, but only until Hae felt she was ready.

He had never looked away- his sister had.

Should he have wanted to look away? Should what he had heard from Hae have made him so revulsed and grief-stricken that he couldn't bear to hear any more of how their people had suffered? Unlike her, he had been eager to learn. Should he be ashamed of that?

Perhaps not. It hadn't been morbid curiosity driving him, but a desire to know exactly what had been done so he could spread the word. The truth was important.

But maybe he should have felt a shred of hesitation, even if it had only been something he needed to overcome.

He knew even if Korea hadn't pushed Hae to be the main interviewer in Sincheon, things still would have transpired similarly. Even if she had wanted to remain silent, Hwang would have ended up asking a question that was too insensitive of a victim, and his sister would've had to cut in, having to soothe their feelings and take over, like she usually had to while they were going village to village to explain the Agricultural Reform or Labour Law, so that the peasants who hadn't received any education yet could understand them in their entirety.

Hwang wished he could say his jealousy stemmed solely from an intellectual frustration at his words not being as understandable as hers, as it had been back during the night-classes of the Occupation. But truly it was how easily Hae connected with people.

Beyond the night-classes, during their guerrilla days it was always she that every single village they visited became enamoured with, and nowadays it was she that was always receiving invitations to important events in people's lives. Truthfully, she needn't have ever worried about not being able to share a domicile with Hwang- if Korea had forbid it, she simply could've skipped into almost anyone's house in Hwanghae province and asked if she could sleep there. She was charming, industrious, energetic, and- though Korea had disallowed them from getting drunk without permission- she knew how to drink with the farmers like she belonged.

Hwang wasn't blind (well, not metaphorically). He knew he had his own strengths- Hae could never write reports the same way he did or actually enjoy going over the budget or do the information and publicity work he did. They were both equally important in their own fields.

But this wasn't about importance. It was about his sister always having felt closer to their people. He may be able to converse more easily with other intellectuals (and he meant no offense to any other social class by that), but most of their people were peasants. Peasants and now workers, especially in Hwanghae. And his sister had always felt like one of them.

It went back further than that doomed village in South Jeolla- it was even in how their lives had been before Korea had recruited them. Hwang had been in the privileged position of being a teacher. And yes, teachers were underpaid, he had been closely monitored, and had been forced to pretend he supported the Occupation. But he had been paid, at a time when many Koreans were not. He had enough freedom to occasionally sneak away for his illegal book club, and he had been provided with food and board, even if they were underwhelming. His glasses had been taken out of his salary, but he had a salary, one he could afford to lose a dozen yen from every year to pay Japan back.

He had always been highly aware that he was more privileged than the vast majority of his people, enough to swiftly realize exactly why North Hamgyong seemed to despise him when they first met. And while their peasants hadn't exactly been living in a dank hole in the ground like Hae had, in a way it was her circumstances they had been closer to. Trapped, not by choice like Hwang, but against their will, not knowing when they would eat next, with no protection between them and the Japanese authorities, unable to see the world around them, cut off from their history and in some cases their own language.

It all came back to suffering. Hwang had been miserable. But Hae and their people had suffered, and that bound them together. Just like at Sincheon.

The Provincehuman sighed heavily, finally placing his glasses back on his face, bringing the world into focus again.

He was glad he hadn't suffered, truly, not in the way they had. But he found himself yearning that he could have that same level of intimacy and understanding with their populace that Hae did, even lacking it.

'Back to work.' It might get the shameful thoughts out of his head.

But as he stood up, something pricked at his brain.

Hwang aborted his move to stride away immediately, instead stooping to unlace his military-issue boot, a process that took some time, as did relacing it once he had turned it upside down, pretending to shake a small rock loose. It gave him the chance to peek down the street from the corner of his eye.

When he was done, he straightened, then set off for the edge of the city instead of the center, making a subtle hand motion as he did.

The street he and his sister had chosen to live on was a busy one, only two streets over from the main road so that there would almost always be light and sound, even at night. Even now that their capital was destroyed, it was still fairly busy, with essential workers using it to avoid more rubble-filled roads to return home from work.

But it was a residential street. And with most of the houses decimated like the Hwanghaes', there was no reason to linger on it.

Hwang greeted the few workers he passed, trying not to appear tense as he made sure to quickly distance himself from them, careful not to give in to the urge to look over his shoulder.

Haeju was located between Haeju Bay to the south and the Suyang Mountains to the north, which the Kwangsokchon originated from before emptying into the West Sea. The stream split the older original central town from the more recent sprawl to the east. It was this Hwang walked towards, purposeful in his movements. He would've made a show of checking a list if he had one, but all his files were mental, so he settled for walking the same brisk way he had to his other appointments.

Like every other bridge over every other waterway, these had all been destroyed. But Hwang found a spot where someone- a farmer most likely- had placed a few old barn boards over a thinner section. The waters had gone down since rainy season, so the province was free to pass over into the rough foothills that sloped up to the looming Suyangs.

Under their shadow and amongst a grove of walnut trees that had been reduced to stumps, Hwang stopped, looking around, checking his watch, then folding his arms as if he was waiting for someone.

He had been expecting the man tailing him to approach stealthily, either circling around to climb the nearby slope to eavesdrop on his conversation with whoever he was waiting for, or for an ambush.

But instead he came directly up the same path Hwang had, walking confidently with his hands in the pockets of his ragged trousers.

The province turned, hand resting on his pistol as he took a brief moment to confirm the details he had observed both times he looked around to see him loitering around the mouth of an alley.

Middle-aged, tall, muscular, tousled dark brown hair, skin that was only a few shades lighter and lined from sun damage from what Hwang could see above the checked blue fabric wrapped around his lower face, and worn clothes that suggested he was either a refugee or pretending to be.

"Can I help you?" Hwang called politely before he could get too close, hypervigilant of the hands hidden in those baggy pants.

He relaxed slightly upon seeing one of his bodyguards flash a signal from the very hill he had expected his pursuer to climb. The other man had likely taken up position on one of the other vantage points Hwang had made sure to give them access to. They had either seen his sign or, more likely, been aware even before him that he was being watched.

He still kept his hand on his firearm as the man declined to stop his approach.

"You don't recognize me?" he called in a rough voice.

It did almost sound familiar, which only served to make Hwang uneasy. His sister had been responsible for dispossessing most of their plentiful landlords, but he had spoken to more than a few, those who had been deemed likely to respond favourably so long as the person explaining it to them used the language of business (and was an intellectual male).

But favourable did not always mean 'supportive,' nor did it mean 'still favourable.' Thinking of all those landlords and their sons that had 'came back' to Sincheon, Hwang sharpened his voice.

"I'm going to have to ask that you refrain from coming closer and tell me why you've been following me."

The man paused a few metres away, then huffed a laugh. "You really don't recognize me, Prof? How about now?"

He unwound the blue cloth from his face, but it was unnecessary. The way he had used the term of address had already pulled the file from Hwang's memory cabinet.

"Choi Jung-nam?" he asked in disbelief.

His former student grinned, exposing a mouthful of yellowed teeth. "It's been awhile. You're not a peanut anymore."

"Indeed it has, and indeed I'm not." Delighted, Hwang hustled forward to shake his arm, remembering to signal his men off.

"Almost thirteen years it's been, if I'm not mistaken. I didn't recognize your voice for a moment there."

Choi Jung-nam's grip on his forearm was as firm as the last time. "Sounds about right. And yeah, take my advice- stop smoking."

Fear for his teaching voice was a large part of what prompted Hwang to (barring his momentary relapse with North Hamgyong).

He chuckled, then asked, "What happened to you after Liberation?"

Choi Jung-nam was of the Haeju Choi Clan, and his family had deep roots in the area, but his father had owned land stretching from the southern plains of Hwanghae into Gyeonggi province. 'Halfway from Seoul to Pyongyang,' as Suzuki Yoshi had once said. Hwang hadn't been surprised to find those lands in his province already abandoned by the rest of the Choi family. Whether his father still lived or Choi Jung-hae had inherited them, they would both know they had far too many business dealings with Japan that preyed on their peasants to avoid being judged as collaborators.

But Hwang had expected the man, his wife, and his children to make an appearance in the north at some point. He'd even debated sending a letter to his former address, though in the end he decided he didn't want to make them a target for the puppet regime.

Choi Jung-nam winced at his question. "We actually left Korea just before Liberation. I saw the way things were going, and, well, it didn't seem like it was going to be entirely safe to be Japanese here for awhile. Or even half."

It was Hwang's turn to wince. They still had a Japanese portion of the populace, and many with Japanese blood. But it was true that they weren't exactly looked favourably upon.

"You might be right," he admitted. "Though I can't imagine it's easy being Korean in Japan right now, either."

Another result of the San Francisco Peace Treaty, aside from sowing the seeds of future conflict, and prepping the stage for Japan to remilitarize and rejoin the international community as an American puppet, was that when the treaty came into force next year, just like Koreans in Korea, Koreans in Japan would be officially freed from Japanese citizenship. A good thing, on the surface. Those who had been forced to migrate there for work or education, or who had been tricked or brought forcefully for manual labour or other unsavoury work would now be able to return to their home country without hassle.

Except Korea was at war. And even if they achieved a ceasefire tomorrow, it would still be years before the country was stable and prosperous enough to support the roughly six hundred thousand or so Koreans left in Japan. And now those hundreds of thousands of people were going to be left stateless in a country that hated them.

Choi Jung-nam's eyes flickered. "No. It isn't easy. A lot of them blame us for losing the war, somehow. Just like the Kanto Carnage."

In 1923, he had attended Tokyo University, whose buildings had been destroyed by the Kanto great earthquake. He had been one of those working with Korean labour unions to distribute aid after the disaster, and been present for the aftermath, when Japanese Nationalists and other right-wingers had taken advantage of the chaos and engaged in witch-hunts against their Korean neighbours and their own leftists.

"Small-minded hatreds will always find a justification," Hwang sighed. "I hope it's alright to ask, but if you were in Japan before Liberation..."

Choi Jung-nam saw where he was going. "We didn't see the bombs. We were staying with a university friend in the countryside outside Nagoya so we wouldn't get fire-bombed. But my wife came from Hiroshima. She still had family there."

"Ah," Hwang said softly.

"They dropped those bombs and killed, what? Two hundred thousand people?"

More. And likely far more when it came to future cancer rates.

Choi Jung-nam shook his head. "But how many politicians do you think they killed? Ones that actually counted?"

"Very few," Hwang guessed. "As ever. When whales fight, it's the shrimp's back that gets broken."

Another shiver ran through him, his own this time.

"Yeah," Choi Jung-nam said bitterly. "As ever."

Hwang beckoned him over, and they settled onto two of the stumps, the human man bringing out a pipe to light.

He caught the province's look. "What? It's too late for me."

Hwang shook his head. "So, how is Suzuki-san? And your family?"

His former student brightened. "My wife is amazing. She's finding it harder to readjust to Japan than she thought, and it's difficult to get a job with her accent. But she's taken control of the apartment building we live in. Mostly a bunch of countrymen live there, and she's decided someone needs to stick up to the owner for them. Our youngest still lives at home, and our other two live in the same building. They're both married."

"Korean or Japanese? Not that it matters," Hwang swiftly clarified.

"Jung-ui married a girl from Seoul a year before we left, and Hye-ja only left the nest a few months ago for a Korean boy over there. But I think our youngest might marry Japanese. He's smitten with girl who lives down the road." He smiled wryly. "I can't exactly judge him."

Hwang laughed. "I suppose not. Make sure Suzuki-san doesn't get discouraged in her job hunt. She's a smart woman- she should be working at the press."

"The Korean press, if we're lucky," Choi Jung-nam said, sucking on his pipe. "After this war's over, we're moving back."

Hwang straightened, delighted. "Truly?"

"Mhm." He nodded. "We left because I wanted to keep my wife safe. But she's not any safer over there. Most of her own people don't accept her, and with all the Yanks..." He shook his head. "My daughter doesn't feel safe, either. She's gone back to using her Japanese name. They might've been discriminated against if we stayed here, but I think they're in more danger where we are."

Hwang bobbed his head. "Aside from the initial bit of chaos right before and after Liberation, we didn't see too many hate-crimes against undeserving Japanese."

Aside from running out land and business owners. But they had been of the deserving. The violence of the oppressed tended to be more considerate than that of the oppressors.

Most unjustifiable anti-Japanese crime had been directed at children, those that carried Japanese blood unwillingly, as those children in Sincheon had carried American blood. And most of it had came from their own families.

Choi Jung-nam let out a long sigh, smoke billowing out. "We shouldn't have left."

"You can't change the past," Hwang pointed out. "And perhaps your momentary move will lead to other good things, like your two youngest finding love."

The man gave a lopsided smile. "Thanks, Prof."

Realizing he had yet to ask a very important question, Hwang inquired, "If you're planning to move back, you haven't moved back yet. So what are you doing here?"

Choi Jung-nam's weathered face grew more serious, and he tamped out his pipe.

"I came to be a spy."

Hwang blinked, taken aback. "Pardon?"

The man's expression didn't change. "I'm one of the engineers that have been contracted to rebuild Seoul and restructure key zones in Busan. They were looking for educated Koreans in Japan without left-wing ties. And there aren't many of those."

"You do have left-wing ties," Hwang pointed out.

"No one knows I'm a Marxist," he returned. "I was involved in independence movements in Japan and back here, but it was always just for independence. And I was never in the Communist Party."

"Suzuki-san's father was," Hwang remembered. "You underestimate how far back America's agents would've pried into your past, and how insubstantial your relationships need to be to be considered suspicious."

"Evidently they weren't suspicious enough not to hire me," he countered.

"They might be if someone becomes aware that you snuck across the 38th Parallel to meet an enemy Provincehuman."

"No one saw me." He plucked at his blue cloth mask. "I left my good clothes in a cache, too. I cut my hair before I left, and I'll shave it off once I get back. I was given the day to survey the city, so as long as I hurry, no one will miss me. And you know I'm good at sneaking out. And I'm observant. I know you've got two guys on those hills and they've been following us since you spotted me while you were taking that break."

He leaned forward on the stump. "I know I don't exactly have clearance to get into classified government files or stuff like that. But I'll be going back and forth between the UN Headquarters in Seoul and Busan, where the American Countryhuman's been staying. I think there's at least a chance I could be useful to you."

Hwang rested his elbows on his knees, steepling his fingers as he thought.

He was right. He could be useful. As a civil engineer, he would have the right to access plenty of areas in Seoul and Busan, and more freedom to wander than most. He would also be able to bypass certain military checkpoints between the two cities, and perhaps locate enemy warehouses and supply caches.

And his background was convenient. Neither he nor Suzuki Yoshi had ever declared themselves Communists or joined any overtly left-wing organizations. Choi Jung-nam was the son of a wealthy, Japanese-collaborating father that had lost his lands, and whose entire family shared those views. And he had never disowned them. And despite his more hands-on approach, he was technically part of the (admittedly more conservative) intellectual class.

But...

"Why do you want to do this?" Hwang asked, raising his gaze.

The man straightened. "Suspecting me, Prof?"

"We're at war," he said simply. "I need to suspect everyone. Even former star students. And this would carry quite the risk."

Choi Jung-nam's lips pressed flat. "I know. And if I was caught, my family could pay for it."

"That price used to be too high for you." Hwang cocked his head. "What changed?"

"It's exactly because it used to be too high for me." The man heaved a sigh, leaning back as he looked out at Haeju. "When we heard the radio announcement that Japan surrendered, it was the happiest day of my life. Even more than our wedding day, or when any of the kids were born. But we were in Japan. The bombs had just hit. We couldn't celebrate. All I could do was go try to find work like usual. And I thought, 'Korea is free. But what did you do to get it there, Jung-nam?"

Hwang opened his mouth, but he interrupted him. "My wife is the one that worked for you. She's Japanese, and she did more to Liberate Korea than I ever did. All I did was use daddy's money to run away to school in Japan." He held up a hand. "I know it was important, and I've learned skills I can use for our country. But instead of sticking around to use them, I ran away again. I was planning to come back once everything was peaceful. And even though it wasn't why I left, it's still cowardly."

Choi Jung-nam looked intensely at Hwang. "I don't want to be a coward. I don't want to sit back and let others pay the price for me. Korea is going to be free, and I want to have a hand it that. I want to make sure there's room for me and my family here."

"There's room for every Korean and like-minded comrade in Korea," Hwang assured him.

He didn't falter. "I wouldn't feel Korean if I kept hiding. I'd feel like I was betraying my country. I want to be able to look around at a free, Reunified Korea and say that I had a part in it." Leaning forward, he stared gravely into Hwang's eyes.

"No matter the cost."

It was strange, to be looking into the worn, weathered face of a man with almost fifty years and still be able to see the ones that had came before it. The fresh-faced first-year student that looked younger than him, the third-year student whose broad shoulders had grown to strain against his suit, the young man that had returned from Japan whom Hwang had caught a secret glimpse of on one of their many Seoul trips, and the confident adult with three children.

And Hwang had only changed once. He supposed as the years went by, he would have to grow used to watching the people he knew age around him, while he stayed the same. One of the Hwanghaes would have to.

But Choi Jung-nam's eyes looked the same as they had back when he had turned that essay in, the same eyes that had made up Hwang's mind to invite him to share more of his opinions instead of silencing him for his safety. Bright and defiant.

The province hesitated, then closed his own eyes. "Alright."

Choi Jung-nam's face lit up, and he quickly said, "I don't have the authority to sanction making you an agent. But I'll ask Korea."

"I need to get back to Seoul by tonight," the man reminded him.

"If he agrees, someone will be in contact with you."

His former student jumped up, flashing a grin that still looked boyish. "Thanks, Prof. I promise I won't let you down!"

Hwang stood, and he vigorously shook his arm. "And promise you won't get hurt."

"No promises," he replied, winking. "Sometimes you've got to risk everything for the mission, right?"

With a pang of worry, the province said, "But only if you must."

"I know." He sobered. "I'll be careful. I don't intend to make my wife a widow."

"Good. I'd never hear the end of it if you did."

They caught up for a few more minutes, both unable to resist before Hwang made himself say, "You should probably get going now."

"Yep." Choi Jung-nam slapped his thighs. "Off to wait in tense anticipation."

"If someone does make contact with you, the code will be our old call-and-response, so you know they aren't with the enemy." He arched a brow. "You do remember it, I hope?"

Choi Jung-nam laughed. "I'd hope so. My wife taught it to the kids. They know about you now, and Comrade Korea. We told them as soon as we were Liberated."

Hwang smiled. "I hope you told them I'm looking forward to meeting them."

"Once the war's over, you will. I'll come back and I'll finally get to engineer the things that we want." Choi Jung-nam tied the cloth back around his face, his eyes squinting up. "See you later, Prof. And long live Korea."

"Long live Korea."

He watched his former student walk away with a spring in his step, stroking his chin. The only reason he could foresee Korea denying the man's request would be the risk of Hwang knowing he was an asset. If Haeju was captured and the enemy got their hands on him, the South of Korea could Command the information out of him.

But in that case, they could simply send someone to recall him swiftly. And he was certain they could work something out for Suzuki Yoshi and the rest of his family. More agents were always needed, after all.

The matter couldn't be discussed over communications channels. He would summon Korea here to ask.

Hwang was reluctant to risk his former student's safety, but...

He understood not feeling like you had done enough.

Thinking about how schools were founded in Japan to teach the young Koreans there about their language and culture (so they could one day return home and also so they could receive education from Korean teachers without being prejudiced against) and the Japanese government and ruling Americans cracked down on them, forcing them into Japanese schools instead because they were considered Japanese citizens. They prohibited Korean language learning and closed the schools completely when people protested. Then when they and their allies protested louder the US called them Communists (because most Koreans supported Socialism and most sympathetic Japanese were progressives) declared martial law and the police killed a sixteen-year old boy. Then they forcefully disbanded Choryon, the organization that ran the schools. Then when we had to sign the San Francisco Peace Treaty the Koreans in Japan were no longer considered Japanese citizens and lost the right to compulsory education. So they had no education. But then the government very 'graciously' offered that they could attend public schools if they agreed that there would not be Korean education on the curriculum. If you've heard of Chongryun, that's actually where they come from. They're the successor of Choryon, providing zainichi with education in Korean schools. They had to make sure the schools were considered miscellaneous schools in order to give Korean education, which wasn't often granted and had to be negotiated for. But the only four pro-South Korea Korean schools obtained it easily, as well as Article 1 status by agreeing to comply with the government's 'no Korean education' regulations (complying with the oppressor, very pro-South Korea). And it only got harder for Korean schools once Japan recognized the South.

Also on the subject of zainichi, they weren't eligible for welfare in the past as they 'weren't Japanese citizens.' The South also wouldn't accept them back. The North was the only place that would take them. They were also the only ones that would give Choryon and Chongryun the funds they needed to stay open (which only started after the war) since they're not eligible for national government funding. The expanded rights that miscellaneous schools have now (they used to have to take qualification exams to prove they could take an entrance exam for university, which meant they had to take evening classes at a regular school as well as attend their school, but they don't have to do that anymore, and they can participate in inter-school sports) were won by Korean schools. And now they're also not eligible for even local government subsidies unless they change their curriculum to the Japanese one, they've been completely cut out from the Tuition Waiver Program, and their students were denied the covid financial support. Most of it gets blamed on the abductions which is always so stupid to me. One because Kim Jong-il said it was rogue actors and two because even if it wasn't, WE HAVE DONE MUCH WORSE. 'Oh noooooo a few people were kidnapped, how could you do this to usssss??' 'You colonized our country, made us change our names, erased our history, knocked down historic buildings, tried to erase our language, committed multiple massacres (Kanto Carnage, for instance), kidnapped THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE to be sex slaves and basically regular slaves (of which many zainichi are descended from), never gave reparations (the South got them, the North didn't), and are still participating in a sanctions regime that starves us.' 'Oh my god that was aaaaages ago, get over it.' I don't think anyone should be blamed for their race or their ancestors' actions (so long as they're not still supporting or committing them) but I do think Koreans have a lot more right to be racist towards Japanese than the opposite. But nooooo, the government uses one incident to justify their racism while crying that we need to stop being blamed for all the ones they caused. A victim complex you only see in colonizer countries- US, Britain, Israel, Japan are the worst for it.

'Korean schools teach anti-Japan thought.' The school curriculums have community work and cultural exchanges and heavily emphasize being friendly to Japanese, and contributing to Japanese society, according to observers. I think if the students are having anti-Japan thoughts it might be because they aren't considered citizens and keep being discriminated against, often violently.

Also hiiiii. Sorry this chapter took so long I was recovering from the burnout of wishing I was still in China.

Adrift From Your Moor

“Great job today, boys,” South Pyongan called. “I’m headed out tomorrow, so if any of you want to try and regain your dignity, you’ll have to fail again tonight.”

“Looking forward to it!” one of the engineers shouted back.

“I don’t think Korea wants you wrestling our engineers,” Chagang said as he fell into step beside her.

“Hey, all he said was ‘Teach them how to kill tanks.’ He never said, ‘Don’t beat the crap out of them in between.’” She slung her olive tunic over her shoulder as they went to pick up their post-training rations. “’Sides, they like it. Boosts morale.”

“They never win,” Chagang pointed out.

“Exactly.” South Pyongan winked. “Fills ‘em with determination to try again. Can’t let a chick come out on top, can they?”

She actually kinda sorta had to beat the crap out of them. Engineers always gave her way more back-talk than regular soldiers, and were less likely to pay attention when she was trying to teach them the best ways to disable a tank. She didn’t know why, but she was going to blame North Hamgyong for it. And yeah, she could go off about the Party line and women’s rights and boring stuff like that, but the quickest (and most fun) way to get them to listen was to piledrive ‘em into the barracks floor. So she’d continue doing that.

“So, did Korea send you just to tell me to head back tomorrow?” she asked her cousin as they stood in line in front of the kitchens, after trading insults with a few of the boys. "Or is he making sure I’m actually being useful?”

He'd given her the 'great honour’ of not just having to deal with her own province stuff- complaints, People’s Committee work, kicking idiots' asses, etcetera- but having to travel across province lines to help out with training the new tank-hunting teams for the front, too. Apparently just because she'd spent some time in one and knew exactly what you didn't want to happen to it, that qualified her for engineer-training duty. Okay.

"Both," Chagang said bluntly.

She scrunched her face. "Come on, when have I ever skipped out on something like this? That bastard."

"He wouldn't have assigned you this if he didn't trust you would do it."

South Pyongan considered that. Eh. She guessed it was true. It wasn't targeted then, just Korea being Korea. She was near the front after all.

"Do you know if North Pyongan left Sinuiju yet?"

Chagang nodded. "Korea recalled us both early in case of delays from the supply line being bombed."

He didn't say anything else, but he didn't have to. It was weird that her brother could've easily came here with him, but hadn't.

South Pyongan felt something in her chest squeeze at that, just like it had when he'd parted ways with her without protest after Foundation Day, the truck that had taken them to Anju together rolling almost without pause towards his province.

'Ugh.'

Chagang winced, making her look away.

"Yeah, well, he knows I've got shit to do." She held out her tray so the server could pile her the bowls high with rice, soup, cucumber kimchi, and even a few pieces of chicken. They got to eat good at training.

"Little more for your province?" she prompted, smiling winningly. They were in Kangwon, but hey, might still work.

The serving chick hesitated, looking around as she raised her ladle slightly.

"Nepotism," Chagang intoned.

"Tch. Yeah yeah." South Pyongan lowered her tray. Louder, she said, "Yeah, that was a… test. You passed." Even though she'd clearly been about to get more sweet sweet cucumber kimchi. "Never give someone more than they're allotted, even if they're important or whatever."

She bumped Chagang as she left the line, totally by accident.

A few engineers beckoned to her from where they were sitting outside the mouth of one of the tunnels bored into the ridge with some other tank experts. She almost went to join them before she spotted who was squatting with them and quickly turned heel.

"Sorry, guys," she called. "Feels like a dug-out kind of day."

She hustled away with her tray, totally not running away. She didn't have anything to run from. What would she be running from? Nothing, that's what.

Korea had everyone digging even more tunnels all over the frontline- bunkers, dug-outs, foxholes, huge underground rooms and ri of corridors she wasn't allowed to sleuth around in. You name it, if it could be digged, it was being dug. South Pyongan thought they might go all the way across the Peninsula by now.

She sauntered towards one of the dug-outs, where a few men were playing cards while shovelling rice into their faces.

"Comrade South Pyongan." One of them quickly rubbed kimchi juice from his mouth. "Hey."

"Hope you comrades don't mind if I join you."

Whoops. That word slipped out again.

It wasn't like it was only Communists that used it, but she was trying to annoy Korea, so she couldn't. Good thing he wasn't here.

Obviously they didn't mind if she joined them, because duh, who would? So South Pyongan flopped down on the lip of the dug-out, the opening big enough for her to sit comfortably without ducking, slinging her legs inside.

"Deal me in," she ordered, pushing her tunic off her shoulder, leaving her in just her sleeveless undershirt.

Ahhhhh. Fresh fall air. And no one-eyed prude to tell her to keep her shirt on. She'd been roasting all summer, even worse than last year. It'd been hotter, and she'd been… in the tank for a lot of it, but with the sheer amount of burns she had, this one felt worse. It was kinda hard to focus on teaching someone the best place for a tread to be hit by a booby-trap to make sure it wouldn't carry a tank up a hill ever again when all you wanted was to cram your hand down your shirt and scoop the sweat out of your cleavage so it would stop stinging the burns there.

A few of the guys eyed her as she slurped down her rice and soup, making her smug, before she realized they were looking at the bandages instead of her muscles. Bleh.

She'd been following Korea's orders about staying covered, more or less. It wasn't like she wanted people thinking about how gross and burned she was under the wraps. The ones on her face were bad enough. But come on, she needed to take advantage of the weather while it was still nice. And there weren't any Chinese around.

"Those hurt much?" one of the men asked, a cigarette clamped between his teeth as he dealt her cards.

"Not enough to stop me from putting you on your ass later, Pak," she retorted.

On the General (an expression Korea had been stubbornly refusing to call her out on), if she caught any one of them trying to go easy on her later, she was breaking a finger. They could still hunt tanks with just nine.

"We'll see about that," he responded. "Comrade Chagang going to want to play, too?"

South Pyongan looked over her shoulder at where her cousin was marching towards them. "Yeah."

He had a great poker face (which he had not gotten from her brother), but she didn't think he understood how card games worked. Like, any of them. The look on people's faces after they found out he had the worst hand in all of Korea and no clue how to play, yet had somehow won because he'd been so convincing no one called his bluff was always classic.

South Pyongan shifted aside so her cousin could squeeze past, folding himself up inside the dug-out, checking her own hand.

Ohhhh yeah. She was taking these suckers for all they had.

Which wasn't much. Gambling wasn't exactly encouraged in the army, so usually they just played with pocket change.

"You're leaving for Chinese National, Day, right?" another solider asked as he laid a card down. "Are you coming back after?"

"Don't know," South Pyongan replied, tossing her own down. "There'll only be four days left, so probably. You losers need all the help you can get."

The training was running from September 6th to October 5th, eight hours a day with Sundays for rest. For everyone else. For South Pyongan Sundays were for rushing back to her province to work more. And tomorrow would be for doing whatever she was told to in Pyongyang.

Sometimes she almost forgot which was worse. Not being able to see her brother at all when they were in different provinces, or being in the same city, but unable to talk.

Then she thought about hearing he'd gotten snatched by traitors before and remembered. Definitely the first one.

But neither compared to the whole 'sunk at sea' debacle.

"We'll see who's a loser after this," one of the Kims smirked, totally bluffing.

"Still you." South Pyongan selected her next card. "So yeah, I'll probably be back Tuesday. Unless Korea wants me for the front."

She looked hopefully at Chagang, who was looking at his cards with great solemnity. He slowly plucked one and placed it down, giving nothing away. Even though she didn't think anyone had actually mentioned the name of the game they were playing to him.

"The defense of the center sector is going well," he said. "The enemy hasn't been able to progress. They have pulled back to recalculate. I doubt Korea will deploy us to the front just for that."

'More like he can't convince anyone to let us deploy to the front just for that.' South Pyongan knew Korea was just as antsy as her to get back to the fighting. It was fun to run around the mountains and simulate taking out tanks, but nothing like the real thing.

"Seems a mite unfair," Pak said, putting down another card. He knew the situation since South Pyongan had complained about it before. "If we're not getting anywhere with those talks, I don't see why some of the best soldiers in our army have to be kept off the front."

"Right? That's what I'm saying." South Pyongan caught Chagang's look. "But it's diplomacy or whatever."

Choe snorted. "Yeah, big fans of that, the Yanks are. Rhee, too. I remember how enthusiastic he was about sorting things out peacefully. He accepted all our peace overtures real diplomatically."

"Ah, but he's allowed to be a violent bastard," the other Kim reminded him. "He's got Yankee money smoothing things over with the rest of the world for him. We don't have the cash to make sabotaging the talks look good."

A few of the men grumbled, and South Pyongan joined them.

God- Whoops- General, that pissed her off so much. The Yanks could literally get caught out bombing the neutral zone and that was fine. But she couldn't go defend their own land from invaders or they'd look bad.

"So what do you think?" Choe said, finishing off the last of his soup and wiping his mouth with the back of a hand. "Comrade Nam Il said we'd be okay with making adjustments to the line the Yanks proposed. Are we really giving up on the 38th Parallel?"

South Pyongan opened her mouth to say 'We'd better fucking not be,' before seeing Chagang's expression.

'No gossiping.'

Gah. It was creepy how much he could look like her brother sometimes.

"I don't know," she said reluctantly. "Korea's number one priority is ending the war so we can… work out Reunification."

And she just knew he hated that even more than her. She'd heard him on Foundation Day, that flowery fire-and-brimstone language he'd used as he promised they'd keep fighting for eternity if they had to, a million times more passionate than when he'd told the provinces not to question the decision to accept the current line, or even his cold, detached tone as they'd voted to accept the ceasefire in the first place. He was being a politician again, covering up how he really felt to act all magnanimous.

Whatever. She wasn't going to call him out on it. He'd just give her another lecture on responsibility and embarrass them both.

"And… what if we can't?" Dan, the youngest engineer of the group ventured, his cards forgotten by his side. He flushed as everyone turned to him, averting his eyes. "What if we sign an armistice, then America refuses to let us negotiate, just like last time?"

South Pyongan shrugged. "Then I guess we go back to war."

"Can we do that?" Dan raised his gaze to her. "The South knows his army's no match for ours now. I doubt he'll want to start another fight. And if we can't even risk sending you comrades to the front because it would look bad, how could we start the next war? We're already getting blamed for this one. If we actually did it…"

South Pyongan didn't know what he wanted from her. Did she look like she knew the ins and outs of politicking? She was here to hit stuff and show them how to get an enemy tank stuck moving forward.

"Look, Korea isn't going to let that happen," she said firmly. "Whether or not we had to start the next fight, he wouldn't let our country stay Divided."

Especially not when it would keep him and his crybaby brother separated.

"And the southern army does not follow South," Chagang said. "It follows the Syngman Rhee clique. And they crave conquest."

Well, South sort of was also there. But South Pyongan guessed they weren't trying to turn their people against him. It was just Korea they were trying (and failing) to get to wake up and smell the roses. And realize that one of the thorns had jabbed his eye out.

"I can tell you with full confidence," she said to the men. "We won't get stuck Divided."

She'd never let her brother be separated from her forever. And even though Korea's brother was a whiny little gullible bitch, she knew he wouldn't either.

Those stupid thoughts she'd had back when she hadn't been sure if North Pyongan was in the enemy's hands or not flickered in her mind, about responsibilities, ending the war no matter what, and not being capable of what Korea was when it came to their siblings.

South Pyongan shook her head irritably. She didn't have to think about that. She didn't have to then, and she didn't have to now.

"And I can also tell you with full confidence that you owe me money." She spun another card down onto the dirt floor. "Boom."

Pak cursed, and Choe shook his head despairingly. Dan stared at her, long enough to make her want to squirm, then nodded.

"Alright. Thank you for that, comrade."

"Yeah, sure."

A shadow fell across the dug-out, and South Pyongan craned her neck to look over her shoulder.

"Do you mind? You're kinda blocking the… sun."

'Ssi-bal.'

The province quickly jerked back around, realized it was too late because she'd literally just looked him dead in the eyes and addressed him, then looked back, propping herself up on an arm.

"What do you want?"

The gunner she'd replaced in Tank 44 half a lifetime ago, Oh Renjiro- No she hadn't remembered the name, she'd asked the engineer battalion commander who the half-Jap was when she'd thought he looked familiar- stood behind her, looking awkward.

"Comrade South Pyongan. I was wondering if I could talk to you for a moment?"

Dammit. She'd caught him eyeing her up a few times over the course of the program, but there were five teams that needed training, with one former tankman (or province) in each, so he'd never had an excuse to talk to her. And she thought he was too much of a coward to try during their breaks.

"I'm clearly sort of busy here." She gestured at her uneaten cucumber kimchi and the card game.

Choe raised his eyebrows at her.

Okay, yeah. That had made her sound like a bit of a dick. But she didn't want to talk to a half-Jap on a good day, and right now her 'uncomfortable conversation' alarm was going off.

"How about tomorrow?" she suggested slyly.

"I thought you were leaving tomorrow," Oh Renjiro said. "That's why I wanted to talk now."

'Dammit.' So close.

"Fine," she said, turning back around and looking at her cards. "If I'm not busy later, we can talk."

"Alright. I'll be standing sentry up on the height." His footsteps crunched away on the dirt.

Saved. Obviously South Pyongan had no intention of talking to him later. And she had her own room down in the tunnels, so she wouldn't have to see him at all before tomorrow, when she could jet off.

She wasn't running away. She just didn't want to have any weird talks she had no use for. She didn't even know what he wanted to talk about anyway.

"You were a little brusque there with Comrade Oh, don't you think?" Pak asked, still chewing on his cigarette.

"He's part Jap," South Pyongan muttered, fiddling with the edge of one of her cards. An ace. "He's lucky brusque is all he's getting."

"He wouldn't've been sent here if he wasn't a patriot," Kim Number One pointed out.

Kim Number Two nodded. "And like the Supreme Commander says, 'It isn't a man's origin that matters, but his character.' And Comrade Oh seems like a good guy."

The words were too much like what Yun-suk had said. 'You should be nicer to Comrade Oh Renjiro. He's a nice man.'

Ugh. It wasn't like she could argue with him after he'd name-dropped the General.

"I guess," she muttered, using her short steel chopsticks to stab at the cucumber still on her tray as she ignored Chagang's stare.

That was why she hated that he used to be a part of her brother. Not just because he had a bunch of embarrassing memories about her, but because she couldn't shut their silent communication off like she could with the others. She knew he was reading her like an open book right now.

Choe suddenly frowned, looking confused. "Hey, shouldn't you two have met before? I heard him say he was with Tank 44 on the way to the Raktong. That was the one you were with, right?"

Curse her big mouth. Even when she didn't tell them the full story, she couldn't resist bragging about being a Hero of the Republic.

"Maybe," she dodged.

"The hell you mean 'maybe?'" Kim Number One said, sounding confused as he demoted himself to Kim Number Two.

"I don't know," she said, sweating. "It was awhile ago, okay?"

The new Kim Number One raised his bushy eyebrows. "You don't remember everyone you served with? There's usually only about five people to a tank."

'Too many.'

"I remember them!" she snapped, making him draw back in surprise, and her change her tone. "I mean, obviously I remember them. That guy was just the one that I replaced whenever I joined the crew, so I haven't talked to him much."

Or at all.

"What happened to the rest of your crew?" Dan came in with another ray-of-sunshine question.

Pak slugged the kid on the shoulder as the other men quieted.

They didn't have many tanks left. And most of them had gone out in service. South Pyongan's crew was far from the only one that had gone out that way, too.

"I've got to go talk to that guy," she said, unable to sit still anymore. "Get the rest of my winnings for me and take my tray back to the kitchen, big guy."

Chagang nodded, and she scarfed down the rest of the cucumber, then shoved the empty tray his way, wiping her face on her arm bandages as she got up, snatching her tunic and leaving, trying to saunter instead of storm.

Ugh, she hadn't even got to enjoy the kimchi. That would teach her to always leave her favourite food for last. Or no, probably not. But it did irritate her.

'Okay, buddy,' she thought, glaring up at the ridgeline. 'Let's talk.'

Yeah she hadn't thought this through.

She'd marched up the mountainside, but by the time she got to where Oh Renjiro was standing, she realized Korea probably wouldn't take 'He interrupted my dinner' as an excuse for beating the crap out of one of their guys (without consent). So now they were both just kind of standing there.

Great view, though. She could see across the fields of the Iron Triangle (she resented foreigners naming things in their country, but it was a badass name, so she'd let it slide) all the way to the mountains south of Chorweon.

She could also see all the craters left in the fields, and the deathbirds circling around the front, killing their guys. On top of the blockade off the coast of Wonsan, Kangwon also had to put up with the passes through his mountains being bombed every day to stop supplies from getting to the front.

Maybe she'd join up with one of the aircraft-hunting teams when they got back to Pyongyang. She couldn't hunt tanks without going to the front, but if the pilots were going to insist on continuing to bomb their cities, then they were fair game.

"So…"

Ugh, right. She'd forgotten he was here.

"Yeah, what is it?" she said, tearing her gaze away from the planes to glare at him. "What did you want to talk about?"

Oh Renjiro rubbed a hand over the back of his head. He looked similar to how he did last year, but his black hair was a little shorter, cropped instead of cut, and his moustache was a tiny bit thicker. It was probably never going to be anything impressive, though.

And something about him still said 'Jap' in a way that made her arm hair prickle.

"I wanted to say… thanks."

Warily, South Pyongan prompted, "'Thanks?'"

The man nodded, his dark eyes sliding towards her. "For kicking me outta that tank."

The province's eyes slid away. "Oh."

"I know you're not exactly fond of me, and I know why, even if Comrades Dae-ho and Yun-suk wouldn't say," he continued. She hadn't known he'd been on a given name basis with them. "But it doesn't matter. If you hadn't taken my place, I'd be dead by now."

If she hadn't taken his place, the rest of the crew might still be alive.

"I'm all my mom has," Oh Renjiro said, even though she'd be thrilled if he shut up now. "If I left her alone… Well, she's Japanese. I'm sure you know she wouldn't have many friends to look after her."

South Pyongan blinked. "Your mom's the Jap?"

“Yeah,” he said, catching her confusion. “Why?”

‘Blame his father,’ Dae-ho had said about him being half.

“I mean, I sort of thought-“ She cut herself off. “Uh, never mind.”

“Dad was with the KPRA,” he said, looking out across the plains. “But he died in the border skirmishes.”

South Pyongan rubbed the back of her bandaged head. “Sorry?”

“It’s not your fault.” He looked back to her. “You stopped me from joining him, even if it wasn’t your intention. I just felt like I owed you thanks for that.”

“You don’t… owe me anything,” she muttered. Seriously, she’d been psychically trying to send him slurs pretty much every time she’d seen him. Though she guessed now she had confirmation it hadn’t worked.

“Maybe not.” He shrugged. “But I feel better now that I have. And… there was something else I wanted to ask.”

Feeling like she wasn’t going to like it, South Pyongan ventured, “What?”

“Could you tell me how they died?”

“Yeah, no,” she responded immediately. “Not happening.”

He frowned. “Why not?”

“Because who just goes around asking how people died? Your Jap side must make you a freak.” The province crossed her arms over her chest, tensing as the ‘clang’ of a bunker door closing echoed up from below.

‘Stupid.’

“They were my comrades,” Oh Renjiro said quietly. “And all anyone would tell me before I was reorganized into infantry was that the tank went into the river.”

A breeze rustled across the scrub brush on the ridge, and South Pyongan slid her tunic back on, drawing it closed over herself.

"Was it quick?"

She could still hear the scream that had left Yun-suk's mouth as she disappeared out the front hatch of the tank, and the crunch as Commander Chul went rocketing overhead. She guessed it had been quick for them. And Dae-ho had been too out of it to realize what was happening.

But Kim Se-woon had seen his daughter die in front of him, followed by his future son-in-law in his arms. It had probably felt long for him. Those minutes of living in a world without his kid had probably felt like a eternity.

"Who cares?" she asked defensively. "They're dead either way. What difference does it make if it was fast or not?"

"I care," Oh Renjiro said, somewhat heartedly. "They weren't just my comrades- they were my friends. And clearly you care, too, or you'd have no problem telling me."

"I-" She cut herself off, looking away. "Hate Japs."

General, Korea could not know she'd just said that to someone that was technically one of their people.

The one next to her sighed heavily. "Can you at least tell me if they received their medals for shooting down that plane posthumously?"

Korea had said they could. She still had to receive hers after all. She was just putting it off because she… didn't feel like it. Not yet.

"What's the point?" she said. "They're dead. We don't even have bodies to bury them with."

And none of them had any family left.

"Right." Oh Renjiro looked south, maybe towards the river their tank crew was buried next to. "Did they go out like Heroes of the Republic?”

Had they? They'd been beyond cool at the front, staying until the last moment, shooting until they couldn’t anymore, taking out as many of the enemy as they could. If they had gone out there in a blaze of glory, flames pouring from the tank, it would’ve been heroic beyond a doubt.

But the reality had been way more… sudden. A bomb, a stupid stuck hatch, and a lot of bad luck. Then they were all gone, just like that.

“I don’t want to talk about this anymore.” South Pyongan turned abruptly, already sliding down the ridge, pebbles spraying away from her boots.

“If you ever do, please tell me,” Oh Renjiro called after her.

She didn’t answer.

She didn’t know if she could say her tank crew had gone out like Heroes of the Republic deserved to.

But she did know she wanted to see her brother.

—

North Pyongan shifted nervously as he stood outside the bunker, eyes scanning the dark treeline. He straightened as he heard the branches rustling.

The person that emerged wasn’t who he had been waiting for specifically, but relief still welled in his chest.

“Sister.”

“Hey,” she said, sauntering over.

“I thought you wouldn’t be returning until tomorrow morning.”

She shrugged. “Training was over for today. Figured I’d head back late instead of early. You know how Chagang gets in the mornings.”

“Of course,” he said, smiling. “Chagang.”

South Pyongan kicked at the dirt, and his smile turned down.

“Are you alright?”

“No touchy-feely crap,” she said with disgust. “We’ve been having way too many gross conversations lately.”

“None of our conversations are gross to me,” he said sincerely, making her clap her hands over her head.

“That counts as touchy-feely, and next comment gets you hit.”

North Pyongan chuckled, waiting for her to talk. Eventually, she huffed, removing her hands from her ‘ears.’

“It’s just… Ugh.” Quickly she ran through her version of her conversation with Oh Renjiro. As always, North Pyongan filtered through the frequent self-flattery and things that obviously hadn’t happened (he was very doubtful the man had gotten down on both knees and apologized for being Japanese before his sister would deign to speak with him) to pick out the core details.

“Why don’t you want to tell him what happened?” North Pyongan asked.

He already knew, of course. His job was to try and make his sister acknowledge it, too.

“I don’t know,” she said, glancing towards where the sound of hammering was coming from. “Is Kangwon building that bath? Green and grim isn’t back yet, right?”

“Hae is helping him,” North Pyongan said, gently guiding her back onto the track. “Why do you think you don’t want to tell him?”

“I don’t know,” his sister repeated uncomfortably. “I haven’t even told you what happened.”

Which was rare for her. They told each other everything.

“Do you want to tell me?”

“No,” she said after a moment. “Too many gross talks, remember?”

He nodded. He knew it was no use trying to convince her. She hadn’t spoken to Korea about it when it happened, and she wouldn’t speak to him now.

“But you wouldn’t be bringing this up if you didn’t want to tell Comrade Oh Renjiro.”

She scrunched her face. “It’s just like… They were his friends, too. I guess. I don’t get why they’d want to be friends with a half-Jap, but whatever.”

“He is fighting for Korea,” North Pyongan reminded her.

He might have his biases against the Japanese, but they didn’t extend to the half children. So long as they had some Korean blood, they were Korean. Especially if they fought.

“Not what we’re talking about,” she huffed, crossing her arms. “Anyway, it’s sort of like, I want to tell him. But then again, I got lucky that none of them had any other family so Korea couldn’t make me pass on my condolences and tell them. And it kind of seems like passing up a gift if I tell someone I don’t have to.”

“I think you’ll tell him,” North Pyongan said.

South Pyongan gave him an affronted look. “Okay, well now I definitely don’t want to.”

“You will,” he said confidently. “You know it’s the right thing to do. And my sister always does the right thing.”

She was silent for a moment, her diamond-shaped eyes dipping down. “That’s not true.”

He opened his mouth, but she cut him off with a look.

‘No gross talks.’

Obliging, he changed course. “And at least part of you wants to tell him. And you always do what you want.”

“More true,” she said, slightly smug, then heaved a sigh, her top half slumping over. “Ugh, fine. I’ll think about it.”

North Pyongan shook his head, smiling, as his eyes trailed back to the trees.

But they snapped back to his sister as she said, “But I don’t always do what I want. I’m not beating the shit out of Korea for separating us.”

“Because you know it’s the right thing to do.” For once he was able to say the words without sounding overly rueful. “We both need to be less codependent. And it’s working.” He smiled at her. “Korea said I did a good job with my efforts in my province. I even managed to resolve a Party issue. The Pakchon County Party Committee was placing a limit on recruitment. I made them stop, and repealed the penalties that shouldn’t have been meted out."

During the temporary retreat, many Party members had buried their cards or even burned then out of fear. But while membership cards were precious, the circumstances had been extreme. The Central Committee had ruled it overly harsh to impose penalties for many cases, especially at a time when they needed as many active comrades as possible.

He had sought the recruitment problem out at its source after reading one of the complaints a rejected applicant had sent to a Korea, and realizing that the numbers of new Party members accepted into the Pakchon cell was exceedingly low, made the Committee members there confess to him that they were placing a hard cap on new members out of fear of compromising the working class core of their Party, and convinced them to lift it by reminding them that most of their population was peasants, and that most of the workers of today had been peasants yesterday. So long as they remained committed to the working class and stuck to their line, they would always be a working class party, no matter how many peasants they admitted.

And he had done it all without wishing his sister was there once.

Well, he had wished she was there several times. But he hadn't yearned for her guidance at any point, or Korea's. And despite having his restriction on prayer lifted, he hadn't felt the need to do that, either, though he had checked in on those involved with Ro Sang-ung's debacle the year before, and joined the church in a small candlelit vigil for all the martyrs, led by Kim Rak-do.

North Pyongan tried his best to always keep pride from his heart, but after Korea had given him an approving nod after his report, he couldn't help but feel a small glow of it.

South Pyongan looked less pleased. He frowned, tipping his head at her. She looked away.

"I'm going to hit the really uncomfortable cot," she said with an exaggerated yawn. "You can go back to waiting for whoever it is you're waiting for."

He gave a slightly sheepish chuckle. Of course she had noticed his wandering gaze.

"I'm waiting for Comrade Liaoxi," he confessed. "And Comrade Liaotung."

"Right." His sister ambled by him, bumping him affectionately as she went.

He smiled, turning back to the trees, then looked back as she spoke again.

"Hey," she said. Her back was to him, and she was shadowed by the overhang of rock above the bunker door. "Weird question, but if I got kidnapped by the enemy, would you come save me?"

He opened his mouth to say 'Of course, always,' when she added, "Even if it would sabotage the peace talks or something?"

His lips touched again as he thought.

"What if we already signed an armistice?" she asked without an answer to her first question. “But then that Yank screwed us over and refused to let us negotiate Reunification, so we were deadlocked or something. But I was stuck in the south. Would you come get me, even if it meant restarting the war?”

Would he? Before he would have answered ‘yes’ immediately, as she had when they voted against accepting the ceasefire. The idea of leaving his sister in the south, in enemy hands if they weren’t Reunified, was abhorrent. He would risk anything for her, do anything to save her.

But could he, if it would mean the bombing that had finally came to an end would begin again?

He could still see the ruins of Sinuiju, the sundered bridges and polluted waters, the burnt timbers and shattered tiles, the empty, smoking farmland and cratered roads, the patches of oily black ash where villages had once stood, and the hundreds of people holding their candles, each one representing a life or more that had already been snuffed out. And still that sea of flame had only been a drop in the ocean of the departed.

If it came to it, could he subject their people to that again for his sister? Could he sprint down the wrong path and leave those he was supposed to be guiding to die, along with their siblings, for his?

“I would want to,” he said, and the words tasted like guilt for too many reasons. “But I couldn’t.”

South Pyongan didn’t turn around. “Me neither,” she said after a moment.

His heart cracked, even though it was the right thing, even though he supposed he had already known that. She hadn’t been in Busan when he had returned from Guk Island, after all.

“But we don’t have to worry about that,” he said, shame churning in his heart as he fought the urge to explain himself. They both had to be thinking the same thing. “You know Korea wouldn’t tolerate a deadlock."

North Pyongan didn't think their Countryhuman would restart the war for one of his provinces, even if he wanted to. But when it came to his own brother...

Keeping their country Divided would be even more disastrous than a continued war. When he had that excuse, the province knew he would stop at nothing to get his sibling back.

"And I doubt we would even have to worry about being the ones to break an armistice," he continued, trying to reassure her, and himself. "A deadlock wouldn't be a victory to America or Rhee. One of them would break it eventually."

And what would happen to his sister before then?

He bit his lip, swallowing the urge to give more excuses. The only true comfort would be taking the words back. And he couldn't do that. They would both know he was lying.

"Mm," his sister said casually. "I wouldn't need to be saved, anyway. I'd just kick that Yank's striped ass, then take Rhee and South out while I was at it. Or drag that little bastard back here for Korea."

"Right," North Pyongan said, guilt still staining his mouth bitter.

"I was just making sure we're on the same page," South Pyongan said, hauling open the door, still without turning around. "Night."

"Goodnight," her brother said softly.

The slam of steel was final, rolling up the mountain ridge like the heavy peal of a mourning bell.

North Pyongan sighed, burying his face in his hands.

Maybe he should have lied from the start. But it was still a sin, and… It was too important to lie about.

He heaved another sigh, then straightened as he heard the rumble of an engine. Before long the crunch of tires on undergrowth joined it, and the Jeep rumbled into the clearing, followed by the GAZ. He hustled forward to help Chagang and the newly-returned Hwang cover their vehicle, while the two Chinese women hid theirs. It seemed Korea wouldn't be returning tonight, though China flitted by, disappearing inside after reminding his provinces to hide the Jeep well.

"Hello," North Pyongan said to Liaoxi as he staked the tarp down.

"Hello," she politely returned. Almost… too politely.

The Korean frowned. He had thought it was only his imagination when she turned down his offer to travel to Sinuiju with him. He hadn't needed her for moral support, he had only wanted to catch up, since they hadn't had the chance since she had returned from China. And her poems made fieldwork lighter.

He had told himself her excuse- 'I'm sorry, comrade. Don't be mad, but I think my sister could use my help here. I'll have to stay behind, I fear-' had been understandable. They would have been in their separate provinces in their country, and would both likely still be on edge from Liaoxi going missing and China's trial. His wasn't the only sister that had been fretting when they were 'lost at sea.' Of course the Liaos would want to stay together.

But now he was certain there was a coolness to her usually soft voice, and she almost seemed to be purposefully avoiding his eyes as she finished camouflaging their Jeep.

Kangwon and Hae had emerged from the trees, done with their work for the night. Hae threw herself at her brother, chattering eagerly, asking a hundred questions about Haeju, while their other cousin led the rest of them into the bunker with his electric lantern.

"Comrade Liaoxi." North Pyongan stopped her as she tried to follow them. "Could I speak with you?"

She turned, and he got the sense that it was almost reluctant, as he had when asking her if she wanted to accompany him. Nervousness still fluttered under his breastbone, for some reason.

"I'm glad to see you're okay," he said, feeling almost awkward. "I didn't have the chance to say that after you returned. And... I'm glad you did."

“I think it might be for the best if we spoke less,” the Chinese woman said suddenly, her words carefully neutral and like a filleting knife to the chest.

North Pyongan’s heart sank as his lips parted in surprise. “Did I… do something wrong?”

Nothing came to mind. Maybe she was upset over him outright confessing that Korea had been the one to order him to find out what he could about China from her. But she hadn’t seemed upset at the time. She’d laughed and said she… liked him. And considered him a friend.

“It’s nothing you’ve done." Her expression didn’t flicker from pleasant politeness, but he couldn’t help but notice that she still wouldn’t meet his eyes.

“Then… is Comrade China the one?” He supposed the other country might not like that the two provinces were friendly. He knew Korea didn't. He had given him a look that bordered on wary whenever her name had came up in his Guk Island report. But it was surprising it was the Chinese Countryhuman that would move to stop them when his own hadn’t even said anything out loud.

“No. China isn’t the one telling me to run.”

His heart twinged in his chest as she rejected his rhyme for her own.

“I simply think we’ve grown too close,” she said, hands clasped professionally in front of her. “I think it would be better if we kept our relationship that of guest and host. I hope you can understand.”

“I…” North Pyongan wanted to argue, but if it really was her choice, then… “I understand,” he finished quietly. “If that truly is what you want.”

“It is,” Liaoxi said, dipping her head before he could catch the look in her eyes. “Thank you. Goodnight.”

She turned and slipped inside, leaving him standing in the dark, uneasy, his insides swaying like a ship unmoored.

I think South Pyongan's native habitat would be 2chan/4chan. Or no. It's like when an animal or plant gets introduced to somewhere it's not native to but has evolved in a way that specifically makes it hyperadapted to the new environment, quickly becoming the apex organism. She could do damage.

An important part of China's character to me is that modern day he refuses to sleep with any adult he took care of as a child because he still sees them as a little sibling and also doesn't want to abuse the power dynamic (there's also probably a desire to leave some things as sacred when he's trampled so thoroughly on his own beliefs about love and intimacy). But I was thinking about the humour of that. 'Oh my God, girl, we've literally all slept with China. He's like, the best. You need to hook up with him at the next party.'
Deep sigh* 'I can't. He led my Young Pioneers group to plant trees when I was seven.'
I don't think he would actually tell people directly that's why he wouldn't sleep with them. But I think with how thick he would lay on 'meimei' after rejecting a woman, some of them might get it.

In The Tiger's Den

[image]

China's birthday party was hurting Chagang's head. Likely more than Korea's head had hurt this morning when the foreigner burst through his door to announce it was his birthday. And more than China's after Chagang had witnessed Korea physically toss him back out into the hall, directly into the wall.

The underground mess hall was full of Chinese soldiers. Division commanders, political workers, and model soldiers that had served bravely, and were being rewarded. Korea and the General themselves had shown up to congratulate them in person. Peng Dehuai was also there, toasting his comrades.

The vivid excitement at their National Day, and at being honoured this way by their ally should have been solely relaxing. But more unpleasant colours seeped through the swirl of emerald and azure.

The stab of maroon that came from North Hamgyong every time he looked at SH. The blaze of deep red that came from her, no longer restrained, as she did the same. They had been forced to share a truck on the way back from their provinces. Chagang did not think it had gone well. The occasional spark of chartreuse and ochre as South and North Pyongan's elbows bumped at the table, and the waft of grey as the latter's eyes strayed to Liaoxi, seated across the room. The returning shades that came from her when he wasn't looking. Hae had returned to radiating her pink, squished next to a Chinese engineer as she threw questions at him. Chagang was glad he had not seen her after her return to Sincheon. The reporting session before had been painful enough. But the olive of worry was welling in Hwang as he asked his own questions of the Chinese. It would build and build until he wicked it away with some internal comfort. Then it would build again.

Kangwon, Gangwon, and their headaching auras of pain had been removed when they returned to the hospital, but the feeling plagued every single one of his cousins. It plagued Chagang, too. The spurts of flax and mahogany made it hard to taste the bean sprouts on his plate.

Korea was the most painful, as usual. This was unfortunate for Chagang as he was sitting guard in his blind spot. While his pain was still hidden, his other emotions were not. Maroon swirled around him when he looked in Pak Hon-yong's direction. Ochre bubbled up whenever one of the Chinese soldiers leaned over to speak to him, even as it was choked by an invisible hand. Dark blue prickled along his skin as his eye landed on one of them eating, before shame overcame it. The grey-yellow of discomfort sheathed him like a second skin.

Chagang knew if it wasn't for the Supreme Commander, he wouldn't be here. The man would send him secret looks from the other table every few minutes, silently calming him. Korea's restlessness would ease, the colours retreating slightly. But it was only a few minutes before they were at full strength again.

Over it all swirled the grey of the Chinese soldiers' sorrow, eclipsing the actual cigarette smoke that brushed the ceiling. Everyone here had lost someone. Sometimes they were here because they had been the sole survivor from their unit to remain to carry out their mission. And despite the fact that violet came from them as they were praised for fighting for Korea, not a single one wanted to be here, hidden in a Korean tunnel. They wanted to be home, celebrating their country's second National Day with their families and countrymen.

Chagang fought through the haze of emotions to find China. He was seated in a corner table, masked like his provinces. But the Korean could see his neck swivelling as he followed a conversation between several of his people.

If he was dismayed like his soldiers, he didn't feel it strongly enough to show. Unlike what he had felt on Korea's Foundation Day.

Chagang would not tell his Countryhuman that the Chinese man had been there if he wasn't asked. It would only unsettle Korea. It would unsettle him more if he knew what colours China had been emitting. It came close to unsettling Chagang, despite them being pleasant for him. It was the strength, when usually he read nothing from the foreigner.

China caught him looking. He tipped his head so the Korean would know he was winking. Chagang looked away.

Across the room, SH politely disengaged from the soldiers crowded around her, making her way to their table.

"Korea," she whispered, leaning down. "What did you get him?"

Korea made a hissing sound under his breath, irritation spiking, though his expression remained neutral. "I told you I'm not paying tribute to him."

The same dark blue spiked from her. "And I told you it's usually called a birthday present, and he got you one, so you need to get him one. Don't lie, Hae told me he got you that knife."

Korea grumbled, his hand going to the sheath at his hip. "I only told her that so she'd stop saying I let him bribe me."

"If it's not a bribe, it's a gift," SH said with a smile, in case anyone was looking. "Which means you owe him one."

More irritation stabbing her, Korea growled, "I owe him nothing."

SH narrowed her eyes. "I reminded you to get him something before I left, so you've had plenty of time. I'm asking him if you gave him a present tomorrow. If he says no, I'll be peeved."

"I have never cared about anything less." Korea turned from her, loudly asking a soldier down the table about his recent service at the front.

SH looked over him at Chagang. 'Make sure he gets him something.'

Chagang blinked back past the pain in his temples. 'I cannot promise.'

Just because he would go with Korea to the military complex did not mean he could convince him to get China a birthday present.

His cousin huffed, returning to her table.

"You should get him something," Chagang attempted, voice thick.

"No."

His eyes dipped to the space before his country. "And you should eat."

The provinces weren't being served as filling meals as the Chinese. The foreigners had pork to go with their rice, bean sprouts, lotus root and walnut soup, and patjuk. The Provincehumans had millet, bean sprouts, and smaller soup bowls.

And the red tablecloth in front of Korea was bare.

His Countryhuman's eye went to the food in front of the Chinese soldier answering his question, that swirl of irritation and shame swirling around him again.

"No," he repeated, then leaned away, clearly done talking.

It had been worth a try. Even if he knew it wouldn't work.

Stewing with new irritated colours now, Korea was even more painful to behold than before. Chagang tried to block him out and focus on speaking with the soldiers next to him. His Countryhuman had deemed it necessary to recall all the provinces to show how grateful they were for the PVA's help. He would make sure he played his part in that.

While fighting the urge to squeeze his eyes shut and smash his head into the table until the pain stopped.

—

North was exhausted by the time he returned to the bunker. Sitting in that mess hall under the eyes of all those Chinese soldiers had been torture.

He wasn't dragging China's dead behind him. He just... They deserved to be in China, with China. Not eating lacklustre fare under the earth while bombs rained overhead, destined to return to combat tomorrow. And not while their Countryhuman sat masked in the corner, unable to even reveal himself. He should have been at home, making his people feel the way North's had on their Foundation Day.

Actually, the people in China might think they did have their Countryhuman. North had been sure the recorded interview and photographs that had apparently been used as evidence at China's trial had been entirely a scheme, one cooked up between him and that reporter. But speaking with one of his own journalists that had recently returned from China confirmed that 'China' was actually there, and had been there since the war began. He had no idea who it could be, and the real China had given him no answer more useful than 'I plucked out one of my hairs to create a copy of myself.'

But that didn't matter. China wasn't there. And he should be. His people deserved to see their country's face as they celebrated their People's Republic. And he deserved to see theirs.

North knew he resented him for that. He had to. Any present would just seem like a pathetic attempt to make up for it. And North didn't have to make up for it. It wasn't him keeping China here.

He caught himself turning the object in his hand obsessively, and made himself stop, not wanting to bruise it.

The outside door slammed open, and the chatter of his provinces filled the bunker.

"No, seriously," South Pyongan was saying. "You tell that Mao guy that he's my new best friend for getting us these. If I've ever said anything racist about you guys, I take it back."

"Have you said anything racist?" Liaotung asked.

"Oh look, the door was unlocked," SH interrupted. "Korea must be back."

A knock came at his door. North stayed still, not answering. He had wasted too much energy escaping Chagang at the military complex, then sprinting all the way to the orchard, then here, to make it pointless.

"He probably went to go meditate under a waterfall or something," South Pyongan said.

SH huffed. "Or he's avoiding me."

"Whyever would he be avoiding you?" China's voice innocently lilted.

"Goodnight, Comrade China," North's province said with perfect politeness. "Happy National Day."

"Thank you. I assume I'll be receiving my portrait for the next one?"

"I was too busy this year," SH demurred. "I need as much time as possible to make it. A painting of a comrade such as yourself is deserving of my undivided attention."

"I would consider myself lucky to have even half the attention of a woman like you," China purred.

"Alright, that's enough," Liaotung said as the same time as North Hamgyong barked, "Everyone out of the fucking hallway."

The others walked deeper into the bunker, which was good. North had been about to lunge out and put an end to the flirting himself. He didn't care if SH found it amusing. He did not.

"I'll keep watch," he could hear Hwang volunteer.

North could tell he was worried about Choi Jung-nam. He had been even more distracted than usual at the banquet.

He'd agreed to the man's request to be an agent, even with the vulnerability of Hwang knowing his identity. They had that suspected leak, after all, and too few spies to deal with it. The access his contracting job would get him was too useful to turn down. And when it came to recruiting agents, trust was the most difficult factor. North was fairly certain he could trust Choi Jung-nam, even if he wouldn't have without prior acquaintance, due to his background. But that background just made him less of a target for suspicion by the enemy.

Hopefully he could solve the issue of the leak. And safely. Suzuki Yoshi had done too much for Korea to be left a widow.

He could hear Hae flounce off with her brother, both of them chattering about the things the Chinese soldiers had told them about their lives back home.

So many of the details were similar to those of North's. It made him... uneasy.

'I don't think 'yours' and 'mine' are quite as delineated as you would like.'

When the hallway was empty, North opened the door, darting a hand out and seizing China- who he had known would still be standing there- by the wrist, and dragging him into his room. He slammed the door, quickly releasing him.

"Should I be worried about what you're going to do to me?" China asked, too used to the man-handling to be ruffled by it.

North didn't answer, crossing his arms, rubbing his thumb across the object hidden in his hand again.

'Stupid.' He should just throw him out again. It had been satisfying to do it this morning, even if he'd just been startled that the other man had been right there when he opened the door.

China's eyes strayed around the small, grey room. "You really haven't done anything with this place, have you?"

When he looked back, North was holding his hand out, looking determinedly away from the item in it.

China tipped his head. "A persimmon?"

North tried not to bristle at the judgement he was sure he heard there. "It's for your National Day. I couldn't get a peach. They're out of season."

He bit his tongue on 'It's not an expensive knife.' Clearly. And he didn't owe China one. He hasn't asked for his gift to be so expensive. He hadn't asked for a gift at all.

China plucked the orange, acorn-shaped fruit from his hand, examining it. North tried to keep his back straight.

And how exactly did SH think this was better than getting him nothing? He didn't have the money to buy anything like a hand-crafted, personalized blade. No matter how much effort he had put into it, it would still be pathetic in comparison.

Ssi-bal, he should have at least taken the knife off of his belt. That just made it seem like he was rubbing the insult in.

"You'd actually give me a fruit?" China asked after a few moments of scrutiny.

North knew he heard judgement now, and couldn't fight his rising hackles, even though he had known the fruit wouldn't mean as much to the other country as it did to him. "If you don't want it-"

China held the persimmon away from his reaching fingers. "Aiya, did I say that? I'm just surprised. I thought you were being generous enough with that patjuk before."

"I wasn't the one that made the menu," North grumbled. He had only exempted his provinces from some of it. And himself from all of it. "And your soldiers are aiding mine. It's only right that we help feed them."

Especially after China had left that... gift when he had departed for his trial. Even if it rankled to give away their limited resources when there were starving Koreans.

"Well, thank you regardless." China held up the persimmon, smiling at it. "And thank you for this."

North looked away.

"Do you want to share it with me?"

"No."

"Are you sure?" China tilted it towards him.

"If you don't want it, just say that," North snapped, flinching back from the fruit.

"I do want it," the other country assured him. "I just thought it might make you less resentful if some of it went to a Korean."

North hunched his shoulders. He had been trying not to let his feelings show on his face earlier. But of course China had seen. He hoped none of the soldiers had.

"I'm not... resentful," he muttered. "Only at America."

That was who his ire should be directed solely at. Him and Rhee's clique, the bastards torching their fields and murdering their peasants. They were the reason his people were starving. And one good meal for a few dozen Chinese soldiers wouldn't have put a dent in that, anyways.

"Well, you can still have half." China held his hand out.

North hesitated, then passed him the tiger-hilted blade, glancing away from the clear difference between the two gifts in China's hands.

"Your husa," the Chinese man remarked. "I was hoping for a paring knife, maybe."

"I haven't stabbed anyone with it yet," North muttered. "And don't pretend you don't have a paring knife in your sleeves."

China smiled slyly, not answering as he used the husa to cut the persimmon into two parts, one large and one smaller. He held them out. North took the smaller half and his blade, wiping it carefully on a cloth pulled from his belt before sliding it back into its sheath.

His ally was already biting into his half, eyes rolling back in his head as he moaned. North would have accused him of playing it up, but he had seen him have the exact same reaction every other time he had eaten a fruit.

'Unpleasant.'

North examined his own half reluctantly. He had chosen the best persimmon he could find in the orchard so early in the season, with taut, unblemished skin. He'd never had one without black spots on it before.

He wanted to go give it to Hae or one of his other provinces, but SH would hear his door shut. He'd already gotten lucky the first time.

Swallowing his saliva, he took a bite, fangs piercing the orange skin with a popping sound. He ate it as swiftly as possible, with small, precise bites, twisted away so China couldn't see.

"Mm, it's actually for the best you couldn't get a peach," the other country remarked.

North gave him a suspicious look over his shoulder. "Why?"

China thought for a moment. "If I explain the joke, I suspect I'll find it less amusing."

North glowered, turning back around so he could wipe his mouth on the unburned part of the back of his hand, then dart his tongue over it, making sure not to waste a drop of the nectar. Persimmons tended to be too sweet for him, but personal preference had never played a part in what he was willing to eat. For example, South Hamgyong's cooking.

"I know it's my birthday, but I actually fixed up a present for you comrades today," China said, taking longer to finish his half. "It will be awhile before it's ready, though."

"What is it?" North asked warily, trying not to look at the fruit still in his ally's hand.

China smiled, taking another bite, juice running down his chin. "It's a surprise."

"I hate surprises."

The man bobbed his head. "So you've said. But I promise it's a non-harmful surprise. Heaven punish me with lightning if it's not."

"You won't need heaven to do it." North watched him lick juice from the back of his hand the same way he had, and realized he was salivating again.

Swallowing, he tore his eye away from China's persimmon, going to his pack in the corner. He lifted it up, removing what was under it, waiting for the sucking sounds of his ally licking his fingers clean to end before he turned around, holding it out.

Raised eyebrows as China dried his fingers on a handkerchief that disappeared back into his sleeve. "Another present? Aiya, and I only got you the one."

"It isn't a present," North clipped. "I'm only returning it."

China took the large photo book from his hands. Stamped on the leather cover were the words 'Property of Meng Yuyu.'

The Chinese country opened it, greeted with black-and-white photographs of his dead soldiers. Men with missing limbs and cracked skulls, skin torn by shrapnel, and unidentifiable for all the colourless gore they had been turned into. Each with their name, rank, and hometown written on a piece of paper slid into the archival sheets with them.

"I was wondering where this went," he said after a moment.

"You knew I had it." North knew he would have asked if he didn't. The book was too important to lose.

"En." China continued to flip through the pages, taking a second to read each identifier. "I was wondering when you were going to give it to me."

North had wanted to wait until he could trust himself. He wasn't sure he ever would be able to. But at least he didn't think he was at risk of hurting China right now.

"I should have done it sooner," he admitted. Even if he couldn't have. He should have just left it with Peng Dehuai to give to his country.

"It's alright. They weren't going anywhere." China brushed his fingers over the second to last photograph. A charred black mass, barely recognizable as human. But there was a name with it, in different handwriting than the rest of the book.

'He Sengqi, private, Shancheng Village, Liaotung Province.'

"And you got her photos developed."

North opened his mouth to deny it, then shut it when he realized it was obvious he had. "She did most of the work," he said instead.

Meng Yuyu's negatives had been neatly arranged in the pages with the descriptors she'd already written out with them. He Sengqi had been the only blank photo.

China looked at the last few names and ranks without photographs, written under He Sengqi's short obituary.

Zhao Qiaolan. Feng Jiahao. Wu Shanyuan. The same name as on the front of the book. Hong Hongjun.

China smiled, and North looked away.

It wasn't enough. He knew that.

The other country flipped to the final page, and his teeth flashed at what he saw there.

The group photo. The note with it read, '63rd Army, 188th Division, Second Battalion, Korea's platoon.' North had debated erasing that part. It being written by Meng Yuyu was the only thing that had saved it.

"Did you look at this one, comrade?" China asked.

"Yes," North lied, though he had slid it into place without even glancing.

But China was already pulling it out and showing it to him. North looked at the wall for as long as he could without making it obvious, then reluctantly turned his eye to it.

China had told them not to wear masks, to only smile if they felt like it. North hadn't wanted to look over and see the kinds of faces people who knew they were going to die would make. He had seen enough of them in his life.

But the Chinese soldiers were smiling. All fifteen of them, along with Meng Yuyu, had wide grins on their faces as they faced the camera with their arms around each other in the darkening trench. The platoon commander and Hong Hongjun, Meng Yuyu crouched at his feet with his pistol, Yao Song with his picture of Li Meihua, Zhang Guangqiang with his foot on He Sengqi's shoulder, Wang Wei caught mid-laugh.

North was the only one unsmiling, staring into the camera like it was the bore of a gun.

There were two copies. The one still in the book was pristine, but on this one, on the photo itself, the pencil lead pressed hard so the words would be visible against the dark background, were Chinese characters. North didn't need his knowledge of Mandarin to know what they said.

'The 63rd Army Lives Forever!'

"See?" China hummed. "I told you they would turn out."

North averted his gaze. His mouth opened, then closed. His burns ached as he wrapped his arms around his chest, pain shooting through the gash and down into his insides. He squeezed harder.

"I'll turn the other copy over to my archivists," China said when he hadn't spoken. "But you should keep this one."

"I don't want it." North's voice sounded too much like a rasp.

"I can't keep it." He gazed down at the photograph. "There's no reason for me to have this. I'm not in Korea, remember? We haven't even met."

North didn't respond. He didn't want the reminder. He would already remember.

"Please," China said softly. "I'd rather not throw it out, or give it to someone it means nothing to."

Reluctantly, North took the photo from him, wordlessly going to his pack. He placed it carefully with SH's sketch of Seoul. Two pictures he would rather not look at.

China looked pleased. "Thank you. And thank you for the persimmon. It was a very nice gift."

North grimaced.

Sounding suddenly bright again, China said, "Wait here a moment. I have something I want to show you."

He darted from the room before North could say anything, leaving him blinking at empty air.

"This is my room," he muttered.

He glared at the door. He should lock it before the other country came back.

But just as he went to do that, China was slipping back inside, two objects in his hands. After a moment, North identified them as the handheld radios he'd looted from the Yanks after Hoengsong.

That battle had gone so well. If they'd just had accurate intelligence on Chipyong-ri-

"Look." China tapped the bulky, military green transceivers together.

"What am I supposed to be looking at?"

Actually, on a second glance, they did look... off. The backs had been removed, and a confusing mess of wires sprouted from them. The backpack-mounted radio was in the same state, North could see as China slung it off his back and set it delicately on the ground. The batteries had been removed, along with several panels, and it looked like it had been gutted. China set a bag down with it, revealing that it was full of assorted wires, switches, antenna, and the batteries from the radio.

He blinked expectantly at North.

North looked at the mess, then back at him, deadpanning, "You're collecting scrap."

China shook his head vigorously. "These are BC-611-F transceivers," he explained, tapping the handheld radios together again. "And this is a SCR-300 unit. Or was." He gestured at the gutted equipment.

North knew what they were. Just because their army didn't have the capability to mass-produce handheld radios didn't mean he didn't keep up to date on them.

"And?"

"And these are awful," China said cheerily. "Their casing is leaky, they're barely useful for communicating between platoons, let alone with battalion or division headquarters, the battery life is shorter than your temper, and they only have one frequency. But what if they weren't awful?

China paused, clearly waiting for a response. North slow-blinked.

Undeterred, his ally continued, "Imagine if we had handheld radios with longer battery life, the transceiver power of long-range radios, and shorter antennas. This one-" China bent, whipping out an antenna that was at least one hundred centimetres long. "Is much too ungainly. Think about it- you locate an enemy sniper unit, and take out your radio to inform your comrades in the other platoon, but it's already too late. They've seen your enormous antenna waving over the treeline, and you're dead."

"Doesn't the SCR-300 fix those issues?" North asked.

It had longer range, more channels, and a much shorter antenna.

"Yes," China said with a tinge of impatience. "But it's backpack-mounted." He nudged the unit. "There's no hiding this. If you have an SCR-300, then everyone knows you have a radio."

"A visible radio is useful," North pointed out. "The infantry knows who's responsible for communications."

China pouted. "But it's not useful for fun things. And if we wanted to talk to each other, we'd have to lug those around on our backs. I don't know about you, but I don't want to do that."

"I don't want to talk to you at all."

Ignoring him, China hefted his transceivers again. "Imagine if we had these in Seoul. We wouldn't have had to worry about getting separated. We could've coordinated our attacks and been even more deadly. Imagine if each of your provinces had one of these. After every battle, you could easily do a head-count."

North narrowed his eye at his tone. "Are you... trying to sell me something?"

"I'm just showing you my pet project." China crouched, rummaging through the bag. After a second the Korean realized he was supposed to be looking at what was in there, even though the assortment of parts made no sense to him. "I've been playing with these whenever I get the chance. So far I've managed to expand the battery casing to fit a battery with more charge, seal some of the cracks in the plastic, and replace the antenna. I was having some trouble with changing the frequency, but I believe I've figured it out."

China looked up at him, holding one of the radios out. North took it.

"Switch it on," China urged.

North examined the handheld, finding the switch, then pulled the antenna up, slightly wary of being electrocuted by the sheer amount of exposed wiring.

"Hello," China said into his device, and the words echoed from the one in North's hand.

The other country's eyes lit up, and he beamed, wider than North had seen before, and he realized his teeth weren't perfectly white. There were small yellow spots on his canines.

"It worked," he crowed, snatching the transceiver back from North. Turning it over in his hands, he babbled, "I was worried it wouldn't after everything I did to it. This was the test run to make sure my modifications didn't break them. Obviously I need to find a way to enlarge the shell itself to fit all the wires back inside with the battery without sacrificing portability, and I still need to find a way to expand the range. But I got my hands on some long-range tech from the Yankees, and it proved useful for the antenna. I'm sure I can work something out with it." He smiled, tapping the handheld radios together again, triumphantly this time. "And then we can always be in contact."

Always being in contact with China was something like North's idea of the worst torture imaginable. And he had been tortured for real several times.

But he was focused on something else, as something he had been suspicious of since August resurfaced.

"Is that what you sent Liaoxi with North Pyongan to get?" North demanded. He could remember his province telling him about the gutted communications building, and Liaoxi's determination to complete the mission. "You risked your province for signals technology?"

"And you risked yours to teach him a life lesson," China said flippantly. "Let's agree not to judge each other."

North couldn't agree to that if he wanted to. But he kept his mouth shut. He hadn't seen China excited like this before. It was... unnerving.

No. He'd seen him this excited once. When they were on Bukhan Mountain. His eyes had been lit up in the same way as his words rushed out of him, talking about wanting to create. He had said something about inventing, too.

"You actually know what you're doing when it comes to technology?" North asked, making sure he sounded more disbelieving than impressed.

China nodded enthusiastically, packing his things away in the bag again. "I haven't had any formal training, but I find most of it is common sense. This part goes here, that part goes there. You just need to get it to do what you want. And I'm very good at that."

North... was realizing that he didn't actually know much about China. Well, no. He knew too much. But he was realizing that while he knew what he looked like when saying goodbye to his people, and how deeply he felt for them, he didn't know whether he had any hobbies, aside from his obsession with art. And that he liked persimmons and peaches.

He didn't want to know. It was just an observation. And a curse that while China knew... uncomfortable details about him, too, he also knew too many mundane things from all of his questioning when he first arrived.

'You'd be surprised what you can learn about people when they're not thinking about their responses.'

"Tch." North swivelled his head abruptly, alarmed. "What are you doing?"

China had folded his long legs under himself, taking a seat against the not-so-far wall next to his bag and radio.

He raised his eyebrows. "Sitting?

"Why?"

"I thought we could talk more," the other country said breezily. "You're usually not at the bunker so early, so I doubt you're going to sleep yet. And we haven't had many chances to just sit and talk, have we? Usually we're fighting for our lives. Or I'm being yelled at."

"By who?" North asked blankly.

"Hmmm. I wonder." China smiled.

The Korean sighed. "If I don't let you stay longer, are you going to sit outside my door and annoy me?"

"Oh no," the other Countryhuman assured him. "I won't say a word. I've recently become fixated on that big lock of yours." He gestured to the steel mechanism. "I'll just stand outside quietly and attempt to find a way to open it."

The image genuinely raised the hair on North's arms.

"Fine," he said, crossing them over his chest, refusing to sit. "Talk."

China leaned back on his palms. "You never told me what your plans for the future are."

"Why do you want to know?"

"I told you my plans," he reminded him. "And I'm interested. You managed to do a lot with your country in five short years. If I want to follow your success, I should take the opportunity to learn from you."

North's people had managed to do a lot. And the idea of China having to say that something in his country had been adapted from a Korean idea, the same way North could (and did not) say about Soviet methods pleased him.

"I'm sure you have a lot of interesting ideas for the future," China added, looking up at the Korean.

"I am... thinking about switching to a cooperative farming system," he admitted.

China smiled. "Tell me about it."

North did. Then he told him about carrying on the anti-feudal, democratic revolution until the eventual Socialist Revolution. And about his plans for post-war reconstruction. And his interpretation of some of Marx's writings.

"It's obvious when he said 'religion is opium for the masses,' he meant that it's addictive and deteriorating," China insisted.

"Did you even read the rest of what he said?" North retorted. "'Religion is the sigh of the oppressed.' He meant it's a distraction from their material conditions."

"Then I don't think that he knew the evils of opium." There was an edge to China's voice, and North recalled his country's history with the drug. "And are you telling me you're a Taoist after all?"

"No," North heatedly rejected once again, leaning forward over his crossed legs. "I think religion is useless. Once the people all live good lives and believe in themselves and those who work for them, it will wither away. They won't need to distract themselves anymore. Which is what Marx meant."

China scrunched his face playfully. "Then I hope they hurry up. Maybe I should start mass-producing books about self-worth."

North snorted. "If you do, give one to North Pyongan."

The Korean country had been carefully monitoring what he said, not wanting to give China too much of an insight into the inner workings of his country, since he was sure that was why he was being pressed on his plans. But he'd actually been doing less talking than expected. The other Countryhuman had frequently chimed in when told of projects North had planned out, giving explanations of similar things he intended to do, or explaining how his ideas differed, leading them off into tangential debates that didn't really offer insight into anything other than their personal opinions.

Occasionally China would derail topics completely to ramble on about something, usually industrialization. His eyes lit up again when he did, abruptly sitting up as if stricken with inspiration. He lost all traces of his languid arrogance when this happened, his tongue moving almost too fast to be understood, leaving North to have to focus intently to absorb everything.

The other country was lying on his back now, looking at him. North had found himself lying down at some point, too, nowhere near his bedroll. The floor was hard, but he was too focused on explaining how he planned to cover all of Korea with fruit trees to care.

"Trees are one of a country's most precious resources. They provide shade, timber, fruit, morale..." North felt like his words were starting to wander, but China was nodding intently.

"I plan to replace my deserts with forests," he said. "Sand doesn't do much for the eye."

"How-?" North cut himself off, sitting up as the heavy steel door opened. Ssi-bal, he hadn't locked it since the person he wanted to lock out was inside. "South Hamgyong."

"I was waiting for you to come back," she said, yawning. "But you've been here the entire time, haven't you? Are you... sleeping here tonight?"

Her eyes strayed to China, clearly not just wondering if her Countryhuman was going to return to the city.

"I intended to," China said, leaning on an elbow.

North hesitated, glancing at him, then away. "...Yes."

SH nodded blearily and hesitantly, thankfully not asking about presents. "I'll get you some pillows."

"We don't have pillows." He had been rejecting the provinces' requests for them. They couldn't waste supplies on something frivolous.

"We do now." SH tipped her head to China. "Our comrade brought some."

"A birthday gift from home," he demurred. "I decided to be generous with it."

"I don't need one," North said.

His province sighed. "Ugh. Men."

"Don't lump me in with him," China protested. "I'll take as many as possible. Silk, preferably."

"You get one. Cotton."

After she left, North refused to look at China. He shouldn't have said he was sleeping in here.

The other man didn't mention it, unbuttoning his jacket and removing his many belts as he got ready for sleep. North stayed fully dressed, not even removing his eyepatch. He actually adjusted his buckles, tightening them.

When SH returned, she was carrying China's bedroll, alongside actual pillows and blankets that were evidently also part of his birthday gift. "There, now you'll finally be comfortable. Korea, you know the Premier said we shouldn't put ourselves through hardship for no reason-"

"Get out of here," he growled.

SH paused for a moment, squinting at China in what was almost a glare.

He smiled. "Goodnight."

"Hm." She turned and left with a, "Goodnight, Korea."

"She's amusing," China said as he spread out his bedroll, and North reluctantly arranged his new pillow and blanket on his.

"Stay away from her."

"I don't think she would have me, anyhow. She believes I'm courting someone else."

"I doubt anyone would have you." North didn't care who he was courting, so long as it wasn't one of his provinces. Or people.

"You wound me." China spread himself out on his bed, draping the thin olive blanket over himself. "I'll have you know that I've turned down at least ten marriage proposals in my life."

North tugged his own roll away, hesitated, then moved it even farther before laying down. Even pressed into the wall as far as he could go, it was still too close. The room really wasn't that big.

He hesitated, fingers on the string that tied his eyepatch. Kangwon said he shouldn't sleep with it on, since it could chafe, and breathing was good for it. But still...

He untied it, half-turning his face as the cool air of the bunker wafted across the exposed socket. He glanced over at China, unable to help looking somewhat defiant.

The other country didn't pretend he wasn't interested. His eyes bored into North's missing one, making the scar itch as they flicked over it.

But he also didn't gape. Curiosity sated, he lay back down.

North eyed him, wary, but he'd already started talking again. A little bit of tension went out of him.

He listened as the other Countryhuman launched into an explanation of his imagined dedesertification that somehow morphed into how many textiles he intended to create for his people.

Talking with China was... nice, he was forced to admit. It was engaging to discuss theory and praxis with him. With his provinces there was always the element of them looking to him for guidance. Even Hwang- who had read every work on Socialist theory he could get his hands on, and thoroughly studied the material conditions of their own country- depended on him to know how to implement it. The time for debates was at the mass meetings with their people, which lacked the... North didn't like the word 'intimate.' Maybe 'private.' Yes- mass meetings lacked the private quality of conversations like this. Talking with China was less like talking to his provinces and more like talking to-

He caught his lips curling up at a quip China made about the value of linen, and quickly forced them flat, flipping over on his bedroll and tugging the blanket over himself. "I'm going to sleep."

China sighed loudly. "Pulling away again?"

"Trying to sleep," North muttered. He didn't like the way the other country had said that. Like he was some kind of... wild animal that he was trying to pet. "I have a war to fight."

"We have a war to fight," China corrected. "I'm with you to the end. And cutting your eye out would only blind us both."

Of course he remembered that.

"I'm a revolutionary, Chaoxian." There was a rustle of fabric as China readjusted himself into a position North couldn't see. "I'm well used to those who would infiltrate our movements and stab us in the back. I understand your tendency to mistrust, but if we trusted none of our comrades, neither of us would have made it through our revolutions."

That was almost exactly what his Premier had said to him.

North sat up aggressively. China was sitting, too, hands in his lap. He had switched on his flashlight to conserve the lamp, and it painted his face in black shadows and bright light that glinted off the gold stars on his face.

"So you can promise that you'll never betray me?" the Korean challenged. "That I'll never end up with your knife in my back?" Or in his face.

He didn't like how vulnerable the words sounded, even as agitated as they were. They revealed too much. He tied his eye patch back on.

"No." China smiled as he said it. "I can't do that."

North snorted in disgust, roughly standing, intent on stomping out of the room without a word. It had been stupid to think he could let China sleep in here. He could barely rest around those he trusted, let alone someone he couldn't.

China was unbothered by his display. "We're both Communists. Our friendship isn't based off of profit like that of capitalists, where I'll promise to support you so long as you keep lining my pockets. If you ever strayed from your path, you would become my enemy. And I'd expect the same from you."

North stopped in place, gritting his teeth.

"But you're not the type to be dissuaded easily, and- believe it or not- neither am I."

North believed it. From the conversations they had shared, he could tell that China believed in what he was saying when he talked about uplifting his country. And he wouldn't have been able to unite his people and free them if that belief wasn't firm.

He compared the image of his brother that night in the woods- eyes steady as they stared into his, relaxed as he told him he had no idea what his government was doing to their people- to that of China tonight and when they had talked on the mountain above Seoul. The Chinese country's eyes had been practically glowing as he spoke of becoming a red star in the East, fixated on someplace in the future.

"Yes," he reluctantly said to China in the here and now. "I got that impression."

China's face was unusually intense as he looked up at North. "Our friendship is based off of our mutual ideals. And so long as we both share those ideals, I'll support you, even at the risk of my life."

The Korean country reflexively wanted to reply again that talk was cheap, but didn't.

Because it wasn't just talk. China had stayed in Seoul to help not just North, but his people. He had dragged him from the city even as bombs fell around them. He had stayed at Chorweon as the American army bore down on them, and even if that had been for his people, he had sent them here to help. He was here, fighting through mud and blood, instead of in his country, building towards the future he felt such enthusiasm for and it was clear he wanted so badly. On his National Day, instead of celebrating with his people, he was in a cramped bunker with someone that couldn't give him more than a persimmon.

And, conversely, his admittance that North couldn't expect him to never turn on him was oddly comforting. If he had stared him dead in the eye and assured him that he would never backstab him no matter what, that he would always be on North's side, then the Korean man wouldn't still be standing here. If he had promised that North could always trust him, he never would have been able to.

North fixed his eye on the tips of China's fingers, which were just poking out of his overlong sleeves. He couldn't see his fingerpads right now, but he knew they were flawed, patches burned smooth from where he had grabbed that burning wood to lift it off of Kyong-hyang in Seoul. Just like North's.

He sat back down, tugging the blanket over himself once more as he turned his back to the other Countryhuman. "Fine."

"Care to elaborate?"

"Fine," he repeated, closing his eye. He kept his eyepatch on.

"How nicely non-specific," China hummed. "But I assume that means you're not going to storm away." When North didn't respond, he added, "By the way, if I ever do feel like stabbing you, I'll make sure it's in the front. In the chest, maybe."

North huffed, then cleared his throat. "You could try."

"Are you smiling?" China's own smile was clear in his voice.

"No," the Korean denied.

"You are," his comrade crooned in delight. "I can hear it."

"I going to stab you tonight if you don't go to sleep," North growled, still not looking in his direction.

China laughed softly, and with a click, shut off the flashlight, plunging them into darkness.

[image]

Another chapter I have been waiting ages to write. Yippee! It will be known that while I always try to be as accurate and realistic as possible when it comes to technology used at the time, China's handheld radios do not apply. It's China. If he wants them to work a certain way, they will.

Refusal To Submit

1926

North had never seen a naked woman before. And as he stared down at the corpse, he got the sense that he still hadn't.

She was sprawled out in the village square, her long brown hair torn from its bun and splayed across the dirt like ragged wings. The bloody tatters of her choson-out littered the ground around her. She had been cut out of her clothes like North had once been, but far more messily. The evidence of the knife slashes littered her brown skin.

Her spine was twisted, and her legs bent. Blood soaked the ground around her almost black, most of it coming from her stomach. It gaped open, the skin sagging in, like something had been torn from it, beyond the streamers of pink intestines that festooned her. Blood smeared her thighs as well, had gushed from a place North was avoiding looking at.

But he couldn't make himself look away entirely. His eyes kept being drawn against his will back to her chest, and the character that was carved there.

'従.' He knew which reading it was supposed to have.

'OBEY.'

The kanji had been cut between her breasts while she was still alive. Her hands, curled into half-claws, bore the cuts from trying to grasp the blade, trying to stop it from carving her open, slicing her palms to ribbons in the process. North's fingers curled in over the pale blue scars that crossed his own palms.

Japan hadn't been the one to do this. If he had, the kanji wouldn't be so shaky, the strokes taking sudden angles where the blade had slipped across her breasts, exposing the pale yellow insides. His hand would have been steady, mechanical, no matter how much she struggled to stop him.

The woman's mouth was open in a rictus scream, her dark, glazed eyes still wide even days after her death. Somehow the carrion birds perched on the burnt houses around the square hadn't taken them yet, even when they had clearly pecked at her innards. North glanced up at them, then hesitantly crouched, though he didn't want to be any closer to her.

He had touched old corpses before. While they never stuck around after they killed another Jap soldier or traitor, life in Korea was hard. At the beginning of the year, they had encountered a family of five that had frozen to death in a countryside ditch. They had likely been evicted, and were travelling to find a new home. They had curled up in a ditch for warmth and never woken up. The youngest would have only came up to his knee. North had worked with the others to move them somewhere more noticeable, not wanting to bury them in case they had family that should know what happened. The bodies had been heavy and hard, like blocks of ice instead of people.

There was also the guard that had tried to take his brother. He had sat in their shack for days before retrieval, the men outside wanting to punish North even more for killing their partner. South had been having nightmares about his eyes watching them, so North had to roll him into the corner. His limbs wouldn't bend, and he had left a human-shaped stain on the wooden floor.

And Kang Kyung-nam. North's 'something worse' had lasted for hours, enough time for the man's blood to start to jell, and his muscles to stiffen. His body could remember what it felt like to be smashed into his, like his inflexible limbs were grabbing at him.

And all those people at the vigil. Those wrapped in white cloths, those whose names he had learned, those he had carried for wives or mothers that couldn't. He had been weaker and smaller than them, but he knew it was his responsibility to muster all his strength to lift the beloved dead into his thin arms. It was the least he owed them.

Still, despite the familiarity, he found himself reluctant to touch the woman before him.

Her skin was cold, the autumn sunshine refusing to arm it. It barely felt like flesh. It had taken on a grey tone as it decayed, and the eyelids that North placed his fingers on were almost purple, webbed with dark, broken veins.

They wouldn't shut. She was too stiff, and they had started to sink down into her eye sockets.

She was just a corpse. It didn't matter. But still, when everything else was left exposed...

North grit his teeth, placing one hand carefully on her shoulder to hold her steady, and pinching one of her eyelids between his fingers. With a sticky peeling sound, he pulled it down until it touched her bruised lower lid, pressing it into place for half a minute, trying not to think about how her eyeball shifted under his touch. When he was done, he repeated the process with the other one.

It didn't work. As he watched, they slowly peeled back, exposing the dead glint of her eyes again.

All of a sudden the feeling of clammy skin under his fingers was too much. He scrambled back from the woman, wiping his hands compulsively on his cloak before shame flooded him.

She was his. He shouldn't feel unclean from touching her.

North inched forward, making himself slide his fingers between her stiff ones, pressing his scarred palm to her bloody one.

She had been murdered because of him, after all.

His eye went back to her chest, and the word gouged into it.

'OBEY.'

They hadn't been to this village. They had only just entered the region. The Kempeitei must have tracked them, not well enough to find them, but well enough for Japan to order this message to be left.

Maybe that was why he had trouble touching her, beyond her nudity. Because he was responsible for this.

North shook his head, squeezing her hand tighter.

He was responsible for the others, too. He should have been able to stop his brother from executing Kang Kyung-nam. He should have been there to save everyone at the vigil. He was responsible.

But Japan was to blame. It had been him that had forced his brother to pull the trigger, it had been him that had Kang Kyung-nam arrested in the first place for the crime of trying to feed his family, and it had been him that had ordered this village destroyed. He may not have carved the words with his own hand like he had in South Jeolla, but he was to blame.

North bared his teeth, gripping the woman's hand so tight her bones creaked, making himself feel her. He should have been here. It was the least he could do.

"Korea?" SH's voice echoed through the empty streets of the village, and North jerked up, quickly letting go of the hand.

Ssi-bal, she didn't need to see this.

He glanced around for something to cover the dead woman and, finding nothing, tore off his own cloak, spreading the worn green fabric over the body just as SH, Sang, and North Chungcheong came around the corner of the village elder's house, their guns drawn and their faces cautious.

They looked relieved when they saw him standing there.

"Korea!" Sang cried. "Where were you?"

SH clicked her tongue. "'When you're scouting, you need to be swift and through, and return as soon as possible.'"

"The village is empty," North clipped, though he wouldn't have accepted the excuse from them. "The Kempeitei are gone. But we still need to hurry. Round up the others, gather the provisions that you can, and let's move."

He strode away from the body, wanting to put distance between her and his female provinces.

"Where's your cloak?" North Chungcheong asked as he approached.

"I'll get a new one."

SH's eyes drifted over his shoulder to the puddle of military green fabric. The light in them dimmed.

"We saw bodies on the way in," she said quietly.

North had seen them, too. None of them had been like this.

"We keep moving," North said, then halted.

"Korea?"

His legs started moving again. "The men that did this should still be searching the area for us. We are going to find them first."

"Alright," North Chungcheong crowed as SH said with quiet viciousness, "Good."

"Are you sure that's safe?" Sang fretted, her eyes trailing around the half-burnt village. "What if they do this to another place as revenge? What if they start doing it more often?"

He knew she was thinking of that little village in South Jeolla last year.

"They will do it regardless," North said, heading down the main road. "We can at least make sure they pay for it."

He was relieved to see there was no guilt on South Hamgyong or North Chungcheong's faces, and only the ghost of it on South Gyeongsang's. They had listened to him last time.

Night-classes, killing police and kempei, or even just travelling around, influencing no one, harming no one. All were disobedience in Japan's eyes. All needed to be punished. And if they didn't fight back, if they didn't give Japan a human cost to the Occupation, then he would continue to punish their people for whatever he felt like.

That woman had fought. She hadn't clutched uselessly at the ground as she was tortured. She had grabbed at the blade, she had writhed and twisted and scratched with no thought as to whether it would make her pain worse. She had fought because she had to in order to be free. Not all of the blood under her nails and in her teeth had been hers. Her eyes hadn't been wide solely in terror and pain, but in fury and defiance as Japan's command to her country was carved into her chest.

'従. Follow, comply, OBEY.'

Korea would be doing none of that.

'Never again.'

—

1951

Chagang followed Korea through the empty streets of Pyongyang. Crimson and navy swirled around him in frustration, though his voice as he spoke with Pak Sun-do was even.

"Van Fleet said in his press release that he refuses to let his soldiers 'stagnate.' Between that and his earlier comments about hurting us more before the winter is over, we can expect combat to continue into winter."

Olive worry joined the brighter colours, drab and anxious. For all three years Chagang had been alive, winter had always done that to Korea. Free of the louder, sharper worries of the tactical retreat last year, it was more suffocating now.

"Can I ask how the talks are going?" Pak Sun-do had to hurry through the rubble to keep pace with his Countryhuman, though his legs were longer.

"The same way they have been," Korea answered.

They had asked for them to resume on the 20th last month. America and South had said nothing. Rhee had denied it unless the Chinese left Korea. Ridgway had taken his time replying. When he did, it was only to propose talks between their liaisons. They were now involved in talks about restarting the talks.

They had just turned down moving the neutral zone from Kaesong again. Chagang knew part of Korea's frustration came from the fact that they were going to give in soon. The location was too petty of a sticking factor. It was causing more delays than just moving would.

"They're going to postpone their resumption until at least the end of this month, when the snows come to the hills," Korea said, stepping over a chunk of rubble. "Our soldiers at the front are going to need supplies more urgently than ever. I need the Party to rouse as many civilians as possible to keep the eastern highway open. Bring in the other parties, too."

"The other parties?" Pak Sun-do asked, pausing in writing Korea's words down.

"The Chairman is going to call for greater cooperation with the friendly parties next month at the Plenary Meeting," Korea explained. "Get a head start on it. Include the People's Republican Party and the Toiling People's Party. We're all going to need to rally more firmly around the Worker's Party."

His snap of olive said what his words didn't.

'If we want to survive the winter.'

"Understood, Comrade Korea." Pak Sun-do jotted his words down in a small notebook.

"We might get a ceasefire before the winter is over," Korea said. "Van Fleet's statement wasn't popular, even in America."

Perhaps especially in America. Around ten thousand American soldiers' lives had been claimed since the peace talks started. Most after their 'limited offensive' had began. And while it was far less than the KPA and PVA's casualties, Americans weren't used to loss. They thought killing Koreans should be easy. And they didn't like learning they had been lied to about their army not being involved. Or that Van Fleet had essentially said Korea was a training ground.

Chagang also didn't like that. Soldiers shouldn't die in training. And he didn't like that his country was a combat school for American soldiers to train in so that the survivors could eventually be sent to destroy more countries.

But he knew no matter how unpopular Van Fleet and Ridgway's determination to capture just one more hill was, it wouldn't end the war. They hadn't cared that Koreans wanted Socialism. They hadn't cared that they wanted Reunification. They didn't care that they didn't want to be considered target practice. South did not control the southern army, and American civilians did not control theirs.

Korea knew it, too. No golden glow of hope had surrounded his words. Only slate mixed with azure and indigo in stony resolution.

"But even if we do reach an armistice, we need to keep resources flowing," he continued as they passed onto Stalin Street, heading for the warehouse district and its underground buildings. "We will need to stabilize people's living situations as quickly as possible."

Chagang tilted his head, hearing a distant drone. "Plane," he reported.

Pak Sun-do glanced anxiously at the sky, but Korea only nodded, his boots silent on one of the few clear streets as he continued.

"Once the fighting ends, there are many who will start to blame us for the condition of the country, and not fixing it quickly enough. We need to make sure they're in the minority. I want the Party to be at the forefront of the rehabilitative efforts. You can involve the other friendly parties, but make sure the public knows it is a Worker's Party initiative."

Chagang could hear the drone coming closer. Only a single plane. They didn't have to worry about bombs then. It was only surveillance.

"Do you think the fighting will end?" Pak Sun-do asked quietly. "Or will the Yankees just keep stretching it out?"

"You heard my Foundation Day broadcast," Korea said, and the man nodded. "It doesn't matter how long they want to drag this war out for. We can fight it for even longer."

Chagang lifted his head as the plane came into view, arcing around the east of Pyongyang, across the Taedong. It was bulky and silver, with four engines and propellers. Not a reconnaissance craft. A B-29 Superfortress heavy bomber. Not flying in a wing. Alone.

Something in him stilled.

"The Americans are getting impatient," Korea was saying. "The world is getting impatient. The longer this war lasts, the worse America looks. He wants it over. We're going to make sure-"

"Korea."

Something in Chagang's voice made his Countryhuman look back, irritation and olive flaring.

"What?" He followed his gaze as the plane curled in, heading for the nearby city center.

Pak Sun-do looked, too. His tan face paled, lime terror engulfing him.

Superfortresses did not fly alone. They were too valuable to travel without defense. And most of them were not so silver.

One variant was. The Silverplate. The kind that had flown alone over Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The kind that had been modified to carry the nuclear bomb.

Chagang felt curiously numb as the words left his lips. "They're going to drop the atom bomb on us."

Korea barged past him, standing in the center of the street, staring up at that single plane as it drew near.

And for a moment, all colour drained from him. The maroon, the grey, the scarlet and navy, the dark blue, the olive. It all vanished. Nothing was left.

He had been right. America wanted the war over.

And it was over.

Lime and sick yellow plumed over their capital as those still in it caught sight of the bomber. As they understood what it meant. Anti-aircraft gunfire rattled from the heights. But the B-29 was too high. It swept in, black despair blooming in the shadow of its wings.

The air fields had been struck again. Their own planes couldn't mobilize in time. There was nothing they could do.

As the whine of the plane grew louder, grew deafening, even from so high up, Korea's colours returned.

He stepped forward, and inky black and the blood red of raw fury flooded from him, lashing up at the sky as he screamed in defiance. The bomber was ri above them, but Chagang could see the hate and rage crash into it, trying desperately to hold it back from its mission. For a moment, he hoped they could defy reality to tear it from the sky.

But the emotions weren't tangible, and the B-29 tore through, propellers shredding them into a most of blood and ash. There was nothing they could do to stop it.

Korea turned, panting, his eye locking on his province and Pak Sun-do.

There was one thing Chagang could do. Even if it wouldn't stop the plane.

He charged, slamming into Korea, who tried to flinch back.

"What are you doing?!" he barked as Chagang muscled him away, dragging him down the street, away from the center of the city. "Let me go! I need-"

"There is nothing we can do."

For the briefest second, Korea went slack in his arms, colours retreating again, replaced by the slate of resignation.

But then the red flared back, along with the yellow-lime-scarlet of panicked desperation, hammering directly into Chagang's skull. He reeled back, and his Countryhuman freed himself, not running towards the target zone, but away. He was the one gripping Chagang this time, and he grabbed the frozen Pak Sun-do by the arm, too, hauling the men after him, trying to get as far as possible before the bomb went off, trailing red and ink and fear.

As the drone of the plane reached its apex and the bomber reached its nadir high above, Korea dove into a side street, slamming them both into the hard ground, pinning them with his body. Chagang tried to struggle, tried to throw him off. He should be the one covering him, he should be the one protecting his country from the pain that was coming.

But Korea's usual strength was only bolstered by panic, and he latched on tightly to his province, forcing his head into his chest as he buried his face in his shoulder. Knowing there was no escaping, Chagang wrapped his arms around his Countryhuman from below, trying to shield him any way he could. He could hear Korea's teeth grate as he squeezed his eyes shut and dug his nails into his shoulder as the high-pitched whistle cut through the air, and they all braced themselves for nuclear fire to wash over them and their capital.

'BOOM.'

The explosion was deafening. It roared over Pyongyang like something alive, the monster that had destroyed Hungnam returning for another city as the bomb detonated in mid-air and the shockwave tore through streets and alleys. Shrapnel could be heard raining down blocks away, along with the creak and groan of shells of buildings giving way, and screams echoing from unseen throats.

And then silence.

There was no wave of fire. No sudden agonizing pain as Pyongyang was wiped off the map by a city-killer. And as Chagang opened his eyes, he found that while the blue sky was choked with black smoke and the smell of chemicals, there was no immense heat that could melt bones and leave them shadows of ash on the ground. There had been no great double flash of light.

He inhaled the burning acrid smoke and found it smelled familiar. He couldn't find his voice at first, and when he did, it was muffled by the ringing in his skull.

"A TNT bomb. It was a TNT bomb."

Korea's hold on Chagang and Pak Sun-do tightened enough to hurt. Then he suddenly released them, sliding off and back. Chagang sat up. His insides felt like they had all been liquefied by an atom bomb after all. The human man looked how he felt, his arms trembling as he forced himself up onto his knees, fear staining his handprints as he shook violently.

Korea looked stunned, his eye wide as he stared at Chagang, panting, nauseous yellow and lime green still swirling around him, dominating the inky black and red for a moment with no relief to cut it.

And Chagang didn't need his ability to tell that his Countryhuman, usually so skilled at masking that emotion in himself, was terrified.

Pak Sun-do spoke first, his voice jittering and leaking fear. "C-Comrade Korea. My wife. She's at... Permission to-"

"Go," Korea permitted, quickly masking his vulnerability. From the man, not Chagang.

Pak Sun-do didn't waste a second, scrambling to his shaking legs and staggering off half-dazed.

Korea stood, trying to regain his composure. But Chagang could see he was quivering, his heart beating so hard his entire body was shaking. Like his. And the yellow-lime refused to be smothered.

"It was a test run," Chagang realized, climbing to his feet. His own legs felt weak.

Korea gave him a long, distant look. Then he shook himself. "We need to go assess the blast zone." His voice was raw from screaming. "That bomb was larger than usual. Our people need to see us on the scene."

He went to stride away, but Chagang caught his wrist.

"Korea. You shouldn't have done that."

"Done what?" he asked, his colours saying that he knew.

"You shouldn't have protected me," Chagang told him. "I'm the one that should protect you."

"You're my province," Korea refuted.

The province nodded soberly. "Yes. Provinces are expendable. You are not."

He felt no despair at the words. It was what they were for. He didn't need his cousin's memories of the Occupation to know that if it came down to a province or Korea, the Countryhuman would have to choose himself. And they would have to choose him, too.

The idea had always been reassuring to Chagang. When so many in the world struggled to find a purpose, he had been formed with one. And he had become strong enough to fulfill it.

Korea could stand to lose a Provincehuman. They could not stand to lose their country.

Anger flared from his Countryhuman, piercing through the fear. But the yellow grew thicker, filled with the grey smoke of unease, like when Chagang had made his promise in Kanggye.

"You-"

His province interrupted him. "You need to choose your life over ours."

He could see Korea's unflinching, cold expression as he had told them that in North Pyongan's memories. He had always wondered what colours he would have shown then.

Right now it was more anger. More fear. It was stained with grey-yellow, ochre, and chartreuse.

And then slate grey.

"Move out," he ordered, thinking he was avoiding giving him an answer.

But Chagang had already received it. And as ashamed as he knew it made Korea feel, it comforted him.

America still had the real atom bomb in his arsenal after all.

—

North walked swiftly through the halls of Jonsung complex, brushing past the comrades that tried to call out to him. He had held it together through the aftermath of the TNT bomb, rescuing survivors and assessing damage. But he couldn't take it anymore.

He burst into he and the General's empty office, slamming and locking the door, sinking down against it.

He couldn't stop remembering that one dreadful moment as he stared up at the silver B-29 and realized Chagang was right. That they were all going to die, and that there was nothing he could do.

Ssi-bal, that sick helplessness was rising in him once more, filling his mouth, and for a moment he was scrabbling on the floor again, palms slick with blood as he tried uselessly to wrest the blade from his chest and the boot from his stomach.

He wanted to scream. He wanted to hit something, to turn his desk into kindling.

North leaped to his feet, storming towards it, then slammed his palms down on the surface, baring his teeth as he tucked his chin into his chest.

No. It was immature, like screaming at the plane had been. It accomplished nothing, changed nothing.

There had been nothing he could do.

A test run, Chagang had said. But North knew that wasn't true. The Yanks knew how to deliver death, they had practiced on their own deserts, on Pacific islands whose inhabitants had been rounded up and shipped away like livestock, on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

It had been a threat.

And as the month went on there were more. Not often, once or twice a week. One of the silver Superfortresses would split from the others and come in high and alone. And sometimes their planes would chase it away, but sometimes they couldn't. And on those occasions, it would open the doors of its bomb bay and the bomb would come falling out, plummeting towards Pyongyang and detonating above the city with a sound like the world ending. And every single time, up until the last second, North didn't know whether it was.

They accepted moving locations. The talks were moved to Panmunjom, a village some few ri east of Kaesong, but not yet restarted. Ridgway and Van Fleet wanted to buy time for their army to claim the heights they had been fighting for since the previous month.

They redoubled their efforts the day after the mock-nuke, blanketing the ridge in fire from their aircrafts, in artillery and rockets and machine gun fire. In bunker-busting bombs that collapsed tunnels and air raid shelters. In napalm that burned in the valleys and on North, Kangwon, and Gangwon's skin. The 6th and 12th Divisions, divisions that North and his General had visited just over a week earlier, were down to less than a thousand men per regiment before the real assault even began.

The enemy managed to send their tanks into the maze of mountain passes, and neither the tattered Fifth Corps or the PVA replacements could stop them. They crawled forward, and even though the 13th Division saw no surrenders, almost every single soldier fighting until the very last, only retreating when there was no other choice, they were eventually overwhelmed, and the ridge fell.

They didn't crumble. They didn't lose morale and fall on their swords. They would regird, reorganize, and counterattack. They would pry any height they could out of the enemy's bloody fingers. Whether it took until winter or longer, they and the Chinese were still prepared to fight.

And it meant nothing because at any moment America could decide this was taking too long, and one of those hundreds of planes, one of those thousands of tons of bombs, would be an atom bomb. And everything they had fought for, everything they had won, would be gone.

They weren't test runs. They were promises. Where Japan had once carved his threats into North's villages and people, now America delivered them from above. The TNT practice runs carried the exact same message as that kanji carved between that woman's breasts long ago- if North didn't give America what he wanted in the talks, if he kept fighting, then his people would die screaming by the thousands.

And there was nothing he could do to stop it.

'Follow, comply, OBEY.'

But he would not. North hadn't left that prison shack by following. The Korean people hadn't won their freedom by complying. They hadn't stood against their enemy for this long by obeying.

They had done it all by fighting.

It didn't matter how many 'test runs' America sent. It didn't matter if he sent the real thing. He couldn't nuke all of Korea. And even if he did, so long as some people survived in their bunkers, they would carry on the fight. They would not let themselves be treated like Japan had treated them ever again.

North would not bow. When the talks began again, he would not roll over and give the Yankees the concessions they craved. And he was not going to let Pak Hon-yong and his 'diplomacy' hold him back any longer.

Fighting with his comrades, visiting his people, remaining in Pyongyang politicking- they were all the same to America. So long as North refused to submit, they were disobedience. And he needed to be punished. He might as well take out a few more Yanks in return.

The next time his soldiers needed him at the front, he would go, talks be damned.

Nothing was ever going to stop Korea from fighting again.

—

Two weeks ago

South Chungcheong stared down at the Chosun Ilbo, her heart palpitating severely in her breast.

Unlike all other forms of communication, her jailors held no issue with providing her copies of the rags Rhee's stooges churned out. She need not have even asked. Usually they were skimmed, then torn to shreds to provide kindling for her ondol in preparation for the coming winter.

But her fingers had hesitated on this one, just over a week old, her eyes locked on the classifieds section. Paintings, masks, watches. Vases. Even in the midst of war, the peons were conducting commerce, selling artifacts looted from wealthy homes and old tombs unearthed by foreign destruction.

South Chungcheong tore her eyes from the ad, then tore it from the page before briskly folding the remaining newspaper in half. This she methodically ripped into long, thin strips with her sharp nails, shredding it until it resembled naught more than fine, pulpy hairs. She did not yet carry them to her ondol room. 'Twould require exposing herself to the eyes of her guards for them to unlock the door, and she was shaking far too much for that.

He had always been like this. What right did he have to ask anything of her when he had not kept his promise? Did he not realize what sort of predicament he had put her in?

But of course he did. Those little signifiers in the language made certain he was fully aware. That only infuriated her more.

South Chungcheong paced around the kitchen in her prison cell of a manor.

He was audacious, irksome, dominating, and an idealist who slung around promises he had no way of knowing he could fulfill. He was the very epitome of a male and he always had been.

The province leaned over the sink, baring her teeth at the ceramic as she crumpled the ad in her hand.

And she was just as much a fool as all the others.

She pushed off the counter, marching to her parlour, selecting one of the dozens of embroidered cloths she had draped around the room. She snatched her jasu hoop from the suede chair and turned the wooden pegs, releasing the half-finished pattern of scarlet, ash, and snow koi flitting amongst fuchsia lotus flowers, replacing it with a finished piece.

She went to her window, hesitating with her fingers clenched in the gauzy fabric of the curtains.

The narrow gravel drive terminated at a wrought-iron gate she could not cross. Her eyes could spot one of her jailors loitering outside, the other no doubt planted before her door. Always she could hear them trading their unpleasant words, purporting what they would do to her if given allowance.

She held no fear of them. Not now that she had been given allowance. They were not who she was leery of.

America frequently walked the road beyond the gate, passing back and forth far too swiftly to have visited the market or done anything else of note. His covered gaze would strafe her windows like the fighter jets laying waste to the north.

South Chungcheong held her healed wrist in her hand, feeling the crack as the bones had snapped like tinder.

He did not deserve this from her.

The street was near empty as of present, populated solely by a few wives of the bourgeois in their Westernized clothes. Sleek blouses that dipped too low and tight skirts that rode too high. Just one part of the infections of the West that seeped into the countries they occupied, whether materially or spiritually. The infections that would be pumped into Korea if America and his puppet had their way.

She could still see that blush pink dress, those white Western furnishings, that gold-lined wallpaper, and four-poster bed. Those tiny bottles tucked into an expensive purse imported from across the sea. A microcosm of America in a country colonized by Japan, and a foolish Jap woman that wore it all so poorly, too weak-willed and wasted to take control of her life.

'Twould not be their women. 'Twould not be her.

'No matter what you do, how much you slave away, you will still be nothing in their eyes.'

She would not live that sort of life in her own country. Not again. Even if whatever this was was not truly necessary, even if it risked exposing her, she was Korean. She would not curb her actions in her homeland. She would not silence the click of her heels on the office floor to avoid luring in the wolves.

South Chungcheong let go of her wrist, and set her jasu hoop firmly on the windowsill, turning the pattern of red and gold mountain magnolias to face the autumn morning.

There. The first step was accomplished. Regardless of whether the message was received, she needs must create a chance for the second. And 'twould be far more dangerous than this, perhaps even serving no purpose, if the man no longer drew breath.

'If something terrible transpires, I will make sure it haunts you forever,' she seethed internally, that cursed ad for an antique vase patterned with yellow flowers clutched tightly in lavender fist.

Her eyes scanned the street one last time, blood running cold as she caught sight of that familiar shadow sauntering down it.

South Chungcheong whisked the curtain closed.

The fake nuke runs are real, though I've increased their initial frequency as I feel America would. The US would send their planes in like they were doing a nuclear run, then drop regular TNT bombs. And they started on October 4th, after the talks to restart the talks had began. Can you imagine how terrifying that would be? Knowing that at any moment one of them could be real? They still do this. The US and South Korea fly planes with nuclear capability towards the border and practice invasions, only to veer away at the last second. And every single time the DPRK has no idea if this will be the real thing until that final second. But now instead of it being solely a show of force, it's a taunt. They want the DPRK on edge, they want them to be afraid that it could be the real thing. They want them to think it is and move to defend themselves. Because if they do, the US can call it an unprovoked act of war and bomb them again.

Anyway, I was thinking, and I came to the conclusion that North's dislike of nudity probably runs deeper than just a cultural thing. For his own body, I already knew he didn't like being naked because it makes him feel vulnerable. In the shack, he and South would almost never take their clothes off because the guards could look in or burst in at any time. So any time they did to change into their other set, it was done hastily and with a lot of anxiety. And North doesn't want anyone to see his scars or how skinny he is because then they would think he's weak (even if they wouldn't).
But then more than that, the only times he's seen other people naked have been bad. Because he's very much a 'I am not changing or bathing around other people' guy (reinforced by growing up with no privacy at all), he's never seen his fellow soldiers or provinces nude in the barracks or when they bathe. And he is not a sex-haver. So the only people he's seen naked are either his own brother (and if he was looking then that means it was because South was beat up and needed his wounds cleaned) or corpses. Nudity does not have any positive connotations for him. But he is only subconsciously aware of this. I imagine modern day that this has faded a little with distance. But I think maybe when he sees Y/N naked for the first time, when he touches her he gets a flash of corpse flesh. Kindly think about that the next time you read that one chapter.

Signs of Change

Back on October 5th

On the last day of tank-hunting training, after the engineers had 'graduated' and redeployed to their regiments, South Pyongan jogged along the mountain path after a group of former tank crew heading to the vehicle that would return them to their own posts.

"Hey!" she called before she could come to her senses.

They turned, happy to see her again obviously.

"Comrade South Pyongan," one hailed. "Are you coming with us?"

"I might hitch a ride," she said, eyes picking out someone in the group. "But I have to talk to him for a minute first."

Oh Renjiro looked surprised. Which wasn't surprising since she'd been avoiding him ever since returning from that pretty boy country's National Day. She had to be strategic about it, y'know? Strike at the last second so she wouldn't have to see him again after.

"I'll make sure he gets to the truck in time," she promised, and the group carried on.

Once they were far enough ahead, she looked at the half-Jap, hands on her hips.

"You still want to know how they died?"

He blinked his slender eyes at her in surprise. "You would tell me?"

"No questions." South Pyongan brushed past him, setting off down the path at a casual pace so she wouldn't catch up to the others. "And we walk and talk. So yes or no- do you want to hear how they died?"

"Yes."

She told him. It was like peeling off one of her burn scabs and digging around in the squishy, wet, yellow substance underneath, but she did. And her voice didn't even break once.

But she didn't know how to finish. When she got to the part after Kim Se-woon breathing his last air into Pak Dae-ho, she just sort of… stopped. There was really only one last thing to say. The thing that had stopped her from telling her brother because he'd see through any words she used to what had really happened.

She'd been too weak to save them.

"But you got out okay?" Oh Renjiro asked when it was clear she wasn't going to keep talking.

He didn't sound accusing. He sounded… concerned, which just made her feel gross. At least if he'd said it was unfair she'd made it out and they hadn't, she would have an excuse to push him down the ridge.

"Yeah," she said flippantly. "North Pyongan got the tank hatch open from outside. I just got a concussion and a sick scar on my leg."

"That's good," the man said quietly.

South Pyongan sped up a little. General, she could just hear him thinking it.

'Why couldn't you get them out in time?'

She shook her head. She was not letting some… guy psychically guilt her when her psychic slurs hadn't worked on him.

The mountain pass opened up, the sunset light that flooded the gorge revealing a truck parked down below. The men ahead of them had already reached it, and were loading empty ammunition boxes alongside soldiers that emerged from supply caches hidden in the rocks.

Oh stopped, and South Pyongan reluctantly did, too.

"Trying to get out of work?" she asked, staying casual.

He looked at her seriously. "Thank you for telling me."

"Yeah," she said uncomfortably. "No problem. They were your crew, too. Or whatever. We should probably get down there."

She spun on a heel, but stopped when he said, "I know that shit can't have been easy for you."

A bunch of return quips to deny it ran through her head. But she realized it would be a little fucked up to say, 'Oh no, it was actually really easy.' If she said that about their people's deaths and Korea found out, whether she meant it or not, he'd be pissed.

She took too long thinking of something to say, which unfortunately gave Oh time to continue.

"It keeps me up at night thinking that I could've been able to help, that I should have been there. Even though I'm glad I wasn't…" His eyes slid away. "It must be worse for you. I'm not sure if you're allowed, as a Provincehuman and all, but if you ever need someone to talk to… I'm sure you can find out where I'm stationed."

She turned to face him again, baffled. "Why? You literally said you know I don't like you."

And why.

Oh shrugged. "It's not like you're the only one. And it's not like I don't get it. They ran those articles in the Korean People's Army magazine last week, about what you and the other provinces had to go through during the Occupation."

South Pyongan had had to send Hwang her little write-up on that again. The official one, the one that didn't involve being in prison because she'd smashed a farmer's brains out with a rock.

"I'm not ashamed of the blood in my veins or who my mother is,"

Oh said solemnly. “But I am Korean, too. And I understand hating Japan, and anything of his. And… we’re the same."

South Pyongan’s bristle died as he lifted his gaze to her.

“We both know what it’s like to make it out when people we care about didn’t. And we both have to carry that with us.”

The province avoided his eyes. “Yeah, you’ve reached the talking limit, buddy. Don’t expect anything like this to ever happen again.”

Ideally she’d never even have to see him again.

He dipped his head, starting to walk past her. But she caught his wrist, wrenching him back around, then quickly dropping it, realizing she’d acted without thinking again.

He stared at her expectantly. Ugh, now she had to say something. It would be mega lame to let him walk away knowing she’d chickened out.

“Hey, what you said about making it out when they didn’t,” she began awkwardly. “It wasn’t your fault. It’s the Yanks’. If you’re going to carry them with you, just… make sure you’re actually carrying them. Don’t let them drag behind you.”

Oh’s dark eyes shimmered. “I’ll try not to. And thank you.”

Seriously, how did Korea do it? She had to wonder if he’d been thinking about drowning himself in the river after he’d said that to her, like she was debating taking a sidestep off the ridge right now.

“Stay safe out there,” she said, turning to walk the other way.

“Aren’t you hitching a ride with us?”

If she had to sit in a truck bed with him for a few hours with this conversation between them, she’d crash the vehicle with everyone in it.

“Nah. I’m walking before the weather gets cold enough to freeze my ass off.” She waved, not looking back. “Go kill some Yankees for me.”

“I will!” the half-Korean called back, saluting. Not that she’d looked back.

*‘Awkward convo done.’ And her voice hadn’t even broken twice.

South Pyongan didn’t walk. She got out of sight, then threw herself up the mountain, scrabbling up the steep cliffside, having to climb hand over hand in some places, until she stood on top of the ridge soaked in the blood red light of the setting sun. Then she ran.

The sparse grass up here was dead and dying, even where it hadn’t been bombed. It was colder, too, especially as the light faded from the horizon. The air cut at her lungs as she sprinted along the narrow spine of rock in the dark, gauging each footfall but not slowing in the slightest, dodging loose rocks so she wouldn’t go tumbling back down and break her neck.

Though she’d probably survive, even if she did.

She wasn’t dragging her tank crew around with her. She was carrying them. They were just… heavy. She wasn’t used to the weight. It was like using a muscle that hadn’t got much use before, like how she had a stitch in her side way too soon since she hadn’t done much long-distance running since atrophying in the POW camp.

South Pyongan ignored the stabbing in her side and the hollow hunger in her stomach, forcing herself to run faster, the wind slicing through the bandages on her face to cut her cheeks.

The only way to train a muscle was to use it, to push through the pain until it didn't hurt anymore. She’d run all the way back to Pyongyang, and only then would she look for a car to take her to Anju. She’d keep running until it was easy again and she’d keep carrying her crew until it was easy for real.

She would get stronger. Strong enough that she could make sure nothing like what had happened to her tank crew ever happened again.

—

“The surgery went well. So long as you make sure to keep it clean, you’ll make a full recovery.”

The man on the hospital cot stared numbly at the part of the sheets where his leg should have raised the fabric. It didn’t.

“Not a full recovery,” he said dully.

Kangwon’s wince didn’t show on his face. “We caught the infection before it progressed too far, and managed to successfully amputate. And we managed to save your other leg.”

“Who cares?” the soldier asked bluntly. “It’s useless anyways.”

Kangwon didn’t bother telling him he might regain function of it eventually. Sip Tal-sun had taken a bullet to the back that severed the fourth segment of the lumbar section of his spinal cord, paralyzing him from the waist down. While he might regain control of the limb that hadn’t became infected, it was doubtful. And when it came to the recovery process, the crushing of false hope could be more dangerous than the injury itself.

“It will provide balance,” he said to his patient, keeping his tone reassuring. “And even if you can’t feel it, once your upper half strengthens to compensate, it’ll be useful to you in getting around.”

“But I’ll never be able to walk again,” the soldier said, voice choked. “I’ll never be able to play football with my son or lie with my wife or carry my mother on my back. I won’t be able to return to the front or hold a job or do anything without someone helping me ever again.”

Kangwon could tell he was holding back tears, but desperately didn’t want to shed them in front of his doctor and Provincehuman. But he couldn’t give him privacy just yet.

“You won’t be able to do any of those things the way you did them before,” he admitted. “But you can learn to adapt. Others have.”

Too many. Amputations were supposed to be the last resort. But with the high rate of infection added to their lack of medical supplies, Kangwon had seen far too many severed limbs lately. Sip Tal-sun was lucky he still had one leg to work with.

"I wish you hadn't taken my leg," the man said quietly.

"I know. We wouldn't have if there was any other choice." Kangwon placed a hand on the bed next to him. "Do your exercises to stay limber, and when you've recovered from the surgery, I'll give you some more for strengthening your core and upper body. You won't be able to live your life the way you did. But I promise, as long as you devote yourself to recovering, you will be able to live it. Alright?"

"Alright," Sip Tal-sun said thickly.

Kangwon smiled, patting the thin cot. "Good. Remember to call for a nurse if you need anything. Don't try to be tough- if there's something wrong, we need to catch it right away."

The former soldier agreed, and Kangwon left his chart, slipping out into the hallway, where he let his smile drop, exhaling.

He'd stopped feeling anxious over surgeries a long time ago. Maybe as he'd held the surgical blade above Sip Tal-sun's blackening veins, he'd heard Korea's voice in his head, demanding to know why he hadn't been able to save Kim Mi-ju.

But he knew he'd done everything he could. And he knew he could save the paralyzed man. Once he'd made the first cut, he'd fallen back into rhythm, his hand steady as he focused on nothing but saving his life.

But mental recovery was always more difficult. Wounds could be patched up and forgotten, a disability could be adjusted to. But injuries to the mind and spirit couldn't be fixed with gauze and antiseptic. No matter how many gentle talks he had with Yun Jin-suk and her father, or Cho Sok-young or Oh Tae-min, Han Hyun-jin, or any of the other traumatized people his cousins and Korea sent his way, he would never be able to stitch up what had been done to them. He could say something perfectly comforting and sensible- that it wasn't their fault that it happened, that there were other ways to serve their country, that they didn't need to walk without limping or be able to lift heavy things to be fulfilled in life, that they weren't tainted by what they'd been through. But if their minds and emotions wouldn't let them absorb it, then they wouldn't. His words could help, but only they could hold the needle.

And some of them didn't want to. It was like some patients wanted to wallow in the mire of their sorrow, and resisted any efforts to pull them out of it. Kangwon knew there were a few reasons for it. The healing process could be daunting, while for someone familiar with it, suffering was comforting, even if it was killing them. Trying to get better meant you had to acknowledge what had been done to you in the first place, and that you could never truly go back to who you'd been before. And that was too much for some people.

Kangwon could handle those types more easily. It wasn't that they didn't want to pull themselves out- they were just afraid to. All they needed was someone's hand to steady them.

The difficult ones were the ones that didn't want to recover, for one reason or another. Some didn't want to learn how to use a prosthetic leg or adapt to missing an arm or to live with the mental anguish of being assaulted, because if they did, it would be admitting they were broken. They didn't want to see themselves that way, and so they refused any efforts to heal. They stayed broken. And sometimes they broke worse. Even if they wanted to keep living, if they didn't accept that they were in the mire, they'd drown anyway.

SH's eyes as he'd counselled her to speak to her brother on October 1st flashed through his mind.

Those types could be okay if Kangwon managed to coax them into cracking. But it wasn't like he could force patients to talk to him. Once they'd recovered physically and were discharged from the hospital, he had no real authority over them, beyond the authority of being one of their provinces. He couldn't make them work through their emotions with him. He could only try to convince them, and if they actually listened, hope that would be enough.

Others felt like they deserved it. Usually soldiers that had lost their squads. They were the only survivors, and that guilt ate at them. Because their comrades had died, it felt like a betrayal to live. It felt like even more of one to keep living, to get better, and even be happy. Kangwon knew why so many veterans of the war against Japan had wept tears when their People's Republic had been declared, and why there had been bitter mixed in with the sweet.

And some people almost seemed to take pleasure in suffering, and not in the way South Pyongan meant when she called him a masochist. It was like they were so convinced that life was over after what they'd gone through that they didn't want to be proven wrong by it continuing on. Their suffering wasn't comfortable, but they still wanted to cling to it because it gave them some sort of… Kangwon didn't know. Vindication, maybe. That they were broken, that they had suffered, that since they could never be the same, there was no point in trying. They resisted every bit of positive progress or joy because that would be moving on. And they didn't want to.

That's why it could be so difficult to talk to North Hamgyong. Sometimes Kangwon could see the exact moment his cousin realized he was enjoying himself too much, and he'd quickly turn cruel and dour again.

He thought Sip Tal-sun fell into that last category, too. Even if he didn't slip into the actual depressive state the province could sense hanging over him, he might develop that mindset. Kangwon had to do what he could to prevent that. He had to make him see that he could find ways to keep living his life, even if it was more challenging than he was used to, before he decided that he couldn't.

You couldn't make someone live that didn't want to.

And he had to do it before the ex-soldier was discharged, and while keeping up his sessions with all his other patients.

Kangwon exhaled as he walked through the halls, and suddenly felt like he'd breathed his consciousness away. He swayed, trying to blink away the sudden scattering of black particles swarming before his eyes like flies.

"-won? Comrade Kangwon?"

The province shook himself as the static cleared to reveal An Il-rae had appeared in front of him, a stack of medical gowns in her arms.

"Are you alright?" she asked, frowning in concern.

"Yeah," Kangwon said after a moment. "Just a bit tired. You know how it is."

The nurse clicked her tongue "You and Yong-hwan, I swear. You both need to get more sleep."

Kangwon did get sleep. Unlike some people he knew (it was always Korea), he made sure to get at least five hours of sleep at night, even when he was on-call at the hospital. If he got woken up for an emergency, he'd make sure to take naps the next day.

"Yeah," he simply agreed, rubbing his arm.

An Il-rae's brown eyes caught the motion. "Should I tell Yong-Comrade Kim you won't be giving blood today?"

"No." He quickly shook his head. "That batch of soldiers just got brought in from the front."

Just over a week ago, the American army had finished seizing the last few hills in the west below the line they'd been trying to set up above the 38th Parallel. Now that they had it, they'd accepted the resumption of the talks.

Surprise surprise, changing the location to Panmunjom hadn't changed anything. As the UN was moving their truce talk camp to Munsan, the KPA and PVA were moving theirs to Kaesong. Both forward camps had their own neutral zones. And on October 12th, three enemy fighter jets had entered theirs and shot it up again.

And this time, they'd killed someone. Two boys had been playing on an empty road in broad daylight, thinking they were safe in the neutral zone. And on their way back from the north, the jets had stopped to strafe them. Twice. The younger boy, only two years old, had been hit by a .50-caliber machine gun slug, but luckily survived.

But his twelve-year old brother hadn't been so lucky.

Even after another investigation, it'd seemed like their accusations were going to get dismissed again, until Ridgway had came forward and admitted it was them. Well, not 'them.' He'd admitted it was American pilots, stressing that they'd violated orders to avoid the neutral zone.

Kangwon knew that sometimes soldiers acted against orders, like the comrades of theirs that had executed American POWs. But he'd had to dig too many bullets and shards of shrapnel out of children recently, and held too many cold, small bodies to feel understanding this time. If the enemy Command had actually punished their pilots after the last incident, maybe the ones now wouldn't have been so bold.

And that was if they really had been acting against orders. It seemed convenient that another incident happened just as the talks were about to start back up. Ridgway had shrank the Panmunjom neutral zone to a just over nine hundred-metre radius, and denied their suggestion of a joint committee to manage it, even dropping his own suggestion of joint policing. He'd also refused to reposition the puppet army troops that could've been responsible for attacking the PVA's military police back in August by widening the zone, and didn't want stop the planes from operating overhead, though they'd eventually won out at that one just before the real talks began again.

It sort of seemed to Kangwon that the American Command was doing everything possible to leave the situation open for another incident. He already knew Korea and the rest of their Supreme Command were swallowing their pride by not letting the murder of the boy interrupt the talks. If something else like that happened again, they'd have to pull back, or risk being seen as desperate.

And then there were the radio broadcasts. They'd already picked up again, but after the talks began in earnest on the 26th, they'd gotten way more frequent. From just after dawn to around evening. South's voice had to be getting sore.

Just like the newest shooting, the timing was too calculated to be coincidental.

"Comrade Kangwon?"

Kangwon blinked blearily, the freshly-painted teal and white corridors unfamiliar for a moment.

'Right. Hospital. Blood.'

"Our Chinese comrades suffered casualties when they lost the hills," he said, his tongue feeling like a chunk of lead in his mouth. "And we've taken a lot trying to recapture them. We need the blood."

"Alright," An Il-rae said, her thin brows furrowed. "Just make sure you get some rest after."

Kangwon nodded, the hallway swaying. He needed a break before he hooked himself up to the IV.

Luckily, unlike some of the patients (and relatives) he had to deal with, his brother wasn't adverse to healing. As Kangwon did his best not to stagger into their room, Gangwon was in the middle of adapting to his own disability.

"So here is every resource on our sign language I've managed to find," Hwang said, spreading a ream of papers and one thin book over the cot with enthusiasm. With the other hand he was scratching furiously in a notebook with a pencil. "As I'm sure you're aware, we only had one school for the deaf, and it's in Seoul- they actually just changed the name to the 'Seoul School for the Deaf,' I hear- and we're nowhere close to having a standardized sign language. However, due to influence from the Occupation, we do share a great commonality with Japanese sign language-"

"Hwang, your lips are moving too fast," Kangwon interrupted for his brother as he closed the door. “How about you show him what you’ve written so far?”

Gangwon smiled gratefully at him from his spot on the edge of the cot.

“Ah yes, my apologies.” Hwang passed the notebook over.

The Southern Kangwon took a minute to read it, squinting at the characters.

Hwang coughed lightly into his fist. “Apologies for my handwriting as well.”

“Korea w-won’t like that it’s similar to Japanese,” Gangwon said fretfully as he finished reading.

“Almost certainly not,” Hwang agreed, taking the notebook back. “Which is why I’ve hunted down a few more organic sign languages that have developed around our country. They might be less broadly understood, but as the ‘language’ is young, this is the prime time for influencing it. And as an influential figure already, your use of it will go a long way towards what eventually gets standardized.”

Gangwon nodded nervously as he read the words, looking over at Kangwon as he started to remove his gloves.

“I still like talking better,” he said guiltily, at what was almost a normal volume. “I feel bad I’m making you comrades learn it just so I can understand you.”

Hwang waved a hand dismissively. “I’ve been interested in trying to learn anyhow. Hae is eager to start as well.”

Kangwon nodded, sitting next to his brother and reaching over for the notebook. “It’ll be useful for any deaf patients. Plus we’d have to learn anyway for Jeju.”

Hwang bobbed his head. “If she truly can’t speak- and from SH’s description, it does seem as if there’s damage to her vocal chords- then her impediment is more severe than yours. It’s simple to have someone accompany you to mass meetings or on-the-spot guidance and take a transcript, or to adapt a hearing aid for you. But it will lower Jeju's authority if she has to have someone speak for her, which she would, even with sign language. And we don't yet have the equipment to repair vocal chords."

"M-Maybe we shouldn't say all that to her," Gangwon delicately suggested when he was done reading.

Hwang said quickly, "Obviously. But I didn't intend to be disparaging. I only meant to agree with Kangwon. Jeju's inability to talk must be frustrating. We'd have to learn sign language regardless so she would feel comfortable at home, at the very least."

Kangwon smiled to himself as he rubbed his hands together, trying to get rid of the pruney feeling the medical gloves always left his fingers with.

Even though Hwang could be a little accidentally callous sometimes, he was glad their maybe-mute cousin would have him. She had to be feeling even more isolated than their other locked up family members, since she couldn't even talk to herself. Plus she'd have memories of the Jeollas' twin connection. It probably hurt to have memories of that kind of understanding, only for you to be unable to even tell someone how your day was.

But Hwang was a quick learner and good teacher, so he'd probably be having conversations in sign language with her in a month or less. And he got how important being understood was.

"Mm." Gangwon looked down at his lap. "I hope we can see her soon."

"As do I," Hwang said quietly.

"We will," Kangwon assured them. "The talks are going again. I'm sure we'll get a ceasefire by winter."

"I hope you're r-right," his brother murmured.

'Me too.'

“I am,” he said out loud, flopping down onto the cot with a groan, making sure he didn’t crumple Hwang’s papers.

“Are you feeling alright?” he asked as he gathered them together to put on Gangwon’s side table. “You look a bit peaked.”

“I’m alright.” Kangwon stared up at the cement ceiling, black particles crowding his vision again. “Just tired.”

His keen cousin saw through him. “That’s what Gangwon said as well. I assume you’ve been giving just as much blood as him?”

Through the swarm, his brother gave him a sheepish look. “He caught me changing my arm wraps.”

Kangwon rubbed his. There were burns under all his bandages, but under the ones wound around the crooks of his elbows, they were joined by track marks. A lot of them.

“Yeah,” he said, closing his eyes since the particles refused to go away. “Need…”

‘A lot of it,’ he tried to say. But he didn’t need to waste the energy. Hwang would get it.

He did, and didn’t bother talking them out of it, even if he didn’t approve. Just like Kangwon wasn’t trying to talk him or the others out of their ration scheme, though he definitely didn't approve.

“I can donate some of my own tomorrow,” their glasses-wearing cousin volunteered. “I’ll send messages to the others as well. While we’re not on the front, we should be donating as much as we can.”

“Mmmmmm,” Kangwon hummed, feeling himself sliding into a nap. He was too tired to tell them to get him up later, so he just tapped Gangwon’s hand.

“Do you w-want to get some real sleep?” his brother asked. “I can go to Hospital One for you.”

Kangwon’s eyes shot open. “No. Just wake me up.”

Gangwon frowned at him, but didn't say anything. Even though he'd been able to go to the civilian hospital without him before, so long as all four of their guards went with him. Kangwon knew the only reason he hadn't asked why he hadn't been allowed to recently was because he knew it was a war matter.

"Certainly much too risky," Hwang agreed, then quieted as Kangwon tipped his head back to blink at him.

He felt bad not telling his brother the reason he wasn't allowed out of the military hospital anymore (not counting trips to just beyond the door, where he had to wrap a scarf around his head twice, and wear muffs over his ear slits). But he got why Korea said not to. Him feeling guilty over them wanting to learn sign language kind of just proved the point. Kangwon knew he probably would've felt the same way.

He let his eyes close again, sinking into a hazy half-sleep as his brother and Hwang discussed sign language, already starting to work on the alphabet.

Once he woke up, he'd go check on the soldier in Room 25, and see how his napalm burns were healing. Then he'd visit the artilleryman whose back had been hit by white phosphorus and make sure the nurses had cleaned it right. He trusted them, but white phosphorus could be so harmful he wouldn't feel reassured until he checked himself. He should probably ask Korea if the wound on his back from last year was alright, too, and see if he was lying when he said 'yes.' Then he'd have to head over to City Hospital One and do his rounds there. The little girl that'd taken shrapnel from one of those huge TNT bombs last week worried him. The holes in her stomach were healing well, but she kept waking up crying from nightmares where hot metal was burning through her from the inside. It could just be PTSD from the injuries, but sometimes the subconscious knew something was wrong with the body before a doctor ever could. And punctured stomachs were prone to infection. After that he'd return to the military hospital to give blood… No, he'd talk to Sip Tal-sun again. He needed to be thinking and speaking clear if he was going to keep him from sinking into depression. He'd talk to him, then give blood. And he should fit dinner into that somewhere. Before his donation, so he'd at least be able to stay conscious until after it was done.

But he needed to write the hygiene measures to distribute to the villages and divisions at some point, too. He and his cousins' empathetic fevers had broken midway through August, which meant the smallpox epidemic had finally been contained enough to stop affecting them. But now winter was coming, along with the ailments that came with it. And he didn't exactly trust that America wouldn't try something like that again. It'd be more difficult to spread an epidemic without access to the north, but there were puppet guerrillas that managed to sneak in that could easily bring contaminated chicken feathers again, or something like them.

It was already snowing in the hills. He'd need to get the informationals done soon. He'd write them while he ate dinner, proofread them when he woke up tomorrow so he'd know he was making sense, then send them to the Ministry of Health before noon.

He'd almost forgotten about his own wounds. He'd need to clean and rebandage them all, and boil the cloth again. He'd let the hospital staff do the second part for him, but it wasn't like he could offload his cleaning. He'd do that…

Actually, he was pretty sure he was starting to forget what time was. And he was starting to think maybe he should move his dinner to sooner.

The door opening jolted him from his almost-sleep, and he opened his eyes blearily to see someone standing in the doorway.

"Korea," he slurred as Gangwon followed Hwang's gaze to their Countryhuman.

"You had better not be sleeping on the job," Korea said as a greeting, shutting the door hard.

"Just a… break," Kangwon said with an effort, struggling up.

"Kangwon's been working all day," Gangwon defended him, not hearing Korea, but understanding what he was like. "He had a surgery this morning, too."

Korea's eye flicked to him.

"Just a gunshot wound," Kangwon clarified. "He'll live."

"He had better." Korea turned his glare on Gangwon and Hwang. "And what are you two doing? Shouldn't you be at the University?"

"I'll return after," Hwang said hastily. "I was merely bringing Gangwon the materials I scrounged up on sign language. It's my fault for pulling him away from his duties."

Korea examined the stack of papers, eye narrowed, than announced, "That's acceptable. We don't have much time to spend learning right now. The sooner we start, the better. Then you can finally be fully useful again."

Kangwon raised a brow disapprovingly, though he knew it was the 'fully' part they were supposed to focus on.

Gangwon had winced, but wasn't hurt enough not to smile. "You won't have an excuse to yell at me anymore if you learn sign language."

"I'll still do it," Korea dismissed, then directed to Hwang, "You received the book I sent you?"

"The one from the Seoul School for-" Hwang cut himself off at his Look. "Ah, yes. I received it."

"Good." Korea levelled a glare at the two brothers, daring them to say something.

They didn't, but Kangwon sent Gangwon a small smirk when his head swung the other way.

"And can we question what you're doing here?" Hwang asked. "Or is that privilege solely reserved for you?"

Korea scrunched his face at him. "I came to make sure Kangwon hadn't forgotten about the hygiene directives."

But the look he sent him said that wasn't all.

"I haven't forgotten." Kangwon stood up, blinking away another swarm of particles. "We can go talk about some of my ideas, if you want."

Korea nodded, but before they could leave, Gangwon said, "W-Wait. Is South c-c-calling for me again?"

Korea shot a glare over his shoulder at Kangwon, who shook his head. He hadn't told his brother, but he wasn't surprised he'd figured it out.

"Yes," Korea clipped, turning back so he could read his lips.

Gangwon's lips thinned. "He's trying to use me to s-sabotage the talks, isn't he?"

"Yes," Korea said reluctantly. "When he isn't trying to Command you over the radio, America has him accusing us of abducting you."

With their vote from months ago in mind, Kangwon pointed out, "South could say no. It's not like America was pointing a gun at him to make him Command us when we were in the POW camp. He chose to."

"Because he knows what America will do if he doesn't obey him!" Korea snapped.

"You wouldn't accept that excuse from one of us," Hwang chimed in, earning his own death glare.

"The point is," their Countryhuman continued stonily. "While we don't know if the enemy is aware you're with us or only bluffing, they are using your absence to try and upset the peace talks. Kim Chong-won is heavily hinting that they can't be carried out when the condition of a southern province is unknown."

Gangwon looked lost, but Hwang had been scribbling a transcript of Korea's words almost as fast as he could say them. He passed the notebook over to him. The green-skinned province's brows furrowed as he read the words on the page.

“We could release a short reel of him,” Hwang suggested, tapping his chin. “He could tell the world he’s here willingly, and describe what sort of conditions America kept him in under the US Military Government.”

“No,” Korea dismissed almost immediately. “If they don’t actually know he’s here, I don’t want to change that. And they would only accuse me of using Commands on him to force him to say what I wanted.”

His jaw feathered. He'd never been able to disguise how disgusted the idea of the Commands made him, even when Kangwon could tell he was trying to mentally justify his brother using them.

“And Gangwon wouldn’t exactly do well on camera.” The province put a hand on his brother’s shoulder, rubbing it comfortingly. “With how nervous he is, it probably would seem like we kidnapped him.”

Hwang bobbed his head. “Ah yes. Very true. Though I wonder if he could be made to act more confident. Not saying what you want, but acting it.” His eyes flicked to Korea.

“No.” His tone made it clear that still wasn’t going to happen.

“I w-wouldn’t mind you Commanding me if it would help,” Gangwon said after reading the notebook again.

“Trust me,” Kangwon cut in before Korea could go off on him. “You don’t want to get Commanded.”

He’d felt like his brother when the war first started. He thought he wouldn’t’ve really cared if Korea ever did Command him. He’d only steered his cousins away from the topic because he knew it made some of them uneasy, and Korea even more uncomfortable.

But after experiencing the feeling of South’s words slithering into his brain and holding his body hostage… The word he’d used to describe the Commands with SH was the best one- violating.

“And I said I don’t want them having confirmation that you’re here,” Korea said, relaxing as the topic turned away from the Commands.

"B-But what if America tries to pull away from the talks again because of me?" Gangwon fretted, chewing on a nail.

"It wouldn't be because of you," Kangwon soothed, pulling his hand away from his mouth. "It would be because he's already looking for a excuse."

"But this would be a compelling one." Hwang pushed his glasses up. "Unlike the petty reasons he's pulled back before, this would have weight with the international community. With the amount of propaganda against us, they would easily believe we would torture Gangwon. And even if they didn't, it does make logical sense that both sides should possess all of their Provincehumans before terms are reached."

Korea bristled. "So you think we should just hand him over?"

Hwang quickly shook his head. "No, of course not. But I could easily see America demanding proof that Gangwon is alive and well before assenting to an armistice. And in his hands."

Gangwon frowned as he watched the words appear on the paper.

"The other countries might try to override him on that," Kangwon said. "It's not like they're particularly invested in our safety. And didn't the Australians take a lot of losses against the PVA in the fight for those hills?"

"Exactly," Hwang replied, hand pretty much blurring as he wrote. "And even right-wing American newspapers are talking about the casualty counts that have made it through press censorship. If they overlook something as genuinely objectionable as us having possession of a southern Provincehuman, it makes them not only look like subpar defenders to colonial or reactionary governments that depend on their support, but also desperate."

Just like they'd look desperate if they overlooked another incident like the boys.

As Gangwon read what Hwang had written, the glasses-wearer looked to Korea.

"I think the only way out of this would be to take Gangwon to the United Nations and have him give a statement directly. We can't prove you didn't give him Commands beforehand, and if you're truly adverse to utilizing them at all, then doing something like Commanding him to tell the truth in front of a council is off the table. But they might be more apt to believe us if they see him in person, even with his nerves."

Kangwon nodded thoughtfully. "One of us could go with him, but give him a few minutes alone with the UN or some neutral country. That way he could prove we aren't holding him against his will."

Hwang stroked his chin. "I don't know if leaving him alone with another country would be wise. I would stick to an open room discussion."

"And what happens when one of the countries or their representatives in that room detains him for America?" Korea snapped.

"A neutral country, Korea," Kangwon pointed out. "Not someone working with him."

"There are no neutral countries," his Countryhuman growled. "If they aren't standing up against this this war, then they are for it. I won't give one of them the chance to deliver him back to America to be locked up again."

"Then what do you suggest we do?" Hwang asked. "They haven't threatened to call off the talks over the matter yet, but it's only a question of time."

"I'll go if you want me to."

The room went silent as Korea stopped in his pacing. Kangwon looked at his brother with wide eyes.

Gangwon clutched the notebook tightly in his bandaged hand, staring up at Korea. His brows were furrowed, but his jaw was set.

"I'll go," he repeated, the words only wavering slightly. "If me being here gets in the way of ending the war, you can send me back to South. And- And America."

The paper crinkled as his grip tightened. But he didn't take the words back.

"Nope," Kangwon said immediately. "No way."

"Kang, I'm not going to get in the way of a ceasefire just because I'm scared." His brother took his wrist, careful not to grip the burns too tight. "We talked about this when we voted to accept one."

That was before they'd seen how far America was willing to go to disrupt the talks.

"You'd do the same thing," his brother said.

"Yeah, and you'd try to stop me."

"And I'd know I shouldn't."

Heart pounding, Kangwon asked, "What if America puts you in solitary again?"

Gangwon's grip tightened slightly, his eyes dipping for a second. Then he looked back up.

"How many of our people does R-Rhee have locked up right now? It's not just our comrades in the camps- they have civilians in there, too. And there's even more in the regular prisons."

It was true. Counting the Chinese, their estimates said there were at least ninety thousand people in the enemy camps, probably more. And more getting locked up for being accused of being leftists or breaking laws to try and survive when the puppet government abandoned them.

"How many of them could be in isolation right now? How many of them are going to be pulled out and executed soon, like- like Bong-nam?" Gangwon looked down at the hand clutching the notebook. "They're waiting for Korea to free them, l-like I was. I can't stop him from doing that just because I'm afraid. That's why…"

He looked past Kangwon to their Countryhuman, still rooted in front of the door.

“I’ll go if you want me to.”

Kangwon turned to Korea in desperation, unsure exactly what he wanted from him. He knew his brother was right. But still…

Korea stared intently at Gangwon for a long moment, then gave a short, sharp shake of his head.

“No. You’re staying here.”

Kangwon let out a relived sigh.

“K-Korea,” Gangwon said gently, sounding more like they’d used to than Kangwon had ever heard. “You know it’s the right thing to do.”

Korea’s eye flashed. “No, it isn’t!”

He stalked across the small room, shoving past Kangwon to grab his brother’s lab coat, yanking him towards him.

“You are mine,” he growled into his startled face. “And I am not turning you over to the enemy so they can make you useless to me permanently, not when you’re finally making progress. America is not going to take another of my provinces.”

Gangwon’s expression had went from flushed to hurt to pleased to concerned in just a few seconds.

“Korea, if I get in the way of ending the war-“

“What do you think America is going to do if he gets his hands on you again?” Korea demanded, giving him a shake and swatting Kangwon away when he tried to stop him. "He is going to force South to Command you into spreading lies about us. He will make you say that we’re executing children or that I’m torturing Kangwon and the others or that I told you I have no intention of making peace and that I’ll break any armistice as soon as it’s made. Anything to give him an excuse to break off the talks again. And if you resist the Commands like South Hamgyong did, he'll just say that you're 'brainwashed' after being with us for so long. And that is if he doesn't just claim that you said all that without proof and people believe it anyway."

Korea's eye narrowed as his grip on Gangwon's coat tightened. "That is what would draw the war out longer."

Gangwon hesitated, looking up over at Kangwon, then Hwang, then back up at their Countryhuman. Then he reached up, wrapping his hands around Korea's wrists, but not trying to pry him off.

"Ok-kay," he said quietly. "If that's what you think's for the best."

Korea twitched back from the contact. "It is. I will not lose another province."

"It would only be for a few months, until you and South worked something out, right?" Kangwon asked.

He didn't want Korea to change his mind, but he knew if it came down to it, he might have to. If America did get proof that Gangwon was here, he really might stop the talks over it.

And Gangwon was right. They couldn't let that happen.

"I will not lose another province for any length of time," Korea clipped, not looking at him as he turned away.

"It's for the best, and not simply from an emotional standpoint," Hwang chimed in. "Anything Gangwon has seen in his time here could be used against us."

"Kang's been keeping me away from any state secrets," Gangwon assured him.

"Even something mundane could be used against us in ways we can't foresee."

Hwang caught Kangwon's eye. His lips drew in slightly, and the other province realized what he meant.

“Kangwon.” Korea jerked his head at the door. “I still need to talk to you.”

“Korea!” Gangwon called as they stepped into the hall, probably louder than he’d meant. “Th-Thank you!”

Their Countryhuman gave a “Tch” that he couldn’t hear, slamming the door.

Kangwon followed him a few feet down the hall. They didn’t have to go very far, considering the ‘half-deaf’ thing.

“It’s about Comrade Mao, isn’t it?” he said casually, in case anyone else in the rooms lining the corridor could hear. “You’re worried Gangwon might’ve figured out who he is, and that South might Command it out of him."

Korea didn’t deny it. “He started calling for him again after America’s trial failed. It’s too coincidental.”

‘Just like everything else.’

Kangwon blew out a puff of air. “Yeah. So either we don’t give Gangwon back, and he gets to break off the talks, or we do, and he gets to go to war with China. That’s just what he wants,” he said, seeing Korea’s look. “Gangwon shouldn’t know about Comrade Mao.”

“Are you sure?” Korea demanded.

Kangwon thought carefully.

China had visited the military hospital a few times- to see Kim Mi-ju before she’d passed, to visit one of their soldiers that’d taken a bullet for a PVA soldier, and seemingly just to talk to Kangwon on his break. But he avoided Gangwon. They’d only been in the same room maybe three times- on the Premier’s birthday, at the banquet for the Chinese soldiers on their National Day, and once when Kangwon and Gangwon had visited the civilian hospital and interrupted him in the middle of performing card tricks for the injured children.

But he'd been masked and gloved every time, just like the Liaos on the few occasions Gangwon had seen them.

"I'm sure," he told Korea with confidence. "He definitely wonders why Comrade Mao and the others are always covered up, but he shouldn't know."

He knew even if his brother did know it was China, he'd follow their usual discretion and not mention it. And he couldn't exactly ask if he knew without making him suspicious. But it was honestly sort of an unbelievable thing to guess. Even after Kangwon had glimpsed his white eyes on the way back from the POW camp (and by now he was pretty sure China had let him see on purpose), he'd been trying to think of any other possibilities for what he'd seen- cataracts, a genetic defect, one of CCCP's oblasts sent to help. Even that was more believable than that a Countryhuman that had never even met them in person would come all the way to Korea himself to fight. And they'd even refused to tell Gangwon about the trial back in August, so he wouldn't have even the possibility that China might be here in his head.

Korea didn't look reassured, but he said, "Good. Comrade Mao Zhilong is coming here to donate blood tonight. Make sure Gangwon is occupied while you take it."

Kangwon blinked. "Is it for our people or his?"

Korea grimaced. "He says it's for 'whoever needs it.'"

"Does he know about its properties?"

Kangwon hadn't been able to find out whether the trick with their blood worked on the Chinese or not. Their nurses had been responsible for using it- he'd only handed it over.

"I don't know and I don't care," Korea said shortly. "Have the bags you take from him delivered to his medics."

It was hard to tell if Korea was being generous or a chauvinist again. It was probably a little bit of both.

"Alright," the province agreed. "But maybe we should tell him, just in case he doesn't know."

Korea hesitated, then shook his head. "No. We don't spread that around unless we have to."

Kangwon sighed, but acquiesced. "I should get back to work now. I'll get those hygiene informationals done… tonight."

He could wait until the middle of the night to take his blood. It was one of the benefits of being able to do it himself.

He could just stick the IV in his left arm and use his dominant hand to write the outline, but he had a pretty good read on his own body, and was fairly certain he wasn't going to be able to stay conscious after for longer than was needed to drag himself to he and his brother's cot and collapse.

"I'll be by tonight to donate blood as well," Korea said. "Inform Comrade Kim Yong-hwan."

Not him, of course.

Trying not to feel hurt, Kangwon told him, "She has a surgery scheduled later."

Another amputation. A soldier at the front hadn't told anyone about the cut he'd got, not wanting to be taken off the line. Now his foot would be taken off at the ankle.

"I'll be available all night. When she's done she knows where to find me."

Despite the exhaustion and worry filling him, Kangwon's lips lifted a little. "Still trying to avoid the bunker?"

"No," Korea muttered.

"Mm."

His Countryhuman hadn't slept there more than twice after China's National Day. And both those times had been because SH refused to let him walk back to the city as bombing raids were being carried out.

“Don’t ‘Mm’ me,” Korea grumbled, turning to leave.

“Tell Comrade Kim to clean your burns while she’s there,” Kangwon reminded him.

“I won’t.”

Shaking his head, his province went to go.

“Kangwon.”

He looked back. Korea had stopped in the center of the white and teal hall, his face serious. He turned to face him, palms suddenly sweaty.

“Yeah?”

“I have no intentions of turning Gangwon over to the enemy.” His voice was suddenly as cold as the coming winter. “But if it must be done to end the war, and there is no other choice, I will. And you will let it happen.”

Kangwon’s fingers dug anxiously into his burned palms. But he still said, “Yes, Korea.”

His brother was right. Ending the war was more important than anything. And he knew the guilt of their people being kept locked up and murdered for even longer just so he could stay free would weigh on him, even if it wasn’t his fault.

It would weigh on North Kangwon, too, after all.

His country gave him a terse nod, his eye flicking over the bandages that wrapped every inch of exposed skin in a once-over. “And starting today I’m raising your and Gangwon’s rations back to an active soldier’s.”

Kangwon resisted the urge to put a hand to his torso, and the ribs that stuck out there. “You don’t have to do that, Korea. We’re fine.”

Even if he was hungry all the time, they didn't have the resources to justify that. And at least they were getting their full rations, unlike their cousins.

"Non-negotiable," Korea said bluntly. "If you want to keep giving blood, you need more calories. I won't have you getting weak and losing more of our people."

Kangwon flinched internally, though he knew he'd kind of asked for it by implying his Countryhuman was doing it out of concern. It was unfair, but he was also fully aware that was how Korea worked.

"Okay," he said.

Korea was already walking away, off to work himself to the brink of exhaustion on even less rations than Kangwon.

"And thank you," he called after him. "Even if you do have to give Gangwon up, thanks for not intending to."

Korea didn't respond, quickly rounding the corner out of sight.

Kangwon knew if it came to keeping his brother or ending the war, he'd choose the second one. And he was honestly glad his brother had suggested turning him over. Not just said he'd be willing to like he had at the vote, but volunteered when the possibility was real. It meant he was healing from what America had done to him, and made his heart glow with warm pride.

He would give Gangwon up if they needed to.

But he really didn't want to.

Ridgway's punishment to the American pilots that strafed Kaesong before was a reprimand. And when asked, he said he couldn't confirm if the reprimanded pilot was still being allowed to fly over Korea. Which means he was. There is no record of him mentioning what happened to the pilots that gunned down the two children. I think we can also assume what that means.

Comrades I sliced the tip of my finger off making chebureki. It gushed blood for thirty minutes and I was in the middle of frying them so I couldn't stop cooking. I had to wrap a tissue around it and keep going. My chebureki became biohazards. Never cut towards yourself with a knife. Also cooking tip learned from aunt- caramelize the onions before adding them to the meat mix. Very tasty flavour. Cooking tip from me- avoid adding copious amounts of your blood. It doesn't taste any different, but you can't share them with people. Well, you could. But I consider that ethically dubious and so did not.

Ice Cold

South slumped over the broadcasting booth panel, not looking as he flipped the switch off. The mess of dials and buttons had made his head spin the first time he'd seen it, but he'd spent so much time cramped up in the booth lately that he'd figured some of them out, not needing the radio crew to do it for him anymore.

Idly, he moved the volume slider up and down with a finger, too worn out to get up.

He'd been calling for Gangwon almost every single day for the last three months, though America let him take a day off when his burns hurt too much. Sometimes South said they were just to give his voice a break. He felt kind of bad lying to his friend about that, but he didn't want to ask if a sore throat was a good enough reason to stop looking for the province. If it wasn't, then America would be too suspicious for him to use the excuse after. And it was admittedly kind of lame.

'North wouldn't let a sore throat stop him.'

"Sir?" one of the broadcasters behind him said politely. "Please stop fiddling with the broadcasting equipment."

South quickly stopped spinning the dial he'd been spinning, straightening up, cheeks warm.

"Right. Sorry."

The man handed him a glass of water. It looked cool and refreshing, with the ice America provided clinking together as South took it. He'd never really had ice water before meeting him. Real ice water, not shards of ice smashed from a bucket that he had to suck on to dissolve, numbing his mouth in an already frigid winter. The Provisional Government had been really generous to him in Chongqing, but it wasn't like they were wealthy enough to import a refrigerator, let alone an ice maker. South had discovered that he liked ice water (when he wasn't already freezing). He felt like it soothed his throat more than warm.

Still, as the refreshingly cold liquid washed down his throat, rejuvenating his tongue and spreading pleasantly chill fingers in his stomach, his mouth remained dry. It wanted something else.

His hands shook, aching to feel the cool glass of a bottle in their fingers. But in his head he could see a wooden ladle and splintered bucket, and taste the warm, slightly foul flavour of water that had been sitting out for a week, barely more than a mouthful.

South shook his head, curling his fingers in so they'd stop quivering.

'What kind of idiot wants bucket water?'

He'd been glad when he stopped having to drink like that once he'd received his punishment from Japan. A flask was way better. It was one of the many benefits he'd been given for behaving that still hadn't made up for losing his brother.

Maybe he just wanted to hear those words again.

'I saved you the last sip.'

South gritted his teeth. 'Soon.'

'Are you sure about that? After what that American judge said...'

'America won't let it get in the way of the talks.'

'Right.'

How did a voice in his head manage to sound so skeptical? It made South want to keep arguing. It wasn't like they even needed the talks anyways, but he wanted to convince it he was right about America. But that would be a little...

"Sir?" the broadcaster said politely again. "We need to return to our regular broadcasts."

South jolted. "Sorry, I was just..."

He was not saying 'Arguing with the voice in my head.'

Handing over the glass, he sheepishly slid out of the booth.

God, maybe having to wear his voice out every day was worth it for the little bits of social interaction he got from the broadcasters. With all the time he spent locked up in the manor, he was starting to forget how to interact with people.

'Not that you ever knew how.'

'Shut it.'

His guards had been tolerable lately, enough that he almost didn't mind Smith's emerald eyes, as icy as the water he'd drank, piercing into him like he expected him to take off running on their return to the manor.

Him and Wesson were still a little overbearing, and... Yeah, intimidating. But he figured it was good for bodyguards to be intimidating. And Ku Cheol-moo and Seok Ki-cheol were sort of rough. But they mostly just played cards on the stoop and glowered at anyone that looked at South for too long in public. Which... did sort of suck. He wanted people to look at him. He was the Korean Countryhuman, so they should look at him. They should look at him the same way they looked at America.

But he knew all four of the men were just under orders to keep him safe, and any one of those people they glared at could be a Communist disguised as a peasant or a merchant, just waiting to strike.

He'd pretty much gotten over that they answered to America. It was better than them answering to Rhee. And it wasn't like he was smart enough to have them answer to him. He'd screwed up every time- forgetting to Command the provinces right when sending them after South Hamgyong, giving Kangwon so many chances to mislead him in the camp, letting his doubts about America fester for so long. Sneaking away to visit North.

'If you go back, he's going to use it as an excuse to stretch this war out until he owns all of us.'

That had been the worst mistake. He knew how persuasive his brother was, how his words wormed inside your skull. And if it hadn't been for America, he would have gone crawling back to him, then been brainwashed like him and the provinces.

'Everywhere your army has pulled back from we've found mass graves, hundreds or thousands executed.'

South shook his head as they turned down the street.

North's army were the butchers. Them and the Chinese. The American general had said so.

Even if South questioned the timing.

'South when have I ever lied to you?'

'When it counted.'

Pain struck his heart as he stopped outside the gate to his manor.

But America had never lied to him.

"Is America home?" he asked Wesson, the less intimidating American guard.

"How am I supposed to know where Mr. America is?" he replied coolly. "I was watching you all day. Sir."

"Right." South chuckled awkwardly. "Well, I'm... going to go see if he is."

He inched away, waiting for one of the men to stop him. They didn't, so he walked next door to America's, confirming with the gate guard that his friend wasn't there.

"Can I sit outside and wait for him?"

"Fine." The man opened the iron gate for him. "But no going inside."

South nodded. He didn't have the same confidence as America to just barge into an empty house and put his feet (with shoes on) up on someone else's couch anyway.

He stood by the front door, wrapping his arms around himself as the cold cut through the coat he was wearing. It was the long, thick trench coat patterned with cream and grey plaid that his friend had got him last year, made by Ralph Lauren, whoever that was. But South had a suspicion it was more for American winters than Korean ones. Or maybe just more for fashion than not freezing to death. It was mid-November and his teeth were chattering like yutnori sticks in an old man's hand.

He should probably just go home to his nice warm ondol and wait for America at the window. But he knew the moment he got the fire going, he'd give in to his craving for the applejack on his nightstand, and just want to lie on the heated floor until the pain stopped pulsing through him.

That stupid gash hadn't gone away. It hadn't gotten worse (he'd know, he checked it obsessively for cracks every chance he got), but it also hadn't gotten better. It was there, gross and unnatural, unchanging, even as the other burns ebbed as land in the south slowly healed, and new ones appeared as America's army captured more hills. Or whatever they were doing at the front now.

The gate creaking open made him look up hopefully. But it was only Grace, escorted by her security team of five. It made South a little jealous. Why did America give her one more than him? Was he more concerned about her safety than his?

But she was a woman, and not like one of the commie broads-

'Korea, run!'

-but all soft and smooth, like women were supposed to be. South could maybe defend himself if he got attacked, but she definitely couldn't.

Her white boots crunched on the frost that covered the dirt walkway, the hem of her long cream coat- with a more defined silhouette than his- brushing the fur that lined their tops. Her wavy blonde locks peeked out from the star-spangled hair scarf that bound them, and her eyes were covered with a pair of black sunglasses, more delicate than America's, clearly meant for a girl.

'What is it with Americans and sunglasses?' But they looked good. South wondered if he should get a pair. But that would kind of be copying America, wouldn't it?

Belatedly, South realized he should probably offer to help Grace with the... paper bags? she was struggling to hold in her arms. But she'd already almost reached the door.

'Oops.' In his defense, she had five bodyguards and none of them could offer to carry what looked to be her groceries? Then again, he guessed they had to be ready to use the guns at their hips.

"Hey," he said when she'd almost reached him.

He'd thought she'd seen him, but she must have been looking down or something because she startled, fumbling her bags. One fell out of her arms and South lunged for it, trying to catch it before it hit the ground. Grace flinched, stumbling back as she raised her remaining groceriesto cover her face.

South didn't notice, too busy not catching the bag in time. Potatoes went rolling across the yard.

"Sorry," he said hastily, scrambling to grab them, cheeks flushed not just from the cold now.

He tried to make up for his failure by gathering the potatoes as quickly as possible, shoving them back into the bag. The bottom bulged worryingly.

"Here you go." He popped up, offering it back to Grace.

She stared at it like she'd never seen it before.

South realized his mistakes and withdrew the bag, saying in English this time, "Or, no. I can hold this while you get the door."

Grace stared at him again. Her eyes were just visible past his reflection in her glasses, blown wide open.

"I can... take the others for you, too?"

She made no move to respond to his offer. But she was shaking in the cold, so he reached out to take them anyway, stopping when she flinched back.

Jeez, he was just trying to help. She was acting like he had back when the Provisional Government had first rescued him, jumping at every sound and motion.

Okay, maybe he was still a little like that. But he was definitely better than he'd used to be.

"Sorry," he said, not really sure what he was apologizing for. It was fine, though. This wasn't like apologizing to the provinces or anything. Grace hadn't done anything to not deserve an apology, except for sort of ignoring him.

"I-It's okay," she said, unfreezing. "You can hold them. Sorry, it's just c-cold. Sorry."

South took all three bags, struggling to get his arms around them.

"You know, if you got a basket, you could carry all this stuff on your head," he advised as she rummaged in her pocket for the key to the house. "I see the peasant women do it all the time. Then you wouldn't have to hold so much weight, and you wouldn't have to worry about the bottoms falling out."

Seriously, several pounds of potatoes in a paper bag was just asking to lose them. And if she dropped them in the market, they'd be snatched up by homeless people before she could even bend to get them back.

"You're right," she said, pulling a key from her pocket. "Sorry, I wasn't even thinking. Am-merica just has the distribution guys giving me paper bags, so I use them."

She fumbled with the lock while South stood there, arms aching as he struggled to hold the bags. He definitely had to get to work on his calisthenics again. Starting... tomorrow.

"Is this all from your rations distributor?" South asked, trying to make small talk.

"No," Grace said quietly, not looking at him. "I got most of it at market."

His eyes widened. "This must have cost a fortune."

A bag of potatoes, a bag of what looked like radishes, turnips, and a few other root vegetables, and a bag of rice, pasta, and canned meat. The last two had probably come from America's supply guy, but the rest alone must be worth thousands of won. Prices had only gotten higher now that it was pretty much winter.

"I don't know." Grace jiggled the key in the lock unsuccessfully. "I don't know how your money like, works. America just gave me enough."

There was a jangle as the key slid from her hand, hitting the ground.

"Sorry," she hastily apologized, bending to get it.

"I've got it." South leaned down (mistake), and she jerked back while he struggled not to lose the potatoes again.

"S-Sorry," she stammered, cringing into the door. "I d-didn't mean- I'm sorry."

South kind of got why America got annoyed when he apologized so much now.

"It's okay," he said, giving up on getting the key and turning to their guards instead. "Can one of you actually be useful and get the door for her?"

He winced. That sounded a little harsh. But they'd just been standing around watching while they struggled, and the way Grace had been doing everything possible to avoid looking at him since she'd broken out of her staring was putting him on edge.

His guards didn't move, but one of Grace's stepped forward with a resigned expression, stooping to grab the key, smoothly inserting it into the lock and opening the door in under five seconds. There was something superior in his expression as he dropped the key back into the woman's hand.

'You don't have to be so rude about it.' South was going to suggest that America started hiring nicer people.

"Th-Thank you," Grace stuttered, shakily shoving the key back into her pocket. "Sorry."

"It's alright," South assured her.

Behind the sunglasses, he could see her eyes stray to their guards, then back to him.

"Do you... want to come inside?"

South blinked, surprised by the offer. The American woman had always been distant, never talking to him or even really looking at him, even before today. She only had eyes for America.

But it wasn't like he had anything against her. Maybe she'd be more interested in talking to him when the other Countryhuman wasn't around to suck up the attention, like America's old not-girlfriend had been. Maybe she'd actually take off those sunglasses and look at him. And it was cold out.

He opened his mouth, but America's door guard cut him off. "No one but Miss Hartman can enter while Mr. America is away. You'll have to wait outside, sir."

South looked to Grace, wondering if maybe she'd fight him on that.

But she only smiled. "Oh, sorry. I didn't know that meant his friends, too. Sorry."

She took the bags from South, disappearing inside before he could say anything. He winced as he heard the audible crash of her dropping another bag.

It was a little annoying he couldn't wait inside with her, but he couldn't bring himself to care.

Grace had called him America's friend! And obviously he was. The other country wouldn't be here if he wasn't South's friend. He said it all the time.

But it felt good to hear it from someone else. To have someone- someone that knew America really well- prove that he wasn't his lesser prize or nothing or just his 'investment.'

'Take that, North.'

Pleased, he turned to wait for his friend again, and found someone looking at him.

Across the street, in front of the manor Jeju was being kept in, was a man. He was maybe middle-aged, with a shaved head. And he was tall. His shoulders stretched his good tweed suit like America's did.

South felt a thrill of pleasure from the way his eyes widened as they met his. That was how people should look at him.

He nodded, keeping cool, and the man quickly dipped his head, then strolled off down the street with a notebook in hand.

He didn't feel the cold as much for the next few minutes, but it rushed back in when he heard the crackle of the radio, and an American voice from the guard house.

"-brutally murdered six thousand two hundred and seventy American prisoners of war, seven thousand South Koreans, and one hundred and thirty Allied forces for a total of thirteen thousand four hundred."

"Turn it up," Smith called, and the man in the guardhouse complied.

"Such stunning acts of violence could only be enacted by the Communist regimes which control North Korea and Red China, backed by their masters in Moscow," the American broadcaster decried in a strident voice. "President Truman himself has declared that such actions are the most uncivilized thing to happen in this century. General Ridgway has confirmed Judge Advocate Hanley's latest estimate, and reconfirmed his support in seeing South Korea free of the brutal tyrants behind these atrocities."

"Good," one of Grace's security team grunted. "They should all hang."

"Shh," Smith hushed sharply.

South didn't get why he wanted to listen to this again. It'd been being broadcast over the radio for the past two days, every few hours. He didn't even have a radio in his house, but he could hear the American mobile broadcasters blaring it down by the harbour when he went back and forth from the station.

He wished he could just make a recording to call for Gangwon.

But they'd experimented with Gyeonggi, and Commands didn't work over recordings. It had to be a live broadcast.

"In the reveal of these brutal actions lies the answer to why the Reds have been dragging their heels on the peace talks," the broadcaster continued, barely taking a breath. "They fear the justice coming to them once their crimes come fully to light. But it also raises questions- can we truly make peace with the sort of enemy that guns down unarmed sons of America? Can we truly trust the talk of peace from those to whom the Geneva Convention is nothing but a piece of paper? Could you look North Korea in the eye and shake his hand, knowing that GIs you ate beside, marched beside, fought beside might be lying dead in a field with their bellies full of rice and wine because of that hand?"

"I'd sooner shoot both his eyes out," another guard joked as the broadcast wound down, and switched over to a man announcing some singer.

South shifted uncomfortably as the woman's husky voice filled the cold air, before she was turned down.

"Wouldn't want to make him watch you blow Red China's brains out first?" another asked, leaning against America's manor as he lit a cigarette.

Even after the trial, a lot of America's soldiers seemed convinced that the Red Chinese Countryhuman was in Korea. Smith and Wesson almost never talked when they knew South was listening, but he'd overheard them discussing it before.

The man exhaled a smoke ring alongside a cloud of steam. "Hanley said it's his boys that've done most of the killing."

"Ridgway said it was the Norks," a third said.

"Fuck 'em all, I say," another growled, eyes flashing. "What I wouldn't give to make sure that Nork get what's coming to him. Hanging's too quick for him. He needs to scream first."

The hot, uncomfortable feeling in South's stomach made him speak. "That's my brother you're talking about."

The man shrugged. "So? If my brother was a murdering commie, I'd kill him, too."

"North wouldn't have done any of that stuff himself," South defended.

At least not the story about a thousand people being taken from Pyongyang to the Amnok and fed rice and wine before they were executed. North would never waste food like that.

"Doesn't matter," the first man grunted. "This whole mess is because of him. Every dead soldier is on his hands."

"So we got to cut 'em off and stick 'em where the sun don't shine," the most aggressive man finished.

South opened his mouth, then closed it, wrapping his arms around himself as they kept talking about all the stuff they wanted to do to his brother.

He knew it was North's fault. And honestly the executed prisoners probably were, too, whether the Chinese were responsible for most of them or not.

'Do you think I would allow that?' North had asked at the Raktong.

South had been going to say he didn't know. But he did now. He remembered him rolling that Japanese corpse into the corner, his expression cold and dispassionate. He'd heard that broadcast on his Foundation Day.

North would. He could easily see him ordering the deaths of American soldiers, or Rhee's. He could see him doing it with his own hands. He'd killed thousands of them already. His brother wouldn't care about things like war crimes or the Geneva Convention. He hated them, just like he'd hated the Japanese. So they had to die.

It was stupid to come here. He'd already gotten his answer.

"One good thing'll come of this," the last of Grace's guards said. "The boys at the front should stop wavering. They were getting antsy over the ceasefire not being signed yet."

"I don't think we need your cutting political analysis," Smith cut in coldly.

"Right," the man said swiftly. "My bad."

South was about to leave when the gate swung open, and America sauntered in.

"Southie!" he called when he saw him, beaming. "There's my kid. What's up?"

"It's nothing," South said.

His friend clicked his tongue. "I know that look. Something's on that little mind of yours. Come on in, we'll have a chat. My girl make it home safe?"

The guard his question was directed at saluted, his voice smooth and professional again. "Yes sir. No problems, sir."

"Good. That's why I pay you so much." America clapped him on the shoulder, then steered South into the house.

"Welcome home, daddy-o," Grace called as she stepped out of the kitchen. She was smiling wide and her voice was bouncy in a way it hadn't been when talking to South. "I'm so sorry, but getting the potatoes took a lot longer than I thought so they aren't mashed yet and I just put the roast in the oven but-"

She cut her stream of words off when she saw South there, darting back into the kitchen.

'Okay. Ouch.'

"It's no problem, babe," America said as they walked by the doorway. "I'm gonna have a drink with Southie first anyhow."

"Is she okay?" South asked quietly as they entered the parlour.

"Why wouldn't she be?" His friend went to the cabinet, pulling out a bottle of Jack Daniels and two glasses.

"It looked like she had a bruise on her face."

The woman hadn't been wearing her sunglasses as she poked her head out, and South thought he had seen a dark patch around her eye.

America snorted. "Oh, that. Yeah, Gracie's been experimenting with her looks lately. Lots of black eye shadow and white face powder. I think it makes her look a little like a vamp, but hey, at least she's wearing it. Here ya go, kid."

South caught the drink he slid to him, and America flopped down next to him on the couch, draping his legs over his.

"So," he started. "Whatcha want to talk about?"

South almost took a drink to avoid answering him before remembering that America knew that trick. "It... really is nothing."

"Is it about the POW massacres?"

It was kind of scary how good he was at guessing what he was thinking.

"Yeah," South admitted, then said quickly, "I'm not about to accuse you of lying about them or anything. I know what North's people are capable of."

He didn't think North was lying about Taejon. Not on purpose. Even if he would kill a bunch of unarmed prisoners or order it done, he didn't think he'd done that then. He didn't want to think that his brother could plead like that, to tell him so desperately he hadn't been responsible for it, and be lying.

But North's soldiers could lie to him.

"That's a relief, kid." America feigned wiping sweat from his brow. "I'd be worried all your drinking was giving you short-term memory loss if you'd forgot that little chat we had."

South flushed, embarrassed at the reminder. "I really don't... drink that much."

"At least not enough to degrade your brain cells. Yet," his friend said cheerfully. "But if you're not about to accuse me of being the snake in the garden again, then what is it?"

"I was just..." South took a deep breath. "Do you think any of your people could be lying to you?"

America tipped his head at him, making him take another drink to soothe his nerves. Then he laughed, slapping his thigh and jostling South.

"That's a good one, kid," he said when he'd calmed himself, wiping a fake tear away. "Trust me- none of my guys could lie to me and get away with it. I've got eyes like an eagle and a nose for sniffing out truth like a hound dog sniffs out runaway slaves." He paused. "Metaphorically speaking."

South saw Rhee looking him in the eyes and promising to get people off of the Hangang before blowing it. He wished he had senses like those.

"But c'mon, tell ole America why you think my boys are lying to me." The other country patted his thigh invitingly, still with his legs draped over South's.

He didn't seem disappointed South was asking, so he cautiously ventured, "The numbers keep changing."

After his talk with America-

'You would know my guys were in on the offensive if you paid any damn attention to your army.'

-he'd been trying to be a little more aware of what was going on with the war. He still wasn't allowed to listen to the radio so the Communists couldn't influence him, but papers like the Chosun Ilbo and the English The Korea Times were fine.

He'd wavered on that resolution after opening the paper to see the headline 'REDS KILLED 5500 GI CAPTIVES,' and dropped it altogether after reading all the articles in the days that followed. The news was depressing. If it didn't affect him, there wasn't really any point in knowing about it. Even if it did, it wasn't like he could change it.

But before he'd resolved to never pick up any magazine that wasn't a Sears catalogue or something like it again, he'd watched the number rise to the six thousand two hundred seventy figure for the Americans, and watched the Allied number fall by more than a hundred. And the number of Rhee's soldiers had came out of nowhere. Plus Ridgway and America's Judge Advocate (South wasn't quite sure what that was, but from context clues he thought he had something to do with charging North...'s army and the Chinese for their crimes) had different stories about who'd been responsible for most of the executions.

He eyed America carefully, but his friend was still unmoved by the questioning.

"So there is a brain knocking around up in there." He sat forward to knuckle South's head. "I'm kidding, kid, I'm kidding. I know you're cooking with gas at all times. But here's the thing-" He flopped back down. "Casualty tolls, they're tricky, y'know? Hell, I'm not even sure where they get their numbers from." Seeing South's look, he added, "I know enough to know when they're in the ballpark, though. Anyway, they're constantly being re-evaluated and crap. You get new information, you change the number."

South wondered what new information Hanley could've got in a day to raise the number by almost a thousand.

"Shouldn't they wait until they have the full story to release anything then?"

America shrugged. "I can't really blame 'em. You find out your Doughboys've been gunned down in a rice field and you're gonna wanna spit brimstone, not break out the abacus. My guys were off, not liars."

South rubbed his arm, finishing his drink. "Did you know Hanley was going to make that announcement?"

"A'course."

"And you... couldn't have asked him to wait?"

They'd been close to a ceasefire again. The Reds had officially stopped asking for the line to be drawn at the 38th Parallel, and even accepted it as the current battlefront with no changes. Before all this, the only sticking point had been Kaesong.

South peeked over at America and realized he'd said the wrong thing again.

His friend was looking at him, unsmiling. "You think we should have waited to tell the world about how thousands of my men were taken prisoner and marched unarmed out to be shot dead?"

If South wanted a ceasefire, he would. It was awful that had happened to them, but it wasn't like it could be changed. And if it got in the way of the armistice, that just meant there would be more time for Nor- the Communists to execute more people.

He knew he shouldn't say that, though.

"These are good American men, South. Men whose only crime was trying to help you." America sat up abruptly. "And you think we should keep quiet just to make peace with the bastards that murdered them? Whose side are you on?"

He stopped as South stammered, watching him through his impenetrable lenses as his voice lowered.

"Or do you still think I'm looking for an excuse to go to war with Red China?"

"No," South finally got out. "No, I promise. I know you don't want war with him. And- And I think it's a good thing, actually. Not that your soldiers got killed. But that Hanley told people."

America tilted his head the other way, aviators still locked on him. "Yeah?" he said softly.

"Yeah." Trying to swallow without making it obvious, South said, "Even if it gets in the way of a ceasefire, that's good, right? Because a ceasefire isn't what's best for me."

It made him feel gross to agree with all the opinion pieces he'd read in the newspapers, mostly because he knew Rhee agreed, too.

But his reasons were different. He wasn't agreeing with Rhee- he was agreeing with his friend.

"This stuff just proves North's Communists are crazy," he said, rubbing his arm. "So I'm not really comfortable with the idea of talking out Reunification with them."

He knew he'd have to be involved. North would get pissy if he wasn't. And when he thought about being in a room full of commies just waiting for his guard to slip...

No matter what he'd done to the Americans, he knew his brother wouldn't hurt him. But if his soldiers could lie to him about Taejon, they could lie to him about what happened to South.

And there was that recording. Sometimes South could feel that wire spool wrapped around his neck like the noose they wanted to hang his brother with.

North had no right to judge him, not after this. So what if South had ordered prisoners to be executed? So had he.

But he knew his brother wouldn't see it that way. He'd say there was a difference between killing America's soldiers and his civilians. But there wasn't. Because so long as they were fighting, so long as they were Communists, they weren't civilians. They were ducks.

He knew his brother wouldn't hurt him, even if he found out about that, or about Jeju or Seoul. He couldn't.

But South didn't want to risk it.

"Winter's almost here," he said to America. "We just have to wait a few more months, and then he'll have no choice but to give up, right? Then we can Reunify without the Reds interfering."

And before North could learn that his hands weren't the only ones that were bloody.

America examined him for long enough to make him sweat. Then a smile spread slowly across his face.

"Right. You hit the nail on the head, kid."

South relaxed, relieved.

He didn't need to feel bad about the people that might die up in the north during the cold months. America was right- there were probably only commies left up there. And they deserved it. It wasn't his fault- it was North's, for refusing to give up, for starting this war in the first place. South's hands were bloody, but his brother's were drenched.

"I was just worried." He rubbed his arm again, looking away. "I know you don't want war with China, but... maybe Hanley does. I was worried maybe he was making up numbers to trick you, or that maybe you didn't know he was going to tell everyone that."

"Nope," America said, back to his usual upbeat self. "Hanley told folks because he thought they ought to know what they're really up against. No tricks. Well, aside from the commies trying to say we're lying. And those tricky estimates. Y'know, I'm glad you brought this up now, kid, 'cuz once we get the rest of this country back, you're going to watch those numbers pogo. And I bet they'll land a lot higher than six thousand."

His lips flattened, along with his tone. "And I'll make sure they pay for every one of them."

A chill ran down South's spine as he thought about the graphic threats those guards had been saying as they talked about his brother.

"About that..." He swallowed. "I don't care what happens to the Red Chinese or the Northerners, but do you think you could... stop anyone from hurting North?"

He knew the things those men wanted to happen to him wouldn't. Countryhumans couldn't get sentenced to death or anything. In the past, yeah, but not now. But he could still be locked up or even beaten.

South knew his brother wouldn't go out peacefully. Even when all his 'comrades' turned on him after things got too tough this winter, he'd keep fighting. He'd have to be taken out in combat. Combat that South obviously couldn't be near. It would just be his brother and a bunch of angry American soldiers.

"I know he's killed a lot of your men," he said, resisting the inane urge to apologize for his actions. "But... he's my brother."

'Good one, South. That'll convince the jury.'

America considered his request, tapping a finger on his chin. "Sure. I think I can stop the vengeful masses from getting their blood price."

South let out a sigh of relief too soon. His friend's face slackened as he turned to him again.

"But he does need to be punished."

His heart sank. "You mean-?"

"He's a criminal, South," America said flatly. "It doesn't matter if he didn't pull the trigger himself. He authorized it."

'Blow the bridge, shoot the ducks, burn the city.'

*'Shutupshutupshutup.'

His friend leaned forward, his aviators gleaming darkly. "And North Korea needs to be punished."

South looked down. "Japan punished me."

"That's different, kid." A hand gripped his chin, making him look up. "You were punished for something North did. This time, he'll be being punished for his actions. Think of it as making up for getting you whipped."

The Korean flinched, and he nodded sympathetically. "I know that crap messed you up. Isn't it a little unfair that happened to you while he got off scot-free?"

It was. He'd killed that man. He'd blown his brains out on the cement floor and became a killer like his brother so they wouldn't get punished. Even after North still had to be, South should've escaped his. But he'd been hurt again because his brother left him. He'd been punished for North's actions.

'Just like always.'

"Okay," he said quietly. "Just... please don't hurt him too bad."

America raised his eyebrows. "You make it sound like I'm going to torture him or something. I just mean we're going to have a little fight, work things out man-to-man, y'know?"

Releasing South's chin, he swooped his drink up from the table. "I'm not a monster, Southie. I wouldn't do anything that'll keep you up at night after you merge."

Ice water ran down South's spine. He... hadn't thought about that. Good thing it was just a fight.

"I'll just make sure he knows for sure that what he did is wrong," his friend continued chipperly. "And once he realizes, it'll make things go smoother once I squish you together."

Right. North had to realize his beliefs were wrong, otherwise they'd be messed up once they were Korea. This was necessary, really. And since South couldn't stop it, there was no reason to keep thinking about it. It would happen, they'd Reunify, and Korea could pretend these two years had never happened.

"Thank you," he said, then took another drink to remove the rasp from his throat. He hadn't even seen America refill it.

"Anything for you, Southie," his friend said. "See? Isn't it easy to clear the air when we're open and honest and not playing tag around a couch?"

Coughing in embarrassment, South agreed that it was.

America nodded, satisfied. "Tell you what- why don't I bring over some roast and taters once Grace is finished with them? We can watch another talkie."

"I'd like that."

"Good. Make sure you keep your clothes on when you get home, then." America laughed, then placed a hand on his shoulder. "And kid? Thanks for trying to look out for me, I mean it. I'm not dumb enough for my guys to get one over on me even if they wanted to, but if I was, then maybe you would've just saved my bacon."

'Bacon...' That, along with the rich smell of cooking meet starting to seep down the hall, flooded South's mouth with saliva.

"No problem," he said, a little wetly. "I mean, you look out for me all the time, and I can't really do anything for you..."

America waved a hand. "Don't worry about it, kid. You'll do plenty for me in the future."

As South finished his drink, he tried to focus on nothing but the smooth liquid sliding down his throat and the clink of ice against his teeth.

It was good that everyone knew that the Communists were bloodthirsty, just like he knew North was. A ceasefire with them would be unfair to all the people they'd killed, and dangerous for South. A few months. Just a few months and then-

His brother would be fine. He'd be pissed that he lost the war, but fine. America wouldn't do anything awful to him. He had a violent streak, but he wasn't Japan. And even if he did, his brother could take it. He was strong. He always had been.

'Whose side are you on?' America had asked.

South wasn't really on any side. He didn't like Rhee or the commies and he did like his brother and America. Choosing between Rhee's people and Kim Il-sung's people meant he had to be against one of them, and he didn't want to be. Like he'd told Kangwon, he wasn't against anyone. He was just doing what he had to.

If he had to pick a side, it was his brother's, the brother he knew before he'd changed. Not the one that gave bloodthirsty speeches and led armies and killed people, and who South was a little... Not the one that had 'more important things,' but the one who had stroked South's forehead when he was sick or sad, the one that took his punishments for him and gave him the last sip of water, the one that had always tried to protect him from Japan, even when it was his fault they were getting hurt in the first place, the one that Reunifying with would've been as easy as sliding into a well-loved futon. The brother that never would have left him, would have rather died instead.

The brother South could still get back, if only America won.

It was what was best for their country, even if North couldn't see that now. Japan had never been able to teach him his lesson, but maybe America could. He'd taught Jeju after all. And then his brother would see that this was for the best, that he'd done it all for him, for them.

South drained the last of his glass, the alcohol going down like guilt.

Water might be better for quenching your thirst. But when it came to doubts, nothing washed them away like ice cold liquor.

I'll author's note elaborate on the executed prisoners situation in the next chapter. For now...

Truman's 'most uncivilized thing to happen this century, if true' comment is insane to me. This is 1951. I think something more uncivilized might have happened this century. Just recently in fact. Can't quite put my finger on it, though. Ohhhh right. The Holocaust! The Rape of Nanjing! The Kanto Carnage! The Congo genocide! Hiroshima and Nagasaki! Depending on your definition of century, the Wounded Knee Massacre and California genocide! The current war you are fighting that has burnt down almost every single building in Korea, displaced millions, and resulted in hundreds of thousands of deaths, most of which your army is responsible for! I almost forgot! Even if Ridgway's largest prediction was right (spoiler, it was not), I wonder why the murder of 8000 Americans (not even as one massacre, but altogether) would be seen as the most uncivilized thing to happen this century, when the murder of tens to hundreds of thousands (millions altogether) of other people is just fine and part of war. Can you guess why? That's white, I mean right- because they're not white Americans! So they're worthless! But it's also crazy because even when it comes to Americans, far more died as Japanese POWs. There was literally a policy from Command to execute prisoners instead of lose them. There were Americans tortured by Unit 731, some allegedly dissected while alive. And Truman knew that since they had granted amnesty to the scientists that did it. Oh, but the execution of only 365 proven American POWs after their army mates committed multiple massacres of innocent civilians and burned their country to the ground, who shouldn't even be in Korea is the most uncivilized thing to happen this century.

I erased a sentence here that was stained by the darkness in my heart. I could just say nothing and you would never know, but Communists should be open with their faults. I will simply say again that American soldiers are worse than Nazis.

Ache No More (And No Less)

North narrowly dodged the fist thrown at his face, ducking and lunging, trying to get his arms around his opponent's waist to take them down.

She spun away on light feet before lifting one in a high kick, aiming for his ribs. North whirled, catching her leg in his hands. But before he could wrench it aside she tore it from his grasp, using the second of an opening to strike again with her hands, catching him in the center of the chest with two pointed strikes.

North grunted as he took the hits, refusing to stagger even as he felt the scabs over the old scar burst. He snatched at her arms, catching one in a viselike grip and yanking her close before working her, struggling and snarling, into a firm hold, her back to his chest and his arms pinning hers to her sides.

"Surrender?" he growled.

"Dream on!" South Pyongan spat back, lashing out with her foot and taking him in the ankle.

North grit his teeth at the sharp pain, but only tightened his grip, feeling her ribs creak under the pressure.

"Good evening, comrades," Hwang said as he emerged from the trees around the bunker.

He blinked as South Pyongan suddenly flew across the clearing, smashing into the ground next to him.

"I take it Ridgway is still holding to his story?" he said mildly, looking to North, who was grimacing at the ankle his province had just kicked again.

"What do you think?" he asked scathingly, then threw himself after South Pyongan, who had only just started to get up from the ground, dazed.

"I think that's an 'indeed.'" Hwang edged around them as they grappled to join the small group of people watching the show from the back of the GAZ.

"You would be right," China said from his place cross-legged on the roof. "And now your Countryhuman has decided your lovely blue comrade has to die for the enemy's crimes."

"I didn't start this," North shot at him, interrupted by South Pyongan managing to twist his arm until he was forced to retreat from their grapple.

He hadn't. His province had launched an attack on him almost the second they got out of the GAZ. He just hadn't done anything to stop her.

"And you're not gonna finish it either," she crowed, leaping at him.

North blocked each of her hits with his forearms. She was attacking too fast for him to get his own off, but he was too familiar with her movements to let it phase him. Eventually she would get overconfident and leave herself exposed. He focused on absorbing the blows and not being driven back into the trees.

"Has the enemy produced any proof for their six thousand claim?" Hwang asked, accepting the bowl of hot millet porridge passed his way.

"No," North spat, blocking another strike for his face. South Pyongan always aimed like she was trying to break a nose he didn't have. "They still only have 'proof' for three hundred and sixty five. But he's holding that we could be responsible for up to six thousand."

"In total," China informed, swallowing a mouthful of rice porridge. "They've combined the rest of the UN forces with the American figure."

Hwang clicked his tongue. "Does three hundred and sixty five sound about right, Korea?"

"Not talking about this."

South Pyongan staggered as North blocked one of her hits and shoved her back. Seizing the opportunity, he launched his own assault of rapid strikes, forcing her to switch to the defensive.

In truth, three hundred and sixty five could be right. North was only aware of small incidences of American POWS being executed, groups of twenty or so, like at Taejon, with the largest being just under eighty. But in the chaos of the tactical retreat, he knew some soldiers had decided it was better to act against orders to eliminate the prisoners they were transporting than let them fall back into enemy hands.

But he knew the count was nowhere near a thousand, let alone six, or the eight thousand number that America's representative had been blustering about at the UN General Assembly at the beginning of the month.

No one in Paris had paid attention to it. Even the more ardent supporters of America were tired of his inflated casualty counts. So the very next day, that damn Hanley had gathered every correspondent in the south and given them his five thousand five hundred number, before Ridgway had raised it again the next. Four days later on the 20th, he was saying it was 'possible' six thousand prisoners had been executed, but they only had proof for over three hundred, far too small a number to have been the result of an order from North's Command.

It didn't matter. The damage had been done. The American troops on the front, who had no access to news that wasn't that damned radio network of America's spreading across the south like a virus, were frothing with rage again at the idea of their fellow soldiers being murdered in cold blood, directing their ire at their own Command over the ceasefire delays back on North and China's people.

Ridgway had said outright that the announcement had nothing to do with the ceasefire talks. But North knew that was a lie. Hanley hadn't told those reporters out of some sense of moral obligation, because they should know of the 'wanton murders,' but so they'd stop looking unreasonable for wanting Kaesong.

He grit his teeth, pressing his attack on South Pyongan, forcing her to block faster.

They had been so close. Again. They'd almost had a line agreed on until Ridgway had to suddenly demand that he wanted Kaesong, which was north of the front. It was only a small city, one barely standing after everything it had been through, surrounded by mostly plains. It held no military value. Yet the Americans had been firm on possessing it.

North had known something new was coming. After China's radio had announced that if the enemy dropped their demand for the city they would be willing to have an armistice in only a few hours, with a full cessation of hostilities, America had needed to do something to make them seem even less reasonable than him. And he had settled on accusing them of executing prisoners of war.

As if his soldiers hadn't watched as Rhee's murdered thousands outside of Taejon. As if his soldiers hadn't gunned down hundreds of innocent civilians at Nogun-ri and hung patriots outside of Pyongyang schools like macabre got-gam. As if his soldiers hadn't ravaged Sincheon.

North struck harder, driving South Pyongan back towards the treeline, not giving her a chance to find an opening.

"Hey, Hwang-" She only just got her leg up in time to block a blow to her solar plexus. "Why don't we not talk about war stuff while I'm fighting him? Wah!"

North took advantage of her distraction to lunge, finally getting his arms around her and slamming her to the ground where they rolled around, lashing out with arms and legs.

"I'm sure you can cope." Hwang adjusted his glasses primly. "You seem to handle me well enough when you assault me as I'm engrossed in a book."

South Pyongan didn't answer, her mouth too occupied with North's hand gripping her face.

"At least we got them to give up on Kaesong," SH said, her legs hanging over the truck bed. "We have a ceasefire line. That's progress."

North Hamgyong grunted from the passenger seat. "Until they make up some other shit to throw at us."

"Korea," his sister said sweetly. "Can you beat him next?"

"Beat me yourself," the other Hamgyong grumbled.

"Don't tempt me."

South Pyongan got a knee into North's stomach, managing to push him off her. She didn't scramble away, but lunged after him, pinning him to the ground.

North grit his teeth as her knees squeezed around his torso, the right one grinding into his burn gash, sending a hot shock of pain through the surface burns and a sick pressure into the dead tissue beneath.

His body screamed at him to get her off, make the pain stop no matter what, but he fought the instinct back. She didn't know the wound was there, and he didn't want to hurt her.

"They're still calling for your cousin, aren't they?" Liaotung asked from next to SH.

"They haven't said they'll break off talks over him yet," the Korean province said, dabbing delicately at her mouth as she set her bowl aside.

"But their current claims do provide a springboard for that," Hwang pointed out. "By establishing that our army has killed POWS, they've primed the public and international community to believe we would torture Gangwon."

South Pyongan held tight with her knees as easily as she did when riding horses as North struggled under her. "Why would killing a bunch of Yanks mean we'd kill our own guy? There's a difference between offing some dude who's been going around murdering our people and offing a province. And we can literally pull out the orders this guy-" She held up North's wrists in her hand like a trophy fish. "Sent out last year telling everyone not to get trigger-happy with prisoners."

North Hamgyong scoffed. "Like they'd believe that."

"They wouldn't," Hwang confirmed.

"You see, comrade," China said, pulling his spoon from his mouth. "While those in our antagonists who armies who go around executing prisoners and killing military police in our neutral zone are rogue elements whose actions have no bearing on their Command, every single one of our soldiers is incapable of doing any thinking for themselves. Any unpleasant actions taken, even if in far smaller numbers than our enemy's, must come directly from above. And why wouldn't we do something like go around executing people for no reason? We are lower than barbarians after all."

He smiled as he used the words Dean Acheson had at the UN meetings.

"You know, you piss me off when you say crap like that, but that pisses me off way more." South Pyongan yelped as North finally bucked her off him, relief flooding his body as the pressure went with her.

"In the end I suppose we're just lucky they aren't blaming us for all ten thousand eight hundred and thirty-six of their missing in action soldiers," Hwang said as North drove his cousin's face into the ground, trying to pin her wrists behind her back as she struggled.

North Hamgyong *'tch'*ed. "Just say ten or eleven thousand, Four-Eyes."

"Specificity matters," Hwang sniffed. "But with the amount of prisoners that died last winter, they could easily inflate the numbers even more."

North's soldiers had only executed at most a few hundred prisoners during the first stage of the war, but far more had died in the camps. They had strict handling conditions, but there was nothing they could do about the starvation or sickness. The United Nations had already been accusing them of starving prisoners, even when they did their best to make sure they at least got sorghum paste to eat. But between the drought last summer, the harsh winter, the constant damage to their supply lines, and the burning of their fields and food stores as the enemy retreated from the north, it was hard to keep them fed.

It made North's blood boil, barely noticing as South Pyongan freed herself from his grip by smashing her head back into his chin.

He knew thousands of he and China's people had died in America's camps, too. Kangwon's reports of the dysentery outbreak in the holding camp alone made that clear. Yet the UN found no fault with America, even with his unlimited resources and free supply lines. North couldn't even feed his own people right now, yet he was expected to feed the soldiers that had made it that way, that had descended upon his country like a swarm of locusts, devouring everything with their guns and bombs and gaping maws.

South Pyongan leaped to her feet, trying to kick him in the side of the head, but he tackled her before she could, getting her back on the hard ground. She tried to shove her legs up between them to kick him away, but he pinned her ankles with his. Before he could capture her arms, she dug her hand into his side. Thankfully it wasn't the one with the gash, but her fingers still plunged into a burn, sending a flash of white light across North's vision.

He snarled as she rained blows over his flanks until he seized one of her wrists, bending it back. Something clicked under his grip and his province let out a pained gasp. He didn't fall for it, sliding his grip to her elbow and slamming her arm into her own chest, repeating the motion with the other one.

South Pyongan twisted her torso violently, but when she lunged up to escape, North grabbed her head with his hand, slamming her temple into the ground, using her moment of dazed confusion to force her onto her stomach, his knees coming down on her back as he wrenched her arms around, pinning them by her shoulder blades as she writhed and bucked under him.

He wished his soldiers had killed eight thousand Yankee POWs. He wished they had killed every single one of those almost eleven thousand MIA men. Each one was one more hand that couldn't fire a gun at his comrades, one more foot that couldn't hold a boy down as he struggled, one more part that couldn't be used to violate his women, one more mouth that didn't need to be fed. North wished he could go into every single one of their camps and-

"Surrender!"

North immediately relinquished his grip at the gasp, sliding off of South Pyongan and getting to his feet with an effort. He held back a wince as a throb of pain went through his leg. At some point during their wild tussling, his province had struck his hip, making the usual ache there worse.

North Hamgyong made a pleased sound as South Pyongan rolled over onto her back, holding her limp wrist up.

"You broke my wrist!" she cried, her other arm draped over her eyes. "I'm never going to be able to punch you again!"

North crossed his arms, unimpressed. "That's not even your dominant hand. And I'm not the one that snapped it to the side."

His province peeked at him, clicking her tongue. "Come on, it's been so long since I did that. It didn't freak you out at all?"

"No. Put it back into place before I do. And stop doing that."

South Pyongan sat up, relocating her double-jointed wrist, wincing as she shook it out. "I couldn't help it. I saw my chance."

"And you failed."

His province popped up, and since she didn't immediately jump him again, it meant that she'd worked out the restlessness he'd sensed buzzing under her skin these past few months. It had only been building since October, but any real issues should be averted now that she was stretching casually, relaxed like she'd just had a massage instead of being pummeled into the ground.

Not North. He could still feel that restless churning feeling, the prickling under his skin only made worse by America's latest stunt.

There was only one good piece of news, aside from the line finally being settled on.

America's air superiority had been broken.

With the building of three new air fields on this side of the Amnok, North and China's pilots- and their secret Soviet comrades- were finally able to regain control of the skies between Pyongyang and the river. The enemy had tried to destroy them, but after raining destruction over Namsi and Taechon, they had been met with squadrons of MiG-15bs above Samchom. They'd been outnumbered, but had managed to shoot down three B-29 Superfortresses and badly damage another five, easily outmaneuvering the swarms of F-86s and F-84Es the enemy had sent to escort them, while only losing one fighter in return.

They weren't able to bring death to the American army in the same way their air force did to them- they needed the bulk of the MiGs to protect the route from Manchuria, and the valuable hydroelectric dams on the Amnok. And the few Soviet squadrons were forbidden from flying over enemy-held territory where their presence could be discovered if they were gunned down. They weren't going to lay waste to the enemy's supply lines like they'd been doing to them, or bomb their supply caches and carpet bomb their headquarters.

But they could destroy their expensive aircraft. And America recognized that. Ever since that air battle, none of the B-29s had appeared in the sky at day. Their flights were restricted solely to the dark. And there hadn't been any fake nuclear runs since then.

But there was grim news attached to the good.

The enemy had realized that even with their overwhelming air superiority, it hadn't been enough to destroy North and China's armies. And now that they had a challenge, it definitely wouldn't be.

Their people were too dedicated to winning the war- no matter how many bridges they blew out, they would be fixed by the next day; no matter how many rail lines they cut, they would soon be repaired; no matter how many homes they destroyed and people they killed, it only fuelled the determination of those left to win.

The only way to crush their supply lines for good was to get their boots back on the ground. Which they could only do once the KPA and PVA were even more weakened.

North knew Hwang was right. Even after the Joint Chiefs across the sea had overruled Ridgway on Kaesong, there would be a new sticking point, always another spanner to throw in the works. If it wasn't the POW accusations, it would be Gangwon, and if it wasn't him, it would be something else.

"Who's next?" he asked coldly, scanning the provinces of his that were there.

Hwang quickly ducked into the truck bed to hide, and SH said, "Korea, maybe we shouldn't be tearing each other's burns open. I think Kangwon might disapprove."

"Oh yeah, he's going to slam his head into the wall," South Pyongan said cheerfully. "I'm leaking in like, ten different places. I'll go round two with you tomorrow, though. But tonight? Porridge."

She jumped into the truck, taking the cold bowl and shovelling it down. North had allowed her and North Hamgyong to build a small outdoor kitchen outside the bunker to lighten the load on the army cooks, on the strict condition that they make sure the smoke didn't give away their location.

It was just a simple stone and clay buttumak hearth and agungi, with space for two cast iron pots. Theirs had been salvaged from the wreck of their house (North did not consider it looting- if his people had needed them, they were welcome to them), so he had grudgingly allowed his provinces to pool their meagre wages and hunt down new ones. He had refused to help, not wanting them to find out that his monthly salary was already gone only a few days into the month.

"Maybe you should eat, too?" SH suggested hopefully.

"Who's next?" North repeated, pinning North Hamgyong with his glare.

His province snorted. "No fucking way. I see that look in your eye. I'm not letting you bust my ass up like that loser."

"I'm winning next time," South Pyongan mumbled through a mouthful of soupy grain.

"No talking with your mouth full," North reprimanded. "And no you aren't."

He scanned his provinces again, but none of them gave in. He would have to wait until Chagang and the others returned in China's Jeep. In an hour.

He couldn't wait. If he waited he would just return to every lie America had ever said about them and how to combat it. And when he was again forced to acknowledge that they had none of the money and sway needed to do that, and his people would always be savage barbarians in the eyes of the foreigners when it was them that had committed the true atrocities, it would make him want to grind his teeth to stubs.

He flexed his fists, needing to move, to fight.

"I suppose I can volunteer."

North's neck cracked as he jerked his head towards the front of the GAZ.

China had slid off of the vehicle, and was arching his back in a stretch.

"China, get back on the roof," Liaoxi sighed. "Brawling with our comrade would be most uncouth."

"Do it," Liaotung enthused as she leaned out of the truck bed. "I want to watch."

"Me too," South Pyongan said excitedly, mouth full.

"So?" China asked, smiling at North. "What do you say? Am I good enough for you?"

North opened his mouth, then shut it, eye flicking over his comrade before narrowing. "Yes."

"Korea," SH said warningly.

"Aiya," China hummed. "I'm not sure I like that expression. Maybe I should change my mind."

"Too late." North walked to the center of the clearing before turning back around. "We're fighting."

And not telling his General about it after.

"Alright. I hope you're not a sore loser."

North grit his teeth, blocking out a memory that would just make his prickling worse. "Keep your clothes on."

China tossed his padded outer jacket at Liaotung, leaving him in his white undershirt, which he rolled the long sleeves up on. "I doubt you want me wrestling you with my props on my person."

North thought of all the knives he'd seen him pull out of his jacket sleeves, and grudgingly decided he was right.

"Empty your boots, too."

China smiled slyly. "Only if you empty yours."

They both pulled short blades out of their footwear, tossing them towards the GAZ.

"Hey," said South Pyongan. "Why were you fighting me with a knife in your boot?"

North didn't answer, keeping his expression blank as he fixed his eye on China, both of them getting into fighting stances.

Truthfully, he was... excited was the wrong word. He was eager to face the other man in hand-to-hand combat, though he hadn't expected to get the chance in a way that didn't permanently ruin the relationship between their countries.

He wasn't just looking for an excuse to hit him. He had been watching China in every battle they had been in, and he was an admittedly skilled fighter. North wanted to make sure he was better. Just in case that promise to become enemies if one of them (China) left their path ever came to pass.

"Tear his head off, Korea!" South Pyongan cried as the two Countryhumans started to circle each other. "Aim for the face!"

At Liaoxi's reproachful look, she muttered, "Or have a nice clean fight or something."

North paid her no attention, focused solely on his opponent as they moved around each other, sizing each other up.

China had several centimetres on him, and likely weighed more, if only because he'd been eating all his rations. North had more raw muscle, but he hadn't forgotten that his comrade's slender frame belied his strength.

Thinking of that night on Bukhan Mountain and the awkward situation he'd allowed China to put him in by limiting himself, he warned, "When my provinces and I fight, we don't hold back. The only rule is no maiming."

"Korea," SH sighed despairingly, face buried in her hands.

"Don't worry, meimei," China called, his eyes not leaving North. "I'll be alright. His bark is worse than his bite. Trust me."

He smirked, making North grimace.

"Wait," South Pyongan said suspiciously. "What's up with that tone?"

China opened his mouth and North moved, lunging forward with a chop aimed at his neck. The other man pivoted, slipping away, and the Korean quickly jumped back, assuming a defensive posture. But China didn't pursue him, he only returned to his ready stance as they circled each other again.

His steps were smooth and fluid. All of his wounds were healed by now, unlike North's. His burns throbbed, and that old ache radiated through his hip. He was making sure to keep his steps steady, but he could still see China's gaze drift to his left leg.

As he struck, North almost twisted to defend it, before pivoting at the last second as he realized China was aiming for his right instead. He just managed to dodge, sliding out of the way, alert for a follow-up.

China smiled as they returned to circling.

North's eye flicked to his right, and a second later he lunged, aiming directly for that spot. China smoothly pivoted away from his reverse psychology.

For the next few minutes they prowled around each other, testing their defenses and reflexes, trying to land a blow, but never following up when it didn't land.

North usually never struck where he was looking. But since China knew that, it meant he knew he would strike where he wasn't looking. And the same went for him. As the other country dodged an attack that had been launched towards where North wasn't targeting, only to go for where he was at the last moment, the Korean confirmed that China had been watching him just as closely. Likely more so, knowing him.

North had grown used to predicting his comrade's moves on the battlefield. He had to be able to envisage where China was going to be so he could go where he wasn't. But China had done the same, always making sure he occupied his blind spot too firmly for the enemy to hit it. They were both too familiar with the other's movements, able to anticipate every blow before it was launched, and every bit of subterfuge running through the other's mind. Who drew first blood would be down to whoever was fast enough.

Their tests grew more frequent, until the moment one of them turned aside from a strike, they were launching their own, trying to catch the other in the tail end of their attempt.

North should be growing frustrated by not being able to make contact, but he was too focused to be. It was rare that he actually received a strategic challenge during a fight. Battlefield grappling was wild and chaotic, with no time to think about anything but killing your opponent as quickly as possible. And while he and his provinces had even more familiarity with each other's tactics than he and China, most of their sparring was spontaneous. One moment you were collecting firewood and the next you were on the ground with someone on top of you.

And North outclassed them all with his sheer ferocity. Even with all of Chagang and North Hamgyong's height and muscle mass, the only one that could still occasionally best him was South Pyongan.

He could tell China was enjoying himself, t- was enjoying himself. The other man's teeth flashed as North whirled around after his latest charge, forcing him to abort his attempt at bull rushing him before spinning aside again.

They dodged and weaved around each other, every hit a near-miss and every step a chance for the deadlock to be broken. North felt the whoosh of air as he jerked back, China's jab almost grazing his striped cheek.

"Are you two fighting or dancing?" South Pyongan heckled from the truck.

"You're one to talk," North shot back.

He could see China calculating his level of distraction as he said the words, before ultimately deciding not to move.

Smart. North had purposefully let his eye stray to bait him. That move had worked on his provinces before. And it had always worked on South.

His brother had been the one to make them start wrestling in the first place, but he had never been good at it. The only thing that had ever spared him from an immediate takedown was how he could predict North's movements better than anyone had ever been able to. And even then, he could read him back just as easily. Most of their sessions had only lasted as long as they had because North had been trying to teach him to fight back.

Eventually he had relented. No matter how many times he chided his brother for allowing himself to be distracted or to not look at where he was aiming, it had never sank in. North had decided it was fine if he couldn't defend himself- he would just always make sure he was there to do it for him.

In the end, it seemed his brother still hadn't learned. On that night by the 38th Parallel, he had been looking where he was aiming- North's eyes.

And he hadn't been able to predict it.

North grit his teeth, and China suddenly rushed him, launching a flurry of rapid blows. Caught off-guard, the Korean couldn't dodge in time, throwing himself forward instead, getting his forearms up to catch his strikes as he had South Pyongan's, all thoughts driven from his mind as he concentrated on making sure none of them landed.

China was fast, his pointed hands practically blurs of red as he struck. It was all North could do to hold him back.

Block block block block- There!

China withdrew his arm a millisecond too slow, and as he struck out again, North caught his hand, twisting. The other man tore free, but before he could leap back or attack again, the Korean swung his fist for his side.

His comrade contorted his spine to avoid the full force of the hit, only to be met by North's other hand jabbing into his ribs on his left.

A thrill went through him at getting first contact, but he had no time to savour it as China immediately struck again, throwing himself at him. North planted his feet to avoid being knocked over, but instead of hitting him full on, the other country slid to the side at the last moment. The Korean whirled, only to find empty space before pain bloomed in his right underarm.

He caught a flash of a sly smile as he spun to meet China, who had used his months of practice at it to slide into his blind spot. Pleased that he wasn't afraid to act like a real enemy would, North seized his hands, forcing the Chinese man into a real grapple.

They shuffled around the center of the clearing, gripping each other's hands as they tried to overpower the other. South Pyongan and Liaotung were cheering and hooting, but the two Countryhumans stayed focused on each other. North could see the cords on the Chinese man's neck straining as he tried to force him back. Blood bloomed on the bandages around his hands as red fingers dug into the burns under them, making his own tendons strain even harder, pressure filling his temples in an attempt to block out the pain signals being sent up his arms.

Gritting his teeth, North used his full strength to muscle China aside, trying to get him into a reverse chokehold. He almost succeeded, getting him bent over under his arm, but the other man was so damn wriggly that he slipped free, ducking behind and wrapping his arms around him.

North grimaced as he was pressed up to his chest, one arm locking around his ribs and the other over his throat, the vertical version of the hold he'd put him in on Bukhan Mountain. It was easy to force down the feeling of wild panic at being restrained this time as he had full license to do whatever he had to to free himself.

"Surrender?" China purred mockingly into his 'ear.'

"Never!" North growled, settling on a maneuver South Pyongan frequently used on him.

Ssi-bal, this was going to hurt.

He dug blunt nails into the arm around his throat, mustering his core strength as he kicked both legs into the air, knees to his chest before he straightened them, his weight making China stagger back a step. But he was strong enough to avoid falling, and North was able to complete the motion, getting his legs over his head, breaking China's hold and every single scab on his abdomen. He could feel fluid burst from the gash as sickening agony stabbed into his bones and his spine screamed at curving in a way it wasn't supposed to.

North almost gasped in relief as his knees met the support of China's shoulders, and he was able to lock his thighs around his neck and straighten up, excruciating backwards somersault leaving him kneeling atop the other country to South Pyongan's elated "Whoop!"

"I can't imagine that felt good," China choked out as he staggered under his weight, incongruously laughing.

It definitely hadn't. But hearing the genuine surprise in his delight did.

If China was a real enemy, North would have tightened his grip and used his thighs to snap his neck. Instead he swung backwards until he was staring at the earth, his legs still firmly locked around his opponent's head as he tried to drag him down to the ground. China bent back, grabbing onto his knees to try and pry him loose before suddenly going limp.

North's goal was accomplished, just not in the way he wanted. What should have been a controlled takedown that ended with him properly choking China out with his legs saw him suddenly slamming head-first into the ground, his grip disengaging as he went sprawling on his back. Quick as a snake China flipped around, getting on top of him, reaching for his hands. Head still spinning, North wrapped his arms around his torso and his legs around his waist, lunging up to bury his face in his chest and pull him into a death-roll, both of them tumbling around on the cold dirt while the Korean tried to ignore the strikes that jabbed into his sides and shoulder blades whenever China got the chance.

He'd almost expected the other country to go easy on him for fear of making his burns worse, but North was thrilled to find he'd been wrong. None of China's blows were softened, each landing with the force he would've used on an enemy, which allowed the Korean county to do the same, driving his fist into his side over and over, until China rolled them again and drove his knee into his inner thigh, sending a burst of pins and needles and pain down North's entire leg.

Unable to move it, he was forced to stay on his back as China tried to trap his working leg with his own. North dug the fingers of one hand into his slender waist and drove the other in a wedge shape into his liver, forcing a satisfying "Urk!" sound out of China's mouth.

Suddenly North saw stars as the man smashed his forehead down into his own and they both went reeling, China falling back as he rolled to the side. Before North could recover, the other man's knee drove into his kidneys, his hand gripping the back of his neck. But he was clearly still disoriented from the headbutt as a sharp twist of his spine was enough for North to throw him off.

The Korean pounced on him, straddling his waist.

"Korea, play nice!" SH called as she saw his intent.

Her words didn't stop North from punching the man under him in the face.

He did soften this blow, and made no effort to counter China turning away from it so that he only struck a glancing hit off his jaw. It still felt good.

He bared his teeth and China laughed, wrapping his legs around his abdomen and sending him to the ground again.

They wrestled like this until the sun had sunk below the treeline, only streaks of red managing to make it through the trunks to illuminate their brawl. Rolling, grappling, striking each other's pressure points, each trying maybe not as hard as they could have to pin the other.

North's strength was countered by China's speed and flexibility, and China's calculated strikes were countered by North's fierce fighting style and ability to take blows. It was clear they were evenly matched, and at a stalemate, just like the war engulfing his country. But unlike that stalemate, this one wasn't entirely unpleasant.

North grunted as he was slammed to the ground again, China coming down on him once more, straddling his thighs this time as his ankles locked around North's, stopping him from kicking him off. The Korean read something new in the way his eyes narrowed, and tried to get his arms up. But China seized them, crushing his wrists together as he pinned them over his head.

And for the first time, his free hand met the burn gash, pinpointing the spot where it touched the scar on his chest. North arched his back, teeth creaking as he fought back a pained yelp.

The hand that wasn't pinning his wrists suddenly seized his left leg, fingers wrapping around the back of his thigh as China's thumb jabbed hard into the seam between it and his pelvis.

A twinge shot through North's entire body, electrifying him as it felt like a nerve scraped over a spur of bone.

He was unable to hold back his snarl this time, his vision flashing as the pain sent a rush of renewed vigour through him. He surged up, knocking China back and jumping on top of him, both of them tussling violently in a mess of limbs until he finally came out on top, slamming the other country's back into the ground, knocking the breath from him as he trapped his arms at his sides with his thighs and locked his ankles into place with the same move he'd used on him.

China writhed and twisted ineffectually before gasping, "Surrender!"

North didn't let him go, pressing down on his shoulders. "I know... what letting someone wins looks like," he panted, irked.

China laughed breathily. "Consider it... a favour. Otherwise we'll be here... all night. And if I won, your pride... would mean that we had to fight again tomorrow. And until you won."

North's eye narrowed. "And... when I won?"

China's eye gleamed as his lips curved up. "My pride would dictate I had to do the same thing. It would be... a vicious cycle, comrade. This way we both walk away satisfied."

"Korea, please get off of our comrade," SH called.

They had rolled almost into the trees on the far side of the clearing, and were talking too low for the others to hear.

North bore down harder on China for a moment, eye narrowed. Then he released him, climbing off. Neither of them stood up, still catching their breath.

"Ura!" South Pyongan cheered. "Let's go, Korea! Who's the superior country? That's right- Korea! Korea number one!"

Liaoxi cleared her throat, and she quickly said, "I mean, both of our countries did great, yeah?"

"I'd say so," China said, starting to stand.

Not wanting him to get up first, North shot up, wincing at the ache in his hip, along with the other myriad pains.

SH saw, and arched a brow. 'And what have we learned about picking fights when we're covered in burns?'

'You're next,' North conveyed with a squint.

"Aiya," China said, feeling his own pains as the adrenaline ebbed, rubbing his forehead. "You have a hard head, comrade."

"'Course he does," North Hamgyong grunted, pushing off the GAZ and heading to the bunker door. "Shit's dense as concrete."

"At least it isn't made of steel," North sniped back as headlights shone through the trees, and the Jeep pulled in next to his own vehicle.

"Korea!" Hae shot out of the back bench and rocketed towards him, only stopped by the hand held out against her forehead. "Wegotalltheeastfieldsdonealltthewinterwheatan'rapeseedsplantedan'aheven

Her excited expression morphed to big wide eyes full of concern as she noticed how dishevelled he was.

North attempted to straighten his collar. "Comrade China and I were engaging in on-the-spot combat practice."

Hae squinted suspiciously at the Chinese man.

"I assure you he gave as good as he got, Little Tiger," China said, tucking his rumpled, filthy undershirt back into the waistband of his pants.

Hae turned her squint to North. "Did you win?"

"Yes." If China was going to let him win, he was going to rub it in.

"Hmmm." Hae thought, then nodded decisively, breaking out in a beam again. "A' course you did! Ura Korea!"

"Go get North Pyongan to warm up your rations," he ordered. "Give me your report on the planting after."

Hae nodded happily, skipping over to her cousin as he passed the Jeep keys to China.

"Thank you for letting us borrow your vehicle," he said politely.

"That's nice to hear." China sent North a pointed look. "Though I suppose it is more of our vehicle by now."

North scrunched his face.

North Pyongan looked to Liaoxi as he started towards the stove with Hae, as if wondering if she would stay with them. But the Chinese province didn't look his way, jumping lightly from the GAZ and following her sister into the bunker now that the show was over. North's province looked dejected as he went to heat their porridge.

North wasn't sure if China had decided to keep his promise that he wouldn't have to worry about their provinces'... feelings towards each other early, or if the Chinese woman had simply come to her senses. He didn't care to ask. He was satisfied regardless. He would have preferred if his province was the one to pull away, but at least one of them had.

"And you said you don't enjoy fighting."

North flicked his eye to China as he brushed dirt from his tunic. "I don't."

"Mm." China smiled. "Regardless, it was an engaging one. We'll have to do it again sometime, comrade."

"As long as you're prepared to lose."

North was already analyzing their fight, trying to see what he could have done better, aside from several instances where he could have attempted to finish China off, but hadn't. If he had, their fight would have ended sooner.

Most of his actions had been perfectly executed, and only failed due to China's agility. His one note was that he needed to get better at combatting the man's ability to sneak into his blind spot.

Even though he hadn't truly won, North was pleased by the outcome. He was certain now that he could beat China in a real fight. He had thought he could before, but the way the Chinese Countryhuman had restrained him on Bukhan Mountain kept sticking in his mind, even though he'd been holding back. But if he had been evenly matched with China now, when he was covered in burns and... not in peak physical condition, then he could definitely beat him in perfect health. China might be fast, but so long as he caught him once, North could eliminate him.

If their countries ever became enemies, and he had to fulfill that promise, he could.

"Are you thinking about killing me?"

Snapping out of his thoughts, North said, "No." He spun on a heel. "I'm going to take a bath."

It was the entire reason he'd come to the bunker so early. Now the combat had delayed him, and he was too battered to walk back.

He could. But without time to rest, his Premier would definitely know he'd been brawling. And if he asked with who, North would have to admit he'd given in to his urge to rough up their ally.

Which meant he was going to have to sleep in the bunker, which was precisely what he had been trying to avoid.

"Do you need someone to wash your back?" China asked innocently.

North gave him a wordless glare over his shoulder, then called, "South Hwanghae. If you're anywhere near that stove when I come back, you'll be digging latrines."

She squeaked, jumping back from the flames North Pyongan was feeding.

North collected his bathing kit from his room, grimacing at the collection of radio parts and wires in the corner, before setting off into the woods.

The wooden tub was just far enough away that it couldn't be seen from the bunker, nestled between tree trunks and under the shadow of Jangsan for as much privacy as possible.

North had woken up early this morning to collect water from the river to boil, so all he had to do was use his matches and kindling to light the stove under the tub, and wait. The basin was small, just wide enough to fit one person and tall enough to reach their chest when they sat in it. But it still took a good hour for it to reach the roiling boil Kangwon had dictated in his hygiene measures.

The scent of cooking grain filtered through the trees alongside his provinces' chatter. North felt around in the frozen leaf litter until he found a small stone, placing it in his mouth to suck on, unbothered by the grit of dirt and taste of loam.

When the water was finally boiling, he removed his clothes and bandages, carefully folding them and placing them on a nearby rock, stepping in without waiting for it to cool. The scalding water made all his hairs stand on end and sent stinging shivers through his skin, but he didn't hesitate to submerge his entire body in it.

North swiftly and meticulously scrubbed himself down, brushing his hands roughly over the burns to dislodge the fabric fibres and dirt he knew were caked into them. The steam that rose from the bubbling water smelled like soup.

North swirled the rock in his mouth as he struggled to reach his back, making sure it was as clean as his front. He wasn't going to let them get infected, especially now that he had decided to return to the front if needed.

He knew he should let Kangwon clean them properly again, at least with just water, but... He would visit Kim Yong-hwan soon, like she had nagged him to do when she took blood.

He rubbed the small patch of skin that the nurse had managed to find amongst the burns, thinking of China's instructions to give his blood to whoever needed it. Did he know?

North did. And it was strange to think his blood might be circulating in a Chinese soldier's veins. It was... discomfiting.

When he was clean, he climbed out of the bathtub, hurriedly wiping himself down with a small towel and dressing in his uniform, displeased by the feeling of dirty clothes on his clean skin. He would have to wash it tomorrow, especially now that the water-thinned blood leaking from his body was soaking it. Maybe he should get SH to track down a laundry basin.

But he didn't like the idea of having so many amenities at the bunker. It made it feel too... permanent.

North washed his bandages in the same water, knowing that if he could see it, it would be solid brown by the time he was done, just as filthy as before it was boiled.

Once he was done, he brushed his teeth, then tipped over the tub, careful to keep his boots away from the flood of bloody water, using some of it to douse the fire before returning to the clearing to hang his wet bandages in a tree.

Chagang and SH stood outside the bunker door, their quiet words filling the air with clouds of steam.

His female province smiled when she saw him. "Hae fell asleep waiting for you to get back."

"Wake her up after your shift," North ordered Chagang. "Tell her to wake me up after."

He would have preferred to take the next watch and stand it until dawn, but he knew from experience that when Hae went to sleep with something to tell him, she would keep waking up through the night until she did.

Ssi-bal. He was going to have to sleep in his room.

"Where's China?"

"He left a few minutes ago," SH reported. "He went that way."

She pointed in the opposite direction from where North had come from.

He had time to lock his door.

Without another word, he brushed past his provinces, only answering their 'goodnights' before he darted into the bunker, then into his room.

But as he shut the door, he paused, suddenly unnerved.

The hot water had soothed the minor pains in his body, the bruises and aches that South Pyongan and China had left. But something else was gone, too. Something that's absence was as noticeable as a new injury would be.

North lifted his left leg, then put his full weight down on it, repeating the motion before walking in circles around the small room. Then jogging. Then jumping up and down on it before feeling like an idiot and acknowledging that it was true.

The ache in his hip from the fight was gone. And so was the old ache, the one that had lingered in his bones every day, and plagued him for every winter since 1918.

North braced his back against the cold steel of the door, lifting the leg as high as he could, waiting for the dull pain. Nothing.

It had never got in the way. It hadn't hindered his mobility or made him limp noticeably. It had been just another ache in his tapestry of them. But it had been there.

And now it was gone.

He crushed the flicker of hope he'd felt, smoothing his expression. It was likely only a momentary relief. It would be back tomorrow, and likely worse.

But it wasn't there tonight.

North removed his newly-requisitioned winter uniform, placing it neatly in the corner. He would wear his summer one to spare the thick jacket from further stains since he had to sleep without bandages while they dried.

He pulled his pants off, leaving him in just his military-issue shorts, drab green so they could be hung on a laundry line without attracting enemy fire. He pulled down the corner of them, squinting at the seam of his pelvis in the light of the lantern.

He poked skeptically at it, expecting the action to bring the ache back. It didn't. The skin was a bit tender, and he could see the dark purple bruise forming on his blue skin from China's thumb, but that was all.

"Tch."

Behind him, the door- which he'd forgotten to lock in his disbelief over his leg- creaked open.

North shot into the air, diving into his bedroll, covering his body as quickly as possible with the thick olive fabric.

"You know," China said mildly, shutting the door behind him. "I've had women react less dramatically at being walked in on changing."

"So you walk in on women changing often?" North asked scathingly, hidden up to his chin in the bed roll, heart pounding.

China paused, considering. "Aiya. There's nothing I can say to that that sounds good, is there?"

"No." North worked an arm free to point at the door. "Get out. And knock next time."

Ignoring him, China said, "I don't see the point. We're both men." He suddenly looked keenly at North. "You are a man, yes?"

'You just manhandled me enough to know the answer is yes.'

Not wanting to dignify him with answer, North bit his tongue on that. "Just because I let you sleep in here once, doesn't mean you can just move in."

He gestured at China's things neatly lining the far wall, unmoved from the last time the Korean had slept here.

"Doesn't it?" China sat down on his bedroll, pulling his transceiver from his bag and starting to fiddle with it. "I promise I won't peek."

North remained firmly in his roll.

China didn't have to worry about changing. He was dressed in the thick winter coat and pants that he never took off, already delivered from his requisitions officer before snow had even fallen on the mountains. It was honestly surprising that he'd willingly removed the jacket earlier.

But North was shirtless and covered in open burns that were going to start staining the inside of his bedroll soon.

He eyed the lantern. He was used to changing in the dark.

Then he imagined China lurking a step behind him, unseen, and shuddered. No.

He briefly considered dragging his clothes into the bag to try and change inside it. But he knew it would be immature of him, and the other country would be inwardly snickering the entire time.

It was stupid for him to be so reluctant to be shirtless in front of him. They were both men. And he wasn't one of North's people, so he didn't have the same concerns.

But there were similar ones.

North grit his teeth, sliding a finger down his rough torso to the gash, feeling the liquid pooling in it. He didn't want to go to the trouble of cleaning his bedroll when he just had.

Reluctantly, he pulled himself from safety, staring down China as he did. The other man's eyes didn't move from what he was doing-screwing a panel back onto the transceiver with the knife from his boot.

North quickly grabbed his summer uniform from the head of his bedroll, careful to keep his chest angled away from China. Darting frequent looks at him, he hustled into the far corner.

He glanced back at his long underwear. He knew he should put them on soon to combat the frigid air of the bunker. China was certainly already wearing his. But the way the tight long-sleeved shirt and pants constricted his legs and arms was unpleasant on the best of days, and when he thought about pulling the thick cotton over his open burns, and how the fluids would make the fabric cling to his skin...

He kept his shorts on, quickly throwing on his light summer pants. More at ease with at least them as a barrier, he took a brief moment to examine his torso (after sneaking another look at China).

He curled his lip at what he saw. No longer a patchwork, he was almost a solid mass of mottled red, orange, and black. He looked like one of the many napalm victims from the twenty-six villages that had stood north of Suwon before the beginning of this year, his skin crinkled, scorched into ridges and valleys like the land it represented. The burns had even spread over the tops of his feet, small spots of watery red staining his grey woollen socks.

But there still weren't any on the bottom, or his face. Small victories.

His teeth grit at the word, his fingers turning to claws over the gash.

Suddenly he stiffened and spun around, a 'thud' echoing around the room as his open palm struck China's chest, sending him backwards.

"Are we going again so soon?" he asked, unbothered.

"What were you doing?" North didn't wait for an answer, realizing his chest was exposed, he snatched his uniform shirts up, throwing them on and buttoning them snugly up to his chin.

"Just checking if you were secretly a woman," the other man said innocently. "That would make for an interesting story. But alas."

North pressed his lips together, aggressively shutting off the lamp.

As China's face had appeared in the corner of his vision, he had seen his eyes fixed on his chest. But he knew he hadn't been checking for... those. He had either been looking at the burn gash or his scar.

Had he seen them before? When they had crossed the Chongchon River, the Chinese had removed their outerwear so they wouldn't freeze. But North had tolerated the stiff fabric of his undershirt, only removing his pants and tunic. And he hadn't once taken it off, even during their long campaigns or their digging at Chorweon, unless he was alone in a medical tent.

North didn't think he had. No one had seen his scar but his provinces, his General, and the occasional comrade during the Occupation, when he had no choice. And no one had seen the burn except for Kangwon and Kim Yong-hwan.

China didn't say anything, but the knowledge that he had seen North's 'souvenir' burned worse than his charred skin.

At least he had caught him looking. The idea of him silently watching him, judging him for being unable to stop such a mark from being inflicted on him, without the Korean even knowing, made him burn worse. At least this way he knew he thought he was weak.

He thought of the long, pale scars trailing into China's waistband.

And at least he couldn't think it without being a hypocrite.

North slid into his bedroll, feeling his scar twinge, not from the hits it had taken or the burns that obscured parts of the pink band, but deeper. Something that could never be soothed.

He rested his hand on his chest, fingers pressing against the raised edges.

A reminder. No matter what America threw at them next, he would overcome it. No matter what he had to ignore for the sake of greater peace, like that murdered boy, he would make sure that he survived to make the foreigner pay for it. No matter how much firepower he threw at them to try and make them kneel, North wouldn't.

Korea didn't beg.

He heard a small noise and stiffened, snatching his hand from his scar.

"Get away from me."

"I'm not near you," China's voice said from closer than before.

North pulled his arm from his roll, reaching out. It flopped across a warm body, his hand clearing his chest.

"Get away from me," he repeated.

"You're the one that moved, not me."

North could still feel his right shoulder touching the wall, where he firmly pressed himself the few times he'd had to be in here with China.

"Get. Away."

Giving up his innocent voice, China switched to something whiny, "But it's cold."

His bitching about the heat had ended around the beginning of September and immediately been replaced by whining about the cold again, despite the fact that Hae had predicted this winter wouldn't be anywhere near as frigid as the last. North didn't know which was worse, but both were intolerable.

"What does that have to do with me?" he demanded, shoving him with his shoulder. "Get back on your side of the room."

"We can't cuddle?"

North growled low in his throat.

"Fine," China sighed, and he could hear the deliberate sounds of him inching his entire bedroll away. "I'll just freeze then. When you have to deliver my frozen body to my Comrade Peng, tell him I said not to hold it against you."

"It was your choice to sleep in here," North reminded him irritably. "You could be at your Mobile Headquarters."

It wasn't like they would be much warmer. But at least Peng Dehuai probably permitted a heater.

"And I suppose I'll pay the price for it," China sighed heavily.

North ignored him, closing his eye and making sure his eyepatch was firmly in place.

The room was silent. Mostly. North could hear a sound like clattering bones as China's teeth chattered together, filling the small space.

He wished he could just write him off as being overdramatic, but he knew from last year that the other man truly didn't handle the cold well. His composure was the act, not the shivering.

North huffed, freezing air washing over his upper half as he sat up, removing his tunic. "Here."

He could feel an investigative tug on the fabric before the hand was withdrawn.

"I don't want your jacket." China's voice was suddenly normal again.

"Take it," North said irritably. "I'm sick of listening to your teeth."

"I'll take your winter one, if you're really not going to wear it."

"It's damp." And he didn't want China to see all the stains the next morning. "Take this one."

"I don't want it."

Aggravated, North growled, "You can't moan about the cold then turn me down when I try to fix it."

"I'm not that cold," China denied. "I was only pretending."

North curled his lip, hearing the tremble in his words. "Fine. Freeze. I don't care. But I will punch your teeth out before I listen to them chattering all night."

He shrugged his tunic back on, sliding back into the warmth of the bag.

China's teeth didn't chatter, but in the silence he could hear the fabric of his roll rustling, the slightest noise as his comrade shivered inside it.

Grimacing, North reached back for his pack, pulling something out. He heard the impact as the balled up fabric hit China, hopefully in the face.

"Ah, your scarf," he said after a moment, sounding pleased.

North had finally put his foot down for him to return the grey and white striped fabric (now with dark red stains on it that couldn't quite be washed out) when his comrade started to wear his ushanka again. China hadn't complied, so he had waited until he was sleeping one night and yanked it off him, then pretended to be asleep once he woke up.

"Keep it," he grunted. At least the labour of the woman that made it would go to better use. He didn't often wear scarves.

"I thought you didn't want me to have this."

'As if that wasn't what you were angling for this entire time.'

"You stole it from me before," North grumbled, though he had remembered by now (with great embarrassment) that that wasn't true. "Now I'm giving it to you. Just wear it."

"Thank you."

He could hear China winding the fabric around his neck and snuggling down into his bedroll.

"And if you are anywhere near me when I wake up, I'm strangling you with it."

"Noted."

North knew there would be no waking up, since he wasn't sleeping. His head knew China wasn't going to hurt him, not unless they one day became enemies. But his body still wasn't convinced. The few times they'd shared this room, he had lain awake, waiting for his comrade to drift off. Then lain awake longer, every muscle tense for the sound of the other country getting up to take advantage of his vulnerability. He had preferred having the locked door between them.

China's remaining slight shivers slowly died away as his breathing evened, muffled in a way that meant he had North's- his scarf wrapped around his face. North snorted lightly, keeping his own eye open to avoid the weariness plucking at the edges of his mind.

He truly didn't find it that cold. He had thick walls to keep out the wind, good clothes with sturdy stitching, even if they were for summer, and a military-quality bedroll. If he had to, he could go start another fire in the hearth outside and squat by it, or go for a jog down to the river.

There had been nothing like that in the shack. On windy nights the gusts cut through the gaps in the boards like Japanese blades, stripping the skin from their exposed faces, arms, and legs, even under the thin blanket. Ice welled up from the boards beneath them and into their thin futon, so that even the slightest shift from the warmth your body had created would make you stifle a gasp. The only way to make his brother stop shaking for even a moment was to force him to accept his shirt, wrap them both in the blanket with their legs pulled up to their chests and intertwined, and bury him half under him. Every part of North had been frozen, except for the hands slid up the back of South's shirts, and the inside of his chest when he finally managed to get his brother to sleep.

It had gotten easier in that last year, when they had been given the extra blanket and shirts. North could swaddle his brother in three of them, and even keep one for himself. Though at that point he hadn't needed it. He hadn't felt the bite of the cold as deeply.

He hadn't felt much of anything.

Was South warm? Did he have an ondol room in that large manor? A stove at least? Thick warm clothes to keep the cold away when North couldn't? Was it also still not enough when his body was aching to be curled up with his brother, cold knees knocking together?

One last winter. America wouldn't give up, but once his politicians saw that starvation and bombing were never going to bring Korea to its knees, they would overrule his generals, like they had with Ridgway over Kaesong. They would sign the ceasefire. There would be more hurdles after that, but North could handle them, and tear Korea's Reunification from their bloody claws.

One last winter. Then he could hold his brother again.

The next morning, as North broke from his guard posture outside the bunker and went to muster his provinces, the ache was still gone from his hip. And it never came back.

Author's note elaboration on the POW thing in the next chapter, since it's better for it.

I was watching a lot of grappling videos for this chapter because I've mostly only seen battlefield grappling, not friendly, and... That's a very homoerotic hobby, isn't it? I was looking for specific moves but most of them were 'guy straddles man's hips, uses the power of his thighs to get him on the ground, then embraces him strongly.' One woman was literally just... on top of this other woman. Like between her legs just holding her. It almost looked tender before you saw the other woman's eyes were bulging out of her head. Anyway, that's... not what North and China are doing. They're doing something different. I don't think men in the army ever have a right to be homophobic when they're doing things like that. I think marrying a man might be less gay than grappling.

I think someone should have bit the bullet, so to speak, and jumped Netanyahu at the UN. Fully torn his jugular out with their teeth? Would Israel still exist? Yes, so long as America does. But wouldn't the hot spray of iron be satisfying? Wouldn't it feel good to be the first person to ever actually do something positive at the UN ever? Come on world representatives, you know you want to~
Also remember that the DPRK is frequently blocked from speaking, but the head of a state committing genocide that is also a wanted criminal can get up in front of them and wave his silly little diagrams around as he justifies ethnic cleansing with no problem.

Grito de Corea

TW: Racism directed at black and Hispanic people, Puerto Ricans especially. Slurs aren't being screamed in people's faces (though they are being said internally), but dehumanizing language is used, if you need to be prepared for that.

The Eighth Army Headquarters in Seoul were never empty. Always there were toadies hustling around inside the huge red-brick building (repaired after the nasty scorching it'd taken after Southie's foray into arson) while officers conferred and couriers hustled past with messages for the Signal Corps. Military police patrolled the grounds and stood guard around the perimeter, almost as many as at the base camp at Munsan. There were always folks comin' and goin', fighting the commies in their own special way, whatever that was.

But this was getting fucking ridiculous.

America had to ease off the gas as his vehicle neared the barred iron gate set in the brick wall that surrounded the requisitioned Jap military building so none of the reporters rushing him would end up smeared over his bumper.

The newshawks spent all day circling the place like vultures, shouting at his boys as they crossed the yard and shoving microphones in the sentries' faces as they babbled their questions, just waiting for one of them to slip up and feed 'em a steaming pile of carrion. It was even worse than at the base camp since it was easier to stroll through Seoul than into the neutral zone.

Every UN officer was under strict orders not to feed the scavengers, but it didn't stop them from swarming each vehicle that arrived or left, trying to catch them out.

"Mr. America, is it true the fighting at the front has petered out?"

"Mr. America, do you think we'll have a ceasefire soon?"

“Mr. America, what would you say to those who think the United Nations Command is dragging these negotiations out unduly?”

America let the questions slide off him like water, but couldn’t ignore them completely. The rest of the brass could get away with stonewalling the press, but if he did it, it would just spawn a dozen little paragraphs speculating on his facial expression.

“Sorry, folks!” he called out the window with an apologetic grin. “You know the policy. You wouldn’t want me to get in trouble with the UN, now would you?”

One man with too much hair on his cheeks and not enough on his chin shouted, “Then is it true that the press embargo is the United Nations’ decision?”

America sent him a wink. “Mum’s the word.”

It wasn’t, but despite all the birdy’s complaints about freedom of the press, he knew the organization was relieved he’d tightened security around Korea, since he had to make a follow-up statement on pretty much every statement America’s guys did. His feathers were just ruffled because all the complaints about it went to his desk.

The American tapped his fingers impatiently on the wheel as his vehicle slowly inched forward, the crowd parting reluctantly. At least he’d brought the Jeep over the Packard.

God, what he wouldn’t give to be behind the wheel of his Caddy. The shiny black exterior might’ve made some of these story-sniffers think twice about crowding so close. But he should probably hold off on having it shipped over.

‘Don’t want to give the flies anything else to swarm.’

And of course, if they did get their greasy fingerprints over it, like they were doing to the sides of his Jeep, he’d have to kill ‘em.

“Mr. America!” A younger man with a cowlick jumped in front of his vehicle like he was angling to meet the Lord. “Do you have anything to add to your statement from yesterday?”

“Just that once the Reds stop playing tough and sign this armistice, there will be a reckoning for every American life claimed in Korea,” the country said firmly, then added, “And Allied,” not wanting to give the Euros- and others- in the swarm anything to nitpick.

The man finally got out of his way, and America continued forward, smiling and waving even as he refused to answer any questions, amicably smoothing over the press embargo the way he’d smoothed over Ridgway and Van Fleet’s inability to do math at the press conference yesterday.

He fucking hated the press.

Don’t get him wrong- he loved the freedom of it. Hell, America was pretty much the only country that actually had it. If it wasn’t for the commies and their propaganda, he wouldn’t have to have this blackout right now.

But he hated reporters. Always in your face, looking for some scandal or scoop. Some of them could be useful, the ones that knew the truth wasn't always what people needed to hear. But even some of those could be dammed irritating.

He remembered the time some dirt-digger had lurked outside his plantation house in Virginia for a month straight during the Great Depression, trying to corner him or the help every single time they stepped out his front gate, looking for some dirt to smear his name with.

America had actually been a little amused, staying in the state longer than planned just to see how long the man would keep it up for. But it morphed to annoyance after he had to fire one of his cooks for leaking last week's menu. The guy had acted so triumphant, like it was some great crime America was importing caviar and lobster. So? He could afford it. It wasn’t his fault the little people couldn’t. He hadn’t been the one to crash the stock market.

(Some of the newspapers back home could stand to chew on the fact that the thing that had pulled them out of the Great Depression was the economic opportunity World War II had presented them. Because America would bet if he'd let the economy continue to slide like it had been before this war, they'd be bitching at him even louder.)

Anyway, sure, he could see getting all indignant over a wealthy human, even if he didn't agree with it. If they still had money after 1929, that meant they'd worked for it. If some people spent less time bitching about how empty their pockets were and more time pulling up their bootstraps, they'd be wealthy, too. Maybe not lobster wealthy, but oyster wealthy at least. But he did get it. It was natural for the little fella to envy the guy who had more.

But America was their Countryhuman. Their wealth was his wealth. So long as he was doing fine, that meant America was doing fine. If he'd had to start eating water pie and dandelion salad with everyone else, that would be when folks should start to worry.

The reporter had seen the sense of that when he sat him down to talk things over. Honestly, America was prepared to offer him a few hundred dollars to just drop the whole thing.

But then the man had made one mistake- he got greedy. He'd demanded a ridiculous amount of greenbacks before America could get a word off. And hey, he was reasonable. Humans were naturally greedy, and he didn't expect them to fight their nature.

But he couldn't let him get away with thinking he could blackmail the United States of America.

It wasn't like he'd had him killed or anything. The story wasn't that important. He'd just shrugged and let him go to the press with it. It made a splash, caused a few fish to frenzy, then was out of the papers in a month, just like he'd known it would be. Honestly the only reason he'd even offered the guy cash was because he was impressed by his determination. Not everyone was willing to sleep outside his gate in the rain.

But he'd had to be taught a lesson. As his Countryhuman, America had the right to demand anything from him, not the other way around.

And he needed to be punished for compromising that cook. God, he missed her. She made the best Goddamn cornbread he'd ever had. No one ran a kitchen like a coloured woman in her fifties.

Thinking of that fuelled his urge to just slam the gas and watch the vultures go scrambling. If a few ended going over his hood because they weren't fast enough, that really wasn't his fault.

He didn't, though. He just grinned brightly, red stripes on his knuckles white around the wheel, until he finally got close enough to the gate for the military police to finally move their asses and start to clear people away to open it.

But before they could, a voice rose over the clamour, shouting in accented English, "General America! We need to speak with you!"

America kept facing forward, but peered out the side of his aviators, using the old 'Don't make eye contact with the loons' method to see a group of men forcing their way through the swarm.

Unlike the reporters with their sky blue UN helmets, lanyards, and thick winter coats, these were dressed in military uniforms. American military uniforms.

There were twelve of 'em- five spics, four blacks, and three good ole boys. All of them looked to be privates, and their leader seemed to be from the first category, with a clean-shaven face and a head of dark curls that would've put a cherub to shame if they weren't close-cropped. He looked well put together, but had one of those skin tones that made you think of dirt.

With his 'conversation you don't want to have around reporters' senses tingling, America stared impatiently at the military police that were supposed to be opening the damn gate. But for some completely unknowable reason they'd paused, like their Countryhuman might actually want to speak to a group of soldiers that were definitely not supposed to be here right now.

"General America!"

'Goddammit.'

America turned to his open window, slinging an arm out it. “What seems to be the problem, gentlemen?”

The reporters drew back, their squawking finally settling down as they watched the interaction with avaricious eyes, expecting some crumb of a story.

The soldier at the front stopped a few inches away from him, his eyes serious and his jaw set. The face of a man about to do something he shouldn’t, America would say.

“We want to know why there hasn’t been a ceasefire.”

Wishing people would at least get new questions, the country quirked a lip. Not a laugh, that would be insensitive with recent events. But a little bit of wryness.

“That’s what I’d like to know, too. I’m afraid you’d have to ask the Reds. But fair warning, they might not be so keen on a friendly chat.” His lips pressed thin. “They didn’t exactly ‘chat’ with our POWs.”

“And we haven’t exactly chatted with theirs,” the Mexican-type shot back. “Yet they seem ready to lay down their arms and end this war. It's you that doesn't seem ready to do that. Sir.”

America took a moment to look closer at the man. “Name and rank, soldier?”

He brought his hand up to his forehead in a sharp salute. “Private Adolfo Rivera-Campos, sir. Enlisted 65th Infantry Regiment attached to the 3rd Infantry Division, transferred to guard prisoner of war handling zones, sir.”

America could tell the difference between the people of his more southern lands about as well as he could the gooks and Red Chinese. But he knew the 65th Regiment was the Puerto Rican regiment.

He got the other men's IDs, too. The negro soldiers were all from the same regiment- the 24th, though after its dissolution, they’d all been transferred to different units.

America wasn't sad to see the 24th go. They'd struck their blows against the Indians and the Filipinos and Japs, but they also had a long history of disobedience. Even though he'd made sure their commanding officer was always white, it wasn't enough to stop them from misbehaving. Once again, he wasn't going to hold it against them for following their natures. It was just that war wasn't the place to do it.

In the end, it wasn't wise to keep too many of 'em around each other. It was why America had never had much personal truck with slavery. You get a bunch of little people together, same skin, same background, same job, and it could start to get dangerous, especially when you were letting them live on your estate or giving them firearms. Ideas could start to spread. In a few years he intended to ditch segregated units completely.

The white men were unremarkable. Two of them were also assigned to POW-handling duty, and the other was from a frontline unit a mile or so east.

America gave a low whistle. "That's quite a group. Seems a little strange your officers would send you all the way to Headquarters. What's your mission, soldiers?"

Rivera's hands clenched, his body giving away his nerves, even if his round face didn't. "There is no mission, sir. We came here on our own to speak to you."

America paused for a long moment, giving them time to sweat. "I'm sorry, private. I think I heard you wrong. Did you just tell me you came here without a commanding officer's orders?" He lowered his voice, just slightly. "Because that sounds a little like dereliction of duty."

"It is, sir," Rivera confirmed.

"Do any of you folks know what the punishment for that is?" he asked, raising an eyebrow.

"A fine or court martialling, sir," one of the black soldiers said stiffly from behind his honcho. "And in wartime, the death penalty."

America gave his words time to sink into the hush. By now all of the reporters had fallen silent, realizing that something was going on.

Then he laughed, waving his hand. "Come on now. You ran off to see your Countryhuman, not join the commies in killing our guys. I'd make sure they didn't give you the electric chair." He sobered, looking at them more seriously. "Though with the kind of accusation you just made, I can't promise they wouldn't do more than court martial you. When you go around slinging the enemy's propaganda like that, well… It can make a man sound like an enemy agent."

And he could see they all knew what that meant.

Not death. They weren't like the Rosenbergs, who he was going to see hang if it cost him money. They were just small-fry. But they could still look forward to discharge from the military, loss of their benefits, imprisonment, and blacklisting. Complete ostracization could more than ruin a man's life. And his family's.

"Tell you what," America said congenially once the little group had time to accept the severity of that. "I'm a reasonable guy, so I'm going to give you something the Reds wouldn't- a second chance. Get on back to your posts by the end of the day, and I'll write your commanding officers up a notice to pardon you, just this once."

He could see a few of the reporters nodding. And no reason why they shouldn't. It was a generous offer.

The motley crew looked uncertainly at each other. Then three of them stepped away, the two POW-handling whites and a black, avoiding eye contact as they disappeared into the crowd.

"Don't let him intimidate you!" Rivera ordered. But they were already gone.

Still, America was displeased to see that nine remained. That was enough for two bowling teams and a spare.

The country looked back to the Puerto Rican. “Clock’s ticking.”

His eyes hardened as he looked back at him. “We aren’t leaving.”

A few of the men behind him shifted nervously, but didn’t move.

‘Always something.’

“Alright then,” America said, smiling. “If it’s so important, then why don’t you come on in?”

He waved for his military police to open the gates. They hesitated, then did.

“This is a rare chance,” America said casually as the group flanked his car into the Headquarters. “Usually reporters need an invitation. And their escorts aren’t usually the United States of America.”

He parked the Jeep on the gravel drive, then leapt from the vehicle, taking a stretch. One of the black men was taller than him by a few inches, but he was also younger (obviously) and built like a beanpole. And the Countryhuman more than loomed over Rivera.

“Come on inside,” he invited, starting for the doors fronting the multi-story building.

“We'd rather talk here.”

America gauged the distance between them and the crowd, then put his hands in his pockets. “Alright. So you’re upset there’s not been much progress on the ceasefire front. But I think you’re a little confused- it’s not our side that’s delaying them. It’s the Reds.”

“That’s-!”

Rivera reached back with a hand, quieting the remaining white soldier. “The Reds said they’d give us an armistice right away if we gave up asking for their city. A city that we had no right to ask for in the first place.”

No right? America controlled the skies, even with those toys of CCCP's. He outnumbered the commies eight to one. He had the atom bomb. He had every right to take whatever he wanted.

"That city belonged to us before," he pointed out chipperly, and something flashed across the Puerto Rican's dark eyes that he didn't like. "It's on our side of the Parallel. I'd say it's the Reds that have no right to expect to keep it."

"It never belonged to us," the man said, his hands turning to fists. "And you're the one that kept rejecting the Koreans wanting to set the line at the 38th Parallel."

America arched a brow. "First of all, I'm not responsible for every single thing around here. We're a democracy, unlike our friends to the north."

"Democracy?" Rivera bristled. "Is that what you called it when you invaded and annexed my country? When you took our language and turned us into a sugar plantation?"

Pissed at how little gratitude some people had, but better at maintaining his civility, America held up his hands. "If it weren't for me, you folks would still be slaving away under the Spaniards. But are we here to hash out tired events or the current ones? Because I'm afraid I don't have time for both."

He checked his watch, and the Puerto Rican took a deep breath, allowing America to get back to his points.

"Second of all, I decided that General Ridgway was being unreasonable by asking for Kaesong. That's why he got overruled."

It had been useful for a second, while other things were cooking. But much like water pie, people weren't exactly clamouring for it. Once the pumpkin pie was ready- just in time for Thanksgiving- they'd taken it off the table. America had finally answered Truman's calls, and the man had finally shown sense by consulting with him about it instead of sneaking around behind his back.

And why shouldn't he? As much as America ragged on him for being Prez Pinko, he did want victory in Korea. Even if his idea of it was wearing them down at the current line until they signed over their country, and America's was going back north to burn the Red tendrils, then going even farther to cut the evil out at the root. For now they were aligned over refusing to bow to the commies. So long as the cretins still felt like they had the right to make demands, they weren't ready for an armistice.

And Truman had said a few things that interested him. Things that had him telling Britain to send his Prime Minister- Winston Churchill, back in office, just liked he'd wanted- to pay a little visit to Washington soon.

"But you're still refusing to sign," Rivera accused.

"And you immediately turned around and started accusing them of executing people, and all but saying they were going to regret it!" one of the other island boys cried. "How is that supposed to make them want to make peace?"

America's expression shuttered. "Are you saying you want to make peace with the savages that murdered our men?"

"We've killed far more'a them!" the white man cried in a heavy Texas drawl, his freckles stark against his pallid skin.

"Now wait just a cotton-pickin' minute- No offense intended to present company- but our boys haven't executed a single POW," America said firmly. "That's the commies' truck."

Cords bulged on the man's neck, spots of red high on his cheeks. He glanced over at the reporters that would be pressed to the fence if the military police weren't holding them back, then sagged.

"We've still killed more of them," he said quietly, and America knew he'd have to keep tabs on him after this. A soldier that grew a conscience after the fact was a loose end.

"Do you think that killin' Communist soldiers in combat is the same as them executin' thousands of ours?" he demanded, summoning fire to his voice. "Good, honest men that just wanted to defend their country, your brothers-in-arms, are never going to go home and see their families again because of them."

These people were just like South. He knew damn well that if the kid still wanted a ceasefire, he'd be perfectly fine with brushing America's soldiers under the rug. It didn't matter that they only had proof for a few hundred because they knew thousands had died in the camps, and tens of thousands on the field. It didn't matter whether they were unarmed or not- American men had been killed by a bunch of savage gooks, far more than should've. It was an affront to the natural order, and more importantly an affront to him.

"The 65th Regiment fought to the last minute against the Chinese at the Chosin Resevoir," he continued, incensed. "They died fighting for their country and you're going to disrespect them by pretending it doesn't matter?"

"It isn't our country!" Rivera snapped. "We are Puerto Rican, not American."

Ungrateful. Just like the blacks that complained about how their ancestors were treated or how they were treated. So what if their lives could be better? Because of the slave trade they had access to shit people in Africa could only dream of. Water, hospitals, democracy. If it wasn't for America, they would be swinging in the trees with the monkeys or shining some Spaniard's boots. Instead they were in the greatest country in the world.

"I can't say you're acting very American right now," America observed. "But I hate to break it to you- you are."

He smirked internally as the man's jaw feathered, the feeling roiling in his stomach soothed by the fact that no matter how much they bitched and moaned, no matter how ungrateful they were for everything he did for them, they were his. And that would never change.

"I am an American," an older black man spoke up, his voice rough as the New Orleans streets it sounded like he came from. "Before I'm anythin' else I am American. But why are we fighting for our country in Korea?" He put a callused hand on his chest. "When the Japs bombed Pearl Harbour, I enlisted right away. If you sent me against a hundred Japans I would fight without question and I'd give my damn life for you. But these folks ain't done nothin' to us! Let the Koreans sort out their own problems and let us go home."

"Even if they killed eight thousand prisoners, even if they executed a hundred thousand, they would still be alive if we weren't here," the beanpole said, his eyes shining with pathetic tears. "If this had all ended the first time the commies said we should stop fighting, my brother would still be alive!"

Rivera nodded, his eyes hard. "My countrymen wouldn't be dead if we weren't here fighting the white man's war, the rich man's war. Your war.

"Please." He took a step towards America, and the ice melted to show the desperation behind his eyes. "We've agreed on the line. The fighting at the front's almost stopped. Stop it for good. Tell Van Fleet and Ridgway to go to hell and sign an armistice. All the negotiating crap can come after.

"No one else has to die."

America stared at him, at all of them, face falling blank. They were looking at him with such pleading sincerity.

Tension coiled in the pit of his stomach.

'Cowards.'

Didn't they know? Didn't they see? This wasn't about them, it wasn't about Korea. It wasn't even entirely about America.

It was about the world.

If they didn't stop Communism here it would spread like smallpox, like the plague. This little 'intervention' only proved it. Just like these men who should've had nothing in common, it would make the little countries think they did, would give them ideas. Those ideas would spread, make them think they had a right to be defiant, that America didn't have the right to do what he wanted.

But he did. There was a natural order in the world and he had earned his place in it. He had earned his wealth and influence and power and he would earn his destiny, too. It was what he deserved.

And Korea could jeopardize all of that.

"No."

The word came out flat. He didn't bother dulling it with a smile or prettying it up with any other useless words. These men were too far gone. There wasn't any arguing with drones.

Something passed between the soldiers, like they had known what his answer would be.

Of course they did. They thought America was some great evil, the villain of this show instead of the hero, because that was what their masters told them to think.

Resignation flickered across Rivera's face, and maybe fear, too. Definitely fear.

Then his expression froze back over. "Then we're done."

"We're not dying for you anymore!" spat another spic.

The Texan man's eyes gleamed with that deadly cocktail of guilt and grief. "And we ain't killin' for you either."

"The people here just want to live their lives," Rivera said, puffed up like a bullfrog, emboldened by his little buddies, like America couldn't destroy his life with a phone call. "They have hopes, dreams, families like us. And you sent us here to snuff them all out just so you can colonize Korea like you did Puerto Rico."

He jabbed a finger at him, and if there weren't eyes, America would have broken it. Well we won't do it anymore. I'm not going home to my mamá in a box, and I'm not sending some Korean or Chinese home to theirs that way, either, just so you can have one more sugar plantation. No matter how much you pay me."

His lips pressed together as he drew himself up to look America in the covered eyes.

“None of our lives have a cost.”

“You realize what you’re saying, don’t you?” America asked flatly.

“I do,” Rivera said with confidence. The men behind him now showed no hint of hesitance as they confirmed that they did, too.

“Then don't say I didn't warn you.” Baring his teeth in a grin, America declared with the bite of a guillotine, “As the Commander Supreme of the US Army, for the counts of dereliction of duty and suspected espionage, you are hereby dishonourably discharged. Effective immediately.”

He snapped his fingers and the trio of military police that had been watching from the door since the beginning marched over, rounding the men up and marching them for the building. They’d be detained there to avoid them saying anything they shouldn’t to the crowd of press.

Rivera tore himself away from the man restraining his arms, shouting back at America, his voice echoing around the yard, “You can silence us, but you can’t change the fact that you’re sacrificing my people, Koreans, and Americans to line your own pockets! I'm leaving Korea with less honour than I came here with, and it's still more honour than you've ever had!”

The military police officer slammed the butt of his gun into his back, knocking him to his knees before dragging him roughly away.

America stood rooted, watching the traitors disappear into the red-brick building, rage bubbling inside his guts.

How had he done it?

He knew his boys in the commie camps were being brainwashed. The ones they’d freed on the way north had said the Norks fed them enough bull about ‘class solidarity’ and ‘internationalism,’ and the ones released last winter said it had only grown worse with the Chinese. The only reason they didn’t execute his men by the thousands was so they could fill their brain with nonsense, trick them into thinking they were the heroes. He knew right now, as he stood there, thousands of his Doughboys were being brainwashed into being anti-American, to come home hating the greatest country in the world, the country that gave them everything.

But how had CCCP gotten to the ones here? The holding camps? There shouldn't have been any chance to talk to the prisoners. They were in and out now, and even back when they'd been backed up, a guard talking through the fence too often would have been noticed. And not all of them had been guards. How did someone on the front get brainwashed?

America's teeth grit together as an unpleasant thought threaded roots through his mind.

Was CCCP farther along with brainwashing than he'd thought? Some kind of signal or something in the air? Those MiGs had been roaming farther than usual lately, and he just knew every single one of 'em had a Ruskie in the cockpit. No Oriental could fly a plane with such skill. Were they spreading some sort of chemical over his troops to turn them against him?

That would be ironic, all things considered. But America couldn't find any humour in it.

He couldn't let CCCP beat him at finding a way into people's skulls. If he did then anyone could become a Communist, anyone could be turned against America. Not just your average redneck or ungrateful coloured schmuck, but men of standing, men with wealth and influence and power. Men that mattered.

He had to step up the work the Psychological Strategy Board was doing in the POW camps and he had to do it now. He was the only person that could be trusted to hold the power to change minds, America was the only country that could be trusted to decide what people should think.

He could start with the vultures that had just heard what that uppity spic said. He knew he could wave the situation away, and even if he didn't, the story would be in and out of the papers in a month, just how it had always been and just like it always would be, so long as he beat CCCP at his own game.

And then he could move on to the Soviet's pawns. They'd still be court martialled and imprisoned, but he could spare them from what would come after by finding out what CCCP had done to them, and forcing them to come to their senses. He would undo their brainwashing and make them love America again.

He would save them.

—

High in the mountains north of Kanggye, a Korean woman slogged laboriously through the moonlit snow. Her thick skirts were wet, but her feet were warm, courtesy of the boots delivered to her by Chinese soldiers at the winter's start. In one hand was the small mittened hand of a boy. The other was empty, and ached for it.

Her eyes strained as they panned the thinner snow under the trees, occasionally stooping to scuffle through it, searching for the slightest glimpse of colour, an unwithered plant or an animal frozen underneath, as she had been doing all day. As the widow of a soldier, and mother of a child, she received rations. But her son was growing, and needed every bit of food she could get him. So she checked the hollows of trees, feeling around with frozen fingers for a stash of nuts left by a chipmunk or squirrel.

Overhead, a low drone sounded. She spared it a glance, another chill running along her spine, colder than the ice and snow sheathing the conifers around her.

There had been more friendly planes in the skies these days. But this one was American, and not one of ones that took the route through the mountains to spy on the Chinese across the river.

Its silhouette was featureless against the backdrop of stars, but she knew it was one of the bloated silver monstrosities that always showed up during blitzes.

She doubted it could see her in the shadows down below, but still she tugged her son farther under the cover of the trees. She could hear more droning overhead, and knew it had smaller, sleeker craft escorting it. The type with yellow markings on their wings that made her think of poisonous insects. They would sometimes use their fast guns to sweep over people caught in the open. Her last foraging mission had found one of them, buried under the snow, riddled with slugs. She would have to report this plane to the local People's Committee, just as she'd reported the corpse.

"Look, mom!" her son suddenly cried. "A bomb!"

The woman spun, instinctively pulling him behind her, her mind whirling as she thought of dull eyes and flushed skin and 'There's nothing we can do, she's too far gone.'

'Nothimpleasedon'ttakehimandnot-'

The explosion was dull, almost weak, as the strange orb that had fallen from the plane burst in mid-air. There wasn't a flash of light or burst of flame like she'd seen over Kanggye before. It just vanished.

She waited with bated breath, remembering the way the bombs would sometimes wait to explode, luring rescuers in. But after a long moment, she let out a sigh of relief.

A leaflet bomb. The Americans dropped them all the time, saying that the Chinese were trying to take over Korea or that the People's Government was wicked.

She had never read them, just like she had never taken the surrender tickets they dropped to encourage their soldiers to turn themselves in. Even though they were for the army, she knew some people in the same situation as her pocketed them, just in case. Not her. If the Americans reached Chagang province again, she would send her son to China and stay to protect the small grave in the cemetery.

She knew who had brought her extra rations and building materials, and who had murdered her husband and burned her home to the ground, forcing her out into the unforgiving cold with her son and daughter.

Suddenly her son's hand was tugged from her grasp as he ran forward.

"Did you see that?" he asked excitedly. "I could see it against the moon- it looked like something came out!"

Before she could answer, he charged off into the woods, ignoring her calls.

"Ki-mun!"

His voice echoed out of the dark trees. "We might get more to eat if we show the papers to the army guys!"

The woman heaved a sigh. The wood in the jige on her back rattled as she ran after him, each step arduous in the deep snow, until she emerged in a clearing on a hillside. The trees ringing the far side were sparse, allowing her to catch a glimpse of the darkened village that sat in the valley below.

Ki-mun stood just out of the trees, transfixed. She reached him, panting.

"The next time you go running off on your own, you're getting…" She trailed off as the thin moonlight revealed what he was looking at.

Beetles.

They covered the open space, a writhing mass of brown shells and long feelers. They climbed over each other and scuttled over the snow with a sound like whispers in a foreign language. Some were stuck on their backs, spindly legs waving helplessly at the black sky. Some were thin and some were fat, but none was bigger than her thumb. She could see that more of them writhing in and under the trees to the sides of the clearing, disappearing under the shadow of the conifers.

One scuttled by her foot, allowing her to see the little white spots on its car apace, glowing under the moon, and she realized she knew what they were- white-marked spider beetles. They'd used to plague the pantry, chewing through sacks of rice and getting into the potatoes.

But she'd never seen them in the open like this before. And never so many.

As she stared at the shadowy, roiling mass of insects, she felt a primal revulsion rise in her stomach, along with the hairs on her arms.

Ki-mun crouched, reaching for one with a bare hand.

"Don't touch them!"

His neck cracked around, staring at his mother with wide eyes, unused to her snapping like that.

The woman seized him by the arm, dragging him away from the clearing, swiping at his thin coat and her own, shaking out the knot of hair at the base of her neck and dropping her jige to check it, feeling suddenly dirty and itchy.

Satisfied that none of the creatures had gotten on them, she hustled her son away from the unnatural sight, looking over her shoulder one last time.

A beetle dropped from a tree onto the snow where they'd been standing.

She could still hear the drone of the planes in the distance.

Adolfo <3 Also for reference he prefers to have stubble, but he shaved to look presentable to confront America. And the chapter name is referencing Grito de Jayuya (Cry of Jayuya), which was an uprising in Puerto Rico against the American occupation in October 1950.

Comrades... I hate to say it, but Taylor Swift finally made a bad song. What do you mean 'redwood tree his love was the key that opened my thighs.' That album was so nothing that I was glad when my food processor started smoking and I got the chance to forget I was listening to it. Every single song. I wonder if it's because her soul is rotting like an overripe persimmon.

Okay, finally getting to the finer details of the POW execution claim. It comes after the album complaint because honestly I care more about Taylor Swift's music (not Taylor Swift) than American soldiers. So after over a week of negotiations, the KPA/PVA agreed on having the front as the ceasefire line. They had been suggesting that combat should cease immediately after the line was decided on, but Van Fleet said business would continue 'as usual' until the 'Communist aggressors terminate their violation of human liberty.' Which begs the question- if the US has decided what violating human liberty is, then do they also decide when that ends? If they decide it hasn't, will business continue 'as usual' forever? Ironically, he said this on American Armistice Day. On that same day, November 11th, Ridgway suddenly demanded Kaesong. Same man who has been rejecting returning to the 38th Parallel in the areas the US army was north of it for months now wants to return to it in the areas they're south of it. There is literally no explanation for this beyond either trying to prove that the US can do whatever it wants or intentionally trying to stretch out the talks. At this point even papers like the New York Times and more conservative ones in America were questioning why they didn't just sign a ceasefire. Then on the 13th, Ridgway told the UN that 8000 American POWs had been executed, 7000 by the North Koreans and 1000 by the Chinese. The next day, James Hanley talked to war correspondents and told them that 5500 American and 290 Allied had been executed, and that the Chinese were responsible for most of them. Two days later, Hanley says 6270 Americans, 7000 South Koreans, and 130 Allied were executed. The next day, Ridgway confirms what he says. Three days later, Ridgway says it's possible that 6000 of the MIA America soldiers might have been executed, but they can only prove 365. His UN report from the 13th doesn't come to public attention until two days later. After it does, on the 29th Ridgway holds another conference and says numbers are always up to re-evaluation and 8000 was the first guess, but 6000 is the right one, for all UN soldiers, not just American (and not counting SK and there's still only proof for 365).

Now a year earlier in November 1950, MacArthur was still in charge and he had estimated that 400 American prisoners were killed before the Chinese entered the war. Yet James Hanley's report estimated far more- 3000. But his only specific mention for this time period was a sourceless story about 1250 prisoners being marched from Pyongyang to the Amnok during the tactical retreat and being fed rice and wine before being executed. Why would the KPA go through the trouble of escorting them all the way to the Amnok during a difficult withdrawal before killing them? Why would they feed them just to kill them after the last two summers were droughts, their harvest was interrupted by the retreat, and they were pressed up against the border in a small mountainous area with limited supplies? If North Korean soldiers did do this, it seems clear it couldn't have been an order from above when they were ordering not to celebrate holidays or leave offerings for the ancestors to conserve food. And also, though this was apparently in September of last year, MacArthur never reported on it. After the PVA entered the war, Hanley says that 2500 were executed. But MacArthur said none were. He even said that Chinese soldiers protected American POWs when North Korean civilians tried to go after them. No Chinese war crimes were reported until next June when 7 Americans were executed at the front. (Side note I hate when they go 'Oh the Chinese were so civilized to our soldiers, unlike those savage North Koreans.' Yeah, because the Chinese weren't the ones whose home you invaded and families you murdered. Don't act like they're the savages when you are the ones invading *them.) Hanley gives the numbers of 147 Americans by the North Koreans, 2513 by the Chinese, and 130 Allied as well. But the only specific instances he mentions are 200 American Marines in December 1950, 17 Turks in May 1951, and 12 Turks in April 1951. MacArthur also never mentioned the 200 Americans, yet Hanley doesn't say how they learned the information. Journalist I.F. Stone says that he spoke to a Marine Corps liaison at the Pentagon and that the officer in charge said they had no record of the incident. None of Ridgway's previous reports after he took over mention it either. In April he said 6 UN soldiers were killed by North Koreans in September 1950. In May he said 2 Americans had been killed, 1 by KPA, one by PVA, and 10 Americans and 1 SK by guerrillas (remember, the US army is not responsible for any guerrilla actions and actual South Korean NDA actions when they massacre civilians, but the KPA and PVA and every single government figure are directly responsible for any Communist guerrilla actions). Yet suddenly in November 1951, the number skyrockets to 8000 (then 6000) without any explanation. I.F. Stone conducted these investigations back in 1952, but even in this current year, no evidence has ever surfaced for 8000 executed American POWs (though plenty did die in the camps of disease and starvation). In two weeks, the story faded from the news. Ridgway never brought it up again in the talks, even when discussing POWs. Fascinating how something that filled them with such righteous fury could just be forgotten like that. Almost like they were just using it to turn public opinion against a ceasefire, then wanted people to stop thinking about it after.

I* think it would be just for the North Koreans to execute 8000 American soldiers, considering- 300 or more innocent civilians at Nogun-ri, some say 400. Either way that's almost as many civilians directly executed by the American army at one time as their executed soldiers that they have proof for in over one year of war. And almost 15 000 civilians at Jeju, likely more, 100 000 purged in the south before the war 'began,' and that's being generous. Another 100 000 soon after. And that's not even counting the massacres in the North, the villages that were literally wiped off the map by napalm, or those killed by reactionary guerrilla groups infiltrating during the stalemate. Because if we're going by the US's own logic then their army and every single person in their government is responsible for everything Rhee's army and youth groups did. And in this case they really were. They were in charge and had heard Rhee advocate for war crimes multiple times, such as when he talked about burying Communists with a bulldozer. They were aware that South Korean officers were vicious. Orders were captured that showed that the North Korean government ordered strict handling of POWs and always openly advocated good treatment. The Americans never punished their own, just like they didn't punish the pilot that killed the boy at Kaesong. The mass murders that were interrupted by other UN soldiers never resulted in anyone being charged. They actively stoked hatred by making up those numbers and broadcasting them to their soldiers at a time when peace was near. They painted the North Koreans as savage and bloodthirsty for the act of trying to defend their homeland in the exact same way they did to their own Indigenous people. A dead white American is a sin, anyone else is just a casualty of war. They invaded their home, cut it in half, separated families, burnt every single city to the ground, and murdered hundreds of thousands for nothing. Working class American soldiers shouldn't have deserved to suffer. But they chose to come to Korea, they chose to rape and murder, and even the most 'innocent' chose to kill people protecting their home. So if they did, I really don't care. You had no right to kill even one of them and they had every right to kill every single one of you.

Alas, by the fact that they didn't do that, or kill even 6000, it seems the North Koreans and Chinese are better people than me. On average. Has to be a few reactionaries there that would lift my scale.

Read I.F. Stone's 'The Hidden History of the Korean War' for mo re details. It's old, but has never been disproven, and all his sources for the statements are in there.

Commander Supreme is America's (made up) appointed title, like commander-in-chief is the US President's appointed title. But he is also a general in his army. Modern day America is no longer Commander Supreme, and doesn't flaunt his general status unless a situation calls for it. In the late 80s he works at distancing himself visibly even further from military actions. It's why he also has no actual governmental position, so he has plausible deniability for every awful thing they do. Vietnam was the main motivator for this because his personal popularity fell farther than it ever did before, even during his invasion of Korea. So when the Iraq invasion came around, his popularity stayed high because he 'had nothing to do with it.'

Same Old Game

"I demand to speak with America."

The irksome man outside South Chungcheong's door let out another in a string of increasingly long sighs. "For the last time- Mr. America isn't even here. He's. In. Seoul. Because he has more important things to do than waste time talking to a foreign province. Unlike your country, he actually does shit."

"Stop responding, man," the other jailor muttered. "Ignore her long enough and the bitch'll get tired."

South Chungcheong grit her teeth. "If a week was not enough to become tired, then what makes you think more weeks will be?"

She spoke slow and clear, trying to wrap her tongue around the alien English words, to eliminate the rounded consonants her accent attempted to grace them with, and make them as jagged and breathy as its native speakers did. She had no respect for the barbaric language, but could not stand the way the foreigners outside snickered and parroted her words back to each other, turning her 'l's' to 'r's' and making them far harsher than they had ever left her lips. Speaking the dialect made her feel childish and stupid, unable to translate the far superior words in her lexicon into anything even half as advanced. The bumpkin's frustration when confronting her for criticizing her lacklustre Korean skills was understandable now.

South Chungcheong felt no regret for that. 'Twas a difference between speaking your native tongue poorly and that of savages whose language she should have heard the last of a year ago.

"If you want to talk to someone so bad, maybe I could come in there," the cruder jailor said in a tone South Chungcheong was well-acquainted with from her secretarial days. "I'm sure we could find plenty to talk about."

From ‘You must be lonely in that little house. Maybe I could come keep you company sometime?’ to ‘You’re always working so hard. If you stayed a little later tonight, we could have some drinks in my office.’ The words were always light and innocent, only twisting towards the end, the inflection darkening as their lechery could not help but seep through. But never enough to protest. Any claim of impropriety would only ever be met by a victim’s hurt and a deflection of ‘I was just trying to be friendly!’

Not that South Chungcheong had ever complained of it, to the perpetrators or any other. She had witnessed too many other brainless women find themselves fired after whining about inappropriate behaviour, not understanding that those whose responsibility was ostensibly to put an end to anything of the sort were truly only there to protect the men in charge from their own actions, not those under them.

Victims sought others in an attempt to put men in their place. South Chungcheong had her own methods.

“I am sure any talk we had would be short and unsatisfying,” she clipped, imbuing her tone with all the distaste in Korea. “Is that not why your wife left you for your gardener?”

There was a stunned silence as the other man barked a laugh. “What’s with the face, Sheets? That is why your ‘rife reft you,’ isn’t it?”

“I am hearing that divorce is very hard in your shameful country,” South Chungcheong continued to the door between them. “But since you married a whore, I am sure it will be given to you. Though I do not believe it is easy for men to keep the child when parting, especially if it is a girl-child.”

She knew well it was not easy. The man had been fretting over losing his daughter ever since he had received the letter and read it aloud to his partner.

“You shut up, cunt!” the man snarled, his desire to strike her evident even through the door.

"If I am quiet, I will hear everything you say as I stand by this door," South Chungcheong sniffed. "I do not want to. I find your speaking very unpleasant." She cursed not knowing how to say 'droll.' "And I will use what I hear until you let me speak to America. But if you let me speak to him now, I return to needle-work and you return to being a cuckhold in peace."

She had refused to ever speak English when the abhorrent language was forced upon her after the Division. But she had memorized several insults and slurs so that if she was ever truly pressed, she could communicate concisely. 'Cuckhold' was one of those. She had to admit that as much as she despised how clumsy it felt in her mouth, she was quite pleased at the opportunity to wield it.

"Here's a better idea." The cuckhold's voice was tight. "Why don't I come in there and teach you a lesson about eavesdropping?"

She no longer dreaded the possibility as she had before the southern one's visit months ago. She was no longer entirely helpless. Yet her hands still clenched at the thought.

But she could not back down. She had taken her jasu hoop off the windowsill after a week, pulling every thread out, unweaving the crimson and gold magnolia and their emerald leaves to dispose of the evidence. If he had received the message, he would be waiting for the next, which meant he would be lurking nearby, and had been for almost two months. Every day that passed was one in which they were both in greater danger.

"I would like to see you try," she said, keeping her words steady. "I am sure any lesson from you would be so small it was meaningless."

There was a thump and rattle of keys as he aggressively shoved them into the lock, his partner trying to talk him down. The door shuddered and South Chungcheong took a step back while she still could, staring it down as it slammed open to reveal her guard and his unpleasantly doglike countenance.

"Listen here, you bitch," he growled like one of the beasts as he took a step over her threshold. "We may not be allowed to fuck you up, but that doesn't mean we have to take it when you get mouthy."

South Chungcheong did not retreat, tilting her chin arrogantly. "So your threats are too meaningless? It is good you will lose your child. She should not have a weak father. Maybe the gardener will teach her his own lessons."

The man's eyes flashed and he started forward, only to be yanked back by the other.

"Watch it, man," he muttered, jerking his misshapen head over his lumpy shoulder. "America's coming this way."

"America is back? Perfect." Before they could stop her, South Chungcheong strode past them and down the drive, heading for the gate as the ugly green foreign vehicle rolled down the street with the uglier red-white-and-blue foreigner inside.

"America!" she called stridently. "I needs must converse with you!"

The Jeep stopped abruptly in front of her gate, and the Countryhuman leaned out of the window, grinning. "You? Want to talk to li'l ole me? Ah thought the day would nevah come."

A chill shivered down South Chungcheong's spine from more than the chilled air of November in Busan.

Despite his gleaming grin and cheerful bumpkin accent, in the second before he had looked her way, the foreign man had looked nothing but empty. South Chungcheong had years of experience in gauging the temperaments of men, in identifying when it was safe to enter their offices or if it was wiser to turn a report in late than to approach them now. She knew their moods.

And America was not in a good one.

"I would," she confirmed, though there were very few things she had ever wanted to do less. "Now call off your dogs. I do not think they need to wave their guns around so for one woman."

America looked to her guards, who had sprinted after her to loom menacingly, their firearms pointed at her. “Care to explain how she got out?” he asked amicably.

“Just letting her stretch her legs, sir.” The more unpleasant jailor sounded nothing like he had previously. His tone was firm, imbued with respect now that he was speaking to a high-ranking male.

“I could’ve sworn I told you your orders were to keep her inside at all times.” America raised an eyebrow. “She’s well-behaved- Well, relatively.” He sent her a little wink to remind her of their encounter in the POW holding camp. “But we still don’t want a repeat of that other incident, do we?”

South Chungcheong knew what he was speaking of. On Liberation Day, one of the other provinces- of course it was that imbecile who could be called her brother- had used the small bit of freedom his jailors had allowed him to scream his fool head off in his yard, attempting to overcome the Commands in his hopes of broadcasting his reluctance to be in South’s possession. After that, she had been forbidden from setting foot outside her door to even stand in the yard, let alone go on the occasional heavily-supervised foray. The only light she had seen in months was that which was cast around the crosses taped over her windows.

As much as she loathed the other Chungcheong, she begrudged him not for the loss of the ‘privilege.’ Foreigners should not be able to deprive or grant their freedoms. Her ire was on America, and the Southern one for allowing it.

Yet it was undeniable that if she were still allowed to walk the streets, this would be far easier.

“No, sir,” the jailors clipped. “It won’t happen again, sir.”

Certainly knowing there had been more to the situation, America disregarded it and turned his head to her. “So what do you want to talk about, dame?”

South Chungcheong steeled herself. “I have been hearing rumours.”

“Oh?” The man raised a brow. “And how have you been hearing anything all cooped up in your house?”

Having had the foresight to make sure the items she needed were on her person before harassing her jailors, South Chungcheong reached into the skirt of her choson-ot and pulled something out, presenting it to him.

“I enjoy staying informed of the National Defense Army’s efforts against the Communists,” she said, just as crisply as the newspaper was folded. “I did not enjoy some of the words I happened upon in here.”

“Oh yeah?” America gave an ugly smirk. “And which words would those be?”

“Ones best discussed in private.”

She kept her fingers tight, but not tense on the paper. If this failed to work she would need to devise some other means to leave her prison, which would be made even more difficult now.

America eyed her as a wolf would eye a goat that strayed too far into the mountains, then showed his teeth once more. “Alright. Why don’t you come on over to my place then?”

With a gesture, he bade her jailors open the gate. It squealed the way the bars of a real prison cell would.

South Chungcheong marched through, head up, her feet leaving that of her commandeered property for the first time in over three moons. It could have been shorter, but that would have required not slamming the door in the southern one’s face on Liberation Day.

She would not run if she could. But she could not anyways. An experimental thought revealed that the Commands would halt her feet. Her leash had been loosened, not removed, as she had already known.

America leapt from his vehicle, smoothly opening the door on the far side for her. South Chungcheong climbed in, clasping her hands in her lap. She spared no glances for the two manors between hers and the Southern Korea’s, nor for his. The small window that faced North Gyeongsang's in her disgustingly Western kitchen had been completely boarded over. She had no doubt that her neighbour's had been as well. And she doubted he would be looking out the front.

She knew South would not be.

She remained tense until they pulled into the drive of America’s stolen mansion and her feet were once more on the ground. He had not driven her to an unknown location.

But anything could happen inside.

South Chungcheong kept her eyes on the front door as she approached, not wavering to the barbed wire that topped the white wall that encircled the building, nor the men in uniform that leered at her as she passed. She waited imperiously for America to unlock the door and beckon her in, ignoring his mocking bow as he did.

The entryway loomed before her like so many office doors once had. The coatrack and scattered footwear might appear normal, as did the glossy hardwood floor that extended beyond the tiles of the shoe stoop. But South Chungcheong was not fooled- this was a man’s space. And stepping into it would be the same as every gamble she had taken during the Occupation. Every time she set foot in a man’s office, whether it was to hand over financial reports or another damned coaster, was a risk. It was placing yourself in the hands of the man behind the desk, giving him the chance to isolate you, not knowing if this would be the day you looked too good or he felt too small, and needed to prove he still had power. So many women she had worked with had lost that gamble, but never her.

She had not been supposed to play these games again.

Gritting her teeth, cursing America and the southern one and her idiot brother and that little bumpkin and harlot and the person who had promised that to her in the first place, South Chungcheong stepped into America’s office.

The door slammed behind her.

"Hey, Gracie," America called into the depths of the darkened house. "Get decent, babe. Gonna need you to take a walk for a bit."

After a few moments, the Yankee wench emerged from around the corner, gaze obscured by the same foolish eyewear as her master.

"The other boys are on their lunch break, but get Samson to take you down the road for a bit," he ordered, strolling onto the wooden floor in his soggy boots. "And turn on a light once in awhile, the blackout's only at night."

The girl nodded obediently, slinking down the hall to put on her coat and boots. As she knelt to tie the laces, she eyed the province. South Chungcheong eyed her back distastefully.

"Don't worry, babe," America said casually. "I'm not going to cheat on ya with the dame. You know I'm an honest man."

The woman bobbed her head. "I know," she echoed.

South Chungcheong curled her lip. She knew exactly what type of female Grace Hartman was- not one of the women that lost the gamble, but one of the ones that wanted to, then saw it as winning.

Even with the faded bruises revealed under her vapid blue eyes as she looked up from behind the aviators, she still thought she was a player, not a piece.

As she opened the door, the Countryhuman said in a more serious tone, "And Grace? If you see a commie plane coming, get inside."

"Does the North command such fleets that he can now send them all the way to Busan?" South Chungcheong asked sarcastically, fishing for information that could not be published in the newspapers.

"Nope," America said, back to cheerful after Grace agreed and left. "We destroyed the planes the chinks sent in months ago. I'm in control of the skies, so you don't have to worry a bit, dame." He looked around the obviously empty entryway, then said in a conspiratorial voice, "But you know how the Reds accused us of using germ warfare last year? I've been thinking- what if they did it to themselves just to blame me? And if that's the case, that means they know how to use germ warfare. And all it would take was one plane loaded with something nasty making it past mine to wreak havoc on this filthy little city. I'd rather my girl didn't get the clap delivered via Red bomber."

South Chungcheong did not let her thoughts at any of those sentences show on her face, beyond a wisp of disgust.

There had to be more to it. It had not just been his voice that lowered when warning his whore, but his mood. The hallway had grown darker for a moment. He was thinking of something deeper than his obviously false claims.

The province paid no further thought to it. As soon as that door had closed, she had been left with one objective- escape this encounter so she could do what she must.

America set off down the hall, she on his heels. The foreigner had set out no inside slippers for guests, and was slovenly enough to traipse around in his filthy military boots, so she kept her outdoor shoes on. Though it felt sacrilegious, it also gave her pleasure to get melted snow on his stolen floors.

And they would allow her a quick escape.

"Is this an office talk or parlour talk?"

"Office," South Chungcheong said, knowing he would choose the opposite.

"Parlour it is!"

As unpredictable as the foreign country was, he was not nearly as unpredictable as he thought. He was still a man.

South Chungcheong gazed disdainfully around the sitting room. A small bar lined the back wall, with a cold fireplace across from it, and a cluster of Western-style furnishings set nearby, patterned in cream and paisley.

Those with money always seemed to spend as much of it as possible to make their demesne appear as far from Korean as possible, hoping it would make them as far from it, too, turning them into the foreigners they so idolized.

'Disgusting.'

"You know, dame," America remarked as he sauntered over from the bar. "Southie's right- you'd look a lot prettier if you didn't look like you were sucking on a lemon half… all the time."

'And you would look prettier if you shut your maw ever.'

South Chungcheong stayed frostily silent, perching on the edge of an overstuffed armchair on the opposite side of the small table, pointedly ignoring both the gesture to sit on the sofa with him and the glass of amber alcohol slid her way.

"Sorry it's so chilly," the man said, settling in. "Grace always forgets to light the fire, no matter how much I remind her. You're probably used to the cold, though, right, Ice Queen?"

"I did not come here for small talk," she said icily. "I came here for this."

South Chungcheong pulled the newspaper page from her pocket once more, unfolding it and slapping it down on the table with force, headline turned to America, though he surely already knew what it proclaimed.

'RED PROVINCE PRINCESS FORMER PROSTITUTE.'

The rest of the article was just as crude, using the vulgar language lesser 'independent' newspapers got away with more easily. It contained mockery for all those who hailed from the province, demands to know just what kinds of people the Northern Korea let into his halls of power, and detailed three anonymous males' encounters with visiting a brothel in Kanggye during the Occupation, and buying South Hamgyong for sex.

South Chungcheong did not lower her eyes to the paper as America scanned it. She had read it once. 'Twas enough.

Korea had an obsession with information-gathering. Undoubtedly he had seen this article already, or another print of it. This one was already twelve days old when she received it a week ago, and she had no way of knowing if it was breaking news or not.

But whether it was the first print or thirtieth, she knew it would not be the last print.

The harlot would not read reactionary papers, intent on keeping any negative emotions as far from herself as possible, per usual. But would he have shown her?

Doubtful. He had always been a hypocrite. He would keep her sheltered even as degenerates whispered and pointed behind her back, even though he would despise if one of them did the same to him.

South Chungcheong would have relished seeing the look on the harlot's face if she did read it. Maybe then that pitiful mask of hers would finally crack, and she would finally have to face what she was- a whore.

"Huh," America said when he was done reading. "Guess some of her Johns came forward."

"With absolutely no financial incentive at all, I am sure," South Chungcheong clipped. "If they even exist."

"You think the free press would lie to you?" America placed a hand on his broad chest as if personally slighted.

"I think any man that had lain with a Provincehuman would be eager to attach his name to the deed."

The male pointed at her rudely. "You might be right about that. You have no idea how many boyfriends Cali's had to pay off. But why was showing this to me so important? If I wanted to read spicy stories, I'd have a few volumes of the girlie pulps shipped over."

South Chungcheong straightened, clasping her hands professionally in her lap. "I want this removed from the papers."

America leaned back. “And what do you expect me to do about that?”

“Let us not waste time with games,” the Korean said scornfully. “I am well aware that no official newspaper in this half of the country gets published without your acceptance, if not your outright permission.”

“Let’s say that was true.” America swirled his drink in his glass. “Would you have a problem with that, dame?”

“I care not,” she replied immediately. “I understand the importance of controlling the narrative. The North is incredibly persuasive.”

“He is, isn’t he?” America took a long sip of foreign ale, looking contemplatively somewhere over her shoulder.

South Chungcheong snapped her fingers to regain his attention. “I know that if you give the word, this vulgar story will be removed. I want you to do it.”

“You know.” Something in the man’s voice made the province’s hands clasp tighter. “You didn’t exactly strike me as the type to be concerned for that doll’s honour. If I recall correctly from what Southie got out of you and the others with the Commands, you two can’t stand each other. And I know you can’t stand me. I don’t think you’d stop giving me the cold shoulder just to stand up for the doll.”

The foreigner leaned forward, his aviators gleaming darkly, and the oxygen in the room thinned. “So what’s your angle, babe? Why are you really here?”

Heart pounding in her breast, South Chungcheong remained poised, her spine so straight it ached, trying not to think of the other item in her pockets. She had been dreading this.

‘Precision, poise, grace. They cannot see you falter.’

“You are correct,” she said succinctly. “I cannot stand South Hamgyong, nor she I.”

The harlot was too naïve, too emotional, too desperate to please. That eagerness to serve had never left her, no matter how she chided South Chungcheong for being traditional-minded, or babbled about women deserving to be masters of themselves. She would never master herself if she continued to refuse what she was. All of what she was. Just as the female Chungcheong had only been able to free herself from the game once she acknowledged that she had never been a real player in it, only a pawn.

'Pathetic.' She despised the woman even more than her imbecile of a brother.

"But this has nothing to do with her."

It did not. Perhaps she had felt the slightest flicker as she beheld those words for the first time. But that was all it was. She was not Korea, 'twas not her responsibility to cover up the harlot's past, and she would not be risking herself like this if the story had not given her the opportunity she needed.

"Oh?" America said. "That sounds pretty harsh, babe. No sympathy for what your dear sweet cousin went through? I mean, it sounds like these Johns had a great time." He patted the newspaper on the table. "But reading in-between the lines…" Pulling a face, he said, "Eesh. How long did she have to do that for? Nine years? How many men do ya think she had to screw?"

"South Hamgyong chose to be a whore," South Chungcheong said coldly. "She had to expect she would be exposed one day. She is only reaping what she sowed. But I sowed nothing."

"I didn't see your name in the article, dame." America squinted at it over his aviators. "Think you might be imagining things."

"My name is not mentioned," the province confirmed. "But if this is allowed to stand, how long until it is? If questions are being raised by the masses about the explanations of what the northern provinces were being subjected to during the Occupation, will they not soon turn to questioning those of us in the south?"

Despite the article's indignant tone as it accused the northern government of hiding the truth of South Hamgyong's past, Rhee's government had also hid the Jeollas' shame. It had hid all of theirs, distancing them from the indignities they had suffered and the revolutionaries they had been. And from the Northern Korea. If one read only the official story, they could not be blamed for thinking that the southern provinces had tolerated nine to ten years of oppression, then either gone into hiding or fled to China as the Southern Korea had.

"If one female province was being sold, would they not start to think that perhaps others were, too?" South Chungcheong's lip twitched in disgust. "I will not tolerate my name being covered in dirt."

It was dangerous to say it so clearly, and the largest part of why she would not be here if 'tweren't necessary. If he knew how much she truly loathed the idea of such slander being spread about her, he may decide to have a tale crafted just to prove that he could. It was what men did.

Staring into the dark surfaces of America's aviators, she willed him to believe that was the whole truth.

"Hmm." After a fraught moment, he leaned back again. "So you want me to cut a real story- assuming I can- before someone thinks they should attach their name to lying with you?"

"Correct."

He smirked, resting his arms behind his head, and South Chungcheong's pulse calmed the slightest bit. Clearly he was not going to just give in. But he had bought her motive of self-preservation.

"So," the foreigner drawled. "You want something from me. Now normally I'd just do it out of the good of my heart. But you haven't exactly been the nicest to me. I'm a guest in your country, but you've insulted me and my girl, tried to hit me, cut me, and given me the evil eye more times than a man can count."

His smile dropped, voice lowering. "And I'm still missing a set of keys."

South Chungcheong's expression did not twitch.

"So!" His white teeth returned. "I'm not exactly feeling filled with charity, which means we're going to have to pull out the ol' law of equivalent exchange. If you want something, you're going to have to give me something of equal value in return. And this seems pre-tty important to you."

The man cocked his head predatorily, and even through his dark lenses, she could feel his gaze crawling over her. "What are you willing to give me to convince me to pull that story, dame?"

"There is nothing you want from me that I would ever consider giving," South Chungcheong replied coldly, smothering the urge to add her arms to the protection her dark violet jeogori gave her chest. It had been decades since she had not simply been able to strike a gawker with words or hand.

With a 'tsk,' America shook his head. "You're a poor negotiator, babe. Never show you're playing with a dud hand from the start."

"Is that what I said?" She arched a brow. "There is nothing I will give you. That does not mean I have nothing to negotiate with."

"If everything fun's off the table, what's left?"

She drew herself up, her tone firm and composed. "If you see to it that that story is never printed nor whispered about again, I will make sure that another rumour I have heard never makes its way to the press."

"And what rumour would that be?" America asked dangerously. "Not the kind you tried to fill Southie's head with, I trust. 'Cuz that would end poorly for you, babe."

"South Hamgyong and the Jeollas worked as prostitutes for six to nine years," she told him. "South Hamgyong was forced into sex slavery after only being in Japanese hands for a few days. Your puppet was with Japan for far longer."

America stared at her, his smile fading. She stared coolly back.

"Are you saying what I think you're saying?" he asked eventually.

"Japan was a degenerate country," she said smoothly. "He was and is filled with sick perversion, as I am sure you are aware. There is not a single thing he could be accused of that my people would not believe."

After another pause, America said, "You realize that could apply to North Korea, too, right?"

"And why would I care?" She glanced at her nails. "Though I do believe most would be less willing to believe something of that nature had happened to him. He is strong, domineering, aggressive. Everything a man should be. But your puppet-boy is…" She looked up, wrinkling her face. "Soft. Submissive. Almost a woman already, some may say."

He was pathetic. And America knew that just as well as she. The Southern one made the perfect little poster boy for convincing the world that the Northern was the aggressor, and he had been using him as such.

The man stared at her in disbelief.

"If this little tale, or one like it, becomes widely known, neither South Hamgyong nor I will be truly affected," she continued. "I merely dislike the idea of garnering the sympathy of peons. Because that is what an assaulted woman is- sympathetic. Inside, one may be disgusted by her, but 'tis not what would be shown by most. But a man? One who has let himself be violated, by another man, no less? And by a foreign country that colonized ours?"

She shook her head slightly. "That is not a man with the makings of a leader. And 'tis not a country worthy of standing behind. How is one supposed to have pride in their Countryhuman when he has let his be stripped away? Some might feel that they should pledge themselves to a more… respectable Korea."

South Chungcheong cut her eyes back to America's. "A raped woman is pitiable. A raped man is only weak."

America's lips were parted, speechless for what she had no doubt was the first time in his over three hundred years. The Korean woman straightened her shoulders, crossing her ankles the other way.

"So," she said airily. "'Tis a simple choice- either this crass article is never seen again, or the respect that you will need your puppet to obtain and hold victory will be permanently unattainable. I think you will find this an equal exchange, yes?"

The foreign country stared at her for a long while, jaw now slightly agape. South Chungcheong's kept her composure, though her heart beat rapidly enough to make her feel ill.

The outcome did not matter, she tried to remind herself. She only had to make it out of here.

But it did matter. She knew how the people of Korea would look at her if America were to release a falsehood about her. The same way they would look at South Hamgyong. The same way she had looked at her, and at the women that emerged from the Governor-General's office with messy hair and flushed cheeks. It did not matter if the story came with evidence or not- it would come from the mouths of men, and so it would be believed, even in the society that Korea wanted to create. Even if by some miracle that one day changed, the lie would already be truth.

'Twas unfair that after all those years of playing the game, of sharpening her tongue and then learning how to kill so that even if she were to be captured she could make sure she was not tainted, that it could all be made for nothing. So many years of being surrounded by powerful men who thought they could do as they pleased, even more of fighting against Japs who would tear her open like a fresh kill if she missed a shot and Korea did not move swiftly enough, and she had never fallen to what so many other women had. The wolves had never made her their prey. Yet a few words of print could make it so that her people saw her as it anyway.

She did not deserve that. And South Hamgyong did not deserve to have her shame torn from her before she could overcome it.

The only reason a man was seen as weaker than a woman for being assaulted was because women were expected to be weak. They were expected to be victims taken advantage of by any male that could. What had happened to the harlot and the bumpkin twins was predictable. It was what happened to women.

But Provincehumans were not solely women. They could not afford to be. Yet if their people heard what had been done to them, true or not, they would become pitiable. And pity would turn a province into just another girl, too weak to defend her own honour, let alone to change what needed changing. How could any woman feel like the game was beatable, not winnable but beatable, when not even her provinces had been able to overcome it?

South Chungcheong had no interest in most of Korea and South Hamgyong's righteous crusades. But she did have an interest in destroying the game. And they could not do that if the women amongst them were seen as having already lost it.

This did matter.

America stared at her, long and hard. She could feel the tension that had been radiating from him since she first lay eyes on him. It strained against his composure, seeping through the cracks to crackle in the frigid parlour, making her lungs strain for air.

Then he grinned. Not one of the wolf's teeth barings, but a genuine one. And he started to laugh.

South Chungcheong sat very still as he threw back his striped head, howling at the ceiling. There was no malice in the sound, no sense that 'twas a precursor to violence. Only bone-rattling amusement. Yet something in the woman's body told her that the slightest twitch of a muscle could change that.

America may be as predictable as any other man when it came to certain things. But just as she, he was also far more than that.

The laugh penetrated her marrow, and for one moment she felt a fear deeper than that of a woman and man- that of a province faced with a foreign country.

When the foreigner's mad howls ended, it was abrupt. He snapped his head back down, grinning. As he wiped the back of a hand under his glasses, South Chungcheong could see that there was real liquid on it.

"You know, babe," he said, humour still burbling in his throat. "I was having a bad day before this, but you just made it a little better. I can't believe you actually have a sense of humour. You've been holding out on me!"

He chuckled again, taking a swig of his drink while the province remained still. "You really are a crazy bitch," he said, almost sounding impressed as he stood. "But so long as you're not a commie, I can't help but respect that."

The American sauntered toward her, still grinning. South Chungcheong did not turn her head as he took up a place behind her chair, placing his hands on her shoulders.

"Tell you what," he said, the alcohol-soaked words brushing the back of her neck. "As a sign of how much I respect that, I'll talk to a few of the papers, see what I can do to get that story cut. Even if it is the truth, it's not right to air out a girl's dirty laundry like that, is it?"

South Chungcheong said nothing, her fingers digging into the back of her hands as she watched a droplet of sweat slowly run down her glass of whiskey.

"But if you ever try to threaten me again-" The grip on her shoulders turned cruel as his voice came from right next to her ear-slit now, stained with darkness. "I'll have to teach you a lesson. Got that, babe?"

"Release me," South Chungcheong said, the words mechanically cold.

His hands tightened, digging into the sensitive spots above her collarbones, bearing down with enough force to press her into the chair, holding her down just to prove that he could. South Chungcheong did not resist. She knew she could not escape. Even with her leash loosened, she could not defend herself from him. If he wanted to, he could pin her down and make her pitiable with ease. She was a province, a revolutionary.

But she was still just a woman. And he a man. A very powerful man.

Then the pressure lifted, and his palm cupped her face from behind. There were too many calluses for someone who should only be here to supervise.

"Yeah, you got it," he cooed, patting her cheek as her lavendar flesh twitched in disgust. "You're a smart girl, aren't'cha? Maybe too smart."

South Chungcheong bit back a retort about his Yankee whore's intelligence, and his own. She had accomplished something she had thought impossible. Now she had to escape with dignity before the feeling coursing through her body overcame her.

America moved back, allowing her to finally inhale, carefully steady. But he did not go far.

South Chungcheong could not wait for him to retreat. She stood, ignoring the way he towered over her.

"I am glad we could reach a agreement," she said, coolly.

"Me too, babe." His grin was predatory again, though still with a tinch of amusement at the edges. "Isn't it great what we can accomplish when we're both being civilized?"

Neither he nor his people would know civilization if it tore down their doors and splattered their wretched brains on the walls of their hideous dwellings.

South Chungcheong said nothing, marching for the hall, her head held high. The heavy footfalls behind her made her muscles wind tight.

She made it to the front door, placing a hand on it. America's slammed into the wood over her head, his chest just brushing her back.

"It's been fun," he said mockingly. "You could visit more often, if you wanted to stretch those gams of yours. And hey, maybe once I've dealt with your little Communist problem for you, you, me, and the doll can get together. I could help you two kiss and make up."

South Chungcheong opened the portal, forcing him to lean back or go falling out it. She slid out, keeping her footsteps even on the snowy gravel as she headed for the gate.

"Oh, and babe?" the foreign man called after her. "Thanks for telling Southie that wild little conspiracy theory of yours way back when. We got to have a nice li'l chat about it, and I think we're both better off for it."

He was not simply taunting her. He was making it clear- 'He's mine, not yours.'

There was no one to keep her safe.

She should not need someone. He had promised he would teach her to protect herself, and he had. He had kept that one.

But with the Commands, she could not even do that. Not truly.

Her jailors were waiting for her, taking the helm as they started down the street. They did not look back, knowing that even if she were to run, they could easily catch her.

South Chungcheong fought with every nerve in her body, forcing them into submission, knowing she needed to act now or lose her chance.

'Precision, poise, grace.' She could not lose control.

Not outside America's house, and not outside South's. The Yankee came and went from both too often. Not outside Gyeonggi's right next to his. Not outside hers. This could not come back on her.

As they passed the wire fence wrapped around North Gyeongsang's prison, South Chungcheong reached a hand into her chima, willing it not to tremble as she slid it into her secret pocket. The men ahead of her were not looking, those beyond the fence were smoking. She did not look around. Nothing but her hand moved as a scrap of paper fell to the ground, nearly invisible in the dusting of dirty snow.

She waited for the shout of notice from behind, for her guards to look back and see what lay in her footprints.

They did not.

She made it safely to her door. But before she could make it inside, the crasser jailor held the keys up above her head. His mouth was smirking, but his blue eyes were cold.

"I know you're used to getting your way," he said lowly. "But we aren't your scaredy cat gooks, lady. Try to watch that pretty little mouth of yours in the future."

"I would advise that you wash yours," South Chungcheong replied rigidly. "Now let me in."

He did, his furry lips curled in spite, and she was finally able to put up a barrier between herself and the men outside.

But she was not one of the women that let themselves be caged and called it safety. No longer. Bars were not safety, not when someone else held the key.

Whoever had owned this house might have decorated it with Western trappings, with ceramic sinks and sofas and a four-poster bed. But the door was still Korean. It swung outward. She could not even bar it.

South Chungcheong did not bother looking out the window to check on the message she had dropped. He would have seen her drop it or he would not have. He would retrieve the coded name and instructions or he would not. It was no longer her problem.

The province went to her dark sitting room, stiffly lowering herself onto the cushion on the floor, snatching her jasu hoop and needle and thread, stitching a crimson and gold campfire burning on an emerald mountain with hands that refused to hold steady.

She had kept her promise, for all it could have cost her. Again.

She tried not to think of a small, frightened girl clutching white mountain magnolias as flames flickered outside and her loss drew near while she muttered, “Now you had better keep yours."

'Twas foolish to hope this would end as that had. The world was not so kind.

But she always had been a fool.

Her shaking fingers slipped, and the needle pricked her finger, a spot of blood staining the tangled threads on the back of the jasu hoop. South Chungcheong held it tightly in both hands, the frame creaking.

‘Please.’

South Chungcheong: Women that have been assaulted disgust me.

North: ×_ō

SC: So we should create a world where women are seen as equal to men so that will no longer happen.

North: ...You know what? We're at war. That's good enough for now. We'll work on the rest later.

Men out there- you are just as capable of being victims of sexual assault as a woman, and just as worthy of empathy if you are, whether it was done by a woman or another man. You’re not weak. South Chungcheong just hates you. Her opinions on this matter are not to be seen as reality. I saw the phrase ‘dark woke’ and I think that describes her very well.

I am subjecting you all to this excerpt from a ‘girlie pulp’ I found while researching. Context- this American man went all the way to 'Rio Jamorca' (I do not think this is a real place) and is complaining that everyone's unfriendly to him. Followed directly by this (warning, racism):

"Whiskey," snapped Galahad peevishly, "And plenty of it; and say Pedro, are there any people in this village, women, for instance?"

The bulky little man smiled uncertainly and bobbed his head in bewildered agreement. "Si, senor, I get heem at once."

Galahad sighed morosely. "And that," he muttered, "is that. I certainly made a star spangled ass of myself by coming to this God forsaken rim of civilization. The people can't even speak English."

I wonder why they aren't being friendly to him? He is also portrayed as in the right and gets to sleep with a gorgeous rich Argentinian woman. She is the only one in the village that speaks fluent English and negatively refers to Argentinian men as 'men of my race.' He calls her 'Blanchita.' He gets to marry her.

Wait afterthought. 'Rio Jamorca.' I assumed it was in Brazil because 'Rio.' Does Argentina even use Rio for place names? I can't find anything. I hope whoever wrote that is dead.

I looked up 'oldest dirty magazines in America' for that one quip America makes and I was subjected to horrors. Every time I think 'maybe I don't hate men' I am reminded that many of them are no better than animals. Worse actually. I got to read a quirky little story about a male doctor hypnotizing women and raping them and it was shown as sexy and funny. You would not have seen that in a Soviet or North Korean magazine in the same year (1949). And Korean women had literally just gained rights. I am going to go into the street and beat the first man I see until he apologizes for his entire gender. And then I am going to keep going. This might be better accomplished in America but trust me Japanese men need to pay, too.

Men who are my followers, you are exempt from this. Unless you are evil.

A Creeping Chill

"So- CCCP or America? Who do you think would win?"

"It would likely depend on who managed to drop their atom bombs first," Hwang said, not looking up from his notes for his trip to the POW camp tomorrow. "Though of course there are other mitigating factors. Navy proficiency, supply lines, air force size, etcetera."

South Pyongan clicked her tongue. "Forget all the fancy technology and armies and crap. I'm talking one-on-one melee combat, fist-to-fist."

"Ah think Korea would win," Hae said confidently from her place next to Hwang on one of the downed logs they'd set up near the open-air stove as a seat.

"I don't think Korea was an option, Hae," SH said, then returned to glaring at Kangwon as he stirred soup in the cast iron pot.

Some might say she was doing it passive-aggressively, if they wanted to be struck again.

"Ah know," Hae chirped. "Ah still think he'd win. But ah guess if it's really just between CCCP and the Yankee bastard, CCCP would win. He's real big."

While SH scolded his sister for her language, Hwang said, "Size isn't everything. When it comes to a fight," he added, shooting South Pyongan a withering look as she snickered. "As you should know."

"Okay, but it is when he's that big," she argued. "Sure, I can beat guys bigger than me, but that's because I'm awesome. The Yank isn't. CCCP would get one punch in and his head would like, explode. He'd totally win."

"Wait a minute, Pyo," Hae said, suddenly sounding suspicious. "Is this one'a your trick questions, like when you asked if ah thought you could beat CCCP and ah said 'No, ah think your hand would break if you hit him,' and then ya got mad at me?"

"I didn't get mad at you," their cousin defended.

"You were just sulking," her brother hummed from the side, where he was chopping dried mushrooms for Kangwon's soup.

"Do you want to die?" South Pyongan asked indignantly. "I don't sulk. I was just disappointed she didn't pick the clearly obviously correct option."

"If you're posing a question as one whose answer is an opinion while already having an objective answer decided, it is by definition a trick question," Hwang pointed out, and his cousin tossed her gloves on the ground between their feet.

"You guys are boring," she huffed.

"I think CCCP would win," North Pyongan soothed, sliding his own gloves back on as he came to join them. "America might be able to outmaneuver him, but he is also cocky and overconfident. Temperaments like that tend to lose battles."

He smiled at Hwang.

"Right?" South Pyongan preened.

"He is referring to you," Hwang said and she let out a cry of indignity, slapping her brother on the shoulder.

"That's it, I'm kicking your ass. And then I'm taking my championship back from Korea."

"Could you wait until we return from our assignments?" North Pyongan asked politely. "I don't think Korea would be pleased if we went to handle Party work covered in bruises."

"You're handling Party work," South Pyongan grumbled. "I'm going to try and find the bastards sabotaging our shit."

‘Our shit’ was storehouses and power lines in she and the Hwanghaes’ provinces, though mostly Hwanghae. Hwang himself couldn’t see to the task as he was kept busy with his lessons at the temporarily relocated Kim Il-sung University, and his work in the camps, most of which lined the Amnok River. And Hae wasn’t quite cynical enough to hunt down traitors.

He looked back down at his notes, squinting to read his handwriting in the flickering light of the fire that burned in the agungi. Though he was writing with the mindset of these being formal reports to keep his characters neat and orderly, he had to cramp them all together in order to preserve precious paper.

He cringed at using it for non-school-related tasks at all, but he felt the need to take down the names and details given to him by the captured enemy POWs. Even though he had already helped compile the list of names and ranks for the issue of prisoner repatriation, he wanted his own personal notes. He had faith in his mental filing system, but as he always advised his students, it was wise to take notes when you could. Being able to remember that a man came from Louisiana and had two little sisters assured the enemy soldiers that they were people in the Korean province’s eyes, and would make them both more likely to speak highly of their treatment after being released, and more willing to divulge information presently.

Hwang was only allowed to speak to prisoners that had already shown remorse for their actions, or at least a willingness to comply. If they wrote their essays confessing their crimes or engaged in their criticism sessions, he could speak with them. But if they were openly hostile or one of those who targeted their fellow prisoners for doing the latter, he was not.

It disappointed him, both because he was curious to learn how the truly hardline enemy foreigners justified their actions in his country to themselves, or at least what sort of education had made them so vicious, and because any attempts at re-education would likely mean more to their native reactionaries coming from one of their Provincehumans.

But he did understand why Korea forbid it. Just as someone who was sympathetic to their country would be more willing to speak kindly of them after, someone who was predisposed to hostility would be more likely to speak harshly, or make accusations. The last thing they needed was someone returning to their country after the war was over claiming that a Korean Provincehuman had personally assaulted them.

Which they could do anyways. Clearly the Americans had no compunction about lying, as seen by their claims about executed POWs, which had already started to fade out of public consciousness after America's conference last week, according to Korea.

But Hwang could limit their ability to convincingly lie as best he could, both by complying with Korea's order to only speak to prisoners on good behaviour, and always being both accompanied and recorded while doing so.

Hopefully it could dismiss any ridiculous claims of 'brainwashing' as well. Hwang may find the new word delightful, with its implication that by eliminating the remnants of ideology forced on the masses by their colonizers and bourgeois, they were cleaning filth away (something he wasn't entirely sure the author of the article first utilizing it had fully realized), but the concept itself was dangerous. If any shifting of morals or beliefs due to new information was perceived as brainwashing, moving away from preconceived ideas or biases would be seen as leaving your 'natural' state, and stigmatized. Change itself would be start to be seen as some sort of outer force, instead of an innate human and universal constant.

People were meant to change. They were meant to learn and grow and integrate new information that transformed how they saw things. The world was meant to incorporate new ideas and inventions that moved it forward, from hunter-gatherer society, to agricultural society, to feudal to the current mainstream capitalist mode of production, to Socialist modes to Communist. If change and new ideas could be demonized as implanted by the enemy, society would grind to a halt and never advance.

Hwang supposed that was why the notion of brainwashing had started to grow so prevalent in the American consciousness, enough so that several prisoners had accused him of it for merely informing them how a Socialist mode of production worked. Those who held power now did not want change. They wanted the world to stagnate at a point they were comfortable with.

The idea was despicable to him. He knew very well that there would be some who would suggest that in order for him to have changed his opinion on peasants being incapable of leading the vanguard of revolution, or on the inherent progressiveness of the intellectual class, he must have been brainwashed by Korea, instead of having internalized new information and evidence and worked hard to change his own principles quite intentionally.

If he had stagnated and resisted that change as something being forced on him, he never would have been able to fight for their country or educate their people in the way that was needed. If their country had stagnated, they would still be under Japanese control, and with the colonial mindsets their children were made to be nurtured with, they would see it as a good thing.

Hwang shuddered slightly. It was unnerving to think that one man could see the popularity of the Communist Party in China with those that had once been in chains, and come to the conclusion that they must be 'washing brains' for it to happen. And that all such simple words needed to become a concept that could do real harm was to be caught by a government with enough power and wealth to make it real in the eyes of the global community.

"Cold?"

Hwang broke from his mulling to see Kangwon standing over him, and realized he had finished his cooking. The others were already drinking down their soup. North Hamgyong and the Liaos had emerged from the bunker to fill their own bowls.

"It is quite chilly," he admitted, though that hadn't been the reason for his shiver.

"Here, mushroom and tuber soup." Kangwon handed him his half-full tin bowls. "And rice."

Hwang took them gratefully as his cousin settled down next to him on the log with his own bowl, grains already mixed into the soup, the way he preferred.

“Find him yet?” he asked around a mouthful.

Hwang shook his head regretfully, setting his notes aside. “I’ve visited every camp now, and went over all the prisoners we have. And while there are a handful of Jeffrey Morgans, none of them match your description.”

His cousin nodded regretfully. “Thanks for looking. Hope he’s okay.”

Hwang did, too. If the man had died from illness, he would have been identified and added to the list. The options were either that he had been one of those left behind in the tactical withdrawal, and as such had fallen back into his own army’s hands, or that the African-American man had been one of the few hundred that truly had been unlawfully executed.

The province took a sip of the ambery liquid in his bowl, and sighed as it spread out from his stomach to warm his body. The broth was watery, the mushrooms, roots, and sprinkling of dried herbs only serving to impart a mild earthy flavour. But it served to bring feeling back into his toes.

This year was thankfully nowhere near as frigid as the last (especially since Hwang didn’t have to go wandering through the northern mountains), but one of the Premier’s most important directives had still been to make sure their soldiers all had hot soup to drink, with specular emphasis on those in the hills at the front.

“This is excellent,” he said to Kangwon, taking a spoonful of rice to fill with broth. “Even with your limited ingredients, you’ve once again managed to create something edible. I never understand why you say you can’t cook.”

Kangwon shrugged. “I can make soup and roast meat. Not really anything else.”

“You just don’t want to get stuck on cooking duty,” North Hamgyong grunted disdainfully, hunched over by a nearby larch as he shovelled down his supper.

Kangwon smiled.

“You didn’t have to come back tonight,” SH said, perched next to South Pyongan, the seat farthest from where her brother was lurking. “I could have made soup.”

Without missing a beat, South Pyongan declared in a broadcaster’s tone, “Startling news from the rear, somehow our Provincehumans have developed a one hundred percent casualty rate without even seeing combat! A feat only possible in the People’s Korea!”

North Pyongan cleared his throat politely as SH shoved her.

She elbowed her cousin back. “Y’know, Sang loved that bit.”

“I can make soup,” SH said stiffly. “It’s just water-“

“Boiled water,” Kangwon cut in.

“Boiled water, mushrooms, herbs, and roots, cut up then simmered. It isn’t hard.”

“So how do you get it so fucking wrong every time?” North Hamgyong grunted.

SH turned full body to stare at him with a tight smile. “Maybe next time I’ll try adding meat to the soup.”

The words were joking- ostensibly- but Hwang had been liking the look in her eyes less and less lately. It was different than before. Less… restrained.

‘Give me your gun, Hwang!’

Yes, like that.

Thankfully Kangwon intervened before there could be bloodshed.

“Korea said he’s coming back to the bunker tonight. So I figured I’d help you comrades dispose of the evidence.”

“Evidence?” Liaotung asked innocently.

Hwang almost jumped. He hadn’t realized she was still standing in the shadows under the leafless trees.

From the looks on a few of his cousins’ faces, they hadn’t either.

“Helping everyone get cleaned up,” Kangwon said casually. “Dishes and stuff.”

The Chinese province didn’t appear as if she bought the cover. “Alright. I know when secrets are being discussed. I suppose I’ll just go join my sister.”

She slid away towards the clearing. Despite how the Korean provinces had been speaking, while she had only been eating, her bowl was still much more full than any of theirs.

The heavy bunker door shut with a mighty ‘clang’ in the night, and North Hamgyong *‘tch’*ed. “She’s a damn sneak.”

“She was just standing there,” SH shot back. “It isn’t like we’re in a strategy meeting.”

“Comrade Liao Juān’s real nice,” Hae confirmed. “Ah told ya she helped me lots in the fields. And ah’ve seen her helpin’ hand out winter clothes to the folks in the hills.”

Chagang nodded in conformation.

“I don’t trust her,” North Hamgyong grumbled, glaring off in the direction of the bunker. “I don’t trust any of them.”

“Well I don’t think anyone here actually cares about your opinion,” SH sniped.

“SH, don’t be mean,” Hae scolded, then looked at the other Hamgyong. “Ah care about your opinions, Hambu.”

“Don’t call me that.”

“Sometimes.”

“SH didn’t mean that,” Kangwon placated, though Hwang thought their cousin very much looked as if she meant it. "And neither did you. We're all just hungry. Though some of us could be less hungry, if they wanted to be.”

He pointedly eyed all of them but South Pyongan.

Hwang cleared his throat. “We’ve discussed the matter, and decided on our course of action. Rest assured, none of us are foolish enough to go too far.”

They all exchanged looks that clearly communicated, ‘Unlike some people.’

Kangwon said, “That’s the only reason I’m helping. I’d still rather you didn’t, though.”

“You’re all being idiots for doing it at all,” North Hamgyong grumbled.

Seeing the fire blaze in SH’s eyes, Hwang quickly interrupted with, “We would be hungry anyhow. With our empathetic hunger, even if we ate a full twelve dishes a day with our grains and soup, we still wouldn’t be satiated.”

No matter how much a Country or Provincehuman ate, so long as their people were starving, they would starve.

And right now, Koreans were certainly starving.

“You know I have a theory about the biological reasoning for that,” he said excitedly, having been thinking about it lately. “I have a hypothesis that it might be a built-in punishment-reward system to encourage Countryhumans to take care of their people. Human monarchs and bourgeoisie can indulge however they like without ever having to think about the condition of the lower classes. But no matter how much a Countryhuman eats, it won’t matter so long as their masses go without- they’ll still feel a hunger.

That provides an incentive to make sure all of their population is fed."

Though it rarely seemed to work that way. From stories of Rome, China, Korea, and other societies with large class divides, it seemed instead of feeding their people, the Countryhumans would only eat more.

Hwang's common sense told him that during the Kyeongsin Famine, a year-long famine that devastated Korea in 1670, killing possibly up to a million people, Joseon had spent an exorbitant amount of funds importing enough food so that not a minute would go by without him having something to eat. During the devastating famines that China was constantly wracked by, several Chinese Countryhumans had been known to devote resources that could have gone into projects to increase yields or purchase food for those who had none into searching for elixirs of immortality, desiring not to just make their conditional immortality unconditional, but to eliminate the empathetic effects of hunger and illness.

And that was in Korea and China, states that were relatively reserved with their Confucian influence. Hwang had read accounts of some of the last days of Rome, when several famines had plagued the land, that recounted the Roman Countryhuman summoning his provinces, from the favoured to the 'barbarian' northerners, to hold a month-long feast. The story went that they'd gorged themselves on sweetmeats and roast peacock, stewed pork and ostrich, all smothered in imported seasonings, along with pears and figs and honey-drenched cakes, while guzzling down wine spiced with herbs, until they quite literally ate themselves to death in an attempt to escape the hunger.

There was no way to know if that was true. The tale could have been penned by a bitter lower-class scholar or an enemy that came after the fall, seeking to discredit Rome. But it did seem that there was a period where there were no mentions of any Roman province or Rome himself after when the feast was said to take place. Three months could be long enough to recover from a food-induced death.

Perhaps Italy or some other 'descendant' of the Roman Empire had more information in their archives. Hwang couldn't wait until Korea was recognized as a nation, and he could start to engage in informational exchanges with foreign countries. There was so much Korea didn't know about them, and so much they didn't know about Korea. Hwang was looking forward to making sure their country's five thousand year-long history was more widely known.

And perhaps whoever he spoke to would be more enthusiastic about his knowledge than his cousins.

Hae was focused intently on the centimetre of soup left in his bowl, and Chagang's eyes were glazing over as he finished telling them about the past.

"Who cares why we're hungry so long as we are?" South Pyongan moaned, then clutched at her head. "Why'd you have to mention stewed pork?"

Hwang would admit that his own mouth had started to water as he thought about the descriptions of ancient feasts (and wondered what ostrich even tasted like). But at least he had prevented SH from saying whatever she'd been about to to her brother.

"Apologies," he said after swallowing. "I might have gotten carried away."

"Uggghhh!" South Pyongan flopped backwards off the log, her legs still hooked over it.

"Why the fuck are you complaining?" North Hamgyong demanded. "You're actually eating."

"So are you," the Pyongan shot back. "I'll take criticism from literally anyone else."

North Pyongan patted her knee. "No you won't."

"Hungryyyyyyy," his sister moaned dramatically.

Hwang shook his head. At least the complaints meant she wasn't truly starving. But his own sister…

Hae was still fixated on his soup bowl. Hwang spooned the rest of the rice in, then held it out to her.

She quickly leaned back. “Ah ate all mine. Ah ain’t hungry anymore.”

“Hae-"

“Ah mean ah’m not.” She crossed her arms over her chest.

“I was going to say you can have it anyway,” Hwang said. “And you don’t have to participate in this.”

“He’s right,” SH said, her brows furrowed. “I didn’t suggest it to force everyone. It’s just if you want to.”

“Ah want to,” Hae said stubbornly. “And there’s no reason ah can’t do what y’all’re doin’. Ah’m still not a kid.”

“I know,” SH sighed, though Hwang knew she couldn’t help but see his sister as younger.

Admittedly, neither could he. Though he was well aware she was the same age as him, it was difficult not to see her as his little sister. She pouted when he referred to her that way, and he generally tried not to. But sometimes when she came up in casual conversation when he was hosting a discussion, he would find himself slipping up and using ‘nyeodongsaeng’ to describe her.

He didn't see her as a child, in the way he sometimes suspected SH did. But he did feel a protective urge over her, even if he knew she was far stronger than he.

‘And even if I’ve done such a poor job.’

“If Korea can work as hard as he does on nothin’, ah can get by on somethin’,” Hae said stubbornly.

“Korea’s not really the person to look to when it comes to calorie intake, Hae,” Kangwon said gently.

Per usual it was a losing argument.

“Korea’s the person to look to on everythin’.” She tilted her chin up and away from Hwang’s proffered bowl. “And ah’m full.”

Her stomach growled.

Hwang sighed, lowering the bowl. “Very well.”

He knew Hae’s body was far better at retaining stores of fat, as evidenced by the fact that she still had a bit of padding on her, while he had to be careful not to cut himself on his ribcage when he got dressed in the morning. But he also knew she burned far more energy with all her bouncing and running around. Even with the winter crops planted, she remained active checking on the fields, hauling supplies for the Rehabilitation Corps, and distributing the the free winter clothing to their workers.

He could still remember how she had looked the first time he lay eyes on her. Arms and legs projecting from that dirty shift, as thin as cheap pencils, and cheeks that were concave enough to hold juk. When he had first touched her, a feeling of warmth and familiarity had flooded through him as he connected with his other half. But a chill had came with it as he felt her shoulder bone under his hand- fragile, light, like that of a bird’s. As physically unfit as he had been at that point, he had known that if he gripped too hard, he could shatter it.

He didn't want to see her that way again.

Hae nudged him, perhaps sensing his malaise. As she snuggled up, he could hear her stomach growl again. With the warmth of the soup leaving his own, he could feel the hollowness creeping back in.

He had to wonder if Hae felt the empathetic hunger even more strongly than he. He knew she truly was more resistant to regular hunger after her long years of dealing with it in Japan’s clutches, but what about the kind that came with their people? Could her bond with the masses have an effect on the empathetic symptoms?

Thinking of that brought back that uncomfortable feeling of envy. He didn’t want to feel even more ravenous than he already did, and he didn't like to think that his sister might be suffering even more.

But it still irrationally hurt to think that he might be being distanced from their shared suffering again.

"Hey, Hwang." South Pyongan held her top half off the ground, legs still wrapped around the log. "You can give me the rest of that."

"You've had quite enough to eat," he sniffed, pushing his glasses up.

"Oi, I better not be hearing judgement in there," she warned. "I'm not being selfish- I'm literally being responsible. I need calories if I'm gonna remain in ass-kicking shape. He's being selfish." She pointed at North Hamgyong.

"Fuck you."

"You still aren't getting my supper," Hwang told her.

"Gah!" Her head thumped into the snowy ground again. "I'm wasting away! Tell North Pyongan his hat is dumb once I'm gone."

"I will," North Pyongan solemnly assured her.

"I can feel my skin shrivelling," his sister bemoaned. "My organs are shutting down."

"Are your muscles wasting away?" Kangwon asked, leaning back on the log.

"No," she said swiftly. "Those are fine. But everything else is wasting away! I'm going to turn into a skeleton with muscles if Hwang doesn't give me his last spoonful of rice."

"Not scientifically possible," he told her.

"When I turn into a muscular skeleton, I'll make you eat those words. Then I'll eat all those brains of yours." She groaned up at the sky again. "Starvinggggggg."

Chagang suddenly stood up, making them all look.

"Korea is coming," he said after a moment.

In a few seconds, Korea indeed emerged from the winter woods, China on his heels, as usual.

"Douse the fire if none of you are using it," he said in lieu of a greeting, looking up at the dark sky. "It's clear enough for bombers tonight."

"I've got water boiling for dishes," Kangwon said. "And if you brought your rations, I can cook them with the leftover soup."

"Or I can," SH offered.

"I already ate," Korea clipped, and none of the provinces needed to see China's eyebrow raise behind his head to know he was lying. "And even if I hadn't, I wouldn't let you cook them." The last was directed at SH.

She sighed, and Kangwon echoed her.

"You know," South Pyongan said, pulling herself back into a sitting position. "If you ever want to make donations, I'm right here. Joke, joking," she said to his glare. "Well, not really. I'm starving."

Chagang closed his eyes as he sank back into a seated position.

"But our people need it more, I know," the Pyongan woman said swiftly.

"Maybe if you spent less time picking fights, you would require less fuel," Korea icily told her.

Kangwon gave a pointed eyebrow raise. "Good advice."

He had been predictably exasperated to find out that the two had torn each other's burns open in their fight two and a half weeks ago. He was also predictably not letting them live it down.

Korea made a face. "Kangwon, Comrades Sip Yung-su and Ri Il are waiting at the road for you. Stop making them come all the way out here. Either sleep here or don't come at all."

Kangwon could not inform him of his reason for being here without getting them all lectured, so he simply gave a small salute.

Hwang jolted as Korea swung his head to him. "North Hwanghae, South Hamgyong- come with me."

SH stood as Hwang began, "What-?"

"Now." Korea turned away, headed into the woods. China flitted after him.

Hwang exchanged a glance with his cousin, who pursed her lips to say, 'No clue.'

"Good luck," Kangwon said, swaying as he rose. "I'll get all the contraband out of the bunker while he's busy with you."

"Don't call it contraband," SH scolded, placing her dirty dishes on the stump next to the stove. "That makes it sound like we're doing something wrong."

"It's going to be treated like contraband if Korea finds out," their cousin warned.

"Because he's a hypocrite," Hwang stated.

"Because he's a hypocrite," Kangwon agreed.

Hwang set his near-empty bowl next to Hae. "Finish this for me. It will get cold before I'm back," he added before she could protest.

She pushed her bottom lip out. "You're sure? You won't be hungry?"

"A few morsels of rice aren't going to make the difference, Hae."

"They do," she said, then reluctantly took the bowl.

"Don't feed it to that dog," he warned. "Korea won't be pleased, and it's capable of finding its own food."

The hound had started sniffing around the bunker at the end of November, expecting that where there was inhabitance, there would be food. Hwang had caught his sister letting it lick her bowl a few days ago.

"Ah won't," she said, pouting.

She had already finished inhaling the truthfully already cold spoonfuls before Hwang left the clearing.

"If he kills you, I call your organ meat!" South Pyongan called after them.

"Do you ever worry, sleeping in the same room as her?" Hwang asked SH as they followed Korea's prints through the snowy forest, using the light of his flashlight to navigate.

"I'm more worried about Hae," she joked, her words creating a cloud of steam around her face. "She crawls into my bunk to cuddle, then wakes me up sleep-talking about food. I'm worried she'll eat my entire arm without even opening her eyes."

Hwang chuckled. Neither of them found it very funny.

They found Korea a five-minute walk away from the bunker, standing in the midst of the grove. He was staring into the woods, his arms behind his back in a military brace and his expression impenetrable, as usual. His light breathing created no mist in the winter's air.

"What is it, Korea?" SH asked as they reached him. She spoke quietly, but her voice seemed to echo in the night.

Korea did not acknowledge her. "China," he said to the forest. "If I get back and North Pyongan says you haven't been there for at least five minutes, you are getting locked out."

Hwang peered into the darkness, flashlight panning over the silver and russet tree trunks. He saw nothing, but after a minute Korea finally turned to them.

“Is he gone?” the male province asked.

“He had better be.”

“Did you just threaten not to let him sleep in your room?” SH asked dryly.

“Shut up.” Korea straightened up, and the look on his face made them mimic him. “This is about Choi Jung-nam.”

He spoke quietly enough that his words were absorbed by the trees.

Hwang’s eyes widened as he snuck a glance at SH. “Are you sure we should talk about this with present company?”

He hadn't even been receiving updates on the man, if updates were being given, nor had he expected to.

“Her input is needed,” Korea replied.

“Does he have intelligence for us?” Hwang asked eagerly. Then a chill ran down his spine as he considered another possibility. “Is he well?”

“He’s fine so far,” Korea assured him. “He doesn’t believe he is under surveillance.”

“Choi Jung-nam?” SH whispered. “He was your student, wasn’t he, Hwang?”

“And now he is our agent,” Korea cut in, eye darting around. “No more names unless necessary. He has no intel for us yet. He wasn’t supposed to make contact with his handler unless he did. But he might have an opportunity.”

Hwang bit down on his questions, knowing they would either be answered or wouldn’t be.

“He has been casing out the residence America is staying in,” Korea said. “Amongst other activities. He has observed he and his guards coming and going.” His fist clenched. “And South. As well as that American nurse."

"Gra-?" SH cut herself off, but perked up. "She's alive?"

"Yes. And a few days ago, he spoke with her."

Hwang blinked in surprise. "A bold move."

"He used his guise as a contractor to ask her about American architecture," Korea explained. "He managed to catch her on the street with only one guard, and said she seemed eager to talk."

Hwang connected the dots. "He wants to use her to gain access to America's residence."

Their Countryhuman nodded as SH's eyes widened.

"That's dangerous," she fretted.

"Yes." Korea nodded. "For several reasons."

"He would be entering the heart of enemy territory," Hwang said, wringing his hands. "And I don't suppose his base would be lightly monitored."

"No," Korea confirmed. "And if America finds out the woman is speaking to him, he'll look into his history personally. If even one thing links him to us, he would likely be killed."

Hwang racked his brain, trying to think of anything that could connect them that he hadn't already thought of.

The most damning evidence would be that Hwang had taught him in school. He could only assume it hadn't raised any flags when it came to hiring him because the information wasn't widely known. Even their own informationals only said he had worked at 'a specific school.'

But with his access to Japanese archives and Japan himself, if America wanted to find out, he could. Though Hwang had also taught over a hundred other students, he knew that in the eyes of a man looking for guilt he expected to find, that would be it.

“It’s dangerous for Grace, too,” SH said, her brows furrowed.

“I don’t care about the American,” Korea coldly dismissed. “But I don’t want to jeopardize a valuable asset and a personal comrade for nothing. Which is why you’re here." He looked SH in the eyes. “Do you think she could get him access to worthwhile information?”

SH’s lips pursed in thought. “I think she must have had fairly high-level clearance before, since she was able to visit the holding camp. But if America has her living in his house and keeps multiple guards on her now, then he's likely moved on to isolating her completely. And I can’t see him telling her anything important.”

“Would he have to?” Hwang inquired. “She must be around him more than almost anyone. There is a high probability she’s overhead something, at least.”

Frowning, SH said, “Maybe.” She mulled for a few seconds. “America seemed a little paranoid, but arrogant. If he thinks he has her under his control, I don't think he'd be too careful around her. She might be able to give us something.”

“And do you think she would?” Korea asked intently. “Is she careless enough to slip up?”

SH considered the question again, then nodded. “I think she’s smarter than she acted. But she’s lonely, too. And if she’s really isolated now, she must be even lonelier.”

Her gaze steeled somewhat as she seemed to decide something. “She was desperate for a friend. If he can give her that, I think she’ll tell him anything.”

Korea dipped his head, then looked back to Hwang. “Then do you think we should risk it?”

Surprised to be the deciding factor, Hwang said, “Beg pardon?”

“He was your student. And it was you he came to volunteer himself to.” Korea looked at him seriously. “This will be dangerous. There is a very good chance he will be discovered and executed. Do you think he's up to it?"

That was far more culpability than Hwang wanted, though he knew it was only one of his responsibilities.

Choi Jung-nam had always been charismatic. As a boy he'd been skilled at ingratiating himself with the other students, Korean and Japanese alike, even when his views on the Occupation were barely disguised. Suzuki Yoshi had been shy and nervous at their first shared extracurricular lesson, but by the end of it, he had coaxed her open and had her excitedly sharing her opinions.

The Japanese woman had been the one to gather most of the information they had shared over the years, but Choi Jung-nam had also been responsible for passing some of it on- the plans of landlords and politicians, gleaned from smooth-talking his father's influential friends.

And that essay, the one he had turned in that had originally brought him to Hwang's attention, had been so persuasive he suspected it could change the minds of even some of those that supported the Occupation wholeheartedly.

"He's a capable man," Hwang decided. "I think if anyone is up to it, it's him. And…" He straightened his glasses. "No matter how dangerous it is, when the opportunity is as compelling as this, there isn't really a choice. If it can aid the war effort, he must do it."

"Anything for the mission," SH said softly.

Hwang nodded, though a shred of guilt dwelled in his heart. "Anything for the mission."

He found himself wondering if Hae would agree, then shook his head. It didn't matter. He might envy his sister's ability to be so unerringly compassionate, but it didn't mean that compassion was always right. This was war.

And Choi Jung-nam knew what he had signed up for.

Korea nodded decisively. "Then I will give the order to attempt to make contact with her again. I don't need to tell either of you not to share this."

"Lips sealed, Korea," SH assured, and Hwang once again promised as well.

"Good. Move out."

They followed Korea back to the hearth, where the others were finishing cleaning up. Hae was dozing on the log while China- who did seem to have been there for at least five minutes- wound her scarf around her head, apparently attempting to cover it entirely without waking her. Kangwon and North Hamgyong were gone, likely returning to the city with their 'contraband' and returned to the bunker respectively. Liaotung leaned over Chagang, quizzing him while he answered with one-word responses. South Pyongan flicked water at her brother as he did the dishes. The fire in the agungi still flickered so he could prevent his hands from freezing after, but was being allowed to burn low.

Hwang watched as Liaoxi emerged from the bunker with her dishes, taking her sister's as well to place next to the washbasin. She and North Pyongan seemed to exchange a few awkward words before she slunk away. His cousin sagged dejectedly, making him wince in sympathy.

'Likely for the best, really.'

SH went ahead, and Hwang took the opportunity to pull Korea aside.

"Thank you for looking for my input and not simply assigning Comrade Choi Jung-nam to the task," he said sincerely.

"You're more familiar with him than me," Korea replied. "You know better what he's capable of."

"And I'm grateful for you acknowledging that."

Hwang acutely realized that his early years spent teaching under Japanese authority had affected him. He had never been allowed to create his own syllabus or give lectures he thought were pertinent. He had to follow the Japanese-designed courses to the letter or risk being censured. Or worse. None of his recommendations to advance students or offer them extra help had ever been listened to, forcing him to watch silently as their talent was either squandered or they fell behind.

Even now he would find himself hesitating to speak at Teacher's Union meetings and feel genuine shock when he did and his suggestions were taken immediately. He knew it was why he had reacted so negatively back when he had been told their peasants understood Hae better than him, and why the idea still bothered him, even now that he was far better at tailoring his words for his audience.

But Korea had always listened to what he had to say, and if he disagreed, he would explain why (when it came to matters of policy, anyhow). And even though he would still ask around questions, not wanting to divulge when he didn't know something outright (though the Premier and Party experience had improved that somewhat), he had used to ask Hwang about the meaning of words or concepts in the theory they read, and now that he had mastered that, he still asked about historical events or things he suspected the province might have a better grasp of than he.

"I just wanted you to know that it truly means a lot to me that you seek my input, and that you listen to me," Hwang said, removing his glasses to polish them on his shirtfront, cheeks warm.

The Korea-shaped blur before him hunched. "And why are you suddenly telling me this?"

"Simply following my own advice." Hwang smiled as he slid his glasses back on. "I always tell my students they should let their teachers know when they appreciate them."

Korea turned his face away, *'tch'*ing before scuttling off for the bunker. Hwang shook his head fondly, then looked into the woods as a stick snapped, expecting to see the wild dog his sister was enamoured with.

North Hamgyong trudged towards the clearing, hands shoved in his pockets.

“Where were you?” Hwang asked as he approached.

“Damn Kangwon can’t walk down to the fucking road alone,” he grunted scornfully.

‘Ah, Kangwon and his spirits.’

Hwang raised a brow knowingly. “Are you sure you weren’t also taking the opportunity to give him something?”

His cousin halted in his tracks, giving him a murderous look. “I’ll kill you if you tell anyone, Four-Eyes.”

The Hwanghae turned away smugly. “It’s enough that I know. Though perhaps if you want your secret to go undiscovered, you should be more crafty when hiding your ‘contraband.’ But perhaps that’s beyond a lug like yourself.”

North Hamgyong jostled him, but didn’t bite back, embarrassed enough to storm off.

Hwang snorted. Korea wasn’t the only one that pretended at hard-heartedness.

His amusement melted away as he recalled the words he’d used to describe Choi Jung-nam. ‘A valuable asset and personal comrade.’ He had been worried enough to say the quiet part out loud.

Hwang was appreciative that his Countryhuman had sought his opinion instead of throwing their comrade into danger, and knew it wasn’t a mistake to prioritize the possibility of gaining an intelligence source so close to America over the man’s life.

Still, he hoped his former student could complete his mission and bring his family home to the country he would help Liberate.

I added a chapter to Safeway Pyongyang, if you're interested. It's called Softening. And in the chapter before it, now called Like To Like, I added a scene with SH and South Pyongan. Dejected sigh. Time to work on the sex scene.

I also had a dream where I was fighting Nazis in Poland with North, China, and Poland. ?? There were also some sort of Creatures. And at one point I think I was in Minecraft.

Butterfly Lovers

[image]

1933

The Japanese had no desire for them to be comfortable. The Palace of the Restoration, or the Palace of Shame as Heilongjiang called it, was beautiful, far more so than the quarters given to that traitor Puyi while he awaited his own grand palace.

But it was still small, a cluster of swept-roof buildings surrounding a main hall in the center of Xinjing, whose occupants could hear each other at almost all times.

So Fengtian could also hear the fuss outside quite well, the gasps of shock and cries of “Seize her!”

She faltered in her steps, her eyes straying to the large doors, embossed with golden emblems in the shape of suns.

Manchukuo made a noise in the back of his throat, and fear sparked inside her, her feet swiftly returning to the rote motions.

Eyes lined the room, dark and critical. The officials were watching. Watching her long skirts swish in vivid gold, ruby, sapphire, snow, and ash, the colours of the puppet flag, watching the bare skin of her navel between them and the strip of silk that bound her breasts, watching her long gossamer sleeves spin in carefully practiced circles.

The commotion was still there. She could not look. Manchukuo’s white eyes often glazed while watching her, but today they wandered. Fear flashed in them, his fingers tight on the arms of his throne.

‘Jilin.’ Was he back? Had they caught him?

The doors slammed open. Fengtian kept dancing, all the hair on her body prickling as she fought the urge to turn. She kept dancing until Manchukuo raised a hand and brought it down in a slashing motion. Then she scurried over to kneel at the foot of the throne. Her knees ground into the stone tiles.

When she looked up, her eyes widened.

Not Jilin.

The guards were throwing a woman to the ground. A Countryhuman woman.

She was dressed in a qixiong ruqun, the flowing skirts a blaze of crimson and gold, embroidered with alternating thread. The hemline of the ru that dipped down to her chest-high waistband was as white as pure snow, only marred by black accents, as were the long sleeves that splayed across the floor as she was tossed to her knees.

The Tang-era dress was beautiful, and Fengtian's heart swelled as her common sense gave her an image of the Liao Dynasty clad in an even more extravagant one.

Yet a part of her noted that it was strange to wear the upper body ru in white. Like the woman was at a funeral.

She looked up, and Fengtian almost gasped.

Her features were elegant, her cheekbones high and sharp, shadowing her dramatic cheeks. The delicate gaitou veil that draped down from the surprisingly simple crown of copper, iron, and jade did nothing to conceal her bow-shaped lips, parted in surprise, nor her slender white eyes.

Or the hammer and sickle on the top left of her face. That, and the characters on the bottom right, like a birthmark drawn in golden ink- 中共- marked her as property of the Communists.

The Jiangxi Soviet.

There was a silence in the room, the gathered Japanese and puppet officials struck speechless. Manchukuo, with no one to feed him his words, said nothing.

"What?" the woman said in a voice like the softest silk, her shock at being handled so roughly replaced by amusement. "Am I so beautiful you've forgotten your lines?"

"Executive Manchukuo," one of the men murmured, and the puppet state straightened.

"You," he said, his long nails scratching at his armrests. "What brings an enemy of the State of Manchukuo here?"

"Am I an enemy?" the Jiangxi Soviet asked in dismay, now sitting on her knees. "I don't recall us meeting before. I'm sure I would've remembered you." She stared up from under her lashes, the look sultry enough to make even Fengtian flush.

Manchukuo may be used to the affections of women, yet her beauty still seemed to shake him. "I- Manchukuo knows well of the desires of the Communists. They created the Jiangxi Soviet to oppose cooperating with Japan to bring prosperity to the East. And they oppose the restoration of China."

The 'restoration.' A crown given by foreign hands.

"Must a nation agree with its purpose?" the Jiangxi Soviet asked. "Can we not break free from it?"

Manchukuo shifted uncomfortably in his high-collared tunic.

"I do not desire a life of hardship," the woman continued, rising to her feet, surprisingly tall for a southern province. "I do not desire to fight uselessly in the muck in a fight that can't be won. I desire prosperity and the greatness that China once held." She smiled coquettishly. "And I desire to dance for you."

Manchukuo blinked. "To dance?"

"I hear you enjoy it," the Jiangxi Soviet said playfully, her eyes not straying to Fengtian. "And I would dance for the one who will be Empire."

Fengtian fought the urge to press her lips flat at the reminder. An empire beholden to an empire. How could such a thing exist?

'As a puppet.'

Manchukuo looked subtly around. One of the men leaned in and whispered to him. He nodded, his eyebrows drawn in.

"Then dance."

Fengtian wanted to tell the woman not to, to tell her to run, run far, run back to the Communists. She was not safe here. Manchukuo's handlers would cage her like an exotic bird and give her to Japan.

But the woman was a traitor. Maybe she deserved her wings being clipped.

The Jiangxi Soviet stepped into the center of the room, moving so gracefully that the coloured glass beads dangling from her crown didn't clatter, and the tassels on her skirt tie didn't tremble. She spread her arms out, reaching up for the heavens beyond the high roof.

And she began to dance.

Each step was light and perfect, effortless in a way Fengtian had never been able to master with all the concentration in the world. The vibrant pibo followed each precise flick of her arms like something alive, a crimson and gold serpent that obeyed her every command, wrapping around her slender limbs, tying itself into shapes that shouldn't have been possible before seamlessly freeing itself, never tangling, never tripping her up.

Her long sleeves dipped and whirled, never so much as brushing the ground, and while Fengtian kept waiting for her beaded crown to slip, it never did. Somehow, the decorations barely made a sound. Her long skirts twirled around her, a blaze of fire, and as light rippled across the gleaming threads, the province realized they were embroidered to look like a dragon.

She was dressed far more modestly than Fengtian, yet no one in the room could take their eyes off her. Even Manchukuo, who would so often stare off into middle-space while the province performed, was awestruck.

There was no music, she hadn't given them time to put on a record. But her movements needed no accompaniment. Even the sweetest strumming of Sunü's zither would be vulgar in comparison. Ling Lun would have wept for ever creating music in the first place.

Fengtian's dances were always slow, rote. She moved carefully, in the constrained way that was suitable for court.

The Jiangxi Soviet's dance was nothing like that.

Despite how graceful she was, how her silk slippers made barely a scuff against the floor, how her beads didn't jangle, there was something unrestrained in the way she moved. Her pibo didn't flow like a snake lazily winding across the sand, but like a viper striking. Her skirts were not the slow flap of a crane's wings, but the flash of a phoenix's, and her steps were elegant, but wild. Each one had a destination, but only she knew where that would be.

Even Fengtian, knowing she was a woman and a traitor, felt something well inside her heart, struck by the beauty before her, knowing she had never seen anything like it before and likely never would after.

For Fengtian, performing was shackles. It was waking up early and going to sleep late and using every bit of time she had to practice steps for dances to show a man who had no interest in them and who she wanted dead.

But for this woman, dancing was freedom. And for a moment, Fengtian could feel it, too.

She could feel the wind on her face and smell the tang of saltwater from the Dalian Bay. She could taste the sweet spring rain, feel the hot summer sun and cold kiss of winter. She could remember the rush of sneaking out of dinner parties to eat steamed buns and cheap noodles in Shenyang, trading couplets with the poets under the willows until the light faded and the lanterns came on.

The Jiangxi Soviet spun and whirled and dipped for a hour, and no one tried to stop her. No one entered. No one left. There were no reminders of meetings or duties. There was only her. Right now everyone, from the Japanese puppet masters to the Chinese traitors to the serving girls in the corner to Fengtian to Manchukuo himself, was equal. They were all just an audience.

When the woman stopped, it felt like life did, too. As she finally halted, right before Manchukuo's dais, and bent at the waist, her pibo finally allowed to rest on the floor, it felt like all light went out of the room.

Just like back then, when Fengtian's minders would finally find her and drag her home, the freedom had only been temporary.

Her eyes welled with burning tears that she couldn't let fall. They came from deep inside her, and her throat swelled closed as she fought the urge to throw back her head and keen.

Someone was crying. It was Manchukuo.

He shook on his throne, a hand pressed over his mouth as tears rolled down his face, staining his expensive collar. His eyes squeezed shut, trying to hide his shame from the eyes of the court, unable to flee.

The Jiangxi Soviet smiled.

"Executive Manchukuo," one of the Japanese said, his voice raspy. "I think you would do well to let the woman stay."

Manchukuo opened his mouth like he might protest, then closed it, nodding soundlessly.

"Thank you, Your Future Majesty." The Jiangxi Soviet inclined her head, and was escorted out.

Fengtian soon followed, released to get her away from the shameful display of the puppet state she was bound to.

'A puppet of a puppet.' How could such a person exist?

And here this southern woman came to throw away her freedom.

In her room, she felt hollow. She should feel glad for the chance to shuck her dancing silks for the comfort of a qipao. But today she didn't. She didn't seek out Heilongjiang or practice her routines. She just lay there on her couch bed, empty.

Until the door opened.

She sat up, expecting Heilongjiang, though he usually knocked. It wasn't.

The Jiangxi Soviet slid into her room.

Strange. Fengtian would have thought she was being kept monitored, perhaps in Manchukuo's own suites.

"Hello, Little Sister," the woman said, closing the door softly behind her. Here in Fengtian's cramped suite, she seemed even more radiant.

"Greetings, mistress," she said, rising. "May I help you with something?"

"So formal," the woman chided, gliding towards her to perch on the edge of the bed. "We're family, are we not?"

'No.' Fengtian had no desire to be family with a traitor.

"Sit, meimei." The woman patted the plush fabric with a well-manicured hand. "Entertain me until our illustrious neighbour comes to pay me a visit."

She would die then. The Jiangxi Soviet was not an original Chinese province, and she made no claim to be one. She wanted to be China. Japan would have no desire to annex her, only stamp out the Communists that opposed his rule.

Fengtian sat. "How should I entertain you, mistress?"

She was even more beautiful up close. Her naturally red lips were painted a deeper crimson, and gold powder dusted the corners of her lovely eyes. Her long lashes tickled her cheeks when she blinked, and her scarlet skin was smooth and flawless.

Very flawless.

Fengtian's eyes went to the hammer and sickle, half-hidden by her veiled crown.

"Tell me what you thought of my dance," the woman prompted.

"It was beautiful," Fengtian said sincerely. "You're far more skilled than me."

"Passion is required in art," the Jiangxi Soviet said. "If there isn't passion behind your movements, they'll never make an impact."

It was true that Fengtian's dancing lacked passion. It was hard to feel passionate about something you were made to do.

"What would you say my dance was about?" the Jiangxi Soviet asked.

"Freedom."

The woman seemed pleased. "And what does freedom mean to you, meimei?"

Fengtian stilled as her silk slipper trod on dangerous territory. This woman was a traitor, one who would soon meet with Japan. Anything she told her could be used against her.

Her eyes remained on her clasped hands. "This is freedom, mistress. Japan has given us the freedom of prosperity. Soon he'll bring it to all of China."

"You don't need to lie to jiejie," the woman chided, making her want to stiffen. "I can tell our neighbour anything I like. So tell me the truth, little actress- what is freedom to you?"

Fengtian swallowed, her citrine knuckles paling. "Being free from Japan and Manchukuo. Being independent."

"So you want a return to your Republic days?"

"No."

She hadn't been free. Every moment of freedom in her life had been stolen, snuck out from under the fingers of her minders. She had wealth and status, but she hadn't had freedom. And most of the people she met on her escapes had none of those.

"Japan already had a part of me," she told the Jiangxi Soviet.

Her common sense of Dalian was not her own. It was the Fengtian's from before 1907, and years before that. The Liaotung Peninsula had traded hands between Britain, Japan, the Russian Empire, and Japan again. It had been decades since it was Chinese.

"I want it back," she said, her fingers digging into her black qipao. "I want our nation to stop carving parts of itself off for foreigners. I want our people to have real prosperity. I want-" Her voice finally cracked like ice on the river she hadn't seen in two years.

"I want to be free."

The Jiangxi Soviet searched her face, and Fengtian abruptly stood up.

"And I think you're a traitor," she accused, the words bubbling over. "I think you don't know what you're throwing away. I think you have more freedom than most Chinese provinces have had in decades, in a century, and you're handing it over like an idiot.

"And I don't think you're even the Jiangxi Soviet."

The woman smiled, her crimson lips stretching. "And what makes you think that?"

Fengtian reached forward, lifting her veil and cupping her jaw, swiping her thumb across the characters on her flawlessly smooth face.

It came away with a smear of scarlet and gold, revealing darker red skin underneath, unmarked.

The impostor smiled wider.

"You're wearing that veil so no one can tell you don't have pores," Fengtian said, wiping the oil make-up on her hem.

"Actually, I'm wearing it because it gives me sex appeal," the mystery woman corrected. "I don't think anyone here is observant enough to notice whether I have pores or not. Aside from you, meimei."

She stood, towering over her, and Fengtian took a step back.

"I like your passion," she said, following. "You're much more sincere here than when you're dancing."

Fengtian opened her mouth to demand to know when she had seen her dancing, but the woman cut her off by gripping her chin, her short red nails lightly scraping her skin as she tilted her face up to meet her squinched-up eyes.

"So tell me, Little Sister," the 'woman' purred in a voice that was no less silky, but far more masculine.

"Are you ready to be free?"

—

It was always impressive, watching China at work.

Or listening to him, at least.

Liaoxi lurked below the embankment she had painstakingly crept along, back pressed against the frozen earth. It wasn't tall enough to hide her completely, and this summer hadn't been as dry as the last. The cold waters of the Taedong River lapped at her toes, leaving her unable to crouch. She stood with her knees bent painfully, the chill of the icy embankment seeping through her padded jacket.

Above, China cut loose another rabbit.

“I’m sorry, meimei,” he sighed to the woman that had just breathily confessed her love to him. “I’m afraid I’ve given you the wrong impression.”

“W-What do you mean?” the young Korean woman stammered.

“You’re lovely,” he said ruefully. “And I’ve enjoyed our talks by the river. But I have a lover back home.”

Liaoxi internally winced as she heard the woman’s heart shatter in his palm.

“Don’t cry,” China soothed, and though his province’s hearing didn’t near his levels, she knew the rustle was him using his long sleeve to wipe her tears away. “You’re too beautiful to shed tears over a man like me.”

“B-But I thought-“

“I never meant to be anything more than friendly,” he said, regretfully enough that one might think he meant it. “I think perhaps our cultural differences caused a miscommunication. Even so, in another life…”

Liaoxi knew he had just pulled his hand away from her face like it had physically hurt him.

“But I can’t,” he said with resolve. “There isn’t anyone in this world like my Jiang Qing.”

Ah. He was stealing Comrade Mao’s wife again. And neither poor woman even knew it.

‘Not until I tell Comrade Jiang, anyway. And then he will pay.’

“Is- Is she beautiful?” the Korean woman asked, simultaneously dreading to hear she was more so than she, and needing to hear that she could only be rejected for a great beauty.

“So beautiful, meimei,” China sighed. “But her looks are far exceeded by her kindness.”

Liaoxi flattened her lips as he went on, waxing poetic about a woman that sounded nothing like the one whose name he had stolen, spinning a sorrowful tale about being torn apart by the fires of civil war, only briefly reuniting before war had once again swept him away, to Korea this time.

"But you volunteered," the woman breathed, wrapped up in his story. "Why would you leave her when she's taking care of her ill mother all alone?"

"My heart broke when I did, meimei." Liaoxi puffed her cheeks out at the tears she could hear brimming in her country's voice. "But she told me that if I wasn't the sort of man that would fight for our comrades, then I wasn't the sort of man she wanted. So I left my broken pieces with her. If I make it home, she'll put them back together, and I'll spend the rest of my life making her as happy as possible."

"You'll make it home," the woman said fiercely. "You'll make it home, Comrade Mao. And I know you'll make her the happiest woman alive."

"Thank you, meimei," China said, choked up. "You really are a good friend. But I think it might be easiest for both our hearts if this was the last time we met."

They shared a tender, teary goodbye, and the poor rabbit hopped away, so affected by his tale of tragic love that she no longer remembered he had been the one to lead her on in the first place.

Liaoxi could hear China sniffling long after she left, making her internally 'tsk.'

"You're despicable," she said, popping up, her knees protesting as she inched around to face him.

"Are you sure to me that word's applicable?" China smiled, unsurprised by her appearance. "You dislodged a bit of dirt on your way down the bank, Little Sister."

"You could have told me, so I didn't have to crouch so awkwardly," she huffed, accepting his hand so he could pull her up next to him.

"Ah, but then you would have interrupted my parting words."

Liaoxi looked in the direction the woman had gone. She was heading for the hills across the open fields, another victim of China's little one-act tragedies, not knowing that being released was far safer than being snared.

"If I may say so," she said. "One day for an answer, one won't take 'no.'"

"Joking about gege getting assaulted isn't funny, meimei," he said, plucking at her masked cheek. "Big Brother wouldn't say that to you." He thought for a moment. "Unless it was for a role."

"I had thought from this game, in Korea you might refrain."

"Aiya, Little Sister. It's not like I'm ruining their honour. I'm just giving their lives drama," China said proudly. "In thirteen years when they're married with three children, they'll think of the mysterious masked foreign soldier and wonder what could have been."

"I don't understand how for you they fall, when your face they can't see at all."

China's eyes squinched up as he leaned in close, his tone sultry. "I guess I'm just irresistible."

Liaoxi hummed doubtfully, pushing his face away. "For what did you summon me here?"

"I've noticed something odd recently." China paused, and she narrowed her eyes. "…I fear."

Satisfied, Liaoxi tipped her head in question.

"You used to be stuck at the hip to that religious province. But lately you've been avoiding him."

Liaoxi's smile fell as she looked away.

China clicked his tongue in disappointment. "A more obvious tell there could not be, Little Sister. Even if I hadn't heard your awkward little exchange night."

His voice softened to an impression of her that was so accurate it sent chills down her spine. "I can… wash my own dish."

Switching to a slightly deeper register that sounded almost exactly like North Pyongan, he responded, "It's… alright. I've got it."

Back to her, he finished, "If that's… your wish."

China winced exaggeratedly as his vouce returned to normal. "I suspect that kept you both up at night."

Liaoxi looked back up at him, smiling neutrally under her mask again. "To talk to our comrade, I no longer have a whim. I've gotten every piece of intelligence I can from him."

"Are you sure that's it, meimei?" China started to prowl around her. "Are you sure you're not scared?"

"What would I have to be scared about?"

He stopped behind her, draping his arms over her shoulders, using a hand to pull the fabric shielding her lower face away as he murmured, "Your mask slipping."

Knowing he could feel her heartbeat, Liaoxi tried to still it as he read her so easily.

She was scared. North Pyongan was so kind and honest, so easy to talk to, it compromised her role. Her mask had came almost completely off on that night in the sampan, not because it had slipped, but because he had made her want to remove it. She had wanted to reassure him that he had no reason to fear for his Countryhuman with hers, and that China was as harmless as someone like him could be.

But she calmly told China, "Of that happening, I have doubt."

“You still haven’t found your tell, Little Sister,” he hummed, propping a elbow on her shoulder. “You know, a good actress doesn’t run from difficult scenes. The only way to master a role is to face them.”

She wanted to, but…

“China,” she sighed. “I don’t want to act just a scene like you. This kind of act would be the whole way through.”

“Aiya, it sounds like you’re calling me a womanizer.”

“We’re comrades with him for today. It might not always be that way.” Liaoxi’s arms twitched, and she resisted the urge to wrap her arms around herself. “I would never choose anything over you. But making that choice would hurt to do, if I committed. And even the possibility of slipping and hurting our country…”

“Cannot be permitted?” China supplied when her words failed.

She nodded quietly.

"Aiya,” he sighed. “You and North are both such cynics.”

He let go of her, sliding around to her front again. “Do you like him, meimei?”

Liaoxi flushed, her eyes dipping. She nodded.

She wouldn’t be so scared if she didn’t.

“Then the possibility of ‘hurt’ shouldn’t matter,” he said. “You know that. And I know you’ll never betray your country. Which means there’s nothing to fear. So I’ll ask- how much do you like him?”

The hairs on the back of Liaoxi’s neck prickled as his voice lowered. When she looked back up, his eyes weren’t smiling.

He reached out, gripping her chin with a gloved hand, tilting it up. “Would you want to be with him, knowing it won’t end well? Knowing you’ll be butterfly lovers instead of mandarin ducks?”

Liaoxi's blood ran cold. She wanted to ask her country what he was planning, but knew she wouldn't receive an answer.

The province closed her eyes, taking a deep breath. "Yes. It doesn't matter how something ends. All that matters is that the love was there."

China pierced her with his gaze for a long moment, then nodded, releasing her.

"Then I think you should be with him."

The province looked up in surprise.

Her Countryhuman smiled behind the mask, and the look in his eyes was… not sad. But it was the look of when he sent their comrades off to battle, knowing he would not see them again.

"You deserve to feel this, meimei. While you still can."

Liaoxi asked no questions. There was really only one that mattered. And she already knew the answer- China would never do anything to her that wasn't for the good of their country.

"Thank you," she said to him.

"You're welcome," he said, his eyes once more smiling, like that look hadn't ever existed. "I'll even overlook your momentary lapse in rhyming scheme, since you were quoting me." He reached out, adjusting her ushanka. "I hear your sailor is setting sail for his province soon. You should hurry up if you want to join him."

Liaoxi sighed. "You've timed it perfectly so I'm going to have to dramatically run after his truck, yes?"

China smiled. "Good guess. You had better start running if you don't want to look too ugly when you catch him."

Without another word, his province turned and ran for the place the Korean provinces usually caught their transport. By the time she got there, the sun was setting and the truck was rolling away. Huffing in exasperation at China's maneuvering, she redoubled her efforts, calling out, “Wait!”

One of the figures in the back of the truck stood, and the vehicle rolled to a stop as he said something. As she drew closer, Liaoxi could see it was North Pyongan.

“Comrade Liaoxi?” he asked as she reached him, huffing and puffing.

“Sorry I’m… late,” she panted, hands on her knees. “Would I… be able to come… with you? If that wouldn’t be… too much… ado!” She gasped the last words out.

North Pyongan looked surprised, and a little shy. “You… want to?”

Wordlessly, Liaoxi nodded.

“Of course,” he said, easily accepting her even after she had been so cold. He held out his hand, and she took it, letting help her up.

She squished in next to him and the other soldiers and technicians in the truck as it started forward again.

“Nice sprint,” South Pyongan praised from his other side. “You were cutting it pretty close there.”

“Your driver’s patience I didn’t mean to test,” she said apologetically. “But I was held up by a pest.”

“No one’s patience was tested,” North Pyongan assured her. “I’m… glad you’re coming.”

He gave her a tentative smile, and her heart skipped. She found herself wishing he could hear as well as China.

Liaoxi quickly grew cold as the truck drove through the winter’s night towards Anju. But the places pressed up against North Pyongan were warm. After a moment of deliberation, she placed her gloved hand on top of his in the dark. He looked over at her, cheeks flushed from more than the cold, then hesitantly curled his fingers around hers so that they were holding hands in secret.

Perhaps it would be unfair to him. Perhaps it would be just like China leading women along, making them think they had the possibility of a future together before breaking their hearts.

Yet the Chinese woman couldn't see it that way. Unlike her Countryhuman's, her feelings were true. And grief and pain were nothing compared to what they stemmed from.

Just like the thousands of comrades she and China had lost, it didn't matter if it hurt either of them to look back on, so long as it hurt because it had been love.

100 septims for anyone else that draws me China in his female disguise. And, uh, flips through archives My third-born child? Are we on third-born now?

China's comment about being butterfly lovers instead of mandarin ducks is referring to this story about a man and a woman that meet when the woman is pretending to be a man. She falls in love with him, they part, then he finds out she's a woman when they reunite, and they vow to be together. But the woman has already been pledged by her family to someone else. The man dies of a broken heart, and on the wedding march the woman throws herself onto his grave and begs for it to open. It does, she throws herself in, then they both emerge as butterflies and fly away together. So tragic story. While mandarin ducks are a symbol of happy, lifelong couples.

I didn't know how to do the dragon pattern yet here he is!

Not Again

Most of the people in the truck had passed out almost as soon as they left Pyongyang, trying to catch some sleep before they reached their destinations. The only ones still up were South Pyongan, her brother, one of his bodyguards, one of hers, and maybe the Chinese chick. And the driver, hopefully.

South Pyongan tipped her head back to let the cold night air rush over her, imagining the driver falling asleep at the wheel and her pulling off some sick move like swinging from the back into the front and commandeering them back on course.

Sure, it might just be easier to shout and wake him up. But where would be the fun in that?

"You can get some rest."

North Pyongan's voice made her pull her head out of the slipstream, stretching as much as she could, crammed in with all the men as she was.

General, some of them needed a bath. She did, too. A real bath, not just dunking herself in boiled water for the minute it took until it got freezing. She had no idea how SH could soak herself in ice water like she did.

"I'm good," she said, slinging an arm over the side of the truck bed. "What if we get jumped by the traitors cutting our wires and crap? Someone's got to make sure you don't get carried off again."

"That won't happen," her brother said, and she snorted.

"Yeah, I'm sure you wanted it to happen the first time." She drummed her fingers on the side of the vehicle, feeling the engine hum. "Any word on what Korea's doing with that Pak guy?"

She kept her voice low, just in case.

North Pyongan looked down. "He's still being held. I..." He moved closer to her, barely audible over the rushing wind as he whispered, "Think he might want him to die in jail."

South Pyongan bobbed her head. Made sense. The traitor-priest must be in his what, seventies? And it wasn't like jail was a fun place to be ever, let alone while they were at war. If she had her way, none of the prisoners would be eating at all.

The political ones anyway. She got that breaking the law now that it was actually their law was bad no matter what. But she wasn't gonna start calling for death by firing squad for some poor bastard that stole his neighbour's chicken to feed his family, or that picked someone up when they didn't have a transport pass.

But Pak had fucked with her brother. She'd kill him herself if Korea let her.

"I don't know if he's worried I might ask for leniency," he murmured. "If it is just his niece's testimony, an argument could be made that he was one of those forced to work for the enemy under threats of coercion."

Which meant no death penalty. Bleh.

"Would you ask for leniency?" she asked.

Her brother was silent for a long moment as they drove down the bumpy road.

"I don't know," he said eventually.

South Pyongan pressed her lips together. "If he gets offed, it's his own fault. You know damn well he didn't do that shit to protect himself or his niece. And even if he did, he'd still deserve it."

If he'd wanted protection, he could have come north. They'd literally been retreating. If he'd asked her brother, he would've pissed Korea off by personally escorting him all the way back to Pyongyang. Instead the bastard had turned her brother over because he was a traitorous, god-fearing idiot.

Unlike North Pyongan, who was a god-loving idiot.

"I know," he said quietly, making her huff.

She leaned her head back over the edge of the truck again. Whatever. Hopefully the old bastard would rot in some lightless cell. Maybe the Yanks would bomb him like they'd bombed their own prisoners.

She turned her head, looking up the highway. The last line of hills were still between them and Sukchon, but she knew she wouldn't be able to see it anyway. Normally she'd be able to spot a village or two, but with the blackout, the only light came from the half-moon illuminating the snow that dusted the fields, getting deeper higher up in the hills.

'Can't even turn on a light in our own damn country.'

The province tilted her head more, eyes fixed on the mountains that rose beyond the hills, darker shadows against the inky blue sky.

Chaejon-ri was somewhere over there. Commander Ro's hometown. And more than a year later, his body was still a thousand ri away by the Raktong.

She didn't want to think about that.

Turning her head the other way, wind rushing in her 'ears,' South Pyongan looked back the way they'd came. The lights of the road crew working on the cratered highway were hidden by the hills behind them, making it look dark all the way back to Pyongyang.

Her eyes flicked over to someone in the truck.

Liaoxi was on the other side of her brother, squished up against him so she wouldn't fall out the back. Her chin rested on her chest, but that didn't mean she was asleep.

South Pyongan didn't have it out for the Chinese provinces the way North Hamgyong did, but she definitely thought they were sneaky. And that wasn't her being racist, it was her being one hundred percent certain that Liaoxi had been using her brother for information, and that Liaotung had gone through her stuff in the bunker.

She thought of the woman telling her she'd have to pretend she didn't care about her sister if she was captured by the enemy, that she didn't even know her, and huffed.

Whatever. They were fighting for Korea, so they were still cool. And it wasn't like South Pyongan hadn't rummaged through their stuff, too (the most interesting thing she'd found was Liaoxi's poetry, which wasn't actually interesting to her at all, though a few poems had made her eyes narrow).

She did have it out for China, though. She didn't care why he was here or why he was putting up with Korea- he was way too pretty for anything to make up for it. And Korea hadn't taken his chance during their fight to fix that. The guy literally slept in his room now, and he hadn't even once slammed his face into the concrete and said he did it by accident in his sleep. South Pyongan had no choice but to think he was playing the long con, lulling him into a false sense of security. If he didn't leave Korea after they won this war permanently disfigured, she was going to be disappointed.

Liaoxi shifted a closer to North Pyongan, and he twitched. Not like he wanted to pull away, though. He kind of side-eyed South Pyongan, then settled back in.

She narrowed her eyes at the Chinese woman. Was she awake?

She didn't have it out for Liaoxi exactly. But she was growing suspicious of her.

Opening her mouth to ask her brother what that little look had been about, she stopped, looking past him.

"Shit." South Pyongan shoved her sleeping bodyguard awake, then jumped up, quickly hopping through the maze of legs and guns to pound on the back window of the truck. "Hey!" she shouted. "Incoming fighter jet!"

Behind her the soldiers startled awake, and the truck swerved as the driver took them off-road, accelerating for the cover of the hills. South Pyongan threw herself down half on top of some guy so she wouldn't go flying out, and the people close to the back crowded in closer, her brother putting an arm around Liaoxi, preventing her from sliding.

As they reached the edge of the hills, their driver aimed for a crevice between two crags, cutting the engine as soon as they were as hidden as they could get. Together they all watched the fighter jet soar towards them, a dark shadow up above.

"Seriously? We can't even take a damn drive?" South Pyongan muttered, finally getting off the guy she was crushing.

"It's weird that it's alone," he whispered, crowding close to the edge of the truck with her. "Where's its wing?"

"You know you don't have to whisper, right?" the province asked. "It can't hear us from up there."

Still, the guys kept their voices low as they talked.

Whatever. She guessed they did have sabotagers. She doubted they'd coincidentally be just off the highway, but with their luck, they might be.

Actually, maybe she should start shouting. If she could finish them off here, she'd save herself a search and interrogation.

The fighter jet swept over the road, heading northwest and over the hills.

"Okay, it's off to get eaten alive by the MiGs," South Pyongan said, clapping her hands. "Let's get this show back on the road."

North Pyongan frowned. "I think we should wait a bit longer."

One of his bodyguards watched the empty sky with narrowed eyes. "Did you see how low it was flying? It was looking for something."

"You don't think they saw us, do you?" one of the technicians- a younger guy- asked nervously.

"Not with their eyes. Comrade South Pyongan caught 'em pretty far out," his escort- an older gruff soldier- said, lighting a cigarette. "Might've caught us on radar, though. Best to wait it out."

South Pyongan blew out a puff of air, jumping from the truck to stretch. They hadn't been on the road long, but she couldn't stand the smell of tobacco smoke. She also didn't need Kangwon to tell her it was bad for her body. Opium had fucked the Chinese up, so she didn't see why tobacco was any different. The only thing going in her lungs was air, especially now that she could run without getting out of breath again.

She eyed Liaoxi, who was checking her sniper rifle as she talked with her brother.

Sure enough, after a handful of minutes (and a eighty-two push-ups), the drone of the jet returned, and it soared over the hills again.

"Told you comrades we should wait," South Pyongan said, dusting grit from her hands. "Looks like the deathbird is looking for us."

The driver *'tch'*ed, leaning out his window. "I've got a fucking schedule to keep. Pardon the language, Comrade Provinces."

"We've all got fucking schedules to keep," South Pyongan assured him.

"Hard to tell, but it looks like an F-80," the soldier in the passenger seat said, squinting up at the shadow. "Where's the closest place it could come from? Cho Island?"

Cho Island was off the coast of South Pyongan and the Hwanghaes' provinces. And yes it did piss her off immensely that the Yanks had set up camp literally in her backyard, thank you.

"There's no air field there yet," she told him. "The Yanks are just using it to spy, and rescue the bastards we shoot up over the Amnok."

Though Korea said intel said they were building one, which meant she'd be getting bombed more. Great.

"Seoul, then," the gruff soldier grunted.

"If it came from Seoul, it could have up to four hours of juice left," the passenger seat guy judged. "More, if they've got drop tanks."

'Ughhhhhh.' South Pyongan had enough dignity to groan internally.

"Want to try outrunning a fighter jet?" she tried.

"It can carry two thousand-pound bombs, too," passenger guy- who was clearly a buzzkill as well as a deathbird expert- said.

The driver smiled wryly. "The mechanic course the State got for me makes me good enough to get a stalled engine running again. We might be outta luck if we get bombed."

His expression went more serious. "But do you want me to try?"

"No," South Pyongan quickly said. "I'm not on a time-crunch or anything. And if we ended up dead, we'd really be off schedule."

It would be cool if they actually managed to outrun the plane, maybe shoot it down in a burst of flame that they barely escaped. But she wasn't going to get them killed over that. She had enough things to not think about.

They waited as the plane flew by again, veering away from the road this time to swoop low over the hills.

"It's being too persistent," Liaoxi whispered, shrinking down. "I think it has some intent."

South Pyongan tensed as the shadow buzzed towards them.

Suddenly the night was split by gunfire, and the crags above them erupted in shards of rock as the soldiers shouted in alarm.

South Pyongan lunged for the truck to save her brother as the rapid machine gun fire sprayed over them. She heard the whine as a slug shot by her, missing by an inch.

North Pyongan's guards had already hustled him down, hauling him for cover with Liaoxi, so she switched course, rushing for the front of the vehicle as she heard the explosion of the windshield shattering. Rounds peppered the front of it with the screech of rending metal as she hauled the door open, tearing the driver from his seat just before another wave of bullets hit.

She tugged the man towards the shadow of the crag, blood slicking her hands, before the passenger rushed over to help. As soon as she had him safe, she raised her Type 49, aiming for the deathbird as it circled back over.

"Wait!" North Pyongan grabbed her arm, resting her attempt to shrug him off. "Don't shoot. I don't think it knows we're here."

"It just shot us up!" she hissed, throwing him off. "And it's coming back for round two!"

But as she lifted her muzzle skyward, the deathbird didn't beat her to the shot. It soared over again, moonlight glinting off its silver wings.

Against her better judgement, South Pyongan held position, watching as it veered north, unleashing another wave of rounds against the hills there.

"It's just shooting blind and hoping it'll hit something," the gruff soldier grunted in relief, slinging his own rifle back over his shoulder.

He probably wouldn't have got a good shot in, anyways, considering the young technician was clinging to his waist.

"Is anyone hurt?" North Pyongan asked, hustling back over to the shadows under the crags.

"Driver took a slug," South Pyongan said, not taking her eyes off the sky as she wiped his blood on her pants. Just because the deathbird hadn't seen them yet, didn't mean it wouldn't.

"I'm alright," the man said in a strained voice, blood pouring through the fingers over his bicep. "It was just a glance. I can still drive."

"I'm not sure you can," the technician said, no longer clinging to his escort, but still hiding in his shadow. "The truck got hit."

South Pyongan glanced over to see that yeah, that metal sound she'd heard had been their hood getting fucked up, engine probably included.

"Let me take a look at it," the driver grunted, heaving to his feet.

North Pyongan gently guided him back down. "Not yet. I'll bandage your wound while we wait for the plane to leave."

The man reluctantly agreed, and Liaoxi hustled for the truck, getting the first aid kit that all military drivers were required to carry, along with his mechanic's bag.

One of North Pyongan's bodyguards had got hit, too, covering him on the way to safety. It was only an actual graze, unlike the almost direct shot the driver had taken. But South Pyongan knew thigh wounds could sting like a bitch.

Her own guards were giving her the eye, probably displeased that she'd stolen any heroics from them by moving too fast.

The fighter's guns rattled across the hills, eventually interrupted by a familiar whistle and 'boom.'

"It's doing everything it can to get us," a soldier noted.

"Hope there's no refugees where it's aiming." The gruff soldier's voice was softer than before.

The deathbird expert said quietly, "It had to be aiming for something."

The next explosion came close enough that it lit up the hillside, sending showers of rock and shards of wood down towards them, though luckily they weren't hit by the actual shockwave. After another volley of machine gun fire, the deathbird started to soar away.

South Pyongan gripped her gun tightly.

It was unfair that this bastard could just soar over their country as he pleased, screwing up their truck, making them bleed, and definitely blowing up their civs. She wanted to bring down the plane and drag the pilot from it screaming, show him he wasn't as high and mighty as he felt up there. To show him that if he was going to rain death on their country, then he had to pay for it.

She looked back over her shoulder at the cluster of soldiers, North Pyongan helping his guard with his leg wound while the driver clutched at his already blood-soaked bandage.

They'd been lucky. They'd all made it out.

The province grit her teeth, slinging her submachine gun back on, watching with narrowed eyes as the fighter gained altitude, soaring back over the plains towards the south. Soon it was gone.

While she'd watched, the driver had made his way to the truck and lifted the hood with one hand. He made a low whistle of disappointment as he observed the smoking insides.

"Engine's shot," he grumbled. "Nothing in my kit can fix this. We'll have to head to the Sukchon checkpoint and get someone to drive back and tow it."

"You're sure we can't get it working?" the technician asked, peering our from behind his human shield.

"Kid." The man slammed the hood. "This is a gasoline engine with a hole in it. We're lucky we didn't get blown to hell. In fact, we should all probably put some distance with it, just in case."

The technician scrambled back, and the rest of them followed.

"Sorry to make you late, comrades," the driver said, dusting off his hands. "You head on to Sukchon. I'll keep the old hoss safe."

"It's the pilot's fault, not yours," North Pyongan assured him. "And we won't leave you out here unguarded. South Pyongan can go."

South Pyongan blinked, tearing her eyes away from the sky. "Did I volunteer to do that?"

"You're the only one that can turn a two hour run into an hour and a half," he said, making her chest puff.

"Well yeah. That's true." She examined her blunt nails. "I guess we can go."

Her brother looked over his shoulder. "I should stay here."

South Pyongan shifted uneasily, looking around at the dark hills. "Yeah, I'm not comfortable with that. There might be reactionaries around, and I kinda don't want you to get kidnapped again. Especially since that Yankee bastard's looking for an excuse to drag these talks out longer."

Seriously, they'd decided on a line, and Korea had been magnanimous enough to offer a ceasefire right away so they couldn't kill any more Yanks. But noooo. Now the miguk-nom wanted to hash out POW shit before signing anything. While the loser Korea was still trying to hijack Gangwon.

South Pyongan wouldn't mind getting more time to kill Yankees, but she wasn't even allowed to! She had to go do detective work. Blurgh.

"My guards won't let me accompany you without them both," her brother said. "And Comrade Kim Don-om can't run right now."

He looked back at her, pulling his brows in so she knew that was only an excuse. 'I'll slow you down.'

She glared back at him. 'Maybe if you were actually eating full meals-'

"Fine," she said out loud. "I'm ditching my guards then. They'll slow me down, too."

"I'm afraid we can't let that happen, Comrade South Pyongan," one of them cut in.

Korea had literally chosen the worst guards for her. They were super serious, like, no sense of humour at all, wouldn't entertain the idea of an all-bodyguard football match (even though she knew they'd win since they were hers), they were similar-looking enough she thought they were related, which meant she couldn't play them off each other to distract them, and they literally wouldn't even tell her their names so she could try and get chummy enough with them to convince 'em to let her sneak off and do her own thing!

Okay, maybe Korea had chosen the best guards for her for him. But not the best guards for her for her.

South Pyongan paddled her feet, glancing around the shadowy terrain again. "That deathbird was weird. What if the traitors are planning something?"

"I think it must have just caught us on its radar," North Pyongan soothed. "And it's not like I am staying alone. Our comrades are here, and Comrade Liao Shī. And I can take care of myself, you know."

"Yeah, totally," she said sarcastically. "Until you get kidnapped by another priest." Catching his disapproving look, she muttered, "Sorry. I just- Ugh!"

She turned around, not wanting to do this in front of their guys.

"I'll be alright, sister," her brother said, putting a hand on her shoulder. "But we need to be out of here by morning. The hills won't hide us from planes in daylight."

South Pyongan bounced on her heels, then growled again. "Fine," she said, then immediately shot off, calling, "I'll be back! Keep up," she shot at her guards without slowing, sliding down the slight slope they'd driven up and sprinting as soon as she hit flat ground, heading for the highway.

She was not leaving her brother alone longer than she had to.

An hour and a half there, an hour and a half back. Less if she got lucky enough to catch a vehicle in Sukchon. That wasn't too bad. What could happen to him in three hours?

She had an image of the truck's engine exploding in a fireball. And if that didn't kill him, the rockslide caused by it would. Or that deathbird would come back with its friends and carpet the mountain in napalm. Or those reactionaries had conveniently decided to move their operations north on this specific night. Or-

South Pyongan stretched her legs as far as they would go, letting the pounding of her feet and blood drown out the thoughts in her head.

The province reached Sukchon in under an hour and thirty minutes (not dying in the slightest), and gasped out the situation to the military checkpoint, who assured her they'd contact Anju immediately and get a truck sent out. They offered to boil some water for her to drink while she waited, but she was already running again, back towards the highway, passing her wheezing guards on the way.

Honestly, they'd kept up pretty good. Korea had also chosen incredibly athletic men. Not athletic enough, though, and South Pyongan was pleased to learn that if she ever wanted to lose them she just had to take a brief jaunt of over an hour.

She pushed herself even harder than on her run to Pyongyang from tank-hunting training, through the stitch in her side and the cold wind scouring her lungs raw and the crackling of her skin as the burns on her things chafed and split. And the hollow ache that seemed to spread out of her stomach to pervade every inch of her body.

'I can take care of myself,' her brother had said.

But he couldn't. Not when he was just as burned up as her- worse- and starving on top of it. Not when he'd said 'I don't know' about Pak Chae-eun. He might be getting better, but he still needed her.

A little under three hours. That was fine. There was no way something had happened in that little amount of time. He was fine. She was going to get there and he was going to be fine and she wasn't going to feel like the entire world was crashing down around her again.

But as she skidded over the crag they'd relocated to, adrenaline flooded her body on a second wind, making her heart pound so hard it felt like it was going to burst.

The men were up and tense, firearms in hand, and the injured one of her brother's guards had even pointed his submachine gun at her before he realized who it was. She didn't see the other one. Looking around frantically, she also didn't see someone else.

'No no no no no not again-'

South Pyongan drew in a breath that made her lungs scream in protest, glaring murderously as she demanded to know,

"Where is my fucking brother?"

I've been obsessed with tree jellyfish lately. And this Korean daeju tea paste. I have been eating it out of the jar with a spoon.

Also I just learned that I didn't have the proper chapter up for the One's Own Destiny chapter? I accidentally had my third draft up instead of my fourth? So it wasn't that big of a difference, just a few word changes and a few added lines, but those lines were important. So go back and read that if you please. I don't know how I did that since I usually do a fifth draft read.

I had a friend say that she didn't get why Israelis go around claiming they speak for all Jewish people and that all Jewish people support them, because if people think 'Oh, all Jewish people support genocide,' then they'll be anti-Semitic. But I think that's the point. I think the reason Zionists are so obsessed with saying that every Jewish person believes what they do (they don't) is because they want to increase anti-Semitism. They want people to think that all Jewish people are genocidal racist freaks because it exacerbates the culture of fear for Jewish people, which makes the Israeli claim that Israel is 'the only safe place for Jews' seem more real, and can draw normal Jewish people towards them. Just a reminder that Zionists are Jewish in the same way that ISIS is Islamic (and American-funded), Evangelicals are Christian, and Kokka Shinto supporters follow Shinto. Which is to say religion is a weapon for them instead of a belief. Don't let anyone tell you saying death to Israel and the IOF is anti-Semitic, but also be very mindful to never attack actual Jewish people just for being Jewish.

The Unfaithful and The Upright

A far away drone hummed over the plains on the edge of hearing. It was difficult to tell where it was coming from, but it was likely Pyongyang or the rail lines to the south. North Pyongan kept on alert for the bombers to come closer, but they remained distant.

Apart from that the night was silent, filled with the cold hush that only winter brought. Whites and silvers painted the landscape where moonlight shone off the ice and snow clinging to the hills.

Winter was North Pyongan's favourite season, visually. It had always made him want to craft poetry. But he was never able to truly appreciate it when he knew firsthand the hardship it brought.

His eyes scanned the horizon, wondering how many people were roaming the dark hills in search of food even at this late hour.

The province looked towards the highway, though he couldn't see it, and South Pyongan had only just left.

'God watch over her.'

North Pyongan could not afford to rely on God any longer, if he wanted to become the type of province his people could believe in, and his sister could rely on. But in this case, where he couldn't follow her, it still felt appropriate to ask the Lord to keep an eye on her.

"Do you see anything suspicious?"

The province looked over to see his injured bodyguard limping towards him. "Comrade Kim Don-om, you should rest."

"Not while we're so exposed out here." He flanked North Pyongan on the other side, squinting out at the plateau. "I don't like how those hills cut off our line of sight to the southwest."

"Me neither," his other bodyguard- Ho Yong-ik- grunted.

Both men spoke Pyongan dialect, from close to the Amnok. Korea had chosen pairs from each Provincehuman's lands to guard them, as well as those who had been both involved in the fight against Japan, and were members of the Worker's Party.

North Pyongan hadn't been the one to realize it- SH had, from introducing herself to all of them. She guessed it was to provide another layer of assurance. Even if they turned out to not support their State's goals, hopefully their feelings about their home provinces would keep them loyal.

"And I don't like what was up with that plane," Kim Don-om said, lifting his eyes to the dark heavens above. "You know it wasn't right."

North Pyongan nodded. He did. He had only told his sister otherwise to reassure her enough to leave him to get help.

Without discussing it, the small group had taken up a defensive position at the sheltered base of a crag, a safe distance away from the damaged truck. They clustered around it in a semi-circle, with the wounded driver and young technician safely behind them. Some squatted, some stood, but all remained on guard.

It could have been a coincidence that a single scouting plane had found them while they were transporting a Provincehuman across open ground. But it had also seemed like one when North Pyongan encountered Pak Chae-eun in Seoul.

The priest had taught him that when it came to war, it was safer not to believe in coincidences.

"Comrade Liao Shī will warn us if she spots anything coming," he said, looking up at the foothills, where the woman was keeping watch.

He had asked her to remain in sight, just in case, so he could see her positioned within the shadows cast by the scrub trees clinging to the rocks above her, rifle in hand. It was too dark to see her clearly, but he could make out that she was sitting at attention with her eye pressed to the scope.

The rifle briefly lowered as she looked back at him, and he swiftly turned back to the plateau, cheeks warm for some reason.

He wasn't… quite sure what had happened between them in the truck. Why after saying it was best if they spoke less and studiously avoiding him for two months, she had suddenly seemed to have a change of heart, enough that she had…

Realizing he was cradling the hand that had held hers to his chest, North Pyongan hid it behind his back, almost expecting to hear his sister teasing him.

He wanted to talk to Liaoxi, but now wasn't the time. Especially when any words they exchanged would echo down below.

His gaze had snuck back to the Chinese province, so as she suddenly stiffened and made a hand signal, he was already tapping his guards, all of them hurrying back to the group. Kim Don-om attempted to stand next to North Pyongan, but the province ushered him in with the driver and technician.

"One person," he murmured, rifle pointed at the outcrop that shielded them, one eye on it and the other on Liaoxi's signals. "Northwest approach, coming down through the foothills. Possibly unarmed."

None of the soldiers relaxed, their firearms remaining steady as the clatter of rock broke the hush, followed by the harsh rasp of heavy breathing, before a woman came staggering around the rocks.

She took a few tottering steps, looking around frantically, before seeing the men and stumbling back, her eyes wide with terror as she fell to the ground, her palms scrabbling at the icy rock.

"It's alright," North Pyongan quickly soothed, placing his gun on his back, and gesturing for the others to lower theirs. Though not holster them. "KPA, General North Pyongan. You're safe now."

The woman stared at his extended hand with blown-out pupils, looking like she wanted to run. But after a second she took it, allowing him to pull her up.

"C-C-Comrade North Pyongan," she stuttered, her hands balled in her thick skirt. "Thank God I f-found you- found someone. M-My sister she's- she's sick. I need- I n-need-"

"Slow down," he soothed, guiding her over to a ledge of rock she could use to sit. "Get your breath back first."

The woman started to inhale and exhale deeply, each breath containing a whistling note of hysteria, while North Pyongan examined her more closely.

She was young, under thirty he'd say, and thin, as many were, though the layers of her winter choson-ot and coat made her look sturdy. Her hood was down and her dark hair was loose, pasted to her forehead with sweat. Her skin was the colour of pearls in the moonlight.

He looked up, seeing no sign of Liaoxi.

Once the woman's chest wasn't heaving, he asked, "Can you tell me your name and what you're doing out here?"

She took one last deep inhale. "I'm K-Kim Jin. I'm from a nearby farm. M-My sister is sick with something. I need you to come right away."

North Pyongan's heart sank, thinking of the American-spread smallpox of last year. "Do you know what she has?"

"Does it matter?" the woman shrilled. "She's coughing blood and- and mucus, and I need you to come see her."

"We don't have any medical supplies," the province told her. The driver's kit was for emergency first aid, not illness. "But we have a truck coming for us soon. We could pick her up and take her-"

"No!" Kim Jin shrilled, shooting up, the whites of her eyes gleaming wildly. "No, she's so ill, I- I don't think she's going to make it. Please, I need to get back to her now."

“I understand,” North Pyongan said gently. “But in that case, I’m afraid there’s nothing we can do for her.”

The woman clutched at the ties of her coat. “You- You’re Christian, right? You’re with the Christian Federation, aren’t you?”

North Pyongan hesitantly assented, though he never actually had been. Mindful of Korea not wanting him to broadcast his faith, he had only ever worked closely with them as his appointed go-between.

“Then you have to come!” the woman urged, clutching at the collar of his tunic. “Please! You can give her final rites or- or-“

Her eyes welled with tears that glistened like diamonds in the silver light, her knuckles creaking with how desperately she was clinging to him.

If the woman's sister really was dying, then North Pyongan couldn't not do what he could for them both.

He looked over his shoulder at his comrades, who were still holding their firearms, watching warily. Kim Don-om met his eyes, giving a slight shake of his head.

“A… few of us could come see her, I suppose,” the province said to Kim Jin.

Her eyes somehow widened even further as she stepped back, shaking her head vigorously. “My sister, she- she doesn’t trust soldiers. Men. B-But you’re a Provincehuman, so you’re safe. Please.”

North Pyongan hesitated, wishing his sister was…

No. This was his situation. He could handle it.

“Let me speak with my comrades first,” he said.

“O-Okay.” The woman’s eyes darted around at the looming shadows. “Please hurry.”

North Pyongan hustled back to the men, all of them going aside to confer in brief, hushed tones.

After some fervent protests from Kim Don-om, the province turned back to the woman.

“Alright,” he said. “I can accompany you back. But my bodyguard has to come, or I can’t.”

Kim Jin glanced at Ho Yong-ik, her tongue darting out to wet her chapped lips. “Th-That’s fine. But we need to hurry.”

She started off before he could say anything else.

As Ho Yong-ik adjusted his firearm, North Pyongan glanced back at the others. Kim Don-om’s lips were pressed thin, still displeased, and the gruff old soldier had his fingers tight around his submachine gun’s grip.

He still couldn't see Liaoxi. But he trusted she would know what to do.

The province and his guard set out after Kim Jin.

North Pyongan did not ask God to watch over him. He needed to prove to his sister that he could take care of himself, so that she would no longer have to worry about leaving him. He needed to prove to Korea and himself that he was someone he could rely on.

And he shouldn’t need divine providence for that.

They followed the woman out of the hills and across the plains, looping down around the small range of ridges that flanked the Pyongyang highway to the west to avoid the river that ran through them, before setting off across a dark country road.

Kim Jin rushed ahead, looking back every few metres as if to make sure they were still following. She shook off North Pyongan’s offers to carry or even support her, though her steps were unsteady.

He thought of how he had felt on his way from Anju to Sinuiju, his thoughts whirling around the abyss in his mind, driven only to keep moving so that he could save his sister sooner. If hers was dying, then her haste and anxiety were understandable.

They walked for over an hour, long enough that he thought they might have gone farther west than Sukchon, though the darkness and sameness of the snow-covered fields was disorienting. There weren't many villages in this part of his sister's province, mostly scattered farms between here and the coast.

"Where did you say your farm was?" he asked, wishing he could have done it before they left the others.

"Close," she assured him, looking around the glowing fields.

"How long have you lived here?"

"All my life," she replied. "We can leave the road now."

He gently took her wrist before she could plunge off it.

"Winter wheat," he said, pointing to the small green plants almost hidden by the dusting of snow. "Let's find a path."

"My sister is dying," the woman said, frustrated.

"I understand. But we can't doom anyone else by treading on food that they need." North Pyongan escorted her farther down the road, finding a farmer's trail through the crops. "We will need as much as possible for the rebuilding effort when the war is over."

Kim Jin was silent as she led them down the path. Then she quietly asked, "Do you really think that Korea can withstand this?"

If she had asked him if he really thought they could force a ceasefire or free the south, North Pyongan might have paused.

He had told his sister that he wasn't too upset by the talks falling through after the American offensive back in August, as negotiating with them when they weren't being honest about wanting peace would only stretch the war out. And it was clear by now that he had been right. And he knew their army couldn't free the south by force. He had known it since the end of the Fifth Phase Offensive. Korea knew it, too, deep down. It was why he'd moved them into the Jangsan bunker. It was why he put up with the Americans murdering that child instead of pulling away and launching another offensive.

The only option left was to wear the enemy down. But could they? Could their army cause enough damage to force America to make peace while remaining strong enough to stand against his growing forces? North Pyongan believed their people could keep fighting, just as Korea had said during his Foundation Day speech.

But even if they fought long and hard enough to win a ceasefire…

Would they be able to win Reunification?

And if they didn't, what would that mean for Korea and his brother?

But none of that was what the woman before him was asking. She had asked if Korea could withstand it. So North Pyongan was able to earnestly answer, "Yes," with no hesitation.

Before, he might have had to utter a silent prayer, seeking reassurance that they could and causing a moment of hesitation that would seem like faltering to Kim Jin. But he didn't need to now.

It wouldn't be up to God. Withstanding America's aggression was up to them. It was up to their people to resist and forge forwards, and it was up to Korea and his provinces to find them that way forward. North Pyongan knew his Countryhuman could do it, and he knew that in order to help him, he had to believe he could, too.

He had to believe that no matter what, neither Korea nor their people would let them remain Divided, so that they could believe he wouldn't either.

"Korea has withstood worse than this," he said to Kim Jin. "No matter what, we will withstand this, too."

“Is there even a point?” the woman asked, her voice heavy as guilt. “The Japanese didn’t raze everything like this. Even if we won tomorrow… How are we supposed to live our lives in this?”

She raised her eyes to the plains that spread out around them.

North Pyongan knew that if the sun had been above them, they would have been able to see the destruction. Scorched patches high on the hills where their guerrillas had been targeted when the enemy held South Pyongan, craters in the farming roads where ox carts and sheds had been wiped off the map, the burnt-out remains of houses and barns.

There weren’t many villages in this part of his sister’s province. But there had used to be more.

“It will be difficult,” he admitted, not wanting to lie. “But we’ve faced difficult before. We will rebuild, and thrive again.”

The echo of ‘Please God’ sounded in his head as he took another look at where the dark line of the horizon hid the West Sea from view. But he didn’t allow the words to form.

‘We will.’

Kim Jin was silent for the next few minutes, as a farmhouse rose out of the fields, and they drew near.

It was a typical thatch-roofed one, large enough for a small family, with a few storage buildings and an empty cowshed with a broken roof. A window peered from the front of the house like one large, dark eye, watching them approach.

The snow was near spotless, except for a swathe of path scraped down to the dirt, like a sled had been dragged over it. No footprints marred it.

“Would your friend mind waiting outside?” Kim Jin said as they stopped outside the front door. “My sister should be sleeping. It will scare her if too many men come in.”

“Maybe you should go in and wake her up first,” North Pyongan suggested.

"I…" She dipped her head in a nod. "Yes, you're right. Wait here a second."

She opened the door a crack and slid inside the dark mouth of the house.

Ho Yong-ik kept his gaze fixed on the window. North Pyongan readied himself, looking around the fields. He thought he might have seen a slim shadow slipping behind the cowshed, but it could have been his imagination.

His heart beat hard in his chest, the hair on the back of his neck prickling.

'Not again.' He wouldn't let it happen again.

"You can come in," Kim Jin said from inside a moment later.

Ho Yong-ik stepped to the side of the window, and North Pyongan exhaled.

No prayers. He had gotten himself into this. He had to get himself out.

The province opened the door, stepping into the dark.

"I'm s-sorry there's no light," Kim Jin's voice said from another room. "It's the black-"

She hadn't finished her sentence when North Pyongan felt someone lunge for him.

But he had been prepared. He dodged aside, lashing out in the dark and feeling his fist connect with a firm side. There was a grunt and a crash, then chaos erupted in the farmhouse as the men lying in wait for him leapt into action.

North Pyongan sprung, not back for the door but forwards, feeling two bodies go flying past him. He ran until his hand met the back wall, then spun, raising the flashlight he had ready and flicking it on.

Someone hissed as the military-grade beam illuminated the small room in harsh white light, and the province caught a glimpse of his opponents. Five men, all with guns, one of them with his own flashlight in hand, about to turn it on.

North Pyongan aimed for him, the shot from his pistol catching him in the forehead. The man's flashlight tumbled to the ground, and North Pyongan doused his own, jumping aside as someone fired back. He leapt, again not for the front door, but for the sliding one he'd seen farther along the wall.

The shots were deafening in the enclosed space, louder than the startled screams that had come from the room he dove into. He flashed his light again, stunning the one person inside, then lunged for her in the dark, dragging her into the corner as bullets tore through the thin wood of the sliding door, and the light of the enemy's flashlight poured through in piercing spotlights.

"I'm sorry!" Kim Jin screamed, kicking and thrashing. "I'm sorry, please don't-!"

North Pyongan cut her off. "Is there anyone else in the house?"

"No!" she cried, then yelped as a bullet shattered the window next to them, causing glass to rain down on their heads.

Praying she wasn't lying and glad she'd chosen a room with a window, North Pyongan said, "Then please hold still."

He jumped up, hauling her with one arm as he fired at the door with the other, forcing the shooters on the other side to take cover. When he reached the window, he hurriedly lifted the woman, tossing her unceremoniously through the open portal while she shrieked.

"He's going out the window!" one of the men shouted, catching a glimpse through the holes in the door.

"Comrade Ho, we're out!" North Pyongan shouted as he dove and rolled, thankfully not cutting himself on broken glass this time.

Pieces of it crunched under him as he hit the ground a few feet below, then grabbed Kim Jin by the arm as more gunfire sounded from the other side of the house, Ho Yong-ik free to fire now that the woman was safe.

Rushing for a storage shed around the side, North Pyongan shoved her behind it, warning her, “Stay here if you want to be safe.”

“W-Wait!” Kim Jin snagged his sleeve, looking up at him with tears in her eyes. “My kids are in a shed here, please don’t hurt them, please, I’ll do anything-“

“We aren’t going to hurt you,” North Pyongan promised. “Just stay quiet.”

He whisked away, sprinting for the corner of the house, running directly into a man who had retreated there to escape Ho Yong-ik.

North Pyongan smashed into him just as he turned, both of them sprawling to the ground. Cries were raised as the other men saw him, and more as Ho Yong-ik’s submachine gun rattled. It sounded like there had been more hiding in wait outside.

He wrestled the man he was fighting back, shoving his pistol against the side of his head and spraying his brains out over them both. Dropping him, he charged out, running for the cowshed, trying to put distance between him and Kim Jin.

A bullet grazed his lower back in a line of heat, and he threw himself forward, rolling behind the dilapidated shed and springing up with his Type 49 ready. Somewhere Ho Yong-ik was still laying down his own fire, and North Pyongan heard the distinct sound of someone choking on their own blood.

How many was that down? At least three. But there were definitely more than two left firing. How many were there? Had he gotten in over his head? Should he have waited for-?

North Pyongan shook his head, leaning out to fire at the man trying to take cover back in the house, his body jittering as it fell back against the door.

Ho Yong-ik and Kim Jin and Liaoxi could depend on him. He could depend on him.

He spotted another enemy guerrilla leaning around the corner of a shed, but stopped himself from firing.

“Watch the sheds!” he called. “There’s children in one!”

Lowering his gun, he slid around the side of the cowshed, running into a reloading Ho Yong-ik on the other side.

“Status,” the man demanded.

“Minor injuries. Cover me.”

Under his covering fire, North Pyongan sprinted across the open path between them and the storage shed, sliding behind it just as his comrade had to stop to reload. The soldier using it for cover met him at the back, lunging with his knife and scoring a cut across his forearm. But the province grabbed his knife hand, and- using a move his sister did whenever she could- yanked him closer, bring his knee up to meet the man’s groin. Hard.

The guerrilla let out a strangled shout, instinctively trying to grab at himself, and North Pyongan took the distraction to yank his knife from his hand, driving it into his eye, then cutting his throat as soon as he hit the ground.

He shoved the blade into his belt, immediately peering around the shed again, ready to fire.

But the night was still. As he scanned the battlefield, he couldn’t see any movement, aside from Ho Yong-ik peering out from behind the cowshed.

He looked at the man, who signalled him to stay put. He prowled out, moving slow while North Pyongan eyed the sheds.

As his comrade stepped over the body in the doorway to clear the house, the province remained alert.

The ground was littered with the bodies of seven men. Some lay in the open where Ho Yong-ik had caught them leaving the house, while others sprawled half out from behind cover. Blood stained the snow, glistening like dark ink under the uncaring moon.

He looked down at the man he'd killed, his eyes already misting over in the cold. He briefly closed his own, mourning that he had been right about this being a trap.

A slight creak split the night, and North Pyongan tensed, his eyes darting to a wood shed off to the side of the house. He could have sworn he saw the door shut.

He hesitated, then moved forward, not wanting to alert whoever it was by calling for his bodyguard. He crept toward the shed, his pistol ready.

A man lay on the ground in front of it, blood spilling from a scarlet smile carved across his throat, his face frozen in a startled expression.

Standing off to the side, North Pyongan yanked open the door, bracing for gunfire.

He only heard a whimper.

Cautiously peering in, he relaxed upon seeing three small figures clustered together in the dank darkness.

Two of the children cringed back, their eyes shining wide and terrified in the meager light, while the other only sat there listlesy.

"It's okay," North Pyongan quickly assured them, holstering his pistol and raising his hands. "I'm not going to hurt you."

"Where's Eomeoni?" one hiccupped, his teeth chattering, though he was clearly trying to look brave.

"She's alright," North Pyongan said, then glanced around. "Stay here for a bit longer. I'll come get you when it's safe."

He heard the front door close, and went around the side to see Ho Yong-ik emerging, hauling a body with his hands bound behind its back, and a gash on his head.

"Clear," the man said, dropping the unconscious man on the ground. "One of your shots must've caught him. It's not too serious. If we get him back and patch him up we can interrogate him."

North Pyongan nodded, ashamed he hadn't thought to leave at least one alive for that.

Nine in total then. That seemed about right for a small task force.

"Finish clearing the sheds," he ordered. "But don't open that one." He gestured to the woodshed. "There's children in there."

Ho Yong-ik asked no questions, only nodded.

"I'll go get Ms. Kim," the province said, but before he could a haggard voice growled, "Not so fast."

Both of the men spun to see their firearms pointing at one of the guerrillas that had come around the opposite side of the house.

In his arms was Kim Jin, a pistol pressed against the side of her skull.

"Weapons down," the man panted, his eyes almost as wide as his hostage's. "Or the bitch gets it."

Kim Jin shook in his grasp. "Y-You can't shoot me! You said you'd get me to America!"

"I don't give a damn what happens to you!" the man hissed, wincing. He must have been wounded in the firefight. "I'm here for the province. Weapons down. Now."

Ho Yong-ik eyed North Pyongan, whose jaw feathered. But he nodded, slowly setting down his Type 49, followed by his TT-33 and rifle. He dropped the knives from his belt while his bodyguard did the same, both of them kicking their weapons away as prompted.

As soon as they were down, the man fired his pistol.

North Pyongan flinched, but the shot had only gone into the unconscious enemy guerrilla. More blood spread over the churned-up snow outside the house.

"Good," the man panted, pressing the gun back to his hostage's head. "He was the last one that had to die today. You can turn yourself over to me, and this lady and your guy can go free."

"And then Syngman Rhee uses me to stall the negotiations for even longer," North Pyongan said, his hands in the air. "And tens of thousands more die."

"At least we wouldn't let the Communists win," the man spat, and the province knew there would be no negotiating with him.

There were many reasons someone might join up with the right-wing youth groups. Selfishness, wrong convictions, being misled, personal grievances. But at this point, after all this bloodshed and all of Rhee and America's machinations, if someone was willing to operate behind their lines in order to sabotage peace, there could only be one motivation.

Cruelty.

"This doesn't have to end with you dead," North Pyongan still tried, buying time. "If you hand over Ms. Kim Jin peacefully, and give us the location of your accomplices, we can show you leniency."

He wasn't lying. Life in prison wasn't death.

"Not a chance," the man sneered. "And now it's your last one. Get over here or the woman dies."

'Please,' North Pyongan prayed, not to God.

"I'm sorry," he said sadly, not moving.

Kim Jin's eyes squeezed shut as the pistol dug into her temple.

"Fine," the man growled. "I'm not fucking going out alone."

But before he could pull the trigger, his head exploded.

Kim Jin let out a bloodcurdling scream as blood showered her, stumbling back as the man's body slumped to the ground.

Liaoxi came trotting around the corner of the house, where she had set up her shot from the shadows.

"Sorry it took me so long for the shot to take," she lilted in Korean, slinging her sniper rifle back over her shoulder. "I didn't want to make a mistake."

"I knew you would make it," North Pyongan said, still feeling a deep relief as he retrieved his firearms. "I assumed that was your work."

He tilted his head to the dead man outside the woodshed, and she nodded proudly.

"He was going for the kids. I got him before he did."

North Pyongan was pleased he'd been right to trust that she would know to tail them all the way here from the hills. He had told his soldiers she would. It was the only reason Kim Don-om had agreed to let him go.

"You really were following us the whole time?" Ho Yong-ik asked, impressed. "I didn't even catch a glimpse."

The Chinese woman dipped her head demurely. "On the way here, you also had a less friendly tail. At his job he did fail."

"They must have sent someone with Ms. Kim Jin to make sure she didn't tell us we were walking into a trap," North Pyongan said.

Kim Jin seemed to finally realize it hadn't been her that had been shot. She patted at her bloodsoaked body with her hands, looking stunned.

"You could have shot me," she said to Liaoxi with an air of vague surprise.

“She wouldn’t have,” North Pyongan assured, smiling at the other province. “She’s a good shot.”

Liaoxi dipped her head so deeply her chin pressed to her chest.

“I- I was right th…” The woman’s shock turned to horror as she looked up at North Pyongan, the dazed expression draining from her eyes, replaced by horror. “Oh God. You’re going to kill me.”

“I’m not going to kill you,” he firmly told her.

“Y-You’re-" Kim Jin’s eyes filled with tears as she started to shake. “I’m so sorry, I’m so-“

“Eomeoni?”

North Pyongan looked over to see one of the children peeking out from the woodshed. It was the oldest-looking boy, who looked to be perhaps eight or nine.

He stared down at the corpse outside the door, his eyes wide.

“Min-jun, go back inside,” his mother said, her voice clogged with tears.

He looked at her, alarmed, and ran over, placing himself between her and North Pyongan, his stubby legs firmly planted.

“Why’s my mom crying?” he demanded. “What are you doing to her?”

“Min-jun, shush.” Kim Jin tugged him down into her arms, getting bloodstains on his already filthy white shirt.

A girl crept from the shed behind him. Creeping like a barn kitten, she skirted the corpse and curled up in her mother’s arms.

“Min-sol’s shaking again,” she muttered, burying her face in the woman’s breast. “He’s scaring me.”

“He’s just- He’s just sick, I-min,” the woman said, holding the two close as she looked up at North Pyongan. “I’m sorry. They said they would hurt my kids if I didn't listen."

"I don't think they did," the province replied.

The woman had seemed genuinely shocked when the guerrilla mentioned hurting her. The implication might have been there, but he didn't think that was what they'd used to motivate her.

"They promised to get you passage to America, didn't they?"

Fear flashed through the young mother's eyes before she lowered her head. "What did you expect me to do? My son is sick and the hospitals are full. Even when the medical units visited, all they could do was give these two vaccines and give him teas. We don't have any medicine left."

"And you don't think we'll ever recover from this war," North Pyongan said tiredly.

"It's going to take years," Kim Jin said, tightening her grip. "No matter who wins, my children are going to grow up poor and hungry. And if we don't win, then I'm going go be persecuted. You conscripted my husband, you sent him to die. And Rhee's people would punish me for that."

She curled tighter around her children. "I could've got a pardon. I could've given them a better life over there."

"At the expense of the children here."

"I'm a mother," Kim Jin said into her son's hair. "I have to look out for my kids first. I won't be judged for that."

"I won't judge you," North Pyongan said. "But God's judgement cannot be avoided."

"Please don't kill me," the woman whimpered.

Realizing that had sounded like a threat, he told her again, "I really won't kill you. But you were willing to turn one of your Provincehumans over to the enemy for the chance to start a new life in the country that is the reason ours has become unlivable for children like yours. You can't escape justice for that."

There was the urge to understand her, to send her off and pretend he'd never seen her to anyone but Korea. Even if his Countryhuman wanted to hunt her down, it would be difficult with how displaced everyone had become.

He did understand her wanting a better life for her children, even if he couldn't understand wanting that life to be in the country that had made their lives miserable in the first place, where they would be poor and othered.

But he knew if it had been his sister or one of his cousins she had risked, or Korea, he wouldn't forgive it. Like Korea had said about Pak Chae-eun, he shouldn't forgive it just because it was him she had betrayed.

"I'm going to have to turn you in," he said, and the woman paled further.

"B-But… What about my kids? M-Min-sol is sick and-"

North Pyongan closed his eyes, an idea forming. When he opened them, he said, "I'm going to drive you to Anju, and you're going to leave them in front of the Provincial People's Committee office."

Kim Jin blinked up at him. "What?"

"They're going to be taken in as orphans," North Pyongan told her. "And I'm going to make sure that they're sent on a train to Europe with the next batch of orphans our Polish comrades take in. And when I take you to Public Security, you aren't going to mention that you have children."

He didn't know if their mother being a criminal or still being alive might impede the process. Their comrades were still recovering from the World War, and he knew they would already be stretching precious resources for their orphans. He didn't want to chance them or those making the decisions in his own country being selective.

The woman gaped at him in astonished outrage. "You want me to-to surrender my kids so they can be sent to some foreign country while I'm sent to jail?"

"A foreign country that isn't being bombed," North Pyongan told her. "A foreign country whose doctors aren't being murdered and whose medicinal factories haven't been demolished. And a foreign country that isn't destroying ours. Poland is poor. But they can grow up in peace there until the war is over."

"And- And when would I see them again?"

"You might not," North Pyongan admitted. "It depends on what your sentence is, and whether your prison gets hit by the bombs. And if we can find you and them when they're returned- they'll have to give fake names."

He crouched to meet her eyes. "But if the reason you were going to betray Korea was truly to give them a better life, then you will do this."

Kim Jin squeezed her children tightly, so tight that her daughter let out a squeak.

"Eomeoni, ouch!"

"What are you talking about?" the boy asked, extricating his head to glare suspiciously at North Pyongan.

Kim Jin took a shuddering breath, then lifted her head.

"Nothing," she said with choked calm. "Would you two like to go with your brother to Poland?"

"Pol-seu-kka?" the girl said, sounding the word out. "Where's that?"

"Somewhere else," Kim Jin said, inhaling shakily. "Somewhere far away from here."

Min-jun looked alarmed at that. "Are you coming?"

"No."

He threw his arms around her neck. “Then I’m not leaving you.”

His mother leaned her head against his arm, trapping it between her ear and shoulder, closing her eyes.

Perhaps she felt how thin the little limb was. When she raised her head, she sounded more steady.

“You know how you three play spies?”

“Min-sol always makes me be the evil Japanese guy,” the girl muttered.

“Mm. Well this time, you all get to be spies. You’re going to go off and learn everything you can about Poland for me, okay?”

“Okay,” I-min chirped happily.

But her brother pouted. “I don’t wanna be a spy if I have to leave you.”

“You’re the man of the house now, Min-jun. You can’t sulk like a child anymore.” His mother’s hand carded through his short hair, gentler than her words. “Do you remember when those nice men came to pick up your dad? They gave you that candy and told you he had to go do something really important for the country. That’s what you’ll be doing.”

“Are we going to see dad in Pol-seu-kka?” I-min asked excitedly.

“Dummy,” her brother muttered. “Dad’s dead. That means we’re not gonna see him for a long time.”

“Oh.” The girl sobered, looking up at North Pyongan and his blood-stained uniform like she had decided he was the one conscripting her. “Are we going to die?”

“No,” her mother answered for him, her voice breaking into tears as she pulled her in close again. “You’re going to live. You’re going to live happy lives and your brother is going to get better and then-then you can come home and see me again, and tell me all about it. Okay?”

“You’ll be taken good care of,” North Pyongan promised, his heart aching, but knowing this truly was the best outcome for them. For the children at least. “You’re going to go learn as much as you can, then bring it back here to fix Korea. You're doing your part for our country, just like your father. And your mother.”

He looked at Kim Jin, and she averted her eyes.

“Mmmmmm. Alright!" I-min decided. "If I’m not going to die, then I want to go."

Min-jun pouted, but nodded, looking determined. “I’ll learn everything I can about Poland for you, Eomeoni, promise.”

“That’s my brave boy,” his mother said, placing a kiss on his head. “And my smart girl. Go wake up your brother. We’re leaving soon.”

The two children ran off, I-min yelling excitedly that they were going to Pol-seu-kka.

“You’re making the right choice,” North Pyongan said gently, helping their mother to her feet.

“I hope that comforts me when they've forgotten my face,” Kim Jin said dully.

While she got her children ready for travel, Ho Yong-ik stood guard, and the provinces investigated the area one last time.

“I have to say, I know you’re quick,” Liaoxi said as they collected the dead men’s firearms in a salvaged burlap sack. “But when we set out I wasn’t entirely sure you knew it was a trick."

“I was hoping it wasn’t,” North Pyongan murmured. “But there were too many signs.”

There had been too many suspicious things for even him to overlook. The woman had come down from the mountains, a more difficult trek, and one in which she was less likely to be seen by any passersby she was supposedly looking for. And she hadn’t even mentioned the bombs that had just fallen nearby. Then she had led them out to the plains instead of back the way she came, likely because her tail had wanted to conceal their presence on the way in, then observe them more easily on their way back. On top of that, Kim Jin's skin was too fair to be that of a peasant's, and she'd been too willing to defile the wheat fields.

All of those things could have been just her hysteria over an ill sister, or her not wanting to say she was squatting in an abandoned building. They could have been coincidences, just like it could have been a coincidence that she had managed to find them, or that she recognized him as Christian, or that a frightened woman's sick relative just so happened to be a sister who shared his faith.

"We can't accept coincidences in war."

Liaoxi nodded. "Just like we can't accept that that plane just happened to come by in the same time frame."

She examined the pistol she lifted from the belt of the dead man they'd been planning to capture, then passed it to him so that he could observe, "American."

A Colt 1911. America sold them to the 'National Defense Army.'

But these weren't Rhee's soldiers. At least not officially. They wore plain uniforms and spoke in Pyongan dialect. They wore no identifying markers, but he thought he knew who they were.

"Taedong Youth Corps," he said. "Most of them come from my sister's province."

The sons of the wealthy collaborators that had fled Pyongyang after the Division. The very people his sister would have loved to get her hands on.

"Their weapons won't be enough proof," North Pyongan said, crouching to close the eyes of the corpse at their feet. "The Americans will only say they received them from the southern army, or looted them."

Ridgway had been forced to accept that the reactionary guerrilla units in the south were part of the armed forces he had responsibility for, and so would be held liable if they invaded the new neutral zone again. But he still denied responsibility for those above the line, and refused to say whether or not he was arming them.

But clearly he was. Even the Soviet and northern weapons the Korean saw in their hands had likely come from weapons the KPA had left behind on their withdrawals.

"En," Liaoxi sighed, squinting between the Colt and her Mauser. With a slightly reluctant look, she placed the American pistol in the bag.

North Pyongan took another look in the house, searching for any supplies he could drop off in Anju, but finding nothing except a rotting futon. Considering the fields around the property were well-tended, he allowed himself to hope that the original owners had just moved into the hills.

As his flashlight beam panned around the room one last time, he paused, catching a glimpse of something under the first man he'd killed that he had missed when looting him.

He rolled the corpse over, silently apologizing, and picked up a small notebook. He flipped through it, eyes widening.

Back outside, Ho Yong-ik was tying the sack of firearms to Liaoxi's back (all safely emptied of ammo).

North Pyongan hustled over, showing them the notebook. "Look."

His bodyguard squinted at the handwriting. "Coded."

North Pyongan nodded excitedly. "But it doesn't matter. Even if we can't break the code, this is still useful. Look at the times next to these."

He pointed at the numbers, and the light of understanding dawned in Liaoxi's eyes.

"Transmission times," she said. "They're receiving orders from behind enemy lines."

Bobbing his head, North Pyongan said, “And a radio means they have to keep their base of operations in range, which is hard since Korea is so mountainous. And the group of guerrillas that’s been bothering us is operating mostly in my sister’s province and Hwanghae.”

“Can’t be receiving transmissions from beyond the front,” Ho Yong-ik mused. “Hwanghae has that belt of mountains between it and here. I'd say they're coming from the coast."

“It could be a boat, but I'd guess the Americans would use something more reliable,” North Pyongan said, feeling like a lighthouse fire had been sparked in his head.

And there was really only one island that was both far enough south to be safe from their jets operating over his own coast, that could also easily transmit radio signals across his sister and cousins' provinces.

“Cho Island. They have to be within range of Cho Island.”

This had to be what Hwang felt when solving math equations.

Ho Yong-ik and Liaoxi both lit up at his declaration.

“That narrows the search zone a lot,” the Chinese woman said.

North Pyongan nodded, triumphant. “And once South Pyongan conducts her investigation, we’ll have their position down to the dot.”

Cracking his knuckles, Ho Yong-ik said, “Then our comrades can give those youth group bastards what they deserve.”

“Let’s get moving. I need to tell Korea.” North Pyongan started over to Kim Jin and her children, his steps light.

Though they became somewhat heavier as he took one last look back at the abandoned farmhouse and the corpses he would have to send someone to collect.

It had been wrong to hope that with the talks ongoing he could stop getting his hands bloody when their people still were down at the front, he knew that. Yet he couldn't help it.

But he didn't regret killing these men who had been desperate to capture him for America and Rhee. It meant they shared their masters' desire to keep the war ongoing, so that even more children would fall ill, even more of their land would be destroyed, even more people felt like they had no other option than to leave. They had been killing their country's defenders and looting supplies civilians needed to survive.

It was pointless to think of what Korea had said happened to the youth group conscripts in the south. He had already thought it- if these men had been trusted to come north, it was because they were trusted to be cruel.

If things had been different, these men might have been victims.

But they weren't. And like Paik Sun-yup, they had deserved to die.

If God was real, he would judge their souls. And even if he didn't, North Pyongan had at least served them justice in this world.

He set off into the night with Kim Jin's sick son on his back, hoping to make it back before his sister could worry for him.

Did you hear those testimonies that say the Israelis are using dogs to torture prisoners (objective fact, there are videos) and rape them (enough testimonies that I believe it)? Cats wouldn't do that. You couldn't train a cat to do that. This is because dogs are inherently class traitors, while cats are the only animal outside the class system. You might think of the dogs that help farmers, but that is the Khrushev-Zhou phenomenon. 'I came from the peasantry, you came from the privileged class.' 'Yes, and we are both traitors to our class.' The bulk of dogs are the enemy and must be re-educated.
Also I think there's a sickening thing where people hear that and go 'poor dogs.' Poor dogs?? Poor PEOPLE getting VIOLATED by the dogs. It's like how during the Russian Revolution a lot of borzoi got killed for being symbols of the monarchy. I've seen people call the Bolsheviks (not individuals but as a whole) bloodthirsty savages for that, and it is always tsar supporters. WHAT ABOUT THE HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS OF PEOPLE STARVING ACROSS THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE. WHAT ABOUT THE CHILDREN THAT WERE BORN POOR AND LIVED SHORT, MISERABLE LIVES SO THOSE DOGS COULD EAT RED MEAT. WHAT ABOUT THE WOMEN THAT WERE TREATED LIKE PROPERTY AND HAD TO SELL THEMSELVES TO LIVE. WHAT ABOUT THE LITERAL POGROMS COMMITTED AGAINST JEWS, INDEPENDENCE FIGHTERS, AND COMMUNISTS BY THE TSARDOM? Can you imagine being a man who had broke his back in a factory or field his whole life and still lived in soul-crushing poverty, a man who had to watch his children suffer and grow ill while he couldn't afford medicine, and knowing that there were dogs out there that were eating better than you and your family at your expense? I'm not saying I would do it, but I completely understand any person that did kill a borzoi. If the price to pay to end world hunger, class exploitation, and all war forever was to kill one dog, liberals would refuse because the lives of poor people and foreigners are worth less to them than an animal's. I get that animals are innocent, so people feel badly for them, but somehow those same people never feel sorry for children, who are also innocent while also being people. Yes, poor dogs, too, but the dog doesn't have the sapience to have permanent PTSD and truly understand what being raped is, nor do dogs have to deal with religious or regular shame at being assaulted. The real victims are the Palestinians, and the real beasts are the Israelis.

Also I do think if you ever hurt an animal for no reason you have a crooked soul and deserve to be hurt as well. I just don't think it's a crime above that of hurting a person. I'm not saying people should care less about animals, but that they should care more about humans.

Growing Past You

"If you don't tell me where he went right now, I am going to put you on the ground and kidnap the technician."

'Oh no.'

At hearing his sister's voice resound over the hill, North Pyongan sped up the slope, the sick five-year old on his back thankfully not slowing him much.

"I don't like that he went off without us either, Comrade South Pyongan," Kim Don-om's soothing tone said more quietly. "But we can't have both our provinces chasing off across the fields."

"Tell me where my brother is."

Recognizing the growl in his sister's voice, North Pyongan called, "Eon- South Pyongan!"

There was an immediate burst of movement from above as his sister flew over the slope and straight at him.

"I'm carrying a child," he said quickly, and she aborted the swing she'd been aiming at his chest, skidding to a halt in front of him.

"Where the hell were you?" she demanded, fists clenched. "Those bastards told me you ran off after some shady chick, but wouldn't tell me where!"

"Let's not call our comrades that," he said calmingly, ashamed for upsetting her. "Come on, I'll give you my report once we're up there."

Kim Don-om heaved a sigh of relief as he saw him, likely glad that he wasn't going to be dishonourably discharged for losing his province.

"So it wasn't a trap?" the technician asked (hiding from South Pyongan behind his escort's back).

"It was," North Pyongan corrected, setting down the boy he'd been carrying.

Everyone eyed Kim Jin, who hung her head as she shepherded her children towards the place he indicated, hesitantly accepting his bloody tunic for more warmth.

South Pyongan immediately swept in, slugging him on the arm, not one of her playful ones, but hard enough that he knew he'd really worried her.

He gave her an apologetic forehead wrinkle.

"Idiot," she said out loud. "So you walked into another trap? Even though you actually knew it was a trap this time?"

"If her sister really was ill, then I had to try and help."

"Yeah, but she wasn't and you could've-" South Pyongan cut herself off, punching him again, causing a crunching sound to come from his burns. "Idiot."

North Pyongan winced. "It was worth it."

While they waited for the truck his sister said was coming, and he tended to the wounds on his back and arm, he told their gathered soldiers about what had happened at the farmhouse, biting his tongue before he could tell them about narrowing down the location of the guerrilla headquarters.

He didn't know how the fighter jet that had driven them off the road fit in to tonight. No one should have known he would be heading to Sinuiju that wasn't part of this truck crew. Even if someone had seen him waiting at the muster point or as they drove by, he didn't know how they would have gotten the information to the Americans so swiftly.

Subtly, he eyed his comrades as he talked, trying to gauge their reactions, which he admittedly wasn't the best at. He wanted to assume that the technician's brows were furrowed because he had been worried about his province, or that the driver's lip was curled because he was disgusted by the reactionaries and Kim Jin's attempted betrayal. He didn't want to think it was because he had escaped the trap they had helped set up.

Still, it was best to observe military confidentiality.

He frowned as he noticed someone else's expression.

His sister should have relaxed once she heard how they fought off the enemy, like she always did once she worked herself down from her temper. Her angular eyes would stop appearing so sharp, and the corners of her lips would slacken. More noticeably to anyone that wasn't her, her muscular shoulders would unwind, until she was standing in her usual casual posture and less like she was about to strike like an eel.

But as he recounted how he had handled the soldiers inside the house, eliminated the man with the knife, and bought time for Liaoxi to take her shot, South Pyongan only seemed to grow tenser, her blue lips disappearing in a grim line and her brows drawing in so tightly that a new spot of blood appeared on the bandage on her forehead. She didn't even smirk as he made sure to mention how he had kneed the guerrilla that cut him in the groin.

She wouldn't appreciate him asking in front of the others, so he held his tongue.

"Damn traitors," the gruff soldier- Song Hak-su- grunted when he was done. "Hope Public Security can root the rest of those bastards out."

"There's no way there were only eleven," another agreed. "For an independent band, maybe. But I'd bet my ass these ones had foreign help. They'll be bigger."

"Woman," the driver called to Kim Jin, who flinched. "What do you know about the jet that done shot at us?"

"I- I don't know anything," she muttered, hugging one of her sleeping sons. "The man that brought me here just said we were supposed to find your truck somewhere near the road. Nothing else."

"She'll be properly interrogated once I take her in," North Pyongan said. "But I believe her."

"Even with just that, it definitely sounds like the Yanks knew we'd be coming this way," Ho Yong-ik mused, rubbing his square chin.

He, Kim Don-om, and South Pyongan's bodyguards (who wouldn't tell North Pyongan their names, correctly citing that his sister would make him tell her), eyed the rest of the group with open suspicion.

"Once we find the rest of the enemy guerrillas, we'll find out how they knew," the province assured, not wanting them to start suspecting each other.

As the others murmured in low voices, he followed South Pyongan, who had walked to the edge of the slope, looking down at their now cold truck, which thankfully hadn't exploded.

"I have other good news," he said, coming up behind her, smiling as he quietly informed her about the notebook he'd found. "Now you won't have to scour your entire province for a lead."

It was still difficult to believe he'd not only managed to escape the trap, but also found out a key piece of information in the hunt for the sabotagers. Korea might be disappointed they hadn't managed to take one alive, but he knew his Countryhuman would be pleased with what he had accomplished.

His smiled faded as South Pyongan muttered, "Yeah."

"Sister." He placed a hand on her shoulder, coming around to face her. "I'm sorry I worried you."

Her eyes glinted like real diamonds in the moonlight before she flicked them away from his. "You didn't worry me."

North Pyongan lightly squeezed her. "I shouldn't have. And you shouldn't be."

They would always worry for each other. They were siblings, and they loved each other. But he knew he didn't worry to the same extent as South Pyongan because he knew she could protect herself. His sister was indomitable, and the only time he hadn't felt that way was when she'd been taken by South, unconscious from a wound that could have killed her. Then he had almost gone mad with worry.

South Pyongan must feel like that all the time. He knew the quips she made about him falling down a mountain or being crushed by a meteorite or kidnapped again were supposed to be jokes. But he also knew they disguised a real fear that her helpless brother would get himself hurt if she wasn't there.

His sister wouldn't take anything he had realized when speaking to Korea in the Party Foundation building well. If he ever implied he felt ashamed for not being reliable for her or that he wanted to be able to protect her the way she protected him, she would get defensive and lash out, saying that she didn't need anyone to rely on or want to be protected.

So instead he gave her a smile and said, "You don't have to worry so much about me anymore. You don't need to protect me, eonni."

He had thought the words would relieve her. But South Pyongan looked down at the frosty ground, hiding her expression from him.

"Yeah. Right."

North Pyongan frowned, but before he could say anything, she moved past him, clapping him on the back.

"Hey, look. Ride's here."

Looking over his shoulder, he could see a dark shape rolling towards them from the direction of the highway. He pulled out his flashlight, using it to signal them over.

"Come on, people," South Pyongan called, her voice strident again. "Let's get moving. I want to get to Anju before the New Year!"

Perhaps she was still just shaken from him disappearing, and embarrassed about being so openly rattled in front of their comrades. She didn't like when their people realized that under her cool, unaffected demeanour was a caring core. It was why she still refused to speak to the gunner from her lost tank crew.

'Well, she doesn't really like anyone realizing.'

He had always known she cared, but before they had joined with Korea, even he had only seen her openly show it a handful of times, mostly when he was sick, or when one of the men she'd beaten had decided to attempt to get revenge on her brother for it. He had learned that the rules of the ring had let him get off lightly, and North Pyongan had learned that worry made his sister capable of ripping an ear off of someone's head. And he had earned a permanent perimeter guard every time he needed to relieve himself.

That just made him more determined to prove to her that he could protect himself. They had both been adapting to not following each other everywhere, but what good would it do if his sister was always anxious, fretting about what could be happening to him? He didn't want her to have to feel that way anymore.

But still, as they waited for the towing line to be connected between the two trucks, and North Pyongan comfortingly leaned his shoulder against his sister's, she only gave him a forced smile, not meeting his eyes.

North Pyongan didn't end up going to Anju. Korea needed to hear his news right away, and while he was purposefully vague about whether or not the enemy had managed to crack their codes, the province didn't want to risk sending him a communication from Sinuiju.

So the new driver drove them down to the highway, where they parted ways.

Kim Jin went with he, Liaoxi, and his bodyguards. A light went out of the woman's eyes as she realized she had even less time with her children than she thought.

"You'll be brave for me, won't you?" she asked her brood, on her knees on the unforgiving ground.

Her sons and daughter nodded dutifully, repeating the fake names she had given them back to her.

"We'll make you and Korea really proud," Min-jun was trying to appear brave, but his wobbling lip gave him away.

"Good." Kim Jin looked as if she was trying to be brave, too. The silver liquid in her hazel eyes refused to fall. "Good."

Her voice broke as she pulled them all into one last hug, pressing her lips to each of their forehead's in turn, lingering on her fevered son's.

One day the children would grow old enough to understand what had really happened this night. And what her kisses truly meant. North Pyongan wondered how long it would take for one of their only memories of their mother to be a lingering warmth on their cold brows.

"I think what you decided is kind," Liaoxi murmured as they watched the tender farewell. "A fairer option doesn't come to mind."

Letting her go might have been. But North Pyongan knew that wasn't really an option.

How many children had been claimed by this war already? How many more would have been claimed both here and in China if the enemy had gotten their hands on him and used the Commands? None of the children incinerated by napalm or buried in mass graves had gotten the chance to say goodbye to their mothers. And none of the mothers dragged screaming from their homes by American soldiers had had the chance to kiss their families farewell.

This was just. Perhaps more just than Kim Jin deserved.

The men loaded the three children into the cab of the truck to protect them from the cut of the wind as they drove.

Liaoxi, sensing North Pyongan's hesitance to lie to his soldiers, had told the group they were three unrelated orphans they'd found being held hostage by the enemy guerrillas, and that they should be dropped off at the Anju Provincial People's Committee headquarters. After seeing how heartfelt their goodbye with Kim Jin was, they might doubt that story. But none of them said anything as they piled into the back of the truck.

North Pyongan felt uneasy lying to them, even when he didn't do it directly. But he also didn't want to force them to lie by sharing the truth. Politicians asking soldiers to keep personal secrets was a murky area he wanted to avoid. Military confidentiality was one thing, but an atmosphere of dishonesty and secret-keeping would only make enemy espionage easier.

The driver apologized once more for 'getting them bombed' (refusing to head back to Pyongyang for medical treatment, claiming that he would be fixed up in the same shop as his truck), and then the convoy of two set off down the road.

They couldn't see Kim Jin's children, but North Pyongan gave the grieving mother time to watch them depart, her eyes fixed on the truck like she could burn through the olive metal to her family curled in the front seat.

The damaged vehicle being towed blocked North Pyongan's view of his sister, but he watched, too, until they all vanished between the hills.

A cold wind blew over them, making Liaoxi shiver. But none of them moved.

"You promise you'll get them to Poland?" Kim Jin finally rasped.

"I swear on-" North Pyongan's hand moved for the Bible he no longer had, and he placed his hand over the Party membership card in his breast pocket instead. "My honour as one of your Provincehumans. Your children will be safe."

The mother closed her eyes for a long moment, then tore herself away, starting down the road towards Pyongyang.

"Then do whatever you have to with me," she said, not turning back.

North Pyongan let out a long breath, then went after her, catching up to lead them down the dark road.

Ho Yong-ik and Kim Don-om took up the rear, the injured man being supported by his comrade. Liaoxi walked next to North Pyongan. Under the eyes behind them, she didn't try to take his hand. But she walked closely enough that their shoulders brushed with every other step. It warmed the Korean province enough that he took off his tunic again to give to Kim Jin.

Still, that look on South Pyongan's face lingered in his mind.

Korea wasn't pleased to be dragged out of Jonsung complex by the courier he sent, or to see him back at first. But once he told him about eliminating the guerrilla squad and gave him the transmissions notebook, his country settled.

His eye flicked over the coded words before he snapped it shut, praising, "Good job."

The coil of intense anticipation in North Pyongan's chest eased. "Do you have any criticism for me?"

Korea gave a brisk nod. "It was reckless to follow her in the first place. Even if you had known you would be able to retrieve key information, we could have lost far more."

North Pyongan dipped his head. "I know, Korea. But I couldn't have just ignored her. And if I had made her accept the entire group coming along, her observer might have alerted the rest of them, and they could have chosen to attack directly. I wanted to make sure Ms. Kim Jin got out safely."

And he had been worried that it might just be a ploy to steal the truck. They couldn't afford that after the Americans' intense targeting of their vehicles all summer.

Korea nodded, accepting his explanation. “Just remember that you are more tactically important than a single woman.”

North Pyongan knew his Countryhuman likely would have went with her, too, and probably alone. But he also knew telling him that wouldn’t work as a justification.

“Yes, Korea. And do you have any criticisms for my handling of Ms. Kim Jin’s children?”

“What children?” Korea said coolly. “Those orphans weren’t hers. And they’ll be on their way to Eastern Europe soon.”

North Pyongan’s eyes closed, relieved. “Thank you.”

“Head back to the bunker,” the man said, turning away and marching for the sparse shadows of the trees left on Moran Hill. “Another truck will take you to Sinuiju tomorrow night. And wash your uniform.”

North Pyongan looked down at the blood stains that dyed the dark fabric of his tunic even darker. “Yes, Korea. Can I ask how you think that pilot knew I would be taking the highway?”

Briefly stopping, he replied, “I have someone working on that. In the meantime, try to travel with more secrecy. Take back roads to muster points and wear hoods.”

North Pyongan assured him he would. Before his Countryhuman could disappear onto the hill, he called, “And Korea?”

“What?”

“I’m… sorry I have so many weaknesses to exploit.” He hung his head.

He hadn’t been blindly lured in by Kim Jin’s distress over her sister, or the fact that the fictional woman was a Christian seeking the comfort of another. This time. But he knew that if it wasn’t for Pak Chae-eun’s betrayal, he likely would have been.

It was disturbing to think of his southern cousins being Commanded to tell South and America everything that could be used against him and the others, then the American passing it on to Rhee or his soldiers or reactionary guerrillas. He wondered if it had been Sang made to tell them how much he believed in the 'wrong' sect of their religion, or SJ forced to divulge how deep the bond between he and his sister was.

It would have laid guilt heavy upon his heart if he had been forced to do that. He resolved to make sure their cousins knew none of them blamed them for it once they were reunited.

"Clearly exploiting them didn't work," Korea said, not pausing. "Their information is already outdated."

He became another shadow under the trees, then was gone.

North Pyongan lay a hand over his breast pocket, feeling warm again.

For some reason he found himself feeling slightly nervous for the walk back to the bunker. His bodyguards had turned Kim Jin over to Public Security, and Kim Don-om was getting his wound properly tended, so it was just Ho Yong-ik left to escort him and Liaoxi.

Her shoulder kept brushing his, enough so that he knew it wasn't a accident. But he still couldn't talk to her with his comrade watching. Nor could he do it outside the bunker with Chagang on guard. Especially when his cousin was boring into them with his eyes.

He didn't get a chance the next day, either, even as she shadowed him to give his report on Kim Jin and the reactionaries to the Political Security Agency, or to speak with comrades at the Korean Christian Federation, or as he visited Han-jin and Tae-min at the aid station.

Tae-min had taken to the job surprisingly well, and was actually in the midst of helping the older women wash and stitch uniforms for the soldiers at the nearby checkpoint when they arrived. His dark eyes were fixed with intensity on the clothes he was beating, his knuckles cracked and red from cold river water and domestic work.

North Pyongan stood by the road, keeping watch with Han-jin. “How are you two doing?”

“We’re good,” the curly-haired boy muttered, his eyes on the highway. “Tae-min’s even better at sewing than me now. I’m better-was better at farm work.”

“Our comrades are still glad to have both of you here.”

The women had been full of praise for the two, and he knew from one of his earlier visits that Ok Guk-hui had prepared a crock of kimchi for them for the winter. The province was pleased he’d been right about the older women taking them under their wings.

“And Tae-min really is doing well,” he appraised.

He supposed it shouldn’t be surprising. The former landlord’s son had said he felt useless, like he wasn’t good enough for his friend, so of course he would throw himself into learning how to be. Even if North Pyongan’s words about never not being good enough for those that loved them had stuck, Tae-min would still need to feel useful enough for himself.

“Yeah,” Han-jin said, his gaze drifting to his friend. “He is.”

North Pyongan frowned at his tone.

But before he could say anything, Han-jin shook himself like a duck shedding water and said, “What about you and masked noona?”

“We’re doing well,” North Pyongan answered, holding back on telling him they were going to Sinuiju tonight. “We haven’t been on the front lately.”

He trusted Hyun Han-jin whole-heartedly. But you never knew who was listening.

“No, I mean ‘you and masked noona.’” The boy waggled his thick brows.

Flushing for some reason, North Pyongan shook his head. “I don’t know what you mean.”

“Y’know.” Han-jin folded his arms behind his back, leaning to the side in a childish motion. “You two were always together, but the last few times you’ve brought us rations, she wasn’t there. Now she’s back. Did you make up?”

“We… weren’t exactly fighting.”

“Right. And when my Ma would make Pa sleep in the cowshed, they were doing great.” Raw grief flickered across the boy’s brown eyes before he shook his head. “What did you do? Oh, are you refusing to propose?”

“Pro-“ North Pyongan gaped at him in shock. “Propose!? I’m not- We aren’t even together!”

He shot a look over his shoulder, hoping Liaoxi hadn’t heard that. Thankfully she was still inside the kitchen.

“Mmm.” Han-jin sounded unconvinced. “But you had a couple’s spat.”

“Friends are capable of having rough patches,” North Pyongan defended. “I think you and Tae-min should know that.”

Thankfully the awkwardness that had lingered between the boys for so long seemed to be mostly gone now.

Han-jin’s lips twisted in a brief, wry smile. “Yeah, but you’re a man and a woman. It’s different. So why aren’t you together? Is she ugly under the mask?”

“No,” North Pyongan swiftly denied, then cleared his throat. “And women shouldn’t be judged by their appearances, anyway.”

Neither should men. Which meant his sister should stop glaring at him whenever she remembered how long his eyelashes were.

“So there’s nothing stopping you from proposing,” Han-jin said cheerfully. “She’s pretty, kind, and can snipe a guy’s head off from across town. She's the kind of girl my Pa would've wanted me to marry."

North Pyongan could barely speak past his embarrassment. "Why are you bringing this up?"

"Because I made a bet with Tae-min that you'd end up confessing to her," the boy relied with zero hesitation. "But he said there's no way you would, since she's Chinese and you're a Provincehuman. You're doomed, so there'd be no point."

That was… true.

"Hey, don't look so down," the boy hurriedly said, placing a hand on his shoulder. "Love should… conquer all, yeah? And Tae-min gets really smug whenever he wins a bet. I can't take that when we sleep in the same- house."

He gave a thumbs up directly in North Pyongan's face. "So go get her, hyung!"

North Pyongan gave into the urge to hide his face in his shoulder. "I don't think it's appropriate for a government figure to be talking about this with a civilian."

"Whoa, you know you blush purple? That's cool."

"To know what's being talked about to set Comrade North Pyongan's face on fire, I do desire."

North Pyongan startled, whipping around to see Liaoxi standing there with a bowl of soup in hand.

"Nothing," he said too hastily, making Han-jin snicker.

"Hm." Liaoxi's ushanka moved as she lifted a brow. "It's good that you're honest, since you're a bad liar."

"Triple rhyme," Han-jin noted. "Nice one, noona."

Liaoxi radiated an aura of smugness. "They would not listen, this troupe. They insist you take some soup."

North Pyongan had politely turned down the aid station women's offer, but since it would be rude to decline again, he took the tin bowl, letting the radish and dried minnow soup warm his hands. The markets still weren't receiving any goods from the coasts, which meant the small fish likely came from the Taedong River.

He ate his soup (firmly avoiding the look Han-jin kept sending him whenever Liaoxi wasn't looking), then took the bowl back to the kitchen.

"Thank you," he said to one of the cooks.

She wiped her brow, sweating from the heat of the stoves even with the chill outside. "No problem, comrade. That girl told us you haven't been eating, what with how worried you are about our comrades at the front."

North Pyongan blinked, startled. "Liao- Comrade Liao Shī told you that?"

"Mhm. That's not good," a motherly-looking woman with curly black hair contained by a hairnet- Ok Guk-hui- chided. "You need to eat more when you can, no matter how worried you are. None of our soldiers would want to hear our provinces are starving themselves over them. Tell Comrade Korea that goes for him, too."

"I will." North Pyongan would try. He knew it wouldn't accomplish anything. As for him…

It seemed even when Liaoxi had been avoiding him, she'd noticed what he and his cousins had been doing. Which meant Liaotung questioning their 'contraband' had been teasing, not information-gathering.

But the Chinese province had lied about the real reason he wasn't eating enough. He was worried about their soldiers, but he knew he couldn't let his own strength wane just because of that. Army leadership had to remain strong if they wanted to be respectable enough to lead. Even in the depths of worry over his sister, he had always made sure to eat all his rations.

But even the women here, army dependents and Women's Union members, people far from falling through the cracks, looked thin.

He may be glad his sister wasn't doing what the rest of the provinces were. But that didn't mean he was going to stop doing it.

Outside, Tae-min handed him his undershirt, where he'd stitched up the holes left from the shirt battle. North Pyongan had taken time last night to make sure his clothes were washed, and woke up early enough to mend his outer tunic, but had been intending to fix the white shirt in the truck tonight.

"Han-jin was saying weird things again wasn't he?" the dark-haired boy asked.

"Yes," North Pyongan admitted, draping his undershirt over his arm to put on later, when he had privacy. "But it wasn't about you."

The boy crossed his arms. "Was he trying to convince you to confess to Comrade Liao Shī?"

Stricken that the two clearly had been gossiping about him, North Pyongan nodded sheepishly.

Tae-min sighed, shaking his head. "Sorry about him. I tried to tell him not to. It's impossible for you two to be together, so it just hurts to hear it, right?"

North Pyongan had no idea why he was suddenly being treated like a tragic figure from a poem.

"No," he said, then corrected, "I mean not 'No, it doesn't hurt to hear,' but 'No, Liao- Comrade Liaox- Liao Shī and I are just friends."

"Mm," Tae-min hummed dryly. "If you say so."

His crossed arms tightened across his thin chest as his eyes strayed over the province's shoulder, then dipped.

His tone was more subdued as he said, "It's probably better you keep telling yourself that."

Desperate to escape the strange conversation before his face actually caught on fire, North Pyongan bobbed his head and scampered away, bidding everyone farewell before speed walking for the road, ignoring the second enthusiastic thumbs up Han-jin gave him, and followed by Ho Yong-ik and Liaoxi.

He had to avoid looking at her because every time he did, she arched an eyebrow and, like the gate on a pound lock being raised, heat flooded his face again.

Despite his embarrassment at the boys' sudden lines of questioning, North Pyongan was a little relieved. They had both sounded like actual young adults teasing him, the way they should have been teasing each other over girls if Ganghwa had remained Liberated. And aside from Tae-min's guttering at the end, he seemed more lively than he had before. The work and fresh air was doing him good.

But Han-jin… Even with his chipper tone as he teased North Pyongan about his l-love life (not that that was what was going on with he and Liaoxi), there had been something in his eyes and voice as he spoke about Tae-min doing well that… reminded him a bit of his sister the night before.

Then Liaoxi's shoulder brushed his again and his thoughts scattered like a school of nervous fish.

They had only returned part way by the time night draped its shadowy veil over Korea again, and the two attempted to depart for Sinuiju a second time, now crowded in with empty ammunition crates to return to the underground factories near the border.

Hidden by the shadows of the canvas above them, Liaoxi's hand found his again.

North Pyongan glanced at Ho Yong-ik, seated against the other side of the truck bed, intently focused on the open road behind them, then down at the gloved fingers resting on his.

'That's why I like you, I confess. You're honest.'

He'd thought she only meant she liked him as a friend when she had told him that on the way to Guk Island. But had she meant… something else? Something like Han-jin and Tae-min had?

North Pyongan… didn't have any experience with relationships like that. For several reasons. Women had made advances on him before, but when he noticed, he'd always politely turned them down. It didn't feel right to have a relationship with one of their people. Even when he sometimes forgot he wasn't completely human, the moment someone got bold enough to lay their hand on his arm or South Pyongan pointed out the 'eyes' they were making at him, he remembered.

He would think it was wrong for a pastor to court one of his flock. The idea was similar. Like Korea had said- some of their people didn't realize they were walking with them, not following. They would obey their orders unquestionably, and do anything to earn their favour. The provinces weren't gods, but some could see them that way.

And who would say no to a god?

But Liaoxi wasn't one of his people, or entirely human at all. They were both Provincehumans.

He had thought his feelings for her were only friendly, but when he thought about it… Would he have reacted how he did if Han-jin teased him about liking one of his female friends in the Christian Federation or Worker's Party? He knew he would just shake his head and deny it with a smile, like the few times South Pyongan had jokingly asked him if he wanted her to make the first move for him.

And when he thought about any of those friends confessing to him, the idea didn't fluster him. Even if someone he'd spent time with often before the war, like Hyon Pan-yeong from the Writer's Union, had admitted to having feelings for him, he would just regretfully inform her he didn't feel the same way, and hope that their friendship didn't suffer for it.

But if Liaoxi confessed to him…

The idea made his face grow hot enough that he whipped his ushanka off his head, muscle memory making him cross himself, oblivious to the looks from his bodyguard or the subject of the warding herself.

Maybe…

He snuck a look at her, finding her eyes gleaming like moonstone as she watched him with amusement, and quickly averted his gaze.

Maybe he did like her that way. But…

'You're doomed, so there would be no point.'

He and Liaoxi were both Provincehumans. But she was a foreign Provincehuman. He knew it didn't matter that their nations were comrades- Korea still wouldn't be pleased.

And if she did like him, then wouldn't talking openly with her about it upset her? As Tae-min had said, if it was impossible for them to be together, it might just hurt her to bring it up.

That was if she even liked him. If he wasn't misreading her signals. He'd ask South Pyongan what she thought, but it would be days before he saw her again, and he also didn't trust her not to just ask Liaoxi directly. And then he would have to cast himself into the Amnok.

It probably was just better to keep telling himself that he only thought of her as a friend.

But once he arrived in his capital and threw himself into work, Liaoxi still lingered in his thoughts, even when she left him to unload supplies from her country or help stitch clothes for his soldiers.

He didn't let personal problems distract him from making sure the Pakchon County Party Committee hadn't returned to limiting recruitment or making sure the civilian military training for factory workers was coming along well. But he could feel her there, and knew he was treating her slightly awkwardly.

He didn't want to do that. Whether she liked him… romantically or not, she had said she liked him as a friend. And he definitely wanted to keep her as one. Which meant he didn't want to treat her any differently than before.

'And she did say she liked me for my honesty.'

So on the second night in his province, North Pyongan took her aside before they could enter the Provincial People's Committee bunker to sleep, heart pounding, and asked,

"Can we talk?"

If you ever think 'North Pyongan seems like he has a good grasp of emotions,' you are wrong. Kangwon is literally the only one capable of identifying and acknowledging both his own emotions and other's with ease.

Some day I'll write out in the art book what exactly went on with Tae-min, Han-jin, and Kim Kang-sim. But for now you are left with their vague backstories. The clues are very much there. Also it is crazy that they were literally invented as I worked on the Good Neighbours chapter. The only thing in my outline was 'North Pyongan goes Ganghwa, takes leadership role.' Then it turned into three chapters, a court case, an integral part of his 'what is justice?' character arc, and two boys who are integrally tied to both he and South Pyongan's development, and are some of my favourite side characters. If you were ever wondering how I plan things, the answer is I don't.

Bad Cop

South Pyongan should be glad North Pyongan had dealt with the traitors on his own. She should be glad her hunting zone had been narrowed down to areas near the coast, letting her go straight to fleecing the villages between Kangso and Nampo. She should be glad her brother had actually been cynical enough to tell when someone had it out for him and to handle them by himself. It was what she'd wanted ever since they'd joined up with Korea and started facing real threats, not just drunks and the occasional Jap- for her brother to be able to take care of himself. She should be glad.

So why wasn't she?

'I don't need you to protect me.'

That was good. He shouldn't. Just like she shouldn't have been so worried for him. He should be able to take care of himself.

But something about it just... stuck in the back of her mind, like a piece of corn between her teeth, niggling at her. She couldn't even work it lose by beating the crap out of the reactionaries' toadies when she caught them, because they turned out to be a bunch of kids.

Her first lead came on her third day, in Poseong-ri, one of the villages outside Nampo, in the form of a woman from the neat rows of hastily-built refugee houses sprouting on its edges.

She dragged South Pyongan to her place and pretty much threw herself at her feet, saying her thirteen-year old son had been cutting the phone lines between Nampo and Anju, and passing information about night watch patrols alongside a few other kids, pleading for mercy for him.

When the brat came home from fetching water to see his Provincehuman standing in the middle of his sparse sitting room with her firearm drawn, he'd burst into tears and almost immediately given up the names of the three helping him.

It was good for her investigation, but also incredibly pathetic. So were the other boys he directed her to.

Two broke at her presence, recognizing that a Provincehuman being sent meant they were in deep trouble, and even though the fourth didn't (to be fair he was like, ten, so he probably didn't understand the stakes), it didn't matter. South Pyongan had her guy.

Because of course the reactionary gang wasn't dealing with a group whose oldest member was fifteen directly- they had a go-between. One whose name the kids didn't know, but they would apparently meet with on Sunday night to receive their orders for the week.

They wouldn't be given the location until the next morning, so in order to avoid sending the bastard to ground, South Pyongan had to let the families keep carrying on like nothing was wrong. Though she heavily hinted that with the war going on, it might be safer if they spent the rest of Saturday inside.

Obviously she didn't trust them. That one mother might've given her son up willingly, but it was clearly just to save his skin. And even if the others said they'd had no idea what their children were up to, South Pyongan had doubts. You didn't notice your kid running around acting all secretive and avoiding his best friend in the Young Pioneers all of a sudden? Yeah, okay.

So she set undercover guards on them, even though her bodyguards still refused to leave her, which meant she had to get three randoms from Public Security to do it, plus whoever they thought they needed to involve.

It made her skin prickle. The more people in on it, the more that could leak it to the go-between that the gig was up.

She could hear her brother telling her to have more trust in their guys from Public Security...

Actually, would he still say that to her? He had been eyeing up the rest of the guys in the truck that night. He'd even been suspicious enough to suspect that chick and her sob story.

'I guess that's one more thing he doesn't need me for anymore.'

South Pyongan shook her head, springing up from where she'd been crouched in a makeshift woodshed, positioned to watch one of the marks' places.

Stakeouts gave her time to think. And she hated time to think.

Time to go get another officer so she could be more proactive.

South Pyongan spent the rest of the day pretending to look for a lead, so the go-between and anyone else involved wouldn't think she was on to them. Then she (begrudgingly) went through the process of getting permission to stay overnight in a resident's house.

Her hatred of paperwork was countered by the fact that, as an essential worker at the Nampo Smelting Complex, Pak Du-gil still lived in the city. And he still made a great chicken-ginseng soup, even when the meat was replaced by tofu.

South Pyongan missed meat. Korea had forbidden it from their rations, sending it all to the active soldiers. But so long as she was getting some sort of protein, she liked ginseng enough to make up for it.

The province lay awake in Pak's borrowed apartment in the worker's quarters, tapping her fingers on her chest and swiping the last traces of bitter ginseng aftertaste from her gums.

Before midnight, she sat up, her breath steaming in the cold underground as she went for the door, still fully dressed.

"Back in the room, comrade," one of her guards said as soon as she opened the door.

South Pyongan blinked at them blearily. "Oh, hey guys. Just going to use the latrines."

"You can use the inside ones," her shorter guard said, gesturing down the tunnel.

She scrunched her face. "Yeah, no. As far as I'm concerned, those are for if you've been trapped underground by planes for a week. And I'd still rather take my chances with the deathbirds."

She was so glad Korea had decided not to have a toilet room in the Jangsan bunker. Like most of the shelters, it'd been built in a hurry, so they didn't have real plumbing. They probably would've got stuck with a chamber pot, and she would've been stuck emptying and cleaning it, just like at their destroyed chosonjip. She would take digging and covering a trench over that any day.

"Then we'll be coming with you," her taller guard said.

Affronted, South Pyongan crossed her arms over her chest. "You can't seriously believe you can just spy on me while I piss, right?" Thinking of South Chungcheong's usual excuse, she added, "I am a woman, y'know."

Her guard blinked back, unimpressed. "And you're our Provincehuman."

"Our Provincehuman that Comrade Korea told us to never let out of our sight," the shorter one said.

South Pyongan narrowed her eyes at him. "You've broke your nose before, yeah?"

The man touched the bump in his sloped nose bridge. "...Yes," he said warily. "Why?"

The province bit her lip on, 'Good, so you'll be used to this,' trapping her hands behind her back.

She knew why Korea let her other cousins have full control over their guards, but not her. Because he thought they'd probably only ditch theirs for something they thought was necessary, and not just because they didn't like being watched all the time. He still didn't...

She clenched her fists. She couldn't even get mad. He was right.

She'd tried to escape her tails like, seven times. It was why she wasn't able to just slip away now.

Punching them out and running off wouldn't convince him she was responsible.

"No reason," she replied, marching past them. "Fine, come watch me pee if you want to so badly."

One of them sighed loudly. She didn't turn around, ignoring them until they got to the latrines out back of the quarters. She wrinkled her nose at the smell, even though the trench was freshly dug.

"Turn around," she ordered her guards. "I don't want you looking through the cracks."

They narrowed their eyes, so in sync it solidified the idea they were brothers and also creeped her out a little.

Rolling her eyes, she said, "What do you think I'm going to do? Dive into the trench and swim away?" She gave a real gag at the thought. "Now turn around or I tell Korea you're perverts and he won't be upset if I... toss you in the latrines."

There. That was less violent than 'throat punch you.'

Reluctantly, the men turned around.

Glad that she didn't actually have to go, South Pyongan brushed through the straw door that shielded the hut over the latrines.

Ignoring both the foul-smelling gaps between the planks set over the trench that she used to cross it, and the man squatting over one that quickly yanked his pants up at seeing a woman walk in, (and wishing she had a nose to pinch), South Pyongan immediately jumped up, catching onto the side of the open-roofed hut and boosting herself up, thrusting her head between the thin wood wall and the canvas tarp nailed over the top.

"Uh?" the guy below said, not following it up.

"Shh," his province hushed, forcing her shoulders through, the roughly-sawed wood scraping against her chest through her tunic.

But as she arched her back, it lifted the tarp more, and the swishing sound of a layer of snow sliding off broke the night.

"Comrade South Pyongan!"

She heard the screen to the latrines burst open and the guy below say, "Uh?!" as her guards stormed in.

'Too late!'

Her top half slid free and her legs followed as she plummeted head-first for the ground before flipping like a cat in mid-air, landing on her hands and knees.

Not perfect, but she'd take it.

"Comrade South Pyongan!" Her guards' cries spit the night as they charged back out, stopping suddenly.

Their province smirked. "Well? Gonna cross it?"

The men eyed the trench between them hesitantly. It was only three feet wide. But those three feet looked a lot farther when the price for not making the jump would be getting covered in manure.

"Please come back," her taller guard said, stepping forward, but not tensing for the attack.

South Pyongan huffed. "Look, I'm not a nation-traitor. I'm not running off to sell us out. I'm just making sure my mission gets completed."

"Obviously you aren't a nation-traitor," her shorter guard said. "But it's our job to keep you safe. We can't lose our province to the enemy again."

He almost sounded... pleading.

Crossing her arms, she said, "I'll be fine. I'm just doing some recon. Just stay here and don't make a fuss or you'll screw it up."

Turning around, she waved, sauntering away. "I'll be back before noon tomorrow. Keep yourselves entertained until then."

As soon as she was out of sight around the side of the factory, she broke into a run before they could get brave enough to attempt the jump over the latrines.

Nampo was close enough to the coast to be prepared for a landing party, so most of its factories had fences around them. But they weren't barbed wire, so it was no problem for her to be up and over in less than five seconds. She hit the ground running.

'We can't lose our province to the enemy again.'

Seriously, did they think she was weak or something?

"You get kidnapped one time and it's all anyone remembers," she muttered to no one as she ran for the road out of Nampo, making sure her travel pass was still in her pocket.

She should tell Hwang and Korea to step their propaganda up so every single person in the country knew she hadn't been knocked out and taken like some wife in a bandit story, but had literally shot herself to keep the enemy from using her. She'd like to see her bodyguards do that when they couldn't even jump over a shit ditch.

'It's our job to keep you safe.'

No, it was their job to keep Korea's paranoia at manageable levels so he wouldn't wake up early one morning to lock all the provinces in the bunker until the war was over. She could take care of herself.

Even though she hadn't been able to protect-

She shook her head, sending herself staggering sideways without slowing.

She just wanted to find this traitor asshole and beat him until he spewed all his info out, then move on to the next thing to make her stop thinking.

After showing her travel pass to the Nampo checkpoint (she could've just snuck out, but she was being 'responsible'), she left the main road, taking a country lane back towards Poseong-ri. But she didn't stop there, continuing on towards the dark mass of the nearest hill to the west.

It made sense the go-between had recruited kids in the village. If you wanted information, you went where people were. And tons of people passed by Poseong-ri- soldiers being sent back from coast guard duty, soldiers being sent to it, ammunition and steel and everything else flowing to the capital, and food and supplies flowing in.

Nampo's port was pretty much useless with all the ships and planes off the coast, but the Japs had turned it into a major military supply hub back when they'd controlled it, to send shit to the ports they held in Manchurian, and even though Korea had evened out the city's production after Liberation, they'd kept some of those factories around. Though now they were underground, too.

All the villages she'd hit up before Poseong-ri were on the main road, but she'd figured she'd run into her success there. With all the security measures around cities and towns, traitors could infiltrate villages easier. Especially if they knew people there beforehand.

'Fucking Taedong Youth Corps.'

But for Nampo, they'd need patsies that lived in the area, some of which had even fled from the city. And to keep in good contact with those patsies and Cho Island, they'd need to have a base nearby.

Honestly, South Pyongan thought she already knew where their headquarters was- somewhere in the Osok Mountains, whose foothills she was headed for right now.

They spanned from Nampo, up through Onchon County, all the way back to Pyongwon County, where the trap had been set a few nights ago. If you were a group of murdering, raping, nation-traitors who couldn't show your faces in public, all you had to do was cross a few fields, and you'd have stealthy access to almost all of her province. Plus they were right across the mouth of the Taedong River from Hwanghae for their operations there. They just had to travel east towards the northwards course of the river, where it got thinner and was less heavily watched, and they could be in Sariwon by dinner.

South Pyongan flexed her fists, her teeth grinding.

Hwang had told her some of what happened during Hae's visit to Sincheon, and she'd seen the news reel. No one screwed with her cousins and got away with it.

And no one screwed with her and her province and got away with it.

But she wasn't heading off into the mountains to hunt them down right now. Even though she totally could. The Osok Mountains were, like she just said, really big. There were too many places to hide. And if they caught her or the militia or anyone else sniffing for them, they could disappear into them.

She was going to use this go-between to narrow the range. And to do that, she couldn't just capture him while he left his message.

First, she needed leverage.

South Pyongan found the place the kids had said the traitor would leave them their meeting place instructions- a gully on the oval-shaped hill between Poseong-ri and the Yonggok-ri foothills. Then she settled into the dirt for a long, cold night.

What was her brother doing right now? Probably sleeping. He took pretty good care of himself. Yeah, he was practically starving himself right now, but she got why.

The thought flickered across her mind again. Should she be doing the same thing as the rest of her cousins?

She shook the idea away. Unlike North Hamgyong, she really wasn't being selfish. She just needed every calorie she could get to get her body back in working order. And now she needed to keep it there. She had to.

Plus Korea would be pissed when he found out. And he would, he always did. Trust her, she would know. But her cousins didn't listen, and she wasn't going to tell them how to live their lives.

Maybe there would've been a point where she would bully North Pyongan into eating all his rations, or force him to take half of hers, plowing over his protests.

But she wasn't sure he'd listen now. She... kind of didn't want to find out.

South Pyongan clutched her submachine pistol harder, the cold from the metal seeping through her glove and into her hand.

She had always hated keeping watch without her brother.

By the time the sky had started to change from the colour of Chagang's skin to the colour of her brother's, the province had resolved to never think again. She was lying on her stomach, trying to eradicate all thought, when a twig cracked in the woods.

Her muscles tightened instinctively, getting ready to pounce.

Over the sticks and dead leaves tangled in the snow on the lip of the gully, she could see a man entering the dip. His face was a shadow under a grey hood, and his breath clouded the air in front of his face as he looked around. He didn't carry a light, just a tube rolled up in one hand.

'Ssi-bal.' She couldn't make out any facial features.

The dark shape looked around furtively, before he went to a tangle of skinny odong trees, kneeling at one in the middle and messing with something there.

He was alone, vulnerable.

South Pyongan's muscles wound tighter, her body quivering with the urge to attack, to put an end to this traitor that was working against their country, collaborating with the people that had tried to take her brother. There was no point in wasting a full day when she could knock him out and beat the information she needed out of him now.

She clenched her jaw, knuckles creaking around her PPS.

She couldn't. He might not even have the information she needed yet. They'd agreed the go-between probably wouldn't receive the meeting place for his own orders until the last minute, in case he was captured while leaving a message for the boys. And if that was the case, then as soon as he was late, the reactionaries would relocate. They would already be on edge from losing their kidnapping unit. She couldn't risk letting them get away to continue screwing with her people. Beating this bastard could just give them a chance to kill more.

But it would feel so damn good.

'If you feel responsible for it, then be responsible. Make sure it doesn't happen again.'

She bared her teeth, and when the man stood, taking one last secretive look around the clearing before starting back the way he'd came, she let him go.

South Pyongan waited until the crunching of the snow under his boots had faded to creep out, her legs still telling her to follow him as she padded softly over to the odong tree, stooping to lift the rock below it.

There was a piece of tanned pig skin with directions written on it in charcoal, rock formations and a few place names that she didn't recognize from a map, or her and her brother's travels, or Korea's grand mapping adventure.

Probably nicknames that locals would recognize. He seemed to think the kids would, at least. And it meant he was probably local, too, not just some guy from somewhere else hanging out in a cave.

Now that gave her an idea that could make up for never seeing his face.

She narrowed her eyes at the leafless trees he'd headed off into.

If her legs wanted to follow him, why not do what she always did- what she wanted?

South Pyongan crept after him, following the footprints in the snow.

Stealth still wasn't her thing. But she definitely wasn't bad at it. Especially since in exchange for her Taekwondo lessons, Kangwon had given her stalking ones.

She might not be the best at being responsible or a politician or prot- some of the things she needed to be the best at.

But South Pyongan was great at hunting people.

She caught up and followed the man across hills and fields, winding in circles while he tried to throw off pursuit. But even when she lost his trail a few times in the places the snow thinned, she caught it soon after, and was able to watch from the treeline as he headed back towards Yanggok-ri.

She snuck across the fields of the valley before the sun could crest, just beating the farmers waking up to look over the winter crops and tend to their animals.

An ox lowed as she slunk through the narrow streets, her ushanka pulled down over her blue skin the way the Chinese trio wore them.

She watched from the shadows as the man reached a walled estate on the far end of town. Before he could pass through the carved doors, she quickly ran around the corner of the big house she was using as cover. Yanking her gloves off and biting down on them, she jumped up, the edges of the eaves biting into her hands, morning frost numbing them.

With a surge of effort and a grunt muffled by her gloves, she hauled herself up, sliding on her belly up the curved tile roof, until she could peer over the wooden spine that crested it, just in time to see an older woman hustle out of the main chosonjip, embracing the man. She peered around the courtyard, clearly paranoid, even though the province couldn't see her expression, then ushered him inside.

South Pyongan's lips curved up, her canine teeth gleaming in the pale light flooding the over the eastern hills.

She still hadn't seen his face, but she'd got all she'd needed. Better, actually.

Sliding down, she landed lightly on her feet, rubbing her bicep. Lifting herself onto the roof hadn't been as easy it should've been. She still wasn't back to her old strength.

Even if she hadn't been at Sunchon, could she have-?

"Halt!"

She jerked to see a woman marching towards her, a red armband tied around where Tank 44's flag was on the province marking her as a militia member.

"What do you think you're doing?" she demanded. "Show me your identification card before I notify Public Security!"

Perfect.

"South Pyongan province," South Pyongan said, flashing her face at the woman. "And I'm kidnapping you."

Once she made sure the chick knew what she needed to know, she snuck out of the village with her (she really was spiriting her away; she couldn't trust she wouldn't tell anyone their Provincehuman had been sniffing around), and back to Nampo, where her guards made a big, boring fuss about her running off.

Whatever. Even if they thought she needed their protection, she knew she didn't. And she got to smugly wave the leather with the directions on it in their faces.

The kids from Poseong-ri still went to the hills at dawn, slipping out of their village and meeting up under the cover of the trees to keep up the illusion that nothing was wrong. They were watched closely by South Pyongan and her bodyguards. The boys had said they didn't know where the man was from, but she didn't want them to start running around the woods screaming in the hopes he'd hear them.

They were clearly nervous as they ran through the motions of pretending to find the directions under the rock, then started back for their homes. Their crap composure just made her sure more than one of the mothers had known their son was up to something.

South Pyongan went around to their house and dug-outs afterwards, getting them to tell her where the place the directions led to was (making sure to ask them all separately so they couldn't lie to her).

Only one tried, the youngest one. He gave her a muttered, "I don't know," the scarred-over cleft in his upper lip making the words lisp together.

South Pyongan sighed, leaning over the low table set up in the dug-out, shoving the vase of flowers his mother had set up on it to try and pretend she wasn't living in a hole in the ground aside.

"Look, kid," she said. "Your friends already told me. And I know where this guy lives now. No matter what, I'm getting him."

The boy lowered his gaze. "Please don't arrest him."

"He's a traitor," South Pyongan irritably told him. "Which is what you would be if you were a few years older. As it stands, you're just an idiot."

Tears started to well in his eyes as his thin chest shook.

'Oops.' Kids usually liked her, but sometimes she forgot they were more sensitive than adults.

But that wasn't why he was crying.

"If, if he goes- to- to jail, or g-gets executed," the boy gasped through his sobs. "I'm- n-never going to see Abeoji again!"

He buried his face in his hands, redoubling his sobs.

South Pyongan leaned back, feeling suddenly awkward.

It was what the other boys had told her, too, along with the one kid's mother. The reason they were helping the traitors was because their fathers were in the south, either because they'd been taken prisoner as KPA soldiers or because they'd been one of the men taken by the enemy.

Korea had turned to conscripting every battle-worthy man between sixteen and forty-five that wasn't needed in the factories or mines. But there weren't many left- South's army had forcibly conscripted them all during their retreat a year ago.

Including this kid's dad.

"They- They took him!" he cried, his tears combining with the cleft lip to make his words almost impossible to understand. "But th- the nice man said if I did what he wanted, he'd b-bring him back. But if you lock him up or kill him, then Abeoji'll never come home!"

This probably wasn't something she should say to a kid. It was drastic enough that South Pyongan performed the rare action of thinking about the words about to leave her mouth. They were harsh.

But necessary.

"I hate to say it, kid," she said, averting her eyes from his tears. "But your dad's probably already dead."

He froze, shocked from his sobbing as he looked up at her. "W-What?"

Deciding she'd heard enough, the mother stuck her head into the dug-out, her own eyes teary. "Miss South Pyongan-"

"A lot of the guys that were taken south are dead," the province said, cutting her off. "They got sent on a deathmarch."

South Pyongan didn't read the news when she didn't have to, since it would just make her even more restless to be at the front. But Hwang had been giving them updates, and filled them in on everything he knew back when the affair had wrapped up in August. In typical Korea fashion, their Countryhuman had refused to talk about it until October, when he had both the full story and the mood to talk.

They could've asked earlier, but... Even South Pyongan knew there were times when it was better to leave Korea be.

"All our guys from here, Hwanghae, North and South Kangwon, and Gyeonggi that got conscripted were forced to walk across the Peninsula back in January," she told the mother and son now. "Rhee's National Defense Force was training them for the youth leagues over on Jeju. But the government messed up who was supposed to feed them, they didn't give 'em any winter clothes or salaries, and the guys in charge ended up embezzling like, hundreds of millions of won instead of feeding people."

It had gotten so bad and impossible to hide that the National Defense Force was 'disbanded' (but the youth leagues that made it up were still active, clearly), and the southern National Assembly had actually had to hold a trial over it. Two trials, actually, since they'd ended up pardoning or giving just a few years in jail to the people responsible in the first one. Not even the other reactionaries outside of Rhee's faction had been happy with that.

"A bunch of them died."

Korea said the official trial records said between one to two thousand. But he'd also showed them pages from southern newspapers that said around fifty thousand could have, which meant he believed Rhee as much as South Pyongan did.

"And the ones that survived are messed up," she said. "I hear they can't get work and have to beg down in villages on the coast."

She'd been cold enough spending the last winter in the POW camp in Seoul, and SH had lost three toes just going from there to Pyongyang. Taking mountain roads over half of Korea in just your jeogori and straw sandals? You'd be lucky if a foot was the only thing you lost.

The boy's face had fallen, his skin paled from brown to ghostly white in shock. "N-No."

His mother looked away, wiping her eyes.

She didn't look rattled, just resigned. She'd probably heard already- their newspapers up here had had a field day with the whole thing. Not only had the bastards that had been accusing their army of press-ganging civilians and starving people since the beginning admitted to press-ganging and starving people, but now everyone knew that while they were struggling to afford groceries, Rhee's cronies were siphoning maybe billions of won into their own pockets.

"Yes," she said to the boy, her words becoming less awkward as rage flickered inside her. "And you know why they died? Because they expected the government down there to give 'em boots and coats and rice." She thumped her fist on the table, wishing it was Rhee's skull. "But they're traitors, and you can't count on traitors."

Leaning forward on an arm, she made him shrink back. "And that guy you've been helping? He's a traitor, too. If your dad isn't dead, then I guarantee you he has no damn clue where he is."

"B-But-" The boy's bottom lip wobbled, and he squeezed his eyes shut as he pressed his chin to his chest.

"The only way you ever see your dad again, dead or alive, is if this Korea wins," South Pyongan said, not taking mercy. "But you've been trying to stop that, just like the traitors that killed your dad. Is that what you want? To be just like them?"

"No!" the boy cried. "I just want- I just want my dad back."

"Then tell me where this bastard wants you to meet him."

With snot running down his face, the boy pointed a shaky finger at her map, the same place the other kids had indicated.

South Pyongan didn't relax. Her blood beat hard in her veins, and her nails dug into her palms.

She knew this kid was too young to know what he'd really been doing, but it was hard to remember that when she'd worked with children his age in Anju to sabotage the enemy, who seemed to understand fully what they'd been doing, and when a girl only a couple years older than him had once cast herself into the river in the fight against Japan instead of letting herself be captured.

"Good," she said, forcing herself to relax, leaning back as the boy shook with tears again. "Thanks for the help."

He just kept crying.

The province shifted awkwardly, wondering if she should... pat him on the back or something. She slightly raised a hand, then lowered it.

She didn't really know how to play 'good cop.' That was her brother's thing. And he wasn't here.

South Pyongan stood up, climbing out of the dug-out while the boy kept sobbing.

"You have him until the end of the day," she told his mother. "Then he gets taken for questioning."

The woman nodded, her brown eyes downcast.

"You'll get him back at least," South Pyongan reassured her, which she couldn't do for the other parents. "You'll have to put up with Party members breathing down your neck while they educate him, but he'll get to stay at home."

Whoops. Maybe she shouldn't talk about people in the Party that way.

The mother nodded again, not looking at her. "Thank you."

"Not my decision."

If it was up to South Pyongan, she'd be going to prison for having information about someone committing treason, and the kid would be spending a week in jail to scare him straight.

"Hear that?" she called back to the boy. "Your friends are old enough to go to trial. You're not. But if you ever do something like this again, you probably will be."

It wasn't like the other three were old enough to be thrown in prison or put up against the wall. They'd all end up with re-education and special attention paid to them, too. But this kid didn't need to know that right now.

"I w-won't," the boy whimpered pathetically. "I won't, I promise."

"See to it."

South Pyongan marched off, leaving them with their hidden minder.

She could hear her brother scolding her for how cruel she'd been. And yeah, he was probably right. But what would be more cruel would be letting the kid think he had a chance of seeing his father alive and well again. If he did, he'd just end up falling for the next reactionary making promises he couldn't keep. And one day he could end up with a bullet in his head.

She got what Korea meant about not just being able to kill everyone that went against them, even if she still wanted to. The solution to that was making sure stupid kids didn't grow up into people she wanted to kill.

With the location confirmed, the patsies back in Poseong-ri, and that uncomfortable business done with, all South Pyongan had to do was wait. Her favourite thing.

Continuing with her resolution of never thinking again, she headed back to Nampo to pretend to continue her investigation.

Actually, she really was looking for more traitors. She might be close to pinning down the armed gang's location, but that didn't mean there weren't more agents and proxies in her streets and hills, burrowing under the skin of her land like parasites. It pissed her off that some of the runaway traitors had came back to maraud around her countryside, but it pissed her off even more that some of them had stayed, lurking in their ranks, biding their time even through the temporary occupation. They were benefiting from the ration system, from their housing material and clothing distribution, maybe from their worker-owned factories, all while scheming to destroy it all.

South Pyongan wanted to burn them all out.

Since she couldn't, she settled for intimidating any children she found outside Nampo, looking for weak links, though most of those she found belonged to the Young Pioneers, which meant half of them had been committing their own acts of sabotage against the enemy when their city had been occupied, though probably not as aggressively as the ones with her in Anju. The others were more impressed than scared by her, which meant they were probably in the clear (and had good taste).

But they all promised to look out for any of their friends hanging around with adults they didn't know. South Pyongan made sure they knew to watch out for them talking to any adult they shouldn't be, even if they knew them. Those were the really dangerous ones.

The 'Taedong Youth Corps.' Her lip curled as she thought about them again.

She sort of wondered if Korea was so harsh on her because so many reactionaries and factionalists came from her province. It'd make sense, since he really started cracking down on her after Liberation.

She'd like to still think that, anyway.

As the sun started to set (way too early; she'd always hated that about winter), she set out for the place the kids had marked on the map.

On the go-between's cowhide, it was called 'Kko-kki-o' Rock, after the sound a rooster made, and was located in the curve of the hills beyond the one the man had left the message at.

South Pyongan squinted critically at the outcrop jutting from the slope.

"That doesn't look like a rooster to me. Do you think those kids were smart enough to coordinate a fake meeting spot ahead of time, or am I just not seeing the vision?"

"I think I see it." Her shorter guard pointed upwards. "That's the beak and there's the eye."

"But there's no comb. Doesn't that just make it Chicken Rock?" She thought for moment. "Or Kko-kko Rock?"

"Maybe it's just hard to see it in the dark."

The taller guard cleared his throat. "Comrades. We should get into position."

"Right."

There were probably more dug-outs hidden in the hills, but from here the only sign of civilization South Pyongan could see was a farmhouse out in the fields, lights already off.

The hills rose to the west, but here they were mostly gentle inclines and slopes, all the trees stripped for industry or burned away, which meant there weren't too many places to hide. The three settled for lying flat behind stumps, waiting in the dark.

If all the meeting places were this far from Poseong-ri, South Pyongan knew for sure the other mothers had known something was up. Your kid might be forgiven for staying out after the sun set in winter, since it was only eighteen hundred. But they'd been doing this since mid-summer, when it didn't get dark enough for the go-between to slink out of his hole until at least twenty hundred. There was no way the women hadn't noticed their sons not getting home until an hour later, especially while there were planes bombing the shit out of them.

South Pyongan could hear them now, that endless droning buzz farther to the south as they swooped in towards Nampo, and the dull explosions as they hit their factories for the millionth time. It made her nails scrape at the frost-hardened soil.

That was why she was done waiting. As soon as she saw the dark shadow crest the top of the hill, slinking like someone with something to hide, she pounced.

The man froze, hearing the rapid crunching of her boots on the frost. His eyes locked on hers from the shadows in his hood.

He didn't try to play dumb. He just took off back the way he came, legs pumping.

The province streaked after him, leaping over stumps and rocks instead of going around, blood singing with elation as she was finally able to move with purpose again, not just running or wrestling with Korea, but hunting an enemy.

She felt the urge to let him put distance between them so he would think he had a chance, but crushed the impulse.

This wasn't a game.

He laboured up one of the steeper slopes, then gave up and ran across it, his feet stumbling on the slanted ground. South Pyongan ran higher, her thigh muscles aching with the strain, and sped up, eating up the terrain as she ran parallel above him.

She saw his head swivel up, and knew his eyes must have widened as she flashed her teeth at him in a grin, just before leaping.

She flew through the air, aiming slightly ahead, and the man's momentum brought them crashing together before he could even try to reverse course. He hollered as she slammed into him with full force, knocking them both over and down the hill, rolling in a tangle of arms and legs.

South Pyongan did nothing to slow their fall. She actually wrapped her limbs around him, and put more momentum into it, intent on taking them down the entire hill.

She loved doing this to Korea because it annoyed him so much, though this time it was a little more painful than usual. She winced as her shoulder slammed into the ground, feeling the scabs from her burns scrape off.

Yeah, she was going to feel this tomorrow. But this bastard was going to feel it more.

The world spun around her, and as she sensed the ground evening out, she flexed her spine, making them bounce higher the next time they struck it. She used the chance to flip on top of him so that when they came down, she landed squarely on his torso, crushing the breath out of him in an ugly wheeze.

They came to an abrupt stop three-quarters of the way down the hill. Not all the way, but close enough.

Everything swirled and spun nauseatingly, including South Pyongan's head and stomach as she tried to recover her own oxygen. But she had way more experience with this than the guy under her, so she recovered first, obviously.

Hillside still swaying, she sat up, forcing the man onto his stomach and pinning his wrists behind his back. She put her lips next to his ear.

"Caught you," she panted lowly, smirking as he stiffened.

And feeling so cool.

Her bodyguards reached her a minute later, luckily smart enough not to try scolding her in front of a prisoner. They just took the man's arms, forcing him to stand.

"I... haven't done anything," he panted, his eyes unfocused, head still spinning.

"I don't care." South Pyongan snapped her fingers as she started down the hill, totally not fighting hard to make sure she didn't cant forward and fall on her face. "Come on, boys."

She tossed a menacing smile back at the traitor. "It's interrogation time."

South Pyongan was great at interrogating people. Korea thought he was too good for it or something, so when the KPRA had caught a Jap or a collaborator, he'd usually set her and North Pyongan on them to do their carrot-and-stick routine. And if that didn't work, then he'd send in South Chungcheong. The one time the Southern Pyongan and Chungcheong got along was when they were making men cry.

Well, South Pyongan had been good at interrogating people. Back when she had free rein.

They'd never been allowed to beat up POWs, let alone torture them. The Japs had actually praised them for it (which to her meant they'd definitely been doing something wrong). But she could push them around a little, and if one got too bold and thought two girls would be easy to escape from, then she got to have fun.

But she couldn't do that now for sure. If this guy hadn't personally killed someone, then he was looking at what, treason? That was hard labour, not death. Though his punishment would likely be harsher since they were under wartime laws, and he'd dragged minors into it.

But on the off chance he wasn't executed or sentenced to a lifetime in prison, and just got ten to fifteen years of labour, then she knew Korea wouldn't want him going back into society able to tell people that one of their Provincehumans had gotten handsy with him. She wasn't even sure she could get mouthy.

General, she missed just being a soldier.

Well, she'd never been just a soldier. But she missed being able to act like one.

South Pyongan swung open the door to the interrogation room in the Nampo Public Security headquarters, strolling in.

The man was sitting at a flimsy wooden table, his hands bound behind his back.

He was twenty, in the age range of most of those in the youth groups, though they'd started conscripting above and below it to bolster their ranks. His brown hair was styled in the worst mushroom cut South Pyongan had ever seen, and he was still dressed in the white-collared undershirt he'd had on under his coat when she brought him in. Chickenskin pebbled his exposed flesh.

He lowered his grey eyes from the ceiling to glare at her.

"Worried about getting bombed?" South Pyongan asked casually as she strolled over to the chair opposite him. "But I thought those guys up there were your buddies?"

The building shuddered again as the industrial district was hit. Probably the same factory South Pyongan had been at last night.

Pak Du-gil had better be okay. If she lost his chicken-ginseng soup, there was going to be hell to pay.

"I don't know what you're talking about," the man growled. "I hate those Yanks as much as the next man. And you've got no right to hold me here."

"No?" South Pyongan asked, slapping the pigskin down in front of him. "Recognize this?"

He was a better liar than the kids. His eyes barely flickered to the thing he'd been holding just over twelve hours ago.

"No. What is it?"

Trying another angle, the province asked, "What were you doing in the foothills?"

"Looking for food," he grunted. "We're starving, if ya haven't noticed."

'Starving because of your foreign friends.'

She tried to calm herself. Good cop could easily switch to bad cop, but once she did, there was no going back.

"Y'know, it's weird that you just so happened to be foraging in the same place I was told an enemy agent would be coming to give out operations orders to a bunch of kids."

A muscle in his cheek ticced, and she pressed on it.

"Yeah, I rounded up all your little helpers," she said, leaning back in her chair. "They told me everything. So you might as well tell me where you met with your handlers today."

"I have no idea what you're talking about." He stood, his chair scraping back on the cement floor. "And you have no right to keep me here."

South Pyongan didn't flinch. "I kind of do, actually."

Now his face darkened, contorting in disdain.

"This is why I can't stand you Communists!" he spat. "You walk around thinking you're in charge of everything."

"One- not a Communist. Two-" South Pyongan held up another finger. "You might want to watch what you say."

"See?" the guy scoffed. "A man can't even criticize you anymore."

'You've obviously never been a Plenary Meeting.'

The fourth one had been back in November. The General (Chairman in this case) had stayed true to his closing speech strategy of a few lines of praise, followed a half hour of pure criticism as he went back over every way the Party was failing, ending with a 'I know we can do better, team!'

South Pyongan wasn't even a Party member (Korea just liked to torture her by making her go; it made her miss being a prisoner last year), but even she'd been squirming during it, and during the earlier criticism.

"I mean, you can do whatever you want," she said to her interrogatee. "I'm just saying maybe be careful what you say about the State's ideology when you're being suspected of treason against it."

"Treason?" the man said scornfully, then flinched as the building shook again.

And all of a sudden, South Pyongan was angry.

People like this bastard were the reason so many had died. It was people like him that had sold out Worker's Party and People's Committee members when the enemy controlled their cities, that turned over the neighbours they knew supported them to be tortured and buried. Those people she had stopped from being marched to their death in Anju had been betrayed by bastards like him. All the corpses she had seen swinging on the forest's edge had been because snakes like him were lurking in their ranks. The ones that had welcomed the Yankee deathbirds coming to bomb their country, the ones that would already have lost if they hadn't.

He wasn't like that farmer back then. He wasn't doing this for his family or any bullcrap like that. He wasn't a civilian that cared more about making a few won than anything else. The only reason bastards like him didn't pick up a gun and murder their people themselves was because they were cowards. Instead they stuck to the shadows, using others to do the risky shit, telling the enemy where their supply caches and warehouses were, telling them when their trucks would pass down a certain road.

She could at least respect traitors that did their own dirty work. They were idiots, but they were idiots that were willing to die for the things they wanted.

People like this dog's son weren't. They'd hide in the dark and use others, never risking themselves. If the enemy won, they'd slither out and take all the glory, and if Korea won, they'd pretend none of it had ever happened, and continue reaping the spoils of the country they'd fought to turn into a slave again.

And he had the fucking balls to stand here and act scared.

South Pyongan slammed the table aside with a loud crash, flipping it so hard a leg snapped off. The bastard flinched back, stumbling over his own chair as she marched towards him.

The province caught him by slamming him up against the wall, forearm pinned to his throat.

"Tell me where you met your handlers!" she spat into his face, pressing down on his windpipe.

"Or what?" he panted, enough of his composure regained to twist his lips in a smirk that South Pyongan wanted to punch off. "You'll beat me? Kill me? I'm sure that'll show everyone how 'just' you people ar- Gak!"

He made an ugly gagging sound as South Pyongan shoved harder against his throat.

"Get it through your head," she growled. "I'm not a damn Communist. They'd play nice with you and wait for you to cave. I'm not like them."

"Then... what?" he gasped, unable to even pull at her arm to lessen the pressure with his bound hands crushed between the wall and his back. "You're going to torture one of... your own people?"

"You aren't mine," she said coldly. "No matter what the courts decide to do with you, South Pyongan province disowns you."

The look on his face was almost hurt, even after he'd been so dismissive of her. It made her even more glad her brother had said it to Paik Sun-yup before he'd died. She wished she'd got the chance to say it to Jo Man-sik.

"And I disown your family."

His smug mask broke, fear flashing across his face.

South Pyongan smirked. "You thought I didn't know who you are? Ri Jong-hyok. Your mother's name is Ko Un-sil. She's unemployed. Your uncle's name is Ko Un-gol. He owns a supply store in Nampo. It's his estate you live on."

Ri paled as she recited his exact address back to him, along with everything else the militiawoman had told her.

"Your little brother is called Ri Jong-soon," she continued. "I notice he wasn't one of the kids you recruited to do your work for you."

"Stay away from them!" he growled, trying to lunge forward, but only crushing his windpipe more.

"Y'know, your neighbours aren't very fond of your family," she drawled. "Seems when your dad took off for Pyongyang, he made some big claim about being better than all those little village bumpkins, and how much money he was going to make working for the Japs. Only for your mom to come crawling back with you a few years later. I don't think they'd mind if they disappeared again, especially if your uncle went with. I bet that big estate's a hot commodity right now."

Ri suddenly relaxed, the corner of his lip turning up. "You won't do shit to them."

"Oh yeah? Why not?"

"Because it doesn't matter if you're not a commie- I bet a Provincehuman taking out an entire family doesn't exactly fit in with the State's propaganda."

"Nope," South Pyongan admitted easily. "But the State doesn't know you're here."

He looked wary again, pleasing her.

"Look around." She jerked her head at the cracks running through the plaster walls. "Public Security moved shop. They have no clue I took you in. The only people that know you're here are me and my bodyguards. And they're loyal to me. And none of us gives a damn about what happens to a traitor and his family."

His smirk erased, Ri said, "You wouldn't," like he knew her personally or some shit.

"I would." She pressed harder, heat filling her throat. "There is nothing I'd like more than for you to give me a reason to off you. You're a traitor. And if your family knew, then they're traitors, too.

"And I kill traitors."

"Jong-soon is just a kid-"

"You didn't care that those Poseong-ri boys were kids," South Pyongan reminded him. "And you're a fake Nationalist. I'm a real one. You think I would?"

"You-"

"I already know that gang is in the Osok Mountains," she interrupted. "I'm going to find them, whether you make it easy or not. But if you do make it easy, you can screw off to prison and your family can keep leeching off the State. If you don't, well."

She shrugged. "'The Ko-Jong family fled south, just like the collaborator of the house did after Liberation' doesn't sound too unbelievable. I doubt Korea would care enough to not buy it, if he even found out."

"So what's it gonna be?" she asked, lowering her voice. "Easy? Or hard."

She punctuated the word with more force, her forearm bearing down on his throat as he bared his teeth in pain and fury. The province held his gaze with her own, pressing harder, even after he started to cough and sputter like he was trying to speak.

He deserved to die. And it would be so easy to do it. The blood pounding through his veins beat against her arm, and it would be so easy to stop it. To punish him for the damage he'd already caused, to stop him from ever causing any more.

South Pyongan bore down with all her weight, his windpipe creaking under her pressure. His eyelids fluttered.

Then she stepped back, releasing him as he fell forward, unable to catch himself. He smacked into the floor, gagging and choking as he was able to breathe again.

South Pyongan didn't give him time to recover, yanking him up by his ugly ass mushroom cut.

"Sorry, what were you trying to say?" she mocked.

Her glared at her spitefully. When he spoke, his voice was raspy.

"Easy."

"Good boy." The province ruffled his hair like a dog's fur. "Now sit and speak."

He did, grudgingly and hatefully enough that she was pretty sure he wasn't lying. She got a few other things out of him, too- the sort of information the reactionaries (and so America) were interested in, people he'd been planning to rope into the sabotage, and the orders the kids had been supposed to receive this week. Those involved cutting the phone lines again, rooting out the relocated warehouses for the planes to target (though the boys wouldn't be told that), and keeping an eye out for her.

More proof that the Yanks had known she and her brother were going to their provinces. South Pyongan just knew they had a leak, even if Korea refused to confirm it.

"If you're lying, you all die anyway," she informed him when he was done.

"I'm not lying," he said through gritted teeth. "I'll swear on a Bible of that's what ya want."

"Yeah, like I'd trust that." If a religious nut like her brother swore on that book, sure, maybe. But this guy? No way.

She crossed her arms imposingly. "One more question."

He glowered. "What?"

"That rock you set as a meeting point, Kko-kki-o Rock."

"What about it?"

"It's called that because there used to be trees growing on the ridge above, yeah? So if you saw it from below, it looked like a rooster's comb?"

Ri narrowed his eyes, like he was trying to guess her game. "...Yeah."

'Knew it.'

South Pyongan spun on a heel, heading for the door. "Thanks for you willing cooperation. Your province would appreciate it, if you still had one. And I'm sure it'll look great in court. Oh, and one last thing."

She looked over her shoulder. "Maybe next time don't get ten-year olds to do your dirty work."

He bared his knee, still on his knees against the far wall. "Screw you."

"You wish." South Pyongan stepped out, calling back, "And get a haircut, loser."

She slammed the door before he could say anything else.

"Hear that?" she said to her guards, standing in the dark lobby of the currently empty Public Security headquarters.

They nodded and she said, "Guess 'Kko-kki-o Rock' makes sense after all."

They stared at her, lips not even twitching, continuing to not have a sense of humour.

"And you got the information," the tall one said bluntly.

"Yeah yeah," South Pyongan sighed. "Let's get those Security guys in here right away. I've got to send a message to Korea and get back to Pyongyang."

The reactionaries had definitely taken off as soon as Ri had been given his instructions. They had to get a task force on their trail as soon as possible.

Korea might not be happy with the kinds of threats she'd used. But it had got them the information quicker than playing nice would've, if it even had.

And besides, she thought, dusting her hands off as she stepped out into the cold night.

Playing bad cop was way more fun anyway.

There's this scene in Mass Effect 2 where you're interrogating this guy and you and your one friend/coworker/assassin working for you as a charity case decide who is good cop and who is bad cop. I play my character as a Paragade, which means she's mostly a good person, but she's also very fond of knocking people out, lets her friends kill and maim when she thinks they deserve to, and will occasionally sacrifice ships with ten thousand civilians on board to win battles. I have a much higher Paragon score, which means she should be good cop. She can never pass the intimidation check to make the guy tell us what we want to know immediately. But she would never choose to be good cop, so she is instead left punching this guy three times in the face while he insults her until he breaks down and confesses. This is South Pyongan.

There's this argument that Israelis use when they say they deserve Palestine because they lived there thousands of years ago, and barring the fact that modern Palestinians tend to be more closely related to those ancient people than modern 'Israelis' are (never ask why ancestry tests are pretty much illegal in Israel), I think it's funny when Americans or Canadians parrot that. You can see them repeating that online, but it's like, okay. Let's say the land did belong to the Israelis thousands of years ago. So you think people that live there currently should be forced out of their homes so the indigenous people can reclaim them? Interesting. I wonder how you would feel if a Navajo family showed up at your door with an eviction notice. Not happy, I assume. And just to be clear, it isn't the same thing at all because the Americas actually did belong to the indigenous people there, and far more recently, plus Israelis are moving from other countries. But if you're American or Canadian and someone tries the 'But the land belonged to the Israelis!' thing, please bring that up and tell me their reaction. I bet it's the world's most impressive feat of mental gymnastics you'll ever see.

Don't even mention the name Takaichi Sanae to me.

Protectors' Onus

1911

"Sister!"

The foot about to smash down on the unconscious man's skull halted as South Pyongan heard her brother's voice, cutting through the red haze like the blade her opponent had been clutching.

'Alive. He's alive.'

She let him wrap his slender arms around her, pulling her away from the guy whose head she'd just bashed off the side of the foundry wall.

Realizing she was still holding the torn ear in her hand, she dropped it.

"Are you okay?" she demanded, grabbing and spinning North Pyongan, looking for tears in his worn workshirt, for blood, in the dim alleyway. "Did he get you?"

The bastard had had a knife. A knife! Did he seriously think he needed a blade for some scrawny fifteen-year old not-even-a-year old?

Well, clearly he needed it for her. Actually he probably should've brought a gun. But that was her! Her brother was harmless.

"I'm alright, sister," he soothed, laying his hands on her forearms. "He didn't touch me. You got here before he could."

Something inside her eased, and she tugged her arms out of his grasp.

"Of course I did. South Pyongan to the rescue, count on it."

She spun away, perfunctorily rifling through the guy's pockets. It wasn't like she'd knocked tons of people out (outside of in the ring, and robbing your opponent in front of an audience was sort of looked down on), but she was a kid on the street, so she'd had to defend herself before. And instigate things. And taking shit from unconscious people was pretty much the same as stealing from laundry lines or chicken coops. So long as they couldn't fight back, they were just like containers.

And this container had a shiny knife, probably something he'd spent months scraping up the funds from at the Taegu steelworks, and that he'd cry blood over losing.

'Shouldn't've screwed with my brother then.'

Her heart was still pounding in her chest. God, that had been embarrassing. She'd totally lost her cool.

Her eyes flicked to the ear lying on the ground, the lump of cartilage looking like some kind of weird, fleshy... thing. Gross. Awesome, but gross. She didn't even know how she'd done that. She'd just seen this bastard slipping down the alley her brother had gone down to piss, her vision had gone red and bam- next thing she knew she had his ear in her hand and was cracking his skull off the bricks.

She'd been giving her all in these street fights for the past few months, from Chuncheon to Taegu. But she'd never felt anything like that before, no matter how often the men she was fighting said she had nice tits (hey, she wasn't gonna complain about that) or mocked her by saying a girl couldn't beat them. It just made victory even sweeter. And the prize money spend easier.

But when she'd rounded the corner to see her brother pressed against the alley gate, his hands raised in pacification, her body had just moved on its own, filled with a heat that drove the thoughts from her head.

South Pyongan pocketed the yen she'd found and tucked the knife into the rope belt on her oversized men's trousers, peeved that the asshole didn't have a real belt for her to take.

'Guess the types that get into underground fighting rings aren't the ones that can afford leather belts.'

His shirt was one of the sleeveless kinds factory workers wore, sweat-stained from the summer heat and the fight.

Yeah, she wasn't taking that. Underclothes had to come from the line. Socks, too, preferably.

Winter was the exception. They couldn't be picky then.

South Pyongan raised her head, looking out at the darkness beyond the mouth of the alley. None of the street lamps cast their glow far enough to reach here.

It was summer now. But winter was lurking just around the turn of the season. It couldn't go the same way as last year.

She guessed she had felt that way before. On Mount Kumgang. Not when the Japs had been hot on their heels. She'd been pissed, yeah, and wanted to get them away from her brother. But she'd mostly been excited to take them on a run.

No. She'd felt that blinding heat later, when her feet were numb from the stream she'd fallen into, and cold leeched into her marrow as her brother desperately tried to carry her on, in the last moments before the blackness had crushed her, knowing that they were going to freeze to death, that the Japs were going to dig them out of the snow like potatoes and haul them off to be tortured or killed. Her brother was going to die in the cold and be carved up by some foreign bastard or traitor and there was nothing she could do about it.

Fury. And something worse.

"Sister." Her brother put a hand on her shoulder. "What's troubling you?"

"How we're gonna spend this money," she replied, popping up. "We've got extra now. Want to put on a hood and buy a steamed bun tomorrow? Wait, no. We should buy a sack of grain. We can just steal the buns."

Her brother eyed her disapprovingly, and she huffed. "If god hates stealing so much, maybe he should magic us up some food."

"That isn't how He works."

"Yeah yeah. Ask him for pheasant." Kicking the guy in the ribs, she said, "We should get out of here. And you should let me kill this guy."

Her brother placed a hand on her arm. "He didn't do anything, sister."

"He tried to kill you."

"I doubt he was going to kill me," he said, looking down at the man almost sadly. "He likely just wanted your prize money. We can't blame him for that. And he didn't succeed."

"Ugh, fine." South Pyongan brushed him off, heading for the gate set halfway down the alley. "You win. Let's go."

She definitely could blame the bastard for that, but she knew if she kept arguing, he'd probably just bring up how killing was 'a sin.'

Curse that priest Pak for putting that crap in his head. It was all well and good for him to hunker in that little mountain church of his and preach about 'Thou shalt not lie, steal, or kill.' But the Pyongans were literally wanted fugitives who had to live on the streets when they weren't roughing it in the mountains.

Seriously, when one of the guys she'd become chummy with in Chuncheon said the Kempeitei were in the area, her brother hadn't been able to get anything useful while they gathered stuff to flee because he couldn't bring himself to steal. He'd always been a bit 'eh' about doing it, but at least he'd been able to. Now he was all guilty over it, even when she was the one stealing.

She'd asked what the point was of joining a religion that would just make him feel worse about the stuff they literally had to do to survive, but he'd just given her some answer like 'It gives me peace knowing God is watching over us.' Even though it clearly didn't.

With a few effortless motions, South Pyongan swung herself over the gate, landing lightly on the other side. She hadn't taken too many hits tonight. One guy had gotten a good punch to her ribs in, but it didn't feel like any broke this time. Buddy on the ground hadn't got any in.

'No wonder he wanted revenge.'

Her smugness died as she watched her brother struggle his way up the gate.

Was she going to have to watch out for that all the time? It wasn't like the guys in the other cities had taken losing to a physically fifteen-year old girl well. But they'd come after her. She actually liked that they did- it gave her another chance to beat them.

But her brother... He couldn't fight. He'd only barely agreed to her teaching him some self-defense moves, and she knew that if it came down to it, he would have trouble using them. Not because he was weak or anything, but just because his conscience wouldn't let him. He didn't like hurting people, even if it meant he'd be the one to get hurt. He hated the Japs as much as she did, but he'd asked her before if she thought he'd killed the one he hit with a rock when they first met, and she could tell he'd been a little relieved when she said 'no.'

That thought flickered across her mind again.

It probably would've been easier if they'd never met. If it was just South Pyongan. She could steal whatever she wanted to and kill whoever tried to screw with her, and she'd never have to feel anything but excited for the next fight. There would be no one to have to watch out for, no one to feel guilty about what she had to do.

No one to fear losing.

North Pyongan reached the top of the gate, smiling at her as he swung his legs over.

And no one to sing her songs. No one to wipe her brow when she got sick or to split a bun with her or to lie with on the rocks and watch the waves roll in while they talked about a nicer future.

South Pyongan reached up, making her brother yelp as she grabbed his waist and lifted him safely to the ground.

It might've been easier to survive without him. But life wouldn't have been easier. It didn't really matter if she had unlimited steamed buns if she didn't have him to split them with and she was going to kill herself before she ever said that out loud.

"C'mon, Sailor Boy," she said, turning to march down the alley. "I think we've worn out our welcome here. Why don't we spend the rest of the summer on the coast?"

"Really?" her brother asked, perking up like a street dog you'd mentioned beef around.

"You'll swim in the ocean if I have to beat up a coast guard for it."

"Maybe let's not beat anyone up we don't have to."

His sister clicked her tongue dramatically. "Ungrateful brat. Fine. We'll have a nighttime swim."

"If we spend autumn in Busan, we could head to the Jeollas for winter," her brother suggested as they made their way through the cramped alleyways of the industrial district. "It will be warmer there, and grain should be cheaper. Then we could go north next summer."

South Pyongan snapped her fingers. "Good plan. Busan, here we come!"

The port city would have a fighting scene, at the very least. There'd be a ton of foreign dock workers (Japs galore for her to wale on) and it wasn't like they had money to spend on anything else. And when men were bored and poor, they fought. And when South Pyongan was bored and poor, she won.

Ugh, she was going to have to put up with a new slew of 'Oho, so the little lady thinks she can fight, does she?' It wouldn't even bother her that much if they'd just get new material. Two cities in and she'd already heard it all.

"Before we leave..." North Pyongan ventured. "Could we visit the First Presbyterian Church?"

It was this huge chapel up on Cheongra Hill, which she'd caught him eyeing a few times during their four months in Taegu.

"It's in the middle of the city," South Pyongan reminded him. "Y'know, in richie territory. We'll kind of stick out there."

She plucked at the hem of her dirty checked shirt.

"We are leaving after," North Pyongan pointed out. "But you're right. We shouldn't risk it."

"Why do you want to go anyway?"

Sounding embarrassed, her brother muttered, "I want to be baptized."

His sister clicked her tongue again. "Can't I just shove your head in a bucket and say a prayer?"

"I don't think that's how it works. And do you know any prayers?"

"Nope. Do you?"

North Pyongan shook his head. "Just the one. And Father Pak said a priest needs to do it. The water has to be blessed."

South Pyongan heaved a sigh. "Fine. We'll go check out the church. But if they tell the Japs on us, we're out of luck."

Her brother was quiet as they reached the edge of the district, making her huff.

"If no one's home, we'll find a church on the way to Busan."

"I don't want to get us-"

"No complaints, Choir Boy," his sister declared, finger pointed in the air. "I make the decisions around here. Most of the time. When I want to. But I'm making the decision right now for sure. We'll get you dunked or whatever if I have to kidnap a priest to do it."

"Please don't kidnap a priest."

"No promises!"

South Pyongan peered out from the alleyway, looking both ways down the side street. The ramshackle worker's quarters were dark and quiet, all the boozers and scrappers back home for the night.

Not the Pyongans. So long as they had each other, they were always home.

Right. Her brother was her home, as disgusting as that sounded. It didn't matter that Pak had made him believe shit that could get him hurt, or worse. He wouldn't, because his sister would always be there to look out for him, no matter what.

"You're not allowed to piss by yourself anymore," she informed her brother, then darted out into the street.

"What?!" he hissed after her.

"And when I'm doing it, you have to remain in audio contact the whole time," she whisper-shouted as he scampered after her. "You'll need to go a street over and sing a little song or something."

"Why do you get a bit of privacy and I don't?"

South Pyongan didn't answer, taking them through the maze of cramped, smog-stained buildings towards the church.

If her brother wanted to go there, she would. And if he wanted to go to Busan or the Jeollas or the damn Russian Empire, she'd follow him there, too. She'd go wherever he did and take down anything that got in their way so he could get to his destination.

Despite how his morals made things harder, she was glad she'd ran into him. As corny and embarrassing as it was, even though they hadn't even known each other for a whole year yet, she couldn't imagine life without her brother.

And if he hadn't met her, he might be dead. Just like if she hadn't came fast enough tonight. That couldn't happen.

South Pyongan needed to get stronger. She needed to be able to win not just most fights, but all of them. She needed to be the best warrior that ever lived, better than Ri Sun-sin, Kim Yu-sin, or any gunungsin or janggunsin. They'd had the advantage of money and ships and armies. All she had was her fists and her brother, and she wasn't going to lose either of those things.

She would protect North Pyongan no matter what. She'd never leave him, even if he took a vow of monkhood and refused to even eat stolen food or lift his hand in self-defense. If he didn't want to, he shouldn't have to. She was the one that could fight, she was the one that had been formed without the burden of guilt or a soft heart. She was the one that would steal and lie and kill (or at the very least maim), so that he could stay 'sinless.' It was her job to protect her brother.

He needed her.

—

1951

South Pyongan still didn't feel satisfied. She'd completed her mission in record time and with zero casualties, but she still just felt... off.

She knew she could've handled the four boys and Ri better. Or she knew someone else could have. Her brother might not have been able to get anything out of the man, but he could've done something for the kids, like the ones she'd dropped off in Anju for him. Found a way to make sure they stayed out of trouble without telling them their dads were probably dead and lowkey threatening them.

She'd been too aggressive with all of them, and even if she'd been bluffing about hurting Ri's family, she knew it wouldn't look good if he told someone. She wouldn't get in trouble for it- she was trying to save lives by stopping the Taedong Youth Corps. They were at war.

But what about once they weren't?

And her brother was still bothering her. And the fact that she was bothered at all was still bothering her. And she just wanted to-

"Gahhhhh!" She buried her head in her knees in the back of the truck as it sped back towards Pyongyang.

South Pyongan hated thinking and she hated sitting still. She wanted to throw herself out of the moving vehicle and run next to it. She wanted to be at the front, not having to deal with interrogations and politics, where all she had to do to keep her brother safe was keep one eye on him while she fought.

"Comrade South Pyongan?" one of her guards ventured.

"Shut up," she muttered, pressing her face into her legs, pain shooting through her cheek as her knee ground into her cheek.

She despised these burns. They made her feel even more-

South Pyongan gritted her teeth as the itching under her charred skin became unbearable.

—

North's nails scraped roughly at the scar over his eye as he shifted on the thin wooden chair in he and the General's office. He usually sat with his spine as straight as a steel pole, but was having trouble tonight.

"Namsi?" his Premier's voice asked from across the room.

North's jaw clenched. "Or Taechon or Samchon."

He now knew which burns correlated to the airfields there as the Yankees hit them nearly every single night, trying to make it harder for the MiGs to operate. One of them was on his lower back, and had been spreading down. It was this forcing him to abandon his perfect posture as the pressure sitting straight put on his spine made the scabs leak, and his bandages and shirt cling uncomfortably to his skin.

"You're drinking plenty of fluids?" his Premier asked casually.

North pointedly reached out to grab his canteen from the desk, tossing back the last of it.

'Kangwon.'

His General leaned back in his chair, flexing his broad shoulders, the popping of his spine echoing in the small underground room. "Get some rest, comrade."

"We need to send out a search party as soon as South Pyongan gets back."

His province had sent a telegram, using the code North and the provinces had developed. Unlike the theoretically crackable unique codes he had with each of them, this one was more like the pictorial one he and his General shared, relying on phrases that meant something only to them, and whose meaning could change depending on the context.

This one had been simple- 'COUNT ON IT. GYEONGGI'S FEAR.' 'Count on it' being 'South Pyongan always wins, count on it,' the last thing she had said before toppling from her successfully stolen Japanese horse with a sword wound in her stomach, and 'Gyeonggi's fear' being heights. So in this case, North knew it meant she had accomplished her mission, and the reactionaries were hiding in the mountains. The Osok Mountains, since the telegram had came from Nampo.

Now he just had to wait for her to get here for the rest of the details before he sent soldiers to eliminate them.

"I think myself and our comrades can handle that task." The man's dark eyes squinched up. "If our country will allow us."

North grimaced, looking away.

He knew they could. All they needed to do was to send operations orders to a task force already in the area.

"There's other work to do."

His General didn't protest, but gave his Countryhuman a look that let him know he didn't want to find him sleeping on the thin folding cot tomorrow morning, before bending his neck back over his papers.

North didn't see the point in returning to the bunker to rest. He wouldn't be able to try to sleep until China did, and even then...

He hated sleeping on anything other than his back. It felt too... He didn't like it. And right now it felt like his back was made of ground meat.

Saliva flooded his mouth, and he slipped the stone in his pocket between his lips when the Premier wasn't looking.

He was going to be in pain either way. He might as well get work done while he was.

North set aside casualty reports from the front, taking another paper from the pile. His eye scanned it, his mood growing worse.

Another stray bomb had hit near Camp 3, north of Sinuiju. No one had died this time, the POWs being evacuated to the bunkers on site in time. But he knew that could change tomorrow night. And he would get blamed for it.

It made him think of the ceasefire talks again, the anger he had been fighting for the past... while coiling in his chest.

America’s newest way to postpone peace was over prisoners of war. The talks on them had been supposed to start yesterday, but America’s man- a Rear-Admiral with the family name ‘Libby’- had refused to participate, which had carried into today. North knew the pattern would continue.

Thirty days. That had been the time limit set on November 27th. If the ceasefire was signed in thirty days, the current line would remain. But if it wasn't, then they would have to negotiate a new one with any changed territorial gains or losses. Libby would stretch the POW issue out until at least then.

There shouldn't have even been a discussion. It should have been nothing more complicated than passing each other lists of the names and ranks of the prisoners they had, something North had Hwang assist compiling weeks ago, then discussing how the first exchanges of wounded and ill would be made. North's negotiator on the matter- General Ri Sang-cho- and China's had already made their only demand clear- repatriation of all their soldiers.

And that- the due course for every other war- had been rejected.

The Yankees hadn't said why yet, but North already had his suspicions about what they were planning. Something America had already tried with CCCP after the World Anti-Fascist War. Something that went against the laws codified again in the Geneva Convention only two years ago. Something that wouldn't even be entertained if it wasn't Korea it was being used against.

And even if he was wrong about that, he knew he wasn't wrong about America and his puppets trying to waste time until the thirty-day limit was up. They would drag their heels and refuse to cooperate until time ran out and they had to negotiate a new line, wasting even more time, and all the while North's people would be dying, his northern provinces would be starving, his southern provinces would be imprisoned, and his brother would be under America's control.

And there was nothing he could fucking do about any of it.

"Comrade."

North felt a touch on his wrist, and realized his pencil had snapped in his hand.

"Ssi-bal." He dropped the pieces like they'd given him another burn, guilt flooding him as he stared at the broken lead protruding from the jagged wood.

He knew exactly how much it had cost to extract those resources, exactly how much it took to transport them and assemble them and get them to market, how much the labour of the workers that made it was worth. How much he had just wasted.

Numbers flashed across his vision, the ones he'd been staring at all night- the amount it took to feed his soldiers so they wouldn't starve like Rhee's, the amount it took to feed workers and government officials, to give loans to the peasants and build the factories and shelters and houses just to watch them be destroyed again, the enormous debt he would owe China and CCCP when this was all over and the rapidly mounting cost of rebuilding, what it cost to feed POWs that he'd rather put a bullet in instead, the amount it took to make that fucking pencil and get it in his hand.

"I can fix it." He snatched at the halves like he could force them back together with his bare hands.

"No need," his Premier soothed. "If you take a knife to one end, you'll have two pencils."

North bared his teeth, knowing that the man wouldn't be so lax if some other assemblyman had damaged State property like this.

"What matters is that we have pencils at all," Kim Il-sung said, gently pushing his one hand down to the desk. "Get some rest, comrade. I'll find some glue. If I can put it back together, I will."

North's eye dipped to the broken halves, then away, his shoulders slumping. "Fine."

Exhaustion rushed in to take the guilt's place, not erasing it, only pushing it to the margins. Black particles fizzled across his vision, obscuring the corners of the office.

"You sent our Comrade Provinces off with your transport, didn't you? I can drive you to your base," his General offered.

"No," North said, his tongue feeling like more lead in his mouth. "It's too dangerous."

He could feel the burns over his heart eating away at his skin.

Pyongyang could be being bombed above them.

"I'll be fine," he told him, standing straight, trying to disguise the pain it made shoot through his back, and that he couldn't see past the darkness shrouding his eye.

His General didn't look as if he bought it. But all he said was, "My country needs to consider his own safety as often as he considers others'."

What was the point? The bombs couldn't kill North. So long as it wasn't a direct hit, he could just carry on to the bunker.

"Goodnight," he muttered.

"Sleep well," his Premier advised, returning to his desk with the broken pencil. "And try not to dwell as you walk, comrade."

There was nothing else to do.

The idea of hiding out in a dark meeting room until his General went to sleep crossed his mind, but North tossed it out. The only thing worse than the long walk to Jangsan would be standing still waiting.

So he grudgingly slunk out of the complex, and into the frigid night.

Immediately his blood pressure rose as that all-too-familiar drone hit his ear slits, followed by a distant array of explosions.

North stared out at the dark treeline, his eye piercing through those last dark sentinels all the way to the rail lines that led to Hwanghae.

He should be there, protecting those that lived nearby from the bombs, helping his Rehabilitation Corps fix the tracks. He should be beyond that, at the front. If the Yanks were going to make them have to renegotiate the line, then he should be tearing back what pieces of his country he could before then.

His palm ached where the broken pencil had split his burns. The cold metal of the Tokarev at his hip soothed it.

"Comrade Korea? Is something wrong?"

North tore his eye from the horizon.

"Keep close watch tonight," he clipped at the guard standing outside the red brick building that shielded the entrance to the underground.

The man saluted, not questioning the order as North strode away, subtly removing the stone from his mouth.

There wasn't any particular threat about tonight. He didn't expect any reactionary gangs to be capable of making it to the heart of the country to storm Moran Hill. He just needed to give an order, to do something.

He had told his General his intention to return to the front if he was needed, and the man had said it was his choice. But he wasn't needed right now. His comrades were focused on holding hills and retaking heights recently lost. Engagements were sparse.

The bulk of the casualties came from those damn planes. And it was clear by now that he couldn't protect his people from those.

His teeth ground together, his strides lengthening as he remembered watching that TNT bomb plummet towards Pyongyang, thinking it was an atom bomb, the only thing he was capable of doing using his own body to shield two people, knowing it wasn't enough, that it was-

He wanted to be at the front. But he knew right now he could do more here, behind a desk or a podium.

And it burned.

North stretched his legs, ignoring the blood he felt trickling down his thighs as his skin tore, just wanting to make it back to the bunker without working himself into a fury.

It was hard. Even the two good things he could focus on came with barbs.

An agent had reported in from the south two days ago. Not Choi Jung-nam. But he had passed on the news that an officer in the National Defense Army had been found dead outside the base in Taejon. Authorities suspected foul play, but no evidence had been found.

Rim Gun-hon had been eliminated.

Hae could rest easier, once he told her about the fortunate 'coincidence.' And it meant that his agent's handler was still alive and active.

And it meant his agent still believed in him.

His hands balled into fists, his breath trailing him like clouds of steam billowing from a freight train as he was released from the security checkpoint, marching on towards the mountain.

The other good news was that an article about SH's past seemingly hadn't appeared in a southern newspaper in over a week. North didn't know why- he couldn't imagine America had decided his silence on it meant it wouldn't successfully interfere with the talks. And from what SH had said about him, he didn't think the foreign country would grow bored with the idea of getting revenge on her. His pride had been scratched- a country like America wouldn't just forget that.

It was more likely he was saving it to bring back if the repatriation issue ever got settled. Either that or he hoped it had served its purpose already by getting in SH's head, and North's.

It had. Because how could he even view the articles stopping as good news when they had already came out? They had been being printed for weeks, and even if they weren't in mainstream papers, they still would have been seen by thousands. Thousands of their people would know what had been done to his province, thousands of them could bring it up to her even after Reunification, and even if they only meant well, it would bleed her, the same way it would have bled him.

He hadn't been there to protect South Hamgyong, to stop North

Hamgyong from getting sick or to keep her from being sold, and he couldn't force the reactionary papers to stop spreading the story. He hadn't been the one to make them halt, and he couldn't stop them from starting again if America pleased. All he could do was shield her from knowing that people knew. And he couldn't even do that reliably.

And there was nothing he could do to protect his agent. Nothing but win.

He had to. He had to save her and the southern provinces and their people and-

North's teeth creaked, the pressure inside him reaching an almost unbearable point-

Then it froze, his insides stilling even as his feet kept moving. Something else joined the anger as a prickle itched between his shoulder blades a second before he heard the crunch of dirt on the road behind him.

Someone was coming.

—

South Pyongan came down from her jog as she caught sight of the figure in the distance, catching her breath as she stormed towards him.

The hour-and-a-half-long truck ride had done nothing to make her feel better. It had just given that niggling feeling time to grow, going from a piece of corn stuck in her teeth to a canker sore in her mouth, rubbing raw and bloody, and she still didn't know what it was, and it was pissing her off.

The near-full moon let her see the exact moment he sensed she was coming, the subtle shift as his body language matched hers, filled with tense anticipation, and the moment he realized it was her, and his hand strayed away from his gun.

Korea didn't turn until she was right behind him and her fist was flying at his head. Then he whirled, catching it with one hand and dodging the other.

He didn't ask any questions or tell her to screw off. He just hit back, bringing his knee up into her stomach. South Pyongan let the blow land, then seized the arm gripping hers, sinking her fingers into his skin and wrenching herself free, only to strike again.

They scrapped on the open road, throwing punches and kicks, the only sounds the crackle of frost under their boots and the occasional grunt as one of their hits landed.

South Pyongan threw herself into the combat, her thoughts finally silent as her body dodged and lunged, though that irritating feeling was still there, still building.

A strike against her collarbone sent pain through her chest, and she launched herself at Korea. He caught both her hands this time as they met in the grapple they usually ended up in, each one fighting to overpower the other.

South Pyongan was the only province that could reliably win against him, but it still wasn't enough. He still beat her too often.

Her leg lashed out at his groin, but he blocked her by twisting his hips, then almost knocked her off balance with a blow to the ankle. Only gripping tight to his hands saved her.

"What's wrong with you?" he growled in her face.

South Pyongan bared her teeth at the betrayal of their usual agreement, and he curled his lip.

"I mean you're being sloppy."

He punctuated his point by slamming his forehead into hers, knocking her back and breaking their grapple. South Pyongan's head spun, but she threw herself at him again, slamming into him with her full force, her hands gripping his sides, and he finally went down with a snarl.

She knew he hated being pinned, but she did it anyway, straddling his hips and raining blows over his shoulders and chest, tanking the battering he gave her in return, driving his elbows into her thighs and fists into her sternum.

It wasn't enough and since she didn't really want to hurt him it wasn't going to be enough.

Her open palm struck his chest as her frustration mounted, and she burst out, "What if I never figure out how to be a politician?"

Her own words surprised her, enough that Korea's fist catching her right in the place she'd shot herself almost knocked her off him. But she kept her grip, squeezing his hips tight and slamming his arms back over his head.

"What if I never learn how to lead?" Now that the dam had burst, the words kept coming. "What if no matter how responsible I am, I'm still not good at wearing a suit?"

Korea growled, managing to free one hand and clamping it over her face, digging his fingers into her jaw. "You are saying you're not good at things?"

Tearing his hand away, South Pyongan spat, "I'm a damn good soldier, I'm awesome at football and Taekwondo and ssireum, and no one's better than me at fighting! But none of that helps us."

Being able to tear a man's ear off his head didn't make her capable of guiding their people, being able to intimidate a guy into handing over intel didn't make her able to set an example. And as for protecting-

Korea arched his back off the ground, and his knees slammed into her back. South Pyongan lost her grip, pitching over his head, and he seized her, rolling her over into a full-body hold, her throat squeezed between his chest and arm.

"I told you I need you," he growled in her 'ear' as she struggled to free her arms. "Do you think I'd say empty words just to make you feel better?"

"I don't need to feel better." South Pyongan's words were muffled by his arm. "And you said you need me because you think I can change. But what if I can't?"

"I don't want you to change. I want you to adapt."

"What if I can't?!"

With a violent twist of her body, she exploded from his grasp, rolling away across the cold grit, scrabbling up just in time to meet her country as he pounced on her.

"I don't know how to be diplomatic!" she cried as they tussled, jabbing at each other's weak points. "I don't know how to be polite or magnanimous or forgiving or any of the other crap a politician has to be! What if I never know?

"What if I'm never going to be anything but a soldier!?"

South Pyongan was proud of her skills, she was proud of her strength and marksmanship and ability to take down an asshole twice her size, and kill whoever needed killing. Her earliest memory was bull rushing a Jap and running him through with his own sword. She'd been formed fighting and she didn't regret that. It had kept her safe, it had kept her brother safe, and her cousins and people and Korea.

But they weren't always going to be at war. Even though the Yank and his Imperialist friends would definitely keep trying to get their grubby claws on her country after they were Reunified, she wouldn't always be able to fight them off with a gun. Already she had limits- she had to stay her hand if an NDA soldier surrendered in the hopes they could be re-educated, she had to tolerate landlords and capitalists being integrated into society, they couldn't head to the front without jeopardizing diplomacy, and she couldn't just kill whoever she wanted.

One day there wouldn't be a battlefield at all. And South Pyongan didn't know what she was going to do then.

Korea had gone limp in her arms, but she was keen to that trick, and wrapped herself around him tighter, forcing him back onto his back as she straddled him again.

"I want to be able to protect our people!" she cried down at him, the words spilled out of her like air from a punctured football. "But the only way I know how is by fighting for them! Fighting's the only thing I'm good at and I still couldn't save them."

The flag around her arm burned like a brand as the faces of her tank crew flashed through her mind. Her voice cut at her throat like jagged glass.

"So how am I supposed to keep them safe as a politician when I can't even do it as a soldier? How can I protect them when I can't even protect my own brother?!"

She almost screamed the admission down at him, her chest heaving as she fought to catch her breath, more out of breath than she should be as she realized that was what had been lodged inside of her for the last few days.

For longer.

Her eyes darted up, catching Korea's, and she froze, heat flooding her face as she realized what she just said.

South Pyongan scrabbled off him, trying to jump up and escape before he could try and read into that. But Korea lunged after her, getting his arms around her legs and pinning her face-down, his knees pressing into her sides.

"So this is about North Pyongan," he said, and there was disappointment in his voice.

"No," she muttered into the soil, getting ice crystals and dirt in her mouth. "It..."

Now that she'd got her self-awareness back, she didn't want to say it. But... Ssi-bal, she didn't want him to think she was just obsessing over her brother again. He was part of it, but so was her tank crew, so were the militia she'd lost in Anju, so were those kids, and the couple gunned down in their wake in her capital. So was that farmer.

"I really mean that other crap," she said grudgingly. "It's just... He's my brother. If I can't protect him, who can I protect?"

Korea was silent on top of her, and she squeezed her eyes shut, cursing herself.

"Shit, I didn't-"

"He can protect himself," he interrupted. "North Pyongan isn't helpless anymore. He doesn't need you looking after him."

"That's the problem."

South Pyongan hadn't been able to look out for him when their army was back against the Amnok, she hadn't been able to stop that Pak from almost getting him kidnapped, or been able to keep him safe when he went to Guk Island, or stop him from walking into that trap.

And he hadn't needed her to.

'I don't need you to protect me anymore.'

"What do you mean 'That's the problem?'" Korea demanded. "I- We have been trying to get him to be able to take care of himself for decades. Isn't that why we broke him of his pacifism back then?"

South Pyongan nodded shamefully into the dirt.

She knew it was stupid. She knew this was what she'd always wanted for her brother- for him to be able to protect himself when she couldn't be there. But it still- Ugh, it still hurt.

What was that thing Kangwon had said to her when she was moping about North Pyongan leaving her to South (like she'd wanted)? 'The feeling is unreasonable, but it's not unreasonable to feel that way.'

But it was unreasonable. It was stupid. It had been stupid then and it was even stupider now.

With a surge, she got herself flipped around, but wasn't able to escape before Korea repinned her by her shoulders, glaring down at her.

This was worse. She couldn't meet his eye as she said, "He doesn't need me to protect him anymore. And that's- It's good. But..."

'What am I if I'm not my brother's protector?'

The traitorous thought made her grit her teeth.

North Pyongan was so many things to her. He was the person that took care of her when she got sick, he was the one that thought their flight path through and kept her from taking on Japs when she really shouldn't. He cooked the food she'd stolen and mended the clothes and kept her and Korea from getting under each other's skin even more than they already did, and did her chores for her, and had even done some of her paperwork before she'd started trying to be responsible.

And she was his protector. That had always been enough. But if he didn't need her to protect him anymore...

Then what did he need her for?

Her people could protect themselves, too. Like that guy in the church shelter in Anju had said- 'We have done alright these past few years.'

Her people didn't need her. And if her people didn't need her, then Korea didn't need her. And if her own brother, the one person that she had thought would need her no matter what didn't...

Who did?

Her face burned under Korea's gaze, and she turned her face to her shoulder, trying to hide from her shame. Her insides felt hot and squirmy and she just wanted to run away so they could pretend this had never happened.

But her Countryhuman kept his weight on her, staring down at her like he was trying to get under her skin in a different way than usual.

Then he sighed. "Did you give the Supreme Commander your report?"

South Pyongan should be pleased he was already pretending he hadn't heard her. But her stomach twisted at not getting an answer. Another stupid thing.

"No," she said, trying to sound normal. "He said to bring it to you."

Korea closed his eye, then heaved himself up, freeing her.

"Come on," he said, walking away.

South Pyongan stayed on her back. "I'll catch up."

No way she was walking back to bunker with him with all that mining the air between them. She already wanted to shove the barrel of her pistol in her mouth.

"I need your report now if we're going to make an operation plan."

The province lifted her head, intrigued despite herself. She'd figured Korea would just pass her information off to a task force. "Operation plan? We're joining the hunting party?"

"We are the hunting party," he tossed over his shoulder. "Hurry up."

South Pyongan got up on her knees. "'We' like 'the unit?'"

"You and me," Korea clipped, not looking back. "Alone."

Excitement surged in her, even if that uncomfortable, gross feeling still clogged her pores. She didn't need any more encouragement to trot after him, launching into what Ri had told her, trying not to look or think in Korea's general direction.

It'd been dumb to think he might say anything anyways. That talk by the Raktong had definitely been a one-time thing, and that sh- didn't bother her.

And it wasn't like he could do anything about it. He couldn't make her brother need her, or their people. Eliminating the reactionary gang was the only thing that could make this feeling go away, even just for a little bit.

When the war was over, and they had peace, South Pyongan might be useless.

But right now, she could still turn traitors into paste.

I think writing the piece about South Pyongan tearing a man's ear off affected me as after writing it I had a dream I was on a large man's back, pinning him to the ground and chewing his ear off. The texture was unpleasant, like when you shovel too much old holodets in your mouth and you're stuck with a mouthful of tough jelly. I gagged. But the taste was neutral. He was very displeased with me.

South Pyongan is the type of person to need you to be in an entirely different building when she's using the toilet, but if you are peeing, she's right outside the door saying loudly, 'Damn, are you frying chicken in there?' I have a friend like this. She's also the type to have memorized the entire criminal code so she knows exactly which law she's skirting. South Pyongan, not my friend.

I know many in my audience are young, so some advice- at your current age if someone ever wants to do something sexual with you, say no. And in the future if someone ever wants to hurt or humiliate you in some way and tries to justify it by saying it's a kink for them, DO NOT DO IT. I hate when people try to say sex positivity involves letting people do horrible things (usually to women). As an example- consensual rape enactments. I think there are a few reasons a woman might want that- the fear we have to live with of it happening for real, so it's like experiencing it in a safe space to make the possibility less terrifying, or because we've been groomed by a lot of media to view sexual assault as something more taboo and exciting than one of the worst things that can happen to you (because a lot of media is focused towards men). But there is only one reason a man would want to pretend to rape a woman- because he really does want to rape a woman but is too scared of the consequences. There are a lot of psychological reasons someone might want to be treated awfully, but I don't think the solution to that is to lean into it. And there aren't any good reasons for someone that gets sexual gratification from hurting people. If you ever find someone who claims to love you, question why they would want to pretend to violate you or why they would enjoy actually hurting you. I know this seems all of a sudden, but it's related to something happening to someone I know right now. No matter how nice someone seems, if they want to hurt you in the bedroom, they want to hurt you outside of it, too. The only reason they don't is because they don't have an excuse. And if you let them get away with too much, they'll probably stop thinking they need one and so will you. Sex positivity should be about consenting adult women not being shamed for having a sex life, and sexual safety for teenagers if they insist on having sex with other teenagers, not perpetuating even more violence against us under the guise of being 'open-minded.'

Cast Your Own Rope

The ride to get back to Nampo was way too awkward for South Pyongan's liking.

It didn't take long to sketch out a basic action plan, but she felt like she had to keep talking after that so Korea wouldn't think about all the embarrassing crap she'd said earlier. But he just did that thing where he stared out the windshield and said nothing, not even glancing at her, and his stonewalling made her want to babble more.

"Y'know, SH is going to nag you when we get back," she said as they neared the mountains, kicking her feet up on the Jeep's dash. "She told you to stop stealing pretty boy's ride."

Korea swatted her legs down without looking, speaking his first words in over half an hour. "I don't care."

"She's probably going to be pissed we ran off like that, too," the province pointed out.

Her cousin had been on watch when they'd left. Korea had refused to tell her where they were going, and South Pyongan was more than thrilled to speed off without another word. If SH ever found out she'd been… ugh, vulnerable, she was going to start trying to get her to open up to her, too. Not happening.

"I still don't care."

The wheels of the Jeep crunched over the uneven ground as they drove into the foothills north of Nampo, pulling into the mouth of a wide gulch. Korea cut the engine, and two men in uniform appeared, popping out of the terrain like moles.

"Comrade Korea," one hailed, snapping a brisk salute as he saw who it was. "What brings you here?"

“Classified,” the Countryhuman said, tossing him the keys. “I need this hidden until I come back for it.”

“Yes, comrade.”

Ohhhh. So that was where all their surviving vehicles were. They must be hiding them in ravines outside cities. That made sense. South Pyongan had thought they must just have like, only five left.

'North Hamgyong's going to have work for years.'

Dammit. That meant even he would be useful.

Korea started off into the darkness, and South Pyongan slunk after him, grateful that the General had told her guards she could walk back to the bunker alone. They'd get in the way of her fun, and she’d kill herself if she had freaked out like she did in front of them.

She kind of thought the man might’ve known Korea was going to take her off to do this. He’d had that look on his face, that enigmatic little smile he'd worn back in their guerrilla days whenever he was scheming.

Or maybe he just knew about their shared hobby of beating the crap out of each other.

“You know, if you said we were going into Nampo to talk to the People’s Committee or something, it would be less suspicious,” she told Korea. “Now they’re going to be gossiping about what we’re doing.”

“Coming from an army general, ‘classified’ should be all they need,” Korea clipped. “We need to eradicate the tendency for gossip in the ranks.”

He shot a glare over his shoulder, making her blink innocently.

“Yeah, gossip’s counter-revolutionary. ‘S'why I don’t do it.”

He gave her an unimpressed look. “Don’t speak unless necessary.”

South Pyongan mimed punching herself in the throat, and he rolled his eye.

The place Ri had said he'd met with the reactionaries was high up on Kuksa Hill, on the ridge directly north of the maple leaf-shaped lake nestled at the foot of it. South Pyongan could see the sheen off the water below, and the silver expanse of the sea to the west, black spots speckling its surface.

Cho Island was hidden by the curve of the coast, but the ships were enough to make her fists clench as she threw herself into looking for a trail.

"This would be easier with a light," she whispered, eyes straining to see the snow under the shadows cast by the spindly branches above them.

"And if they're still nearby, it would be easier for them to see us," Korea replied, squinting at the skeletal bushes, looking for caught scraps of fabric or hair.

At least the moon was big tonight, and it wasn't too cloudy. Even if they weren't the only ones taking advantage of that.

South Pyongan bared her teeth as the sound of bombs falling over Nampo echoed behind them, and a burn on her side widened.

Neither her or Korea had went over their wounds after their brawl. Kangwon was going to be pissed. Again.

Her eyes caught something, and she moved a few paces into the trees, brushing aside brittle strands of dead grass.

"Korea."

He crouched by her, and she moved to let the moonlight illuminate a half-print in the scattering of snow, the toe pointed northwest.

Her Countryhuman nodded in satisfaction, standing up and unslinging his Type 49. South Pyongan readied her PPS, even though they wouldn't catch up for hours, grinning as they followed the scent.

The traitors probably wouldn't move around once it was bright out, otherwise the aerial batteries they had on a few of the heights might see them. But it was only around midnight, which meant they had about six hours of darkness left, and a head start of a few hours. Every minute wasted trying to find a sign that they were still going the right way, or doubling back when they lost the trail made South Pyongan antsy.

The good news was that the duo knew these mountains like the back of their hands. The entire reason she knew how easy it'd be for the reactionaries to use the range to cross her province was because she'd done it before, both with her brother and Korea. They both knew where the easiest to traverse paths for groups that wanted to stay hidden were, and she guessed Korea knew the locations of their outposts or supply dumps, since he'd occasionally lead them off in a random direction without a new track.

South Pyongan made a mental note to go around her province and find out the local names of places, like Kko-kki-o Rock. Even if they knew all the physical features, it'd be useful for situations like with Ri's directions.

Maybe that was what she could do once she no longer had a use. She could strap on a jige, find a staff, and travel around the country like some kind of Buddhist monk, collecting charcoal and picking up niche regional slang for Korea, or something.

The thought had been joking, but it made her uneasy enough that she went back to trying not to think about anything but hunting.

The other good news was that unlike the yellow-bellied bastards (one of South Pyongan's favourite Haeisms), they didn't have to creep around in the dark. Once the sun came up, her and Korea would be able to move faster, and keep the trail easier.

But before it even started to get bright, after only around four hours of climbing over icy mountain ridges and doubling back, Korea froze. In hunting mode, South Pyongan didn't need an order to do the same, listening.

Nothing. Just the slight shiver of branches in the mountain breeze, and the distant sound of small paws through the snow.

She looked at her Countryhuman, raising a brow, and he made a flapping motion with his hands.

Right, she'd almost forgotten about his whole bird thing. It had been awhile.

They'd been able to hear nightbirds all night, little chirps and the occasional bueong-bueong of an owl. They only got quiet when they got too close. Actually, just when South Pyongan got too close.

But now it was quiet.

The province slowed her breathing and held as still as possible, trying to emit good vibes, like her and the others had used to do when the Japs were chasing them. But as non-menacing as she tried to be, the only call was a warbling trill far back the way they'd came.

Korea looked back at her, nodding, as he adjusted his grip on his Type 49.

South Pyongan tipped her head. 'Too soon, yeah?'

She'd thought the gang would have a few more ri than this on them, even if they were being lazy.

Korea jerked his chin at the trees. 'Definitely someone nearby. Keep your guard up.'

Yeah, they didn't exactly want to stumble into some poor family's dug-out. Two soldiers with guns waking you up by falling into the kimchi pit was bad enough, but it was worse when they had huge, creepy white eyes. South Pyongan knew from terrorizing more than a few recruits.

Hey, if you had to look like a freak (albeit a hot freak), you might as well have fun with it.

The two prowled through the woods, moving more slowly than before. South Pyongan held her firearm tightly to prevent it from clinking off the buckle on her cross-body belt.

As they neared the base of a cliff, a soft call sounded from off to their right, a hollow two-toned noise, and Korea quickly motioned her back into the trees as a branch rustled nearby.

Another call sounded from above, followed by a closer one. They sounded just like cuckoos, but thanks to Kangwon being incredibly anal about what bird sounds the KPRA used as signals, and when, South Pyongan knew that the birds only spent the summer in Korea, not winter.

She pressed herself to a tree trunk, listening as a perimeter guard moved slowly past, his boots crunching on the thin layer of snow that coated the ground.

Once they couldn't hear him, Korea darted through the trees in the opposite direction, silent as a shadow, and South Pyongan followed, keeping her steps light as they searched for a way up the cliff.

They needed the high ground to scope out the competition. Ri had said he'd only ever met with a couple men, but the group was definitely bigger than that. They just didn't know how big.

She was a big fan of 'take out the sentry and wring the info out of him,' but since there could literally be thirty guys or something, they couldn't risk losing the element of surprise if their captive decided to be brave.

Korea found a craggy part of the wall with enough handholds to make it up, and they waited for the sentry to come back their way.

He made another cuckoo call before he did, and the two above echoed him. South Pyongan figured that meant their camp was up top, and there was another sentry sounding off up there, too.

The one down with them meandered by, cuckooing as he reached the end of his route, then came back their way again.

As soon as he passed, South Pyongan slid from cover and ran over to the rock wall, launching herself up it. She tossed a grin over at Korea, who'd been just behind her.

'Too slow,' she mouthed, starting the climb.

The cliff wasn't too tall, maybe only twenty, twenty-five metres. If she wasn't trying to be stealthy, South Pyongan probably could've made it one-handed. And if she wasn't covered in burns.

The rocks bit at them, even through her military-issue gloves, and she could feel blood soaking through the bandages. She grit her teeth, soldiering through the pain to grip the next handhold.

The cuckoo cries came again.

As they neared the top, Korea climbed into her peripheral, moving faster, rapidly gesturing for her to do the same.

'Ssi-bal.' She bet he'd been counting the seconds between the signals. The sentries must be coming.

They'd be screwed if the one above was too close to the cliff edge, or if there wasn't any cover. But they'd be screwed for sure if the man below even looked up, so South Pyongan made herself move faster, reaching the top just before Korea.

She threw herself over it, springing into a crouch with her PPS ready, prepared to have jumped right into a traitor.

Nothing. But no cover either, just bare rock and dead scrub.

Korea lurched up next to her, taking a brisk assessment before sprinting for the shadow of the ridge above them. South Pyongan followed. The cuckoo call echoed from down below.

Once they were concealed, the two paused, taking brief stock of their position.

They were on a broad, almost flat slope. To their three was scrub forest, too isolated to have been hit by bombs or harvested yet, and to their nine the ground gradually tapered until it merged with the ridge behind them. One of the signals had came from up there.

Korea signalled towards the forest, and they started to slowly creep along the ridge, pressed up against the cold rock. But no matter how close they got, if the sentry above looked down, he'd see them easily. This was probably as much high ground as they were going to get.

South Pyongan could hear voices now, but only the vague murmur of them. They grew more audible as they finally entered the darkness under the trees, where they bounced off of the trunks.

"-hate winter," a man (she was kinda betting they were all men) grumbled. "Wish we could light a fire."

"You think this is cold?" another snorted. "Try living in my village. The wind comes in off the sea like a goddamn knife."

"You're from Seoko-ri, right?" the first asked.

"Yeah."

Ugh, one of hers.

'Not after tonight.'

South Pyongan came to a stop with Korea, crouching down as they listened, trying to get a read on how many there were.

"God, I miss home," the Seoko-ri man sighed. "The way the sunset looks on the West Sea? Nothing like it. I can't wait to see it again."

"Screw that," another said. "I can't wait to see my family. I haven't seen my little sis in three years."

"Should've taken 'em with you." Four and counting. "Would've been safer than leaving 'em with the commies."

"It felt a little unfair making my mom and dad pack up and leave," the man replied. "My family's owned that land for six generations. If they left, those bastards would have taken all of it."

Seriously? A landlord family's son had ran off to join the traitors, and they'd let them keep a personal plot?

She side-eyed Korea, who glared back at her. She huffed silently, looking back into the shadows.

'Whatever.' They didn't know whether or not the family approved.

"What about you, Mun?" the Seoko-ri guy asked. "Your village is nearby, right? Ryongwol-ri? Did you manage to get in touch with your folks?"

The next man that spoke sounded younger, and his voice was flat. "When me and my brother joined last year, my mother told us we'd better never come home. A few months ago, I tried to tell her she got her wish for Son-jo. She told me if she ever saw me again, she was going to make sure I ended up against the wall, and letting me go then was the last thing she was doing as my mother."

'Ha! Loser.'

The other men didn't share South Pyongan's amusement.

There was an awkward silence before one said, "Shit, man. That sucks."

"I'm sure she'll come around," the Seoko-ri one assured, followed by the sound of a back being slapped. "Once we free Korea, she'll see you were just doing your job as a patriot."

South Pyongan felt Korea shift next to her. Since he was disciplined enough not to growl at that, she couldn't either.

"As soon as divorce was legal, she cut my dad off," Mun said flatly. "She said it was because he'd called her a useless bitch. Once. Eleven years ago."

One of the guys tried the bold approach of, "Hey, you're seventeen, aren't ya? You're a man- you don't need a mother anymore."

That… Actually that kind of sounded like something South Pyongan would say by accident. Never mind.

The men continued bantering, a couple more voices joining in.

After another minute of eavesdropping, South Pyongan held her hand up in a strip of moonlight that made it through the trees, putting down her thumb and four fingers.

Korea nodded, holding up his own hand and folding down two more.

Nine, plus two sentries and maybe a few that were sleeping or just not chatty. That was easy as eating tteok lying down. She would've said the number seemed a little small for the harm they'd been doing, but North Pyongan had taken out those others, so it seemed reasonable.

Speaking of…

"Think there's a chance anyone will be there?" Seoko-ri asked.

"Not one," Mr. 'A Man Doesn't Need A Mother' snorted. "You think if they got the province, they'd take a week delivering him? The Yanks want him ASAP."

That got South Pyongan's attention. If they'd known her brother was going to be on the truck, they should've known she was, too. But they'd only wanted him?

"What if they're being hunted? They might have to hide for a bit."

"If they had North Pyongan, the Reds would've locked down the entire coast by now. This place would be crawling with 'em." A spitting sound made South Pyongan scrunch her face. "Trust me- the boys are dead."

"Are we gonna try again?" a sleepy-sounding guy asked.

"Depends." It sounded like the gruff man was in charge. "We'll get to the rendezvous, confirm they really failed, then radio in for new directions."

"I still don't see why we're going for North Pyongan," Seoko-ri said. "South Pyongan is most of ours."

South Pyongan winced. Really? Most of them? Come on!

She could feel Korea side-eyeing her, and hunched her shoulders.

"I'd rather be saving her."

"Orders say the Northern one is easier to trap," one of the others told him. "So long as the unit can separate them, it's a done deal."

The landlord's son snorted. "Yes, well, clearly not."

Despite her... complicated feelings, South Pyongan felt a little glow of pride on her brother's behalf.

"And get it through your skull," the gruff man said. "South Pyongan is a Communist like the rest of them. She will be until she gets all their teachings undone."

That'd be nice. She got the feeling they weren't talking about helping her achieve her goal of never thinking about anything, though. Probably more like making her read and write 'I WILL KILL BABIES' a thousand times or something, until she went outside and drop-kicked the first two-year old she saw into the sun.

"I'm telling you she's not," Seoko-ri insisted. "I've seen her speak a few times, and she's nothing like them."

South Pyongan shifted uncomfortably, determinedly not looking at Korea. Usually she'd like hearing that she was nothing like him or the more serious Party members, but… not when it came from traitors.

The guy didn't say it outright, but she knew a big part of why he thought that was probably because of her absence before the war.

General, she'd been so stupid. How many of these bastards could she have caught if she'd just been around? Could she have caught Jo Man-sik?

She really did get why Korea had been harsh on her after Liberation now, and why she wasn't allowed to have the same control over her bodyguards the others did. And it wasn't because most of these reactionaries came from her. She wished she could still just write it off as him being unreasonable like that. But she knew it wasn't about her province having more farmland for landlords, or Pyongyang and Nampo being wealthy enough to churn out comprador capitalists, things she didn't have any control over.

'I need to know I can trust you,' he'd said. She knew what these bastards were saying wouldn't make him question her loyalty- he trusted her for that.

But she knew he still couldn't fully trust that she was responsible.

"She personally confiscated my father's friend's land," the landlord's son was saying scathingly. "I'd say she's just like them."

Taking shit from landlords was the one part of running her province she'd never neglected.

It didn't feel like it made up for it.

"I bet she has to," Seoko-ri muttered. "Korea would kill her if she didn't go along with them."

Next to her, Korea tipped his head in acknowledgement. South Pyongan shoulder-checked him, shoving her thoughts aside with her Countryhuman.

There was a thump, then the gruff man growled, "The North. There is only one Korea."

'I wish,' South Pyongan mouthed, then snuck a glance at the Korea she meant. It was probably a good thing she couldn't speak out loud right now.

He started to signal her back so they could coordinate their attack, then froze.

There was a moaning sound coming from the camp, in a softer voice than the others.

South Pyongan's teeth clenched. Ssi-bal. She'd lost the bet about them all being men.

She hoped it was some stupid reactionary bitch, but those were kicked aside as a bleary voice murmured, “I’m c-cold.”

“Did you have to lose her jacket?” Seoko-ri complained to someone.

“I was thinking about other things,” a man replied idly.

“P-Please,” the woman said, her teeth chattering. “P-Please just let me g-g-o home. I promise I w-won’t tell anyone I saw you.”

“You’ll be able to go home soon,” Seoko-ri soothed her, and he sounded way too nice for what South Pyongan was sure was going on. “We just have to get far enough away, then we’ll set you free, alright?”

“I’m-m c-c-cold,” she repeated, choked by tears.

Footsteps moved across the camp. “I can warm you up again, if you’re desperate.”

“N-No!” Life filled the woman’s voice again. “No, please, I’m sorry, I won’t complain-“

“I’m sure you won’t. Your mouth will be busy doing other things.”

“Hey, man, leave her alone,” Seoko-ri protested. “Earlier was enough, right?”

South Pyongan made a face. And there it was- why they hadn’t made as much ground as they should’ve.

At least their dicks were going to get them killed.

"You’re just gonna make her want to turn us in more.”

“Then she’ll already want to,” the man replied. “If I’m gonna have to spend the next week being hunted by commies, I’m making sure it’s worth the trouble. Or you could just let me off her.”

“No!” the woman burst out. “No, please!”

“No one’s killing you,” the gruff unit leader grunted. “We’re not the Reds. We're fighting 'em for folks like you."

"Right," Seoko-ri confirmed. "So just leave her alone."

"I'm just making sure she doesn't freeze," the lecherous bastard mocked. "Unless you want to give her your coat?"

The frigid night air of the mountains pressed in on them, sharp and merciless as the tearing fangs of wolves.

"That's what I thought. C'mon, let's get you out of those ropes and go warm you up."

South Pyongan tensed as the woman shrieked, there was a short scuffing sound, then Seoko-ri snapped, "Don't hit her! Christ, she's just a woman."

In a quieter voice, he said, "You'll be okay. Just don't be too loud, alright?"

His answer was a choked sob.

"You had better bring her back," he said to the man. "I mean it, Yung-sun."

"Yeah, yeah," the man muttered. "Anyone else want a turn?"

"I'll go," another said, and the soft sound of muffled cries filtered through the trees as he and the other man, the one with the little sister he hadn't seen in years, dragged the woman off.

Korea was like a statue beside her, and South Pyongan jerked to look at him, eyes flaring.

He nodded grimly. 'Go.'

The province pointed at herself. 'Just me?'

Curling his lip, he jerked his chin aggressively in the direction the bastards were headed. 'Go!'

South Pyongan immediately slipped away, off into the trees, her heart pounding as she tried to move as fast as possible without giving herself away. She couldn't follow the wall of the ridge since it sounded like the men were right next to it.

"I don't like this," Seoko-ri muttered as she crept past. She could see his shadow through the trees, dark on dark.

"Neither do I," the unit leader said, and a match scratched before an ember flickered to life. "But he's a man with urges. And he's already a bastard. You really want to deal with him while he's all pent-up?"

Seoko-ri didn't answer.

South Pyongan moved faster, making it past the camp, picking up her pace slightly as she followed the trail in the snow. It was brushed down in a wide swath, and she pictured the men holding the woman between them, her skirts dragging as she stumbled along.

Ohhhh yeah. Killing them was gonna feel good.

More light streamed through the trees as the scrub forest thinned. Far enough away now, South Pyongan broke into a jog as she heard a struggle, the woman's cries growing louder. Hoping she wasn't about to see something fucked, she tore around the trunks, seeing shadowy figures up ahead.

Her thoughts raced. Did Korea expect her to do this silently? Or burst in guns blazing while he used the distraction to do the same at the camp?

South Pyongan followed her instincts, not slowing. One of the figures half-turned as he heard her footfalls, but was too late. Her fist caught him in the side of the temple, sending his eyes rolling back in his head as his body hit the ground, landing on the woman.

She screamed, and the second guy tried to shout. But South Pyongan had already body-slammed him into the frozen earth, knocking all the breath from his lungs with a 'whoosh!' She didn't waste a second before her knife was plunging into his throat, hot blood soaking her hands.

And she was right- it felt great.

She'd meant what she said to her brother months ago- it wasn't really the killing she liked. It was having a problem (guy that deserved to die) and being able to fix it right away (kill him). Instead of having to fill out forms and crunch numbers and debate things for days, all it took was a little bit of force, and she had saved one of their people directly.

She got that passing laws saved even more- the Law on Gender Equality that let that reactionary's mother divorce her bitch husband, the Labour Law that stopped workers from having to work for half the day or longer in coal-choked mining tunnels, the Agrarian Reform giving peasants the land they deserved.

But there was so much waiting, and it didn't feel like she was the one doing it. This was hers, the knife in her hand and the blood on the snow. This was her protecting her people the only way she knew how.

She jammed her blade into the throat of the man she'd knocked out, wrenching it sideways as the woman screamed again.

South Pyongan pounced on her, clamping a blood-soaked glove over her mouth as she listened intently, then relaxed.

No sound of alarm from towards the camp. They probably expected to hear this chick screaming.

'Perverted bastards.'

"I'm not going to hurt you," South Pyongan whispered to the woman under her. "But if you've lost it, I'm going to have to knock you out. So when I get up, stay quiet. Got it?"

The young woman nodded, the sheen of her eyes just visible under the canopy.

Slowly, South Pyongan got off, lifting her hand from her face, ready to muffle her again.

She just sat up, touching a hand to her cheek and looking numbly at the blood on her fingers.

South Pyongan winced. 'Whoops.' Thanks to her glove, it kind of looked like she'd decided to snack on one of the men's necks.

The woman lifted her eyes to her, voice shaking. "Who are-?" Her blink was hidden by the shadows. "South Pyongan-do?"

"Just Comrade South Pyongan." The province leaned over to body closest to her, stripping its jacket.

She wasn't a Communist, but 'comrade' had always been better than the stuffy 'do.' Or 'miss.'

She shuddered as she tossed the man's upper layers at the woman. "Put those on. And the pants, just give me a second."

She was dressed in winter skirts, but only had a long-sleeved blouse above them, and her shoes were the simple fleece-lined winter ones distributed to refugees. Warm, but not so good for long hikes in the mountains.

South Pyongan guessed she'd been out looking for firewood or headed home after foraging. The bastards had probably ran into her, and taken her with them so she 'couldn't give away their location.'

Whatever. It was clear what these dog's sons really wanted.

Startling the woman, South Pyongan smashed her fist into the dead man's face, satisfied by the spurt of blood that was still able to come from his nose.

She helped the chick dress in the drab pants, working them on under her skirt, but left the soldier's boots. They'd be too big, and couldn't be used once she got home.

South Pyongan squinted at one, holding the heel in her hand. It actually looked the same as the woman's, just with a size difference. It wasn't a Yank shoe, or one of the crappy ones Rhee's guerrillas got (if they got them at all).

She knew the bastards had been looting. They must have stolen their winter boots from peasants in the hills.

Dropping it on the corpse's face, she jumped up, helping the woman to her shaking legs.

"How many are there?" she demanded, then backtracked. "I mean, you're good, right?"

The woman nodded, still trembling in her new clothes.

The province brushed at a splotch of blood on her shoulder. "Yeah, you look good."

There. Let it be known South Pyongan wasn't entirely insensitive.

"So how many are there?"

"I d-don't know," the woman stuttered past her chattering teeth. "I thin-n-nk maybe… Eight-teen?"

Bigger number than she'd thought. South Pyongan raised her head, sharp eyes scanning the trees around them.

"A f-few of them left to sc-c-cout ahead," the chick said, wrapping her arms around herself. "B-But I don't know how m-many. I was-They were-"

"You're good now," South Pyongan interrupted before she could start sobbing. "South Pyongan province is here, so now all these guys are going to die. Just hang tight… not here."

It looked like this cliff stretched to the right until it ended in a steep slope that was part of the ridge above. If the sentry got changed out or those recon guys came back, they'd come right through here.

So South Pyongan scooped the woman up in her arms, and took off, running lightly out of the trees, keeping low as she skirted across the open rock face, tense as she waited for an alarm.

But she made it down the slope and back into the forest below before the cuckoo calls came again, more distant here.

She found a rock formation, and set her passenger down on one of the shattered boulders scattered at its base. The trees growing around it were thick, and the moon barely pierced through them.

As the dazed-looking woman instinctively curled into a ball, her province nodded in satisfaction. “Stay here. If you hear anyone coming, crawl into the rocks and stay quiet. Bite your arm if you have to. We’ll come get you when it’s safe.”

“You brought soldiers?” the woman asked hopefully.

“Nah, just me and Korea.”

“Comrade Korea’s here?” Her face fell. “B-But there’s so many of them…”

Clearly she hadn’t heard the enemy’s broadcasts about Seoul. Or South Pyongan’s more awesome exploits during the Occupation.

She snorted. “Eighteen isn’t a lot. Trust me, we’ve got this. Just don’t go running away. You might lose your feet.”

Without another word, she took off again, leaving the chick huddling on the rock.

She had to hurry. It wasn’t smart to leave Korea alone with an enemy for too long. He might decide to have fun without her.

As she clambered up the slope again, springing up to the top, a chorus of cries split the silence of the night, and her heart started to pound in indignation as she broke into a run, sprinting back for the camp.

‘Oh that bastard-‘

“Got him!”

South Pyongan screeched to a halt, freezing. The scream had been filled with such pure triumph that ‘him’ could only be one person.

She waited for the terror that should come after the traitor realized he was wrong, and Korea eviscerated him, but there were only crows of triumph and a shout of, “Grab the rope!”

‘Ssi-bal.’

South Pyongan fought the urge to charge in blasting. She couldn’t risk Korea getting caught in the crossfire. Switching back to stealth, she prowled towards the clearing, seeing shadows flicker through the trees.

“What’s going on down there?” the sentry called in alarm from above, and one of the men shouted back, giddy with nauseating delight, “We caught Korea! We fucking caught Korea!”

‘Really, Korea?’* The guy was as slippery as her, but the one time he got captured was when they were out here in the middle of nowhere, alone?

“You’re shitting me,” the sentry echoed her own thoughts.

“Dead fucking serious!”

“I want to see.”

“No,” the unit leader said sharply. “Stay in position. If he’s here, more rats might be.”

Great sentiment. Unfortunately her and Korea were insane, so there was no back-up.

The only other rat for ri around got down on her hands and knees, slinking as close to the camp as possible. The reactionaries had lit a lantern, like they needed a better look at what they'd caught to believe it. Through the spindly clumps of dead undergrowth, she could just see them clustered around something.

And of course that something was Korea.

He was on his knees with his hands behind his back, definitely bound, as he glared defiantly up at them. South Pyongan was surprised he wasn’t throwing himself at the nearest traitor, even with his handicap, until she realized they'd wrapped a rope around his torso, too, binding his arms to his body.

That wasn't good. If Korea hated being pinned, he despised being tied up. She'd definitely picked that up in their escaping handcuffs/other bondage classes. She'd never seen a guy dislocate his own wrist with such immediate brutality, even her.

"Get a rope around his legs, too," the unit leader ordered.

"That's a little much, don't ya think?" one someone asked, leaning on their rifle.

"Did you hear what he did in Seoul?" It was the Mun guy, and he sounded scared. Which he should. "Over four hundred people offed, just him and some other commie."

"Enemy broadcasts exaggerated the toll," Korea said. He sounded cold, but South Pyongan could hear the tension under his voice, and see how deliberately slow his chest was rising and falling under the restraints. "It was only over two hundred."

An uneasy silence fell over the camp. It was still an insane number for two people.

General, it should've been South Pyongan with him, not the pretty boy.

"And it would have been more." Korea tilted his chin, managing to look like he was sitting behind a desk instead of on his knees in the dirt. "But I accepted surrenders. And I will accept yours now."

The traitors looked at each other, stunned by his audacity.

"If you lay down your arms and confess your crimes, I will make sure none of you are executed for them," Korea said flatly, still with that arrogant set to his shoulders. "You can see your families again."

He singled out the man whose mother had said she never wanted to see him again, and the traitor shrank bank.

The Countryhuman lifted his chin further, strafing them all with an icy glare.

"If you don't, you die screaming."

South Pyongan felt a shiver run down her spine (because it was cold), and not for the first time in her life was really glad she was too amazing to be a Jap collaborator or a fake Nationalist. Her pride would've never let her surrender to Korea when he gave her the option. And as amazing as she was at fighting…

She had a feeling she would die screaming.

Well, she liked to think she'd go out with dignity, have some really cool last words that would haunt him forever. 'You couldn't even save your own province.' That would definitely screw him up.

The unit leader recovered first, snorting. "You still think you're in control? That's a Red for ya."

He flicked his cigarette into the snow, stalking towards Korea.

"This war isn't over," he growled. "But it will be soon. It doesn't matter how badly the Yanks want to make peace- the Republic of Korea will never bow to you."

Korea snorted derisively. "You think the Americans want to make peace? They want this war to continue, they want Korea to be torn apart. They couldn't conquer us, so now they want to destroy us. And you are helping them do it."

"I'm working with them to free our country from you."

Korea's lip curled in disdain. "You're working for them. You're being a good little colonial slave, just like the collaborators that sold us out to Japan. Just like-"

South Pyongan watched his face go blank, then fury shattered his icy expression as he bared his teeth at the men.

"None of you are Korean. And you're all going to die stateless."

‘SMACK.’

Korea went reeling back as the man’s fist connected with his jaw, and South Pyongan’s nails dug into the earth as rage surged through her.

Hell no. She was the only one allowed to hit her country in the face.

The traitor’s stern expression wavered as he looked at his hand, shaken, like he couldn’t believe he’d just hit his Countryhuman.

Korea didn’t stay down, surging back up onto his knees. As his tongue swiped blood from his split lip, he glared up at the man with a light in his eye that meant South Pyongan was going to get to see a human turn into a cloud of red mist.

Well now she really wanted to untie him.

“Bind his legs,” the unit leader ordered again, backing away from Korea.

South Pyongan had been scoping out the camp the entire time. There were two more guys than they'd thought, so ten traitors here, plus the one up top, and the sentry at the foot of the cliff who wouldn’t be an issue for a few minutes. She didn’t see Korea’s weapons anywhere, but she knew all she had to do was get the ropes off him and it wouldn’t matter. But it’d be easier if his legs weren’t bound, so she had to move fast.

She knew she could take down twelve guys easily. She was a little less sure she could do it without Korea getting shot.

‘Oh well,’ she thought, and Korea probably felt the hairs on his arms stand up. ‘Take the initiative.’

The spray of submachine gun fire hit those standing farthest from Korea, and the traitors burst into cries, scattering or hitting the ground, dead or alive. The lantern burst in an explosion of glass, plunging the camp back into darkness.

Immediately fire was returned, and South Pyongan rolled behind the cover of a tree, shards of frozen earth raining on her as she pushed herself up, back against the trunk.

"Ambush!" the unit leader bellowed. "Pak, covering fire! We die before we lose the North!"

Bullets penetrated the canopy as the sentry fired from above, wood chips showering the province.

She couldn't let herself get pinned down. If these bastards got desperate they might execute Korea. It wouldn't kill him, but-

Another shiver ran down her spine. The war effort needed him.

"Ssi-bal!" someone cried. "Get him off me!"

South Pyongan took the chance to burst from cover, throwing herself into the camp, barreling straight at a man reloading his submachine gun.

His eyes widened as he saw her coming, jamming the magazine in and trying to get the barrel up. She went right by it, throwing an elbow into his throat before heaving him aside into another shooter.

She whirled, catching the gun barrel swinging for her skull and wrenching it from the traitor's hands, plunging her dagger into his neck. His eyes widened as he clutched at it, trying to stop the fountain of blood that sprayed into the air.

"It's South Pyongan!" one of the men screamed, and she grinned as she threw herself at him, sticking the blade into his eye, forcing it in as bones ground and snapped.

"Shoot to disable, but kill if ya have to!" the unit leader shouted. "And get the North out of here!"

South Pyongan caught a glimpse of Korea on the ground, squeezing a man's neck between his thighs, then had to spin to dodge two losers charging at her, slamming backwards into a fucking brick wall of a guy.

He tried to wrap his arms around her waist, but she dropped to the ground, balancing on her palms as she swept her legs out, swiping his from under him, before leaping gracefully up and coming down with both feet on his face, producing the world's most satisfying 'crunch.'

The man screamed as she bounded off, landing lightly to face the next attack.

Four men were out of the count, the sentry couldn't shoot while she was so close to his pals, two were hustling Korea off under the trees, and the other five were coming straight for her.

South Pyongan caught Korea's eye as he was dragged away. He wasn't struggling as hard as he could, which was good for what she'd intended, but was surprising enough to almost give her pause.

Almost. When the first bastard hit her, she was ready.

She checked his shoulder, and spun him around, sending him sideways, unable to finish him off as the others tackled her.

'There we go.' Seriously, sometimes men would come at her one at a time, even on the battlefield. She didn't know if it was some sort of subconscious pride thing, like they didn't want it to take more than one to take a woman down, or if a lot of soldiers just happened to be youngest children.

She went down under their weight, slamming into the hard ground, and her excitement rose.

Unlike Korea, she loved being pinned. She loved the rush of taking on more than one enemy at once, fighting wild as she dug her nails into eye sockets and broke whatever bone she was presented with, the total comeback when it looked like she was done for.

They brawled across the camp, slamming into tree trunks and the ridge, a roiling mass of limbs and blood. South Pyongan got her knife up through a guy's ribcage, and he relied back, taking her blade with him.

Didn't matter. She had her fists.

She got a man on his back and seized his arm, bending it back then wrenching it forward, brutally dislocating it. He screamed and someone piledrivered her, slamming her into him. Crushed between the men, she threw herself sideways, jerking her head up and catching the bastard on top of her in the chin. She rolled over, but before she could get up, someone else seized her throat with a callused hand, sinking his fingers into her carotid artery.

South Pyongan gagged as her air was cut off all at once. She shot her leg up, striking the guy in the groin, but he must've had balls of steel because he tanked it with a grunt and added another hand.

She was not going to do something lame like try to pry his fingers off, so she went for his own throat instead, striking her fists into his neck over and over. He made a gross sound as his hands released.

Oxygen rushed back in, but before she could get up, hands were seizing her limbs and forcing her onto her stomach as the four other men all jumped on her at once, piling their hundreds of pounds of weight onto her back.

The one whose face she'd destroyed was back, and he screamed, "Rope!" voice gargled from the blood sheeting from his shattered nose and cheeks. "Get the fucking rope!"

"I've got it!" Footsteps pounded towards them as someone- the sentry from below- slid into the clearing.

South Pyongan thrashed and writhed, but more weight bore down on her as the man she'd throat-punched joined the dog pile, grabbing her skull in his hand and slamming it over and over into the hard-packed dirt.

Her brain rattled in its casing as her vision swam, her head dropping to the ground when he released her. She still had the strength to move her body, but the hands gripping her wouldn't let her, forcing her legs together to try and tie them.

'Ssi-bal.' She didn't like getting pinned if it meant she was going to lose.

The first fight she'd ever lost flickered through her throbbing head, the way it throbbed back then as the beefy factory worker had cracked her skull off the floor of the warehouse, holding her down in front of all the other men, and her brother. The shame that flooded her as they'd jeered, and how they hadn't even been excited by her loss because she was just a girl and they expected her to lose.

North Pyongan's eyes had been wide with worry, and even though he'd just fussed over her after, South Pyongan knew she had let him down. She hadn't won the prize money. They wouldn't eat that night. She was too

'Weak.'

Her glazed eyes strayed towards the darkness under the trees as her arms were bent behind her back. Through the ringing in her head, she could hear yelling, like it was coming from underwater.

Korea.

All of a sudden her clarity came rocketing back.

He'd brought her out here alone because he thought she could do this with him, because even if she couldn't protect her brother, even if she never learned how to be a politician, she did know how to be a soldier.

When she'd lost that first fight, she'd came back three days later with her concussion still pounding in her temples and she'd put that bastard through the floor, followed by all the spectators that said it was a fluke. She'd won the prize money and everything in their pockets when they tried to put her in her place after. But South Pyongan knew her place.

'On top.'

Her strength came flooding back, and she threw her head back and roared, arching her back and thrashing side to side with all the violence and flexibility of an eel.

The man on her back went sprawling, and she freed an arm from another's grip, twisting her body so hard she gave herself whiplash, but regaining her arms and legs.

She might not win every fight against Korea, but he was the only one that was allowed to beat her. And no matter how many times he did, she'd keep trying until she won again.

Grinning ferally, South Pyongan sprung to her feet, yanking her blade from the man she'd left it in, heart's blood geysering out.

She was only weak if she gave up.

The men went scrambling back, one reaching for his submachine gun. She bowled him over, seizing it, since hers had been torn from her while she fought. Without hesitation she opened fire, peppering his chest with bullets and catching one of the ones behind her in the chest, sending him jittering to the ground. The others dove behind the cover of the trees.

South Pyongan grinned, readying her gun, and-

Whirled and ran off into the woods.

Her instincts said to finish them off, to make them pay for making her doubt herself even for a moment, to make sure they didn't think she was running scared.

But Korea was getting taken. And he was expecting her to come after him, and to save that woman. She couldn't let either of them down.

This wasn't about enjoying killing or revenge. It was about saving their country.

She followed the sounds of snarling and cursing, fleet-footed as she wove around tree trunks and over rocks, dodging the storm of bullets behind her.

Korea was being enough of a nuisance that the men stealing him had only managed to reach the slope. South Pyongan charged them, undeterred by the crack of the rifle and the bullet that whined by her head.

One man was hauling Korea towards the slope while the other tried to cover him, his eyes wide and frightened in the moonlight, reminding her that these weren't real soldiers, just traitorous idiots that'd been handed guns and a crash course on how to kill.

South Pyongan had used to be like them (not the traitor part). She'd been a killer to the Japs and a fighter to everyone else, just looking for the rush of victory and the prize money that came with it.

Korea had changed that. He had taught her how to be more than just a fighter, to be a soldier. Soldiers had causes. And he had given her hers.

And part of it was obliterating this idiot.

South Pyongan flew at him, weaving to dodge his shots as he held his ground, lowering his bayonet so she'd impale herself on it.

At the last second she canted forward, stretching out her arms. She winced as her burnt palms met the ground and her stolen gun swung against her chest. Her back bent as the world spun around her again, this time as she went upside-down in the air. When her boots hit the ground again, she used the momentum of her front handspring to leap up and over the thrust of the traitor's bayonet.

His mouth fell open as she vaulted over him, her spine curving as she soared through the air like a spear, landing behind him, pirouetting gracefully to grab his head between her hands. Before he could even turn, she cracked it to the side, breaking his neck, and he dropped like a sack of potatoes.

She could not believe that had worked. But she wasn't done yet.

She turned just in time to see Korea smash his head into the skull of the man holding him, sending him staggering back.

'That's got to hurt.' Hers still ached from earlier. Screw the reactionaries- Korea's skull really did have reinforced steel in it.

The traitor stumbled back, raising his gun, but tripped on the steep slope. He yelped as he went over, shouting as he tumbled all the way down until it abruptly cut off.

South Pyongan didn't waste time admiring the spectacle as she darted for Korea, already working on the rope that bound his wrists before the loser even stopped screaming.

"You had to show off, didn't you?" her Countryhuman griped.

South Pyongan smirked. "C'mon, even you have to admit that was super cool."

"If the idiot holding me hadn't been stunned, he could have shot you in the middle of that flip."

"Yeah, but he was too shocked by my beauty and grace. That's part of the strategy."

The rope fell away, and she started on the one that wrapped around his torso, frantically sawing at the fibers as the calls of the rest of the men came closer.

Korea aggressively thrust out his arms, tearing through the last strands, and lunged for the rifle of the man with the broken neck.

The four men left from the camp burst from the trees, and Korea's shot took one right between the eyes.

There was a brief pause as those left realized Korea was unbound, and their faces paled as white as their foreign masters'.

Then, "Scatter!" one screamed, and two went flying in opposite directions, one up the ridge and the other back into the trees.

"Don't scatter you idiots!" the third- the unit commander- hollered, but it was too late.

Korea streaked across the open ground like a tiger on a deer, ignoring the bullets sent by the sentry above. The unit leader stood his ground, his submachine gun sputtering. South Pyongan thought one of the rounds might have hit her country, but he kept going, colliding with the man and knocking him back into the forest, dragging him kicking and screaming into the dark.

His province followed, arriving just in time to hear the last wet splattering sound and the gurgle as the traitor died. His face was an unrecognizable mass of torn flesh and white bone.

Yeah, she could've told him that would happen. Korea really didn't like being tied up.

Her Countryhuman stood, grabbing her arm and hauling her towards the cliffside, out of the line of fire of the shooter up top.

"Injured?" he demanded, eye flicking over her. Blood dripped down his cheeks, soaking the front of his tunic.

"I'm good," she said, spotting the hole in his own arm. "Need my PPS, though."

Korea nodded, covering their movements as they prowled back to the camp and his province grabbed her weapon.

Yeah, the traitors were using stolen Soviet loot, too. But the Yanks hadn't been giving out the good stuff. And South Pyongan loved her PPS-43.

Korea disappeared into the dark where they'd been hiding, and re-emerged with his firearms, strapping that shiny tiger knife of his (that South Pyongan totally wasn't jealous of) to his hip.

'Wait a second.' She narrowed her eyes.

"Well done," he said, nodding to the bodies. "You got the civilian to safety?"

It was weird. But she had more exciting things to think about.

She nodded. "She says there's a unit on recon. Maybe four more."

Korea nodded, unfazed. She actually thought she saw a spark light up in his eye.

"Ready?"

His province grinned, brandishing her submachine pistol. "Formed

ready."

Korea inhaled, then shouted, "REACTIONARY SOLDIERS. YOUR UNIT HAS FAILED. BUT NO ONE ELSE HAS TO DIE TODAY. SURRENDER AND YOUR COUNTRY WILL SPARE YOU."

His voice echoed over the mountains, crashing off the rocks. In response, gunfire sprayed blindly into the forest from above.

South Pyongan was a little pissed. She knew Korea had to try to be above vengeance, but she also knew what he'd told her at the Raktong.

"You heard what they were going to do to that chick," she hissed. "Why would you let them surrender after that?"

Korea looked at her, moonlight glinting off his eye the same way it glinted off the barrel of his gun. "Because I know they won't.

"Now come on." He gestured towards the dead end ledge, where the one traitor had fled towards, cornering himself.

Her country had a look on his face that she hadn't seen since the Occupation, back when they'd chase kempei and their puppets over mountain peaks, when the outcome of a battle or fate of the war didn't depend on them winning- just the lives of their enemies. With the dark anticipation in his voice, it made South Pyongan's pulse kick up.

"Let's go hunting."

Explaining the chapter title not out of mercy, but out of respect for North Korean storytellers. The story of Haenim and Dalnim is about a brother and sister whose mother is eaten by a tiger, then the tiger comes to eat them (there's a lot of versions, but this is a basic one). The children pray to the sky and a rope comes down to save them, lifting them up to become the sun and moon. The tiger also dies in most versions. But in the North Korean version, their mother is sick, and there's a man bringing her medicine. To comfort them, she tells them to make a wish to the sky, and it will come true. They wish for her to get better, and tell the guy they don't need medicine anymore. But the mother is still sick, so she pretends to be healthy and goes to gather medicine herself. While she's foraging, a tiger attacks her, and she falls off a cliff. He goes to the home to eat the children, who end up trapped in a tree. They make a wish to the sky to be saved, a rope comes down, and they get lifted to safety. The tiger also gets a rope, but his drops him in the well. But the ropes didn't come from heaven- it was the guy who was helping their mother, standing on the cliff over their home. Then he, ah, tells the kids they should have used the axe to kill the tiger because the more afraid you are, the more you should fight. Which is a good moral, but probably couldn't have been taught that way back when tigers were an actual threat in Korea. Then again, I'd probably want my nine-year old to go out swinging. But the meaning is 'don't just look at the sky and do nothing, solve your own problems.' I really like that version because it's clearly the principle of self-reliance.

Things my cat will eat: anko (LOVES it)
Kkwabaegi with cinnamon and sugar on it
The non-chocolate part of chocolate chip cookies
Cream roll

Things my cat will not eat: meat of any kind

I think I have raised him wrong.

Once A Soldier

The traitors never stood a chance.

The first guy went down when they flushed him from his hiding spot in the trees, driving him towards the dead end cliff. He took one look at South Pyongan and Korea, then threw himself from the twenty-metre drop, his leg breaking with a snap they could hear.

South Pyongan swept an arm in offer, but her Countryhuman graciously declined with a tip of his chin, spraying covering fire at the men atop the ridge and leaving the honour of the killing blow to her.

She trotted to the edge of the cliff, sighting down her rifle at the wounded man dragging himself away, and yelled, “Hey, loser!”

He looked up in terror, then never looked at anything again.

She and her Countryhuman fought their way up the ridge, taking turns covering each other as they sprinted up the open slope, launching themselves directly at the sentry on top, dividing his attention. He swung his submachine gun at Korea, and South Pyongan took him in the side with her PPS.

No sooner had he fallen than gunfire came from the other side of the ridge, forcing the two to hit the ground.

“The recon unit is back,” Korea noted as he slapped a new magazine into his Type 49.

“Good,” South Pyongan said, smirking. “I was worried we’d run out.”

He chuffed, then they burst up, charging down the slope in wordless agreement, even though it would’ve been safer to keep the high ground.

South Pyongan leapt nimbly over obstacles, jumping boulders and depressions, not even feeling her burns anymore past the invigorating rush of adrenaline and night air. The bullets whizzing by her meant as much as mosquitos.

She threw her head back and howled like a wolf with wild elation, the way the provinces had done to terrorize Japan and his puppets as they hunted them over Paektusan.

She tossed a grin at Korea as they barrelled down the ridge, but he only yelled, “No!”

“Spoilsport!”

The men scattered as they hit them, like marbles getting vomited from the triangle in a game of tohaki, disappearing into the rocks around them.

South Pyongan and her Countryhuman pursued.

It looked like the recon unit had actually been nine people, plus the one soldier left from the first batch, something that only made the province even more excited.

They hunted them over ridges and gullies, stalking through trees and across streams, eliminating them one by one, using hand-to-hand whenever possible. South Pyongan leapt down from a tree, breaking a man’s neck on impact. Korea shot one through the leg, then closed the distance to tackle him, shoving his head back into the icy creek and holding him there until he stopped struggling. And when the others attempted to regroup and overwhelm them, they met them gladly, forcing them into melee.

South Pyongan slammed a man back into Korea, and his long silver knife burst from his chest, blood glistening in the moonlight as it slid up. She didn’t stop to admire it, whirling to catch the blade coming for her, snapping the bastard’s wrist before charging the one trying to use his gun, leaving Korea to slit her opponent’s throat as she threw her own knife with deadly accuracy, right into her new target’s heart. His gun clattered to the ground as he gasped and twitched, and she pounced on his chest, wresting her blade free and plunging it into his neck, hot blood spilling over frozen stone.

The others fled, and she watched Korea let himself be shoved off the man he was grappling with, letting him go. There wasn't any risk to it. There wouldn't be any peasants so high in the mountains on a winter's night.

And no matter how many chances they had, none of the traitors would be escaping.

It was freeing to fight this way, to not have to worry about her cousins or keep an eye on her brother or watch out for other soldiers. There was just enemies, her, and Korea. And she knew he could take care of himself.

This was it- the crisp winter air that filled her bloodstream with adrenaline, the feeling of her blade piercing through flesh and her knuckles cracking against bone, and the smooth motion of every muscle in her body working together to make her a deadly weapon.

South Pyongan had always lived for fighting. But it wasn't until after she'd killed that farmer that she realized why. It had chafed at her in that prison, the feeling of his skull shattering under the rock in her hands. It had stayed with her in a way none of her fights or the Japs she'd offed had- the first Korean she had killed.

She'd been worried that somehow it had killed her passion for violence, no matter how much she told herself he was a traitor. That when Japan came for them, she'd find herself like her brother- unable to lift a finger to defend either of them.

But Korea had swept those doubts away. Him and his cause had made her understand why she liked fighting, why killing kempei and real traitors felt so different than killing Guk Gun. It wasn't the violence- it was being able to protect. Herself, her brother, her cousins, their people. And having that cause, an entire country to Liberate and defend, had taught her not just to live for fighting, but to love it.

And Korea had never judged her for it. He'd never tried to tell her it wasn't something women should love or acted like it was wrong, or thought it was a sin. He'd treated it like just another weapon in their arsenal, one of the best, until after Liberation.

And she knew now that that wasn't the part of her he'd taken issue with.

Blood sprayed across her face as that tiger-hilted knife went flying past her head, embedding itself in the throat of the man she'd been about to uppercut. South Pyongan yanked it out as she spun, heaving it with deadly accuracy into the skull of the man charging Korea, stealing his kill like he'd stolen hers.

He bared his fangs at her, eye alight, and she beamed back before they whirled apart and away from the gunfire sent at them.

One day it wouldn't be like this. One day every enemy, every traitor and bastard that hurt their people would have to be charged, tried, dealt with by a court. And plenty of them would never die for their crimes. They'd have to let them live, even if it was in prison, because it was what their people wanted, or what they needed to want.

Like Korea had said at the Raktong- they would have to follow the Party line, to re-educate, to forgive. Even if it didn't feel like they were protecting their people the way they wanted.

It wasn't the killing South Pyongan liked. But she knew when the world was more like the one her brother wanted, and they could lay down their guns, she would miss it.

For now, at least, she knew how to protect her country.

South Pyongan prowled along a ravine, hunting for the traitor she'd heard come this way, but was met with only a dead end, a small frozen waterfall clinging to the rock.

'Blegh.'

"Turn around slowly."

The voice made her smirk. "Or what?"

"Or you know damn well what."

The province turned to see one of the men standing farther along the ravine. It looked like he only had a knife and his pistol on him. He was holding this in a shaking hand, the other hanging limply, blood soaking his jacket from shoulder to elbow. A wild light gleamed in his eyes as chest heaved with ragged gasps.

"Weapons down," he panted. "N-"

He didn't have time to say anything else. Korea hit him like shrapnel, exploding down the ravine and right into his back, seizing his gun arm and wrenching it back so his shot went into the sky. With one hand he slammed the man's face into the rock, while the other forced his arm towards him until the joint ripped free from his shoulder with a tearing sound. The traitor screamed as he dropped the gun, and Korea smashed his face off the stone until he stopped.

He dropped him on the ground, then curb-stomped his head, splattering it on the snow like a melon.

Korea looked up, barely winded, his eye flicking over her. "Uninjured?"

South Pyongan raised an eyebrow. "Uh, yeah. Dude got like, two sentences out. Don't think he had time for a bullet."

Her Countryhuman nodded curtly, tension easing. "I eliminated my target. There should only be one left."

"Think he's smart enough to cut his losses?"

"Doubtful." Korea picked up the dropped pistol. "The camp had a radio. I bet he's doubled back to try and make contact with the Yanks."

South Pyongan spun her pistol around her finger. "Let's go show him Daddy Yankee can't save him now. And by the way- you totally stole my kill. Again."

"Be faster next time. And stop keeping score."

"You just don't want me to win," she teased, and he shoulder-checked her into the wall.

They made their way back up and over the ridge, listening for any sign of the final traitor.

As they neared the camp, South Pyongan heard a faint, “C’mon, c’mon.”

She grinned sharply at Korea. He narrowed his eye with as close to mischief as he got.

The man was crouched over the radio, frantically fiddling with dials. After a second, he groaned in frustration and went to lift the entire thing.

“Heyyy.” South Pyongan’s tone was easy, but she was ready to dodge as the traitor spun around with his rifle.

But he didn’t shoot. He immediately dropped it, raising his hands.

“I surrender.”

South Pyongan paused, disappointed. “Really?”

“I…” He blinked. “Yes, really.”

She recognized his voice. It was Seoko-ri.

“Korea said he would spare us if we surrendered.” His voice wavered. “So I- I surrender.”

“You surrender now,” she said tightly, not lowering her gun. “After we’ve already killed everyone else. After you were actively trying to contact the Yanks again. You’re only surrendering because you know you’re fucked.”

“Yes,” he readily admitted, making her blood burn. “I don’t want to die.”

“Do you know what your little squad of traitors has done?” she hissed. “I’m sure you do, since you were just fine with letting those two dog’s sons rape that woman earlier.”

He flinched. "I didn’t want to-“

"Shut the fuck up," she growled, stepping forward. "She isn't the first chick you freaks have taken. I've been seeing all the reports about the random rapes and looting you've been doing. And the murders."

She might not read the news unless she had to, but reports were different. She needed to know what was being done to the people of her province so she could avenge it.

"Not me," he denied. "I never hurt a woman, I promise. And I only stole to survive."

"You stole from refugees."

Even at her lowest, South Pyongan had never stolen from someone that didn't look like they could afford it (unless they deserved it). She'd never know if that wasn't just her brother's influence, but she hoped it wasn't.

"And the only reason you have to 'survive' at all is because you're letting the Yanks treat you like a trained animal to sabotage our country," she accused, stalking forward until her pistol was pressed to his chest. "And I know there's no fucking way you were just sitting with your thumb up your ass while the rest of your squad murdered our militia members."

His eyes darted for his gun on the ground, but he didn't move for it.

"You are a traitor."

"I surrender." His voice wavered as he squeezed his eyes shut. "Please."

South Pyongan waited for Korea to emerge behind her and stay her hand. But the trees were silent.

She bared her teeth, grip tightening on her pistol so hard it was painful.

'CRACK!'

Seoko-ri slumped to the ground, his temple bloodied where the butt of her gun at struck. South Pyongan's frustration surged, and she kicked him in the ribs, then did it again.

"Bastard!" she hissed as Korea's footsteps finally padded towards her.

He looked dispassionately down at the man as his province breathed heavily.

South Pyongan glared at the traitor's unassuming, average face, then sucked in a breath.

When she spoke, she managed to sound casual. "He probably has information we can use."

Korea nodded.

She didn't know whether he had been testing her. She didn't know if she'd passed. His face gave nothing away.

"Tie him up," he ordered, then added, "Hogtie him. Tight."

But she did know he was still pissed about being tied up.

Which was why it was so weird he had been.

South Pyongan pursed her lips as she watched Korea walk over to the radio, crouching to examine it. But she was distracted from her suspicion by the machine crackling.

"-come in," a male voice said in English, heavily distorted by static. "You- not to contact- set date."

Korea fiddled with the dials, getting a slightly clearer signal, though the trees and mountains between them and Cho Island still made it choppy.

"Come in, unit."

Korea narrowed his eye in thought, but South Pyongan didn't have to think. She clapped her hands, rubbing her palms together vigorously as she pouted her bottom lip at him like Hae.

He rolled his eye, but sat back, allowing her to swoop in and pick up the transceiver. South Pyongan pounced on it, clearing her throat and readying her best English.

"I'm afraid your traitors are all dead," she said, smirking at the sudden silence on the other side. "Tell America he's next."

With that, she smashed the transceiver on the ground.

Korea *'tch'*ed in irritation as he switched off the radio. "Did you have to do that?"

"Did you want to take a turn insulting their mothers?"

He *'tch'*ed again, and South Pyongan grinned in realization.

"Wait. You want to give this to Pretty Boy, right? So he can use it for whatever he's working on."

"Don't call him that," Korea grumbled, packing the radio away into its case. "He's arrogant enough." He suddenly glared at her. "Were you snooping in my quarters?"

"Just in China's things," she assured him.

If only because Korea took his with him when he didn't sleep in the bunker.

South Pyongan tied Seoko-ri up, his arms and legs bent behind his back, maybe just a liiittle more uncomfortably than necessary. As she tightened the ropes, her eyes settled on his face.

Blood smeared his temple. The ground around them was soaked with more of it from the traitors that hadn't been as lucky, freezing into the rock and snow, glistening like spilled oil in the moonlight.

"Korea?"

"What?"

She shouldn’t bring it up. She should just let this wipe the slate. Let it go.

She sat back, not looking at him as she tried to keep her tone light and impersonal. “This was fun, and I'll never say 'no' to offing Yankee dogs."

She really didn't want to get into another awkward conversation with him. But his silence from earlier was becoming another canker in her mouth. If she didn't speak now, she might end up doing something even more embarrassing later.

"But I kind of said I was… stressed about not ever being able to be anything but a soldier, and you brought me out here to massacre a bunch of guys.”

Korea sighed, setting down the radio to look at her. “Because you are a damn good soldier, South Pyongan. Look at what you did.”

He jerked his chin to the bodies scattered around the clearing. “You eliminated most of the enemy combatants, freed me and our civilian, and did it all without a scratch on you. That is three people you protected. And more by getting rid of these bastards.

“You can’t save everyone,” he said, and South Pyongan realized she’d been twisting the flag around her arm again. “But you saved people today.”

If only she could have saved them then.

She wasn’t dragging her tank crew around. She was carrying them, and she would keep training that muscle until she could do it with ease.

She just wished she didn’t have to.

South Pyongan could feel Korea’s gaze burning into the back of her head as he said, “The only reason you couldn’t protect your brother is because you weren’t there.”

Her Countryhuman padded over, crouching on the other side of the hogtied man, his voice getting firmer. “And if you truly want to be responsible, then you are not going to be able to be there for him more often than not. Your provinces come first. Our people come first. Korea comes first."

South Pyongan lowered her gaze, murmuring, "There are more important things."

Korea nodded grimly. "Yes."

They were silent for a moment, the wind picking up, rustling the branches above. A thin skin of ice crept slowly across the puddles of blood.

"North Pyongan can take care of himself now," he said after a moment. "He doesn't need your protection. And that is good. You shouldn't have to need to protect him. You should only have to want to."

"I want to," she said, finally lifting her head, then dropping it again immediately. "And I want to protect our people, too. But…"

She gritted her teeth, forcing the words out. "I'm not sure I can if it's not with a gun in my hand."

"There are always going to be people like this." Korea nodded to the traitor between them. "Self-serving, cowardly, violent. And even if there weren't, there will always be countries like America trying to tear us down and make us slaves again. Korea is always going to need soldiers."

She still didn't look at him. "But that's not all you need us to be."

"No," he admitted. "I need you to be politicians. I need you to be able to champion our people, and guide them towards the future with me. And I know you are capable of that."

South Pyongan flicked her eyes to his.

His expression was serious. "You are aggressive, willing to skirt the law, and usually know how to get what you want."

Those… didn't really sound like compliments. Not when they came from him.

"And you attract people," Korea continued. "You know how to rub elbows. Those are all part of being a politician."

South Pyongan raised a brow. "Even the 'skirting the law' part?"

"We are bound to the same laws as our people," her Countryhuman said. "But our enemies aren't. And even after this war is over, we are still going to be fighting a class war. Without national interests to protect, our patriotic capitalists will turn to their class interests. Factionalists like Jo Man-sik will seek to disrupt us."

For once, it didn't sound like he was using the man's name as a 'gotcha.'

"And if we want to win, then we need at least a few comrades willing and able to fight dirty." Korea inclined his head at her. "And so long as you continue to curb your liberal tendencies, that can be you."

She was definitely willing to fight dirty.

"I can't trust that other comrades won't fall prey to the lure of money or power," he continued. "But I know you won't."

It was... kind of surprising to hear that. South Pyongan obviously never would, but she would have thought that if someone asked Korea which Provincehuman was most likely to take a bribe or embezzle, he would have said her.

Korea stood, looking down at her. "You are already adapting, South Pyongan. You aren't the same province you were last year. And if you don't grow lax in your efforts, you won't be as you are now next year. I'm sure of that.

"Politics is just another battle. Learn new tactics."

He didn't let her look away, holding out his hand, and she reluctantly took it, even though she didn't need help up. The blood frozen to both their gloves crackled.

"And you are capable of being more than a soldier." Korea sounded suddenly fierce as he crushed her hand in his grip. "The Premier trusts you to contribute to the rebuilding of our cities, your sports expertise can easily get you a position in coaching our athletes, and you could even go into law, if you wanted. You're the only one that can recite the Criminal Code to me."

She had to be able to, just in case he tried to pin a crime on her as an excuse to get rid of her for a few months.

Korea stepped around the unconscious man so he was standing next to her, the look in his eye uncomfortably open, just like back at the Raktong.

"You are always going to be a soldier," he told her. "But one day, the war will end. And it won't be the first thing you are anymore."

South Pyongan had never yearned for a peaceful life. Even in her and her brother's most idyllic visions of the future before they'd met Korea, she'd still been beating up Japs that came to bother them, or annoying nobles or politicians in a free Korea. The life of the past five years that her brother had described with yearning- the attending meetings and doing paperwork- had been boring for her. Once it became obvious the Yank and Rhee weren't going to peacefully Reunify with them, she couldn't wait for the war to start again so she could get back to making a difference, doing what she was good at. She wasn't sure she could ever see a world in which she wasn't a soldier first.

But it would be nice to never have to see friends die in front of her again.

Korea's grip tightened so much it hurt as he pierced her with his fervent gaze. "I promise."

South Pyongan finally looked him fully in the eye. The blood on his face had dried, staining his eyepatch and crusting to his cheeks like bloody tears. His tunic was stiff with it, and neither the cold cut of the wind or the bullet wound in his arm seemed to affect him.

Something in his voice and the look in his eye made her have a brief, rare moment of outrospection.

"And what about you?"

He blinked, like he didn't understand what she meant.

"Are you going to be able to, y'know." She gestured awkwardly with her free hand. "Not be a soldier first, too?"

Korea released her, straightening his shoulders. "I am not a soldier first. I am Korea."

And that couldn't exactly change.

South Pyongan looked down at her hand, rubbing her gloved fingers together, watching the flakes of rusty blood shed from them.

"You really think I have what it takes to be a politician?" she asked eventually. "You're not just trying to make me feel better?"

"I know you do," Korea said, back to assured, no longer with that almost desperate edge to his voice. "And even if you didn't, I would find another use for you. You're a valuable asset, South Pyongan. Korea will always need you."

South Pyongan crossed her arms, looking away. If she'd had fuzz in her chest at the Raktong, she had full-blown kittens in there now.

She wanted to throw them in a sack and drown them. She hated that he could do this to her.

'Gross gross gross gross.'

"Also," he said, turning to hoist the radio and its generator into his arms. "I have never once wanted to make you feel better in my life."

"Good," she muttered, nudging the unconscious traitor in the ribs. "Because I've never needed you to."

"Good." Korea gave a military nod, starting off. "Pick him up and let's go."

“Why do I have to carry him?” she protested, relieved that their agreement to pretend these kinds of conversations had never happened remained firm.

Even if she couldn’t pretend to herself.

“Because you knocked him out.”

Huffing, South Pyongan heaved the man into her arms. All four of his limbs being hogtied behind his back made it a little difficult. She had to hold him in her arms like he was a huge dressed chicken. She really hoped he didn’t wake up while they were like this.

Actually, he might not wake up at all. He’d been out for a pretty long time.

“You just don’t want me to drop your little buddy’s radio,” she muttered, stepping over a body.

She guessed they’d come back after to gather the corpses and the weapons up. Getting the civilian woman home had to take priority right now.

“He is not my ‘buddy,’” Korea replied icily.

“So you just let him sleep in your room for fun?”

“I am keeping an eye on him.”

South Pyongan hummed skeptically, making him growl at her.

She snorted, her eyes straying to the ropes she’d cut off Korea as they started down the slope.

“General, this guy is heavy,” she said casually.

“Maybe you're still out of shape,” he deadpanned.

She clicked her tongue. “Says you. You’re wasting away of old age as we speak.”

“I am not.”

“Oh yeah? Then how’d those bastards catch you so easily?”

Korea *‘tch’*ed, not answering as he picked up his pace.

Her smirk lost its sharpness as she felt a little burst of-

‘Ugh, grossssssss.’

Korea had always been her biggest critic, even during the Occupation. But he’d trusted she could get him out of there, and more meaningfully, that she could save that woman. So if he trusted that she could learn how to be comfortable in a suit instead of a uniform…

She guessed she could.

And also she was amazing at everything she ever did ever. So obviously she could be amazing at that, too.

Even if she wasn’t as amazing at it, and it would never be as exciting as nights like this. She knew her thrills weren’t as important as creating a world where no one drowned trapped inside a tank or was dragged into the mountains and raped by enemy guerrillas. A world where people that didn’t want to fight, like her brother and so many of their comrades, wouldn’t have to.

She would put down her gun, if it meant they could, too.

If politics was a fight, South Pyongan would learn to conquer it, to protect their people. She was the best at fighting, after all.

“General,” she said again as they passed by the guy that had fallen down the slope. “That had to hurt.”

Korea gave a long-suffering sigh, finally taking her bait. “Stop saying that.”

His province grinned victoriously. “You want us to cut religious language out, right?”

“Comrade Kim Il-sung would hate that.”

“He’d find it funny.”

“He would tell you he is a man, not a god, and not to use his name as an oath.”

“Yeah,” she said. “After he chuckled.”

Korea scowled at her over his shoulder. “Don’t say that around him.”

“I’m gonna.”

“And I am going to put you up against the wall.”

“Before or after I have to dig latrines?”

“Before. You’re getting buried in them after.”

South Pyongan hummed thoughtfully. “Making me dig my own grave. Rhee would be proud.”

She laughed as he hip-checked her, dramatically stumbling, laughing again as Korea short-circuited trying to figure out how to catch her without dropping the radio before shoving her again as he realized she was faking.

Even if politics wasn’t as exciting as war, at least she’d always have annoying Korea to keep her entertained.

North Pyongan: Hate the sin, love the sinner.
South Pyongan: That's fucked up, bro. You can't say that to Kangwon.
North Pyongan: I'm talking about you, and the sin I'm referring to is murder.

Takaichi Sanae deporting foreigners to protect our sovereignty. How about instead of doing that to poor people fleeing from countries that have been subjected to wars and poverty by nations that Japan supports and also cause no harm at all to national sovereignty, we protect it from THE LITERAL COUNTRY THAT OWNS OUR MILITARY AND HAS BASES IN OUR BORDERS. Then there’s the right-wing American freaks saying ‘based Japan’ while talking about visiting and moving here. YOU ARE THE UNDESIRABLE FOREIGNERS. Sometimes it is so clear when a white gaijin views Japanese people as white. I know it wouldn’t solve systemic issues, but it would be nice if she got to meet her idol’s fate. And then everyone else in the LDP.

Soldier On

North allowed South Pyongan a rest day once they got back to Pyongyang. She'd earned it. Asking if he was sure proved that.

It made him uneasy to leave her sleeping alone in the bunker when her cousins were either in their provinces or Pyongyang. He considered locking the door, then decided against it, settling on keeping watch for an hour while she was in the deepest part of her sleep, before setting off for the capital to send her bodyguards over and make his report to the Premier.

The man said nothing about his impromptu extermination mission, or on the lack of support he'd taken with him. He only gave him that fondly resigned look and reminded him to be more cautious.

"The guerrilla unit was large," North reported. "Larger than a unit operating in stealth should be. I believe there's a chance the reports of multiple units operating in South Pyongan province were all this one, and they converged either for new orders, or the attempt to abduct North Pyongan."

Kim Il-sung nodded thoughtfully. "We will monitor incidents in the area, and see if they decrease significantly. In the meantime, our comrades will get what they can from the prisoner you brought in."

"South Pyongan brought him." North should be pleased his province had shown restraint.

His Premier's lips lifted in a small smile. "Comrade South Pyongan is developing quickly."

North glowered at him. "It's because you say things like that that she's always going on about being your favorite province."

"The Chairman of the Worker's Patty can't engage in provincialism," the Chairman said solemnly. "I am simply stating a fact about my birth province."

Damn it. He probably would laugh at her 'General' exclamations.

North shook his head, standing. "I'll be delaying my surprise on-the-spot guidance at the ammunition factory until tomorrow. I should be at the hospital for most of the day."

He'd put his heavy winter officer's coat on over his uniform to hide the blood and bullet wound. But he still had to get it stitched up. His arm likely wasn't going to work right for the next few days.

"I would never presume to order my country to do anything," his Premier started, clasping his hands on his desk. "But I would advise he takes a rest day as well. As he hasn't slept in over twenty-four hours."

Which was why he was delaying his on-the-spot guidance and spending the day visiting the sick and wounded. It required less clarity than viewing production manifestos and going over quotas.

"I'm fine," he clipped, adding before the man could counter it, "When South Pyongan gives you her report, tell her to conduct a personal survey of Pyongyang for you, and all of the provincial capitals in the north eventually. There's been more destruction since we went over the drafts in May. Don't tell her the order comes from me."

His Premier didn't ask why, just shook his head and agreed.

North worked his jaw, then said, "And the proposal for showing leniency to voluntary surrenders has my full support. If the unit we encountered had been given an option like that beforehand, I think we could have seen more surrenders."

He went for the door, adding, "And have one of the interrogators tell the prisoner the name of the woman he was letting his compatriots violate was Kim Su-hwa. She was nineteen, and taking care of her sick father. He died of hypothermia trying to find her."

Grim now, his General assured him, "It will be done."

North let out a subtle breath as he left the office.

He should be glad South Pyongan was mature enough to take prisoners now.

"There you are." China peeled off the wall as he rounded the corner of the underground tunnel.

"You were eavesdropping on me," North said flatly, not stopping.

He still didn't entirely know what China did when he wasn't around. He'd stopped having agents attempt to tail him. No matter how loyal they were, it was still a risk.

'Not that they ever managed to.'

And he suspected the other country's actions were mostly... beneficial anyway. Aside from the eavesdropping.

"On matters of foreign state? No, never." China padded after him. "You know, I would have come with you on your little mission. But you were out the door and in what used to be my Jeep before I could even grab my rifle."

North tossed the keys over his shoulder, hearing a jingle as China unfortunately caught them. "It was a classified mission."

Neither he nor South Pyongan could have said what they needed to with someone else around. It had been hard enough with just the two of them (and the unconscious reactionary).

"I'm looking forward to hearing about it from your province."

The Korean huffed. He'd told her to tell the others they had brought a squad with them, but hadn't said not to talk about it at all, like he would have a real classified mission. He knew trying to stop her from bragging was an impossible task.

He spent the day in the hospital as planned, going over sign language materials with Gangwon and speaking with patients. He even caved to Kangwon begging on his knees to treat his wound (mostly because he'd cornered him again while North was waiting for Kim Yong-hwan).

The fight- one-sided slaughter, really- had eased the tension in him somewhat. It shouldn't have, but it did.

He still didn't let his province clean his burns, or even look at them, only shrugging his tunic off the injured shoulder. His tension might have eased, but his skin still felt prickly from being tied up. He knew any fingers on his skin where he couldn't see would set him off, even Kangwon's. And he was exhausted enough that he knew his reaction wouldn't be proportional.

And even if he was more relaxed, the war was still ongoing. They were still stuck on a stalemate America was making impassable. Kangwon had enough burdens to deal with.

North gave him one more by asking him to visit South Pyongan's province to speak with Kim Su-hwa.

"It doesn't have to be immediately," he told him. "Take the chance the next time you deploy with the Mobile Medical Corps."

Kangwon set aside his used scissors and spool of surgical thread as his Countryhuman shrugged his coat back on. "Of course."

North lowered his voice, though they were alone in the room. "And keep an eye open for suspicious cases."

It was winter. People got sick. Their completely destroyed infrastructure made that worse. But after last year, any aberrant illness had to be identified immediately.

Kangwon was the only province that knew about the strange flights that had been taking place over the northern half of the north since last month. American fighter jets would drop bombs in Chagang and the Hamgyongs, not near the electric plants or military installations, but seemingly just near isolated villages. Some of them were real, but most of them were pamphlets. It made sense the Yanks wanted to try and turn the villagers against them, but something about it sent a prickle of premonition down North's spine.

Most alarmingly, one woman had hiked all the way to Kanggye to purchase stationary and a pencil, and send him a letter about what her and her son had seen in the Kangnam Mountains- a bomb that had dropped a swarm of beetles.

North had sent her back the cost of the letter, as well as the expensive paper and writing tool, scraping into his funds to give her a bit of extra, too. But she couldn't have known he would do that. She had spent her limited savings to send him a letter that either held a lie too outlandish for her to think he'd believe it, or because what she had witnessed had worried her enough that she thought her Countryhuman needed to be told directly.

And he knew her. She had said she was the mother of the boy 'your comrade' had given goji berries to this time last year.

He didn't think it was a lie. Which meant it was a threat.

Kangwon solemnly nodded. "No one's caught anything out of the normal yet. But the Ministry of Health is making sure everyone's on high alert."

The anti-epidemic measures had been distributed and were being reinforced vigorously. The feats of healthcare workers were being lauded in magazines and newspapers, mass hygiene operations were being carried out, and they were rebuilding as many clinics as possible.

But they couldn't produce enough medicine, and they didn't have enough doctors. Most of the ones they did have were underqualified, with no formal training. Their best had been killed when the hospitals were bombed, or by the reactionaries during the temporary withdrawal.

"Korea."

Kangwon interrupted North's grim thoughts, and he realized his hands were balled into fists.

His province smiled at him reassuringly. "Let us handle the medical stuff. You have enough to worry about."

"I need to worry about all of it," North clipped.

Kangwon sighed like the Premier, but left it at that. "I've got to get back to work. If you're going to talk to more patients, could you talk to Sip Tal-sun?"

He had mentioned the name before. "The one with the broken back?"

"Yeah."

North's jaw clenched. "No."

Kangwon moved subtly between him and the door. "Korea, he's getting discharged tomorrow, and I think he's a suicide risk. I'm going to keep checking in on him, but I can't do it every day. And I've already said everything I can. Hearing it from his Countryhuman might make it stick."

Crossing his arms, North said, "Kangwon, I am the last person that can give advice on how to live permanently crippled."

"You've done it before."

"For missing limbs. Not lifelong paralysis."

A missing hand or arm was almost nothing. A leg, too, could be adapted to with a cane or wooden replacement. Someone could still walk around that way, work the fields or in a factory, go to the store, even serve in certain military positions. North knew how to temper that loss with words.

A broken spine was different.

"Just talk to him," Kangwon said pleadingly. "Please."

North almost denied him again, before exhaling. "Fine."

"Thank you," Kangwon said, picking up his medical tray. "He's in Room 5."

North found the door, then stood outside it, grinding his teeth, considering just leaving. Eventually he steeled himself and went in before a nurse could catch him lurking.

Sip Tal-sun was lying on his bed, the only thing he could do. His cheeks were sallow and his brown eyes listless as he stared at the wall. An aboveground portion of the military hospital had been rebuilt, but rooming the man there likely couldn't be risked. If the hospital was targeted again, he wouldn't be able to get to the shelter in time.

His head slowly turned to face North. "Comrade Korea," he croaked.

His arms pushed at the bed as he tried to sit up. But the dead weight of his remaining leg didn't allow him to move more than an inch. His shoulders slumped as he uttered a shaky breath, raising the edge of his hand to his brow in a bitter salute.

He looked thin and haggard, even with the rations and exercises the doctors would have been making sure he got.

"At ease," North said, shutting the door. He took a few steps in, but kept his distance from the bed.

Sip Tal-sun's hand lowered to the bedsheets. "I already received my discharge from the army."

"There is nothing dishonourable about a medical discharge," North told him, hearing the current under his words. "And that isn't why I'm here."

The man's lips twisted in a humourless smile. "Let me guess- Doctor Kangwon sent you then?"

There was no point in lying. "Yes."

"He's worried about me."

"Yes," North admitted. "Should he be?"

Sip Tal-sun's eyes fell on the flat part of his sheets where his other leg should have been. He didn't respond for a long moment.

He hadn't even been allowed the dignity of being paralyzed, but remaining whole. North's scar itched under the skin.

"I don't have any plans to kill myself," Sip Tal-sun said eventually. "But I don't see how I'm supposed to keep on living."

"You have a family," North reminded him. He had gotten Kangwon to give him a situation report on the man before he left. "Your wife and mother visit you almost every day. And you have a son."

"A family I can't defend," the man said bitterly. "Look at me." He cast a hand at his useless lower half. "If a Yank or some reactionary kicked down the front door, I couldn't do shit to stop him. I'd have to watch as he-"

He bared his teeth in anguish at the thought, lowering his chin to his chest, his eyes squeezed tight.

North tried not to shift in place.

He shouldn't be the one in here. Not when the idea of being unable to move, unable to protect himself or his provinces or people was his worst nightmare. Not when even looking at the bedbound man made his chest grow tight.

Being blinded entirely was one of the worst things he could imagine happening to him. Being paralyzed was worse than that. The idea of being unable to fetch his own food and water, of needing someone to bathe him and take him to the toilet, being completely dependent on someone while knowing he could never make up for it, being unable to work or govern or fight...

North would rather die. As Korea, he wouldn't be able to. He would have to persevere. But if he was this man, he couldn't say he wouldn't throw himself into the river as soon as he was discharged.

'He couldn't even do that.' Even his suicide would have to rely on someone else leaving a knife too near his bed.

North didn't let any of his feelings or the vice around his lungs show on his face.

"You wouldn't be able to defend them," he acknowledged the truth. "But that isn't the only thing a man is good for to his family. Was your marriage a chosen marriage?"

"It was a match," Sip Tal-Sun said. "But we love each other."

North nodded. "Then your wife shouldn't leave you just because you can't wield a gun anymore."

"She's going to have to take care of me for the rest of my life," the man rasped, and North could tell he was fighting tears. "How is that fair to her?"

It wasn't.

"You took care of her and the rest of your family, and families like yours all across Korea by fighting," North said firmly. "You drove the Japanese from our country with the Anti-Japanese People's Guerilla Army, fought Rhee's goons during the skirmishes at the Parallel, and without your Unit 256, our army wouldn't have held Height 1211 for as long as we did. Your wife should be honoured to take care of a veteran of the People's Army."

Sip Tal-sun looked down at the sheets.

North knew it was the 'take care' that was the problem. But there was no other way to spin it. The man wouldn't be recovering. Whether it was his wife, his mother, or his son and his future family, Sip Tal-sun would need to be taken care of forever. The head of a household, the one that should be responsible for safeguarding it, reduced to someone that couldn't even chop wood for the fire. All because of a bullet that would have done next to nothing if it had struck just a centimeter to the side.

One bullet. That was all it took to end a life, even if you were lucky enough to survive it.

"You don't need to be a soldier to have worth," North said, and South Pyongan flickered across his mind. "You can serve your country in other ways."

Even as he said it, he knew he was lying. For others it could be true. As instinctively horrified as he was by the idea of being immobile, North knew that it didn't make any of their comrades that were worthless. He knew people that had lost both their legs during bombing raids and were still contributing to the war effort. They wrote articles or patriotic poems or stories, or made art to bolster morale and hatred of the enemy. Some even taught classes, some on subjects they could no longer perform.

But Sip Tal-sun wasn't like that. He wasn't a creative, a teacher, or any kind of intellectual. He was a soldier, a factory man, according to Kangwon. The only way he knew how to live was by fighting and working. Neither of which he could now do.

Sip Tal-sun echoed his thoughts, looking up at him with glistening eyes. "I don't think I can."

Fighting his body, North stepped closer to the bed, looking the man in the eye. "Try. If not for yourself, then for your family. And if not for them, then for your country."

He made himself place a hand on Sip Tal-sun's thin shoulder, wasted not from starvation or illness, but from despair.

"Korea has lost enough comrades," North told him, seized now with the opposite urge to dig his nails into the man's skin. "We can't afford to lose another loyal soldier, no matter what state he's in. You didn't give up when the Japanese drove our army from Korea. You didn't give up with the Yankees had us up against the Amnok, and you didn't give up defending Height 1211 until the end."

It was easier not to give up when you could fight back.

"Don't give up now," he said fervently, giving in to the desire to grip him tight. "Try to find another way to live."

Sip Tal-sun's fingers twisted in the cotton sheets, his face screwed up. He only responded with a choked nod, and North knew it was because he couldn't speak without crying.

He released him, stepping back, the discomfort seeping back in. He didn't say anything else. Sip Tal-sun was a soldier. The most he could do now was leave before he saw his tears.

North fled the room, then the hospital, unable to stand the way the walls had started closing in on him.

He would go to City Hospital One instead, where the bulk of injuries were less grievous, and a broken spine was less likely to mean the end of everything you had been.

And still it was an endless flood of missing limbs, ruptured organs, and burns more severe than his, if only because they could never truly heal. Women caught in bombing runs on their way home from the factories, their bones crushed under rubble; men filled with shrapnel from the rail lines they'd been fixing as the bombs hit; children with charred, dead patches of flesh from the napalm used to carpet the hills in an attempt to wipe out their storehouses. One boy couldn't stop crying, no matter how much his mother hushed him. His cries still echoed in the halls, even after the nurse had used some of their precious sedatives on him.

By the time it had grown dark, and North stepped out into the shadowed, empty streets, any hint of relief that last night had brought him had been beaten from his body.

He shouldn't have been eased at all. The reactionaries had been small, in the scheme of things. Killing them hadn't ended the war or even gotten them closer to it. All it had done was save a handful of his people and resources. He shouldn't feel relief at simply doing his duty.

There was a drone in the distance. It should have been barely audible, but North's ear slits had become attuned to the sound. There would be another run tonight.

The burns on his body all throbbed at once in anticipation, making him grit his teeth as it felt like the edges of that gash tightened.

Kangwon had scolded him for not telling Kim Yong-hwan that he'd been shot, giving her and his province time to see other patients while he walked around with a hole in his arm. But even if North hadn't known they had more important matters to attend to, it wouldn't have been a priority.

He couldn't feel it. The round had struck a burn. He'd had to dig the bullet out of dead flesh. Every time he thought he almost felt a sting from the good nerves, it was swiftly drowned out by the sea of fire the rest of his skin had become.

North attempted to go to Jonsung complex to work, but he caught his Premier just as he was leaving the office, pointedly locking it while looking him in the eye.

The Countryhuman had his own key, but he didn't bother. The man would just come back in an hour to try and convince him to sleep, and he needed his rest.

So North left the underground again, back into the night where the bombs had started to fall.

Wearily, he realized that Chagang would have driven the others back over an hour ago, and that he had returned the Jeep keys to China.

Sighing, North started off down the road, trying not to think about Sip Tal-sun in that hospital cot.

He'd only gone a hundred metres before he heard tires on the dirt behind him. He looked back as he moved to the side, hand drifting to his gun.

Then he dropped it, glaring as the Jeep pulled up beside him.

"Need a ride?" China asked, leaning out the window. "I think we're going the same way."

North wanted to deny it, but with the planes circling, he couldn't afford to. If China got airstruck, he'd have to drag him go the hospital, which meant he wouldn't have time to wash and sew his tunic tonight.

"I'll drive."

"I'm already driving."

North yanked open the driver's door, shoving China over on the bench so he could get behind the wheel, immediately pressing the gas.

"I was waiting at the rendezvous, but you didn't show up," China hummed, watching the bombers out the open window.

"Don't talk."

He of course didn't listen, nattering on about nothing while North tuned him out.

SH was unfortunately on watch, so as he pulled in and started to cover the Jeep with the tarp, he was already being chided.

"I can't believe you just took off like that," she huffed, pinning down the final corner of the tarp. "South Pyongan says you were fighting reactionaries. You could have brought me with you."

If anyone needed an outlet besides him and the female Pyongan, it was the Southern Hamgyong. But she also would have pestered him into taking a squad.

"We had it handled," he said.

SH put her hands on her hips. "South Pyongan says you got shot."

'Snitch.'

"It was a minor wound," North said, walking by her for the door.

She followed. "Give me your tunic. I can wash and mend it for you."

North gave her a sharp glare over his shoulder.

Blowing a puff of air from her lips, SH said, "I'm not being a slave to tradition. But I bet you haven't slept in around two days. Am I right?"

"No," North muttered.

"Sources would say yes," China hummed, and North snapped, "Get out of here!"

"Very well," the other man signed. "I'll see you in our room."

"My room."

China was already gone.

North couldn't stand him.

SH crossed her arms. "I'm just offering to do your laundry so you can get some rest."

North eyed the open-air kitchen. "Who did dishes tonight?"

His province pursed her lips.

"I'll do my own laundry." He turned to go, but SH caught his sleeve.

"Korea," she said, her attitude gone. "Please be more careful. For some reason, you and South Pyongan running off in the middle of the night makes me feel like you didn't really have a plan."

"I always have a plan." Even if some were more... developed than others.

SH hummed doubtfully. "Also you know South Pyongan's a terrible liar. I don't think you really had a unit with you."

"Good thing it doesn't matter what you think."

His province sighed, releasing his sleeve. "Just please take better care of yourself. We need you."

"I'll be fine," North muttered, hauling open the bunker door.

"Goodnight."

"I'm not sleeping," he tossed over his shoulder. "I have laundry to do."

When he opened the door to his room, he saw that China had already discovered what he had left next to his pile of dissembled electronics this morning. He had the main receiver/transmitter in his lap, and the portable generator deployed in the corner.

"Do you know what this is?" he asked excitedly.

"A radio," North deadpanned, dropping his bag of personal items in his corner, and picking up his summer uniform.

China's enthusiasm was undimmed. "A GRC-9! It has far better range than my SCR-300, and it's incredibly durable. The only issue is the low power supply- you have to crank the generator almost continuously, and it's a two-person job, inconvenient for the field. And it's heavy."

North knew that well. With the radio, the generator, and the accessories bag, he had to have been carrying over a hundred pounds down through the mountains, along with Kim Su-hwa clinging to his arm.

"But I could strip it for parts for my handheld radios," China continued enthusiastically. "It's a shame the handheld portion is smashed, but I can still finally seal up the battery casings, and this might be just what I need to finish increasing the range. The generator might have given me an idea, too, if I can implement it right."

"And who said you could strip it for parts?" North asked coolly, his spare clothes and bag in hand.

China smiled. "It's for me, isn't it?"

The Korean *'tch'*ed, turning his back to him. "One of the soldiers in our unit found it. I don't have any use for it."

There was a knowing lilt in China's voice. "Well, make sure to tell that comrade I say thank you."

North snuck a look over his shoulder before he left. For once,

China wasn't already looking. He was absorbed in examining the foreign radio, running his fingers over the tubes and dials, eyes alight.

Smug, North went to do his laundry.

Basically how South works is that he's claustrophobic, so will have panic attacks if put in small spaces. His manor is almost entirely an open floor plan because of this, with wide windows. While North just can't stand being trapped. He would be okay crawling into a small tunnel or hiding in a box, so long as he can get out. But if you put him in a windowless, doorless room, he would freak out, even if it was the size of a warehouse. It's why he doesn't like tight clothes or being restrained in any way.

By the way, the Americans using island bases to communicate with reactionary guerrilla bands in the North is real. There's a book on it called 'White Tigers, My Secret War In North Korea' by Colonel Ben Malcolm from the US Army. I've only been able to read excerpts, but they were operating up to 125 miles into the North. The Yankees would give the gangs limited training, then send them in as basically suicide groups to save Yanks downed from their planes, conduct sabotage, and (the author admits this) assassinate Communists and village chiefs that didn't support America or the South. These orders came directly from American officers. They also largely fell apart in January 1952 because the leader 'became a dictator,' started using nepotism, and got assassinated by his fellows, leading to mass infighting and defections, including likely one of the most formerly loyal to the group. The KPA chased most of them off the mainland and fucked up their island headquarters soon after. Shocking!

Also while looking at a board where some American men were discussing the GRC-9 being used in the war, one man makes a comment like, 'I didn't know we were operating guerrilla units. I thought just the commies were. I heard about one of our tanks gunning down an entire group of refugees because they couldn't 'sort out the NK in it.' Not apparently the only incident of this kind, but I don't have any interest in investigating that further.'

And isn't that something? These men who are so obsessed with identifying the exact makes of radios being used during the war, not interested in the slightest about the kinds of crimes their army used that technology to commit, or the lives lost to it. In his eyes, the value of a radio is higher than that of Korean refugees.

He also calls the reactionaries 'primitive agents who may have otherwise never had contact with a radio.' Yes Korea was 'underdeveloped' at that point. I am still fairly sure the majority had heard at least one broadcast in their lives. Even being charitable and assuming he means they never operated a radio before, the word primitive sort of cancels that out.

Butterflies Take Wing

“Can we talk?”

Liaoxi turned to North Pyongan, tilting her head. She didn’t look entirely surprised he was asking.

“Verily. Shall we go elsewhere so no one has to listen involuntarily?”

North Pyongan nodded, and they departed the bunker they had just arrived at. With the American bombers hitting the bridges they had built over the river again, People’s Committee members that had been working late were taking shelter inside.

The Premier was insistent that political workers not work overtime, since the State couldn’t afford to pay them for it right now. But North Pyongan knew more than a few stayed in the office far past their eight hours, not reporting the extra time they laboured. He gently reminded them not to burn themselves out when he could, but didn’t outright order them to stop. He knew it gave them comfort, and let them feel like they were contributing as much as they could to the war effort.

As they headed along the river, downstream of the bridges, North Pyongan could still hear the bombs falling.

A bit of guilt tightened his chest. His province was being bombed, crossing guards, airfield workers, and soldiers were likely being killed even as the sounds grew more muted with every step they took out of Sinuiju.

They were at war, and he was worried about confessing his feelings to a woman. It felt petty.

If one of his people had said that to him, he would have told them that they should do what their heart willed because they were at war. Anyone could die tomorrow, whether from a bomb, illness, enemy guerrillas like the kind his sister was hunting, or, as hard as the Party worked to stop it, starvation. This wasn't the time to save feelings for a better day, when you couldn't know if there would be another at all.

But North Pyongan was a province. If he wanted to guide their people instead of follow them, he had to hold himself to different standards.

By the time they reached the place where the Amnok split, flowing around islands as it curved south, he had almost talked himself out of telling Liaoxi the truth.

They stopped at the same time without discussing it, staring out at the broad band of the Amnok, glimmering like black silk under the moon. From here, North Pyongan would have been able to see Dandong, if it wasn't for the blackout the Chinese border villages and cities were observing with them. America wanted an excuse to bomb across the border- they couldn't give him one.

Liaoxi's eyes shone like moonstone as they roamed over the far shore of her sister's province, before flicking to him.

North Pyongan hurriedly looked away, opening then closing his mouth.

Would it be… unprofessional? What if she didn't feel the same way, and he made her uncomfortable? He really didn't want to lose her as a friend.

With no prying eyes around, Liaoxi had taken off her mask. Bathed in moonlight, her citrine skin looked almost silvery-blue, like the scales of the graceful greyling fish that swam in their shared waters. Her slender eyes were squinched expectantly, and a hint of amusement lingered around her bow-shaped lips.

North Pyongan looked away again, out at the sand bars that dotted the river.

Like the islands, many of them had no clear owner. Even after securing their borders after Liberation, both their people and the Chinese came and went to fish and trade, used to the small mixed communities set up decades ago. Some day Korea and China would likely have to sit down and discuss territorial claims, and decide firmly who they belonged to, and who was allowed to tread on them. But right now, even under the blistering firebombing, Koreans and Chinese still left their island homes at dawn in small sampans to feed their families alongside each other.

North Pyongan knew that there was a very good chance Tae-min was right, and even if Liaoxi did share his feelings, any relationship of theirs would be doomed. It might not even make it past Korea's veto. If it miraculously did, things could become difficult after the war was over, and the Chinese province went home.

But he knew if he didn't say anything now, he would lose out on the chance of there being anything to become difficult.

He turned to Liaoxi, who was still patiently waiting.

"Can I ask why it seemed like you didn't want to talk to me ever since you returned from your country?"

The Chinese woman's lips curled up. "You know that I'm not honest. Do you think the truth I would confess?"

"I think you felt badly about hurting me," he said. "And I'd like to know why you did."

Even if he was imagining some of her other signals, he was sure he hadn't been imagining the way her eyes would slide to him as she followed her sister to bed, or the regret in them.

Liaoxi stared into his eyes, and it almost seemed like she might waver. Then she looked out at the river.

"The truth I cannot say. But rest assured 'twas only me getting in my own way." She turned back to him and dipped her head. "I'm sorry for hurting you. It hurt me, too. On that, I speak true."

"So it… didn't have anything to do with me?" he ventured.

She shook his head, and he breathed a sigh of relief.

He was glad to know for sure he hadn't offended her somehow. And he hadn't truly expected to get the truth on her cold-hot actions, either. He had just needed to know that she had missed their time together, too.

North Pyongan gathered his courage and doffed his hat. Then he felt foolish for doffing his hat, but realized he couldn't put it back on without looking foolish to match. So he held it tightly to his chest as if passing on condolences to the family of a fallen soldier.

"Comrade Liaoxi," he said, heart fluttering nervously. "I'm not sure if I should say this, but I think if I'm not honest with the both of us, I'll regret it."

"Speak freely," she lilted. "I do like your honesty."

North Pyongan took a deep, calming breath, stifling his urge to pray. If he couldn't even confess to a woman without looking to the Lord, he would never be able to lead their people.

"I like you," he said, squeezing his cap to his chest. "As a friend and… more."

Liaoxi stared at him, and the corners of her lips wavered. North Pyongan went to hastily apologize before he realized her entire face was changing colour, darkening visibly.

It looked like she was trying to remain composed, but then her expression broke and she ducked aside, hiding her face in her hands.

"Too honest!" she squeaked, her real voice breaking through.

The apology bubbling on his lips burst from them as he took a step back. "I'm so sorry. I don't expect anything and it's alright if you don't feel the same way. I just…"

He wrung his hat in his hands, looking at his boots.

"I admire your combat abilities, and how hard you've been working for my people, even though they're not your own, and how you handle Han-jin and Tae-min, and how you can stay composed enough to recite your cí even on the battlefield, and-“ He cut himself off before he could list the other hundred qualities of hers he admired. “And… I think you’re very beautiful.”

His cheeks warmed as he admitted it. The words sounded too pale for her when the moonbeams were painting her in silvered shadows. He should have written her a poem to get the true depth of his feelings across.

“I… just wanted you to know that,” he finished awkwardly. “Even if you don’t feel the same way, none of that will change. But…” He peered cautiously up at her, hoping she wouldn’t think he was being audacious. “I think you might?”

Liaoxi had stopped hiding her face, and affected her vaguely amused expression again. But her cheeks still looked duskier than the rest of her face.

“I thought that was clear,” she said, and even though her voice sounded steady, he noticed she forgot to finish her ‘too honest’ couplet. “Didn’t your hand I hold all the way here?”

“I…” He was still strangling his hat as he admitted, “Didn’t know if that was just you being friendly. I didn’t want to assume anything.”

The other province sounded distinctly teasing now as she said, “Do women usually hold hands with men just seeking to be friends?” making his face burn more.

He knew they usually didn't, but he had more experience holding a woman’s hand platonically than not- when his female cousins or sister dragged him somewhere, when he joined hands in prayer at church, or when offering comfort to soldiers and those hit by the bombs, giving them something to hold to as they passed.

“I’m sorry, I won’t tease anymore,” Liaoxi giggled as he hid his face the way she had. “Tell me again, and I’ll react how I should for sure.”

It had taken most of his courage the first time. And even though she had just implied she shared the same feelings, it was even harder to get the words out again.

"I like you."

Liaoxi's face remained steady as she smiled, reaching out to hold his hands. "I like you, too."

North Pyongan's heart swelled like the Amnok in flood season as she finished his rhyme this time, and he squeezed her hands as joyful waters spread through him. Liaoxi squeezed back, teeth breaking through her smile for a pulse-skipping second.

They held hands around his hat as the waters of the river flowed by, almost masking the sound of bombs falling in the background.

When North Pyongan managed to gather his words past the lump in his throat, he asked, "What does this mean?"

"It means I'd like to be with you," Liaoxi said, her composure fully regained, though she still couldn't hide that blush. "And I assume for you, the same rings true."

It did. But still North Pyongan hesitated. "Tae-min and Han-jin were teasing me about you. Tae-min said since I'm Korean and you're Chinese, we would be doomed."

And he didn't even know Liaoxi was a Chinese province.

Liaoxi looked into his eyes for a long moment, her smile a ghost of what it was. Then her fingers wound around his more tightly.

"And he thinks he knows doomed, I assume. But we never know how something ends until it does. And isn't 'never' worse than 'was?'"

North Pyongan considered that. He knew his sister would disagree. But did he?

He knew his heart. Losing Liaoxi as a friend these past two months had hurt. Losing her as more than that would hurt even more.

But they didn't know how something would end until it did. They didn't know it would end at all. This war would tie a thread between their countries forever, no matter what else got in the way. And their Countryhumans were even comrades now. More than that, he could say, if he didn't think Korea would hit him for it.

They didn't have to be doomed.

"I would like to be with you," he finally replied, and her smile returned like the sun rising early. "But I have to ask Korea. And if he says no…"

Liaoxi raised a brow. "No sneaking around behind his back?"

North Pyongan shook his head. "I couldn't betray his trust like that. I'm sorry."

He had just repaired his relationship with Korea. Whether he denied his feelings for Liaoxi for a reasonable reason or an unreasonable one, North Pyongan would respect his decision.

"I can understand that without feeling blue," she said, running her thumb over the back of his hand in a way that suddenly made him incredibly conscious of every inch of them she was touching. "That's one of the things I admire about you. But I would hope if your request he does decline, you would still remain a friend of mine."

"Of course," North Pyongan assured firmly, touched to know she shared his feelings on that, too.

"Then whether or not he grants your request to thee, I think you can call me just 'Liaoxi.'"

North Pyongan couldn't have hid his smile if he tried. "Then you can call me North Pyongan, if we're being so free."

Liaoxi smiled up at him, her eyes sparkling in the moonlight like the dust that shed from a butterfly's wings.

"That works for me."

Before asking Korea for permission, there was someone else North Pyongan had to ask. So when he got back from his province a few days later, after their meager dinner of rations, he waited until everyone else had gone inside, then spoke.

"Sister," he started, looking from the corner of his eye, his hands preoccupied with cleaning their dishes for the night.

"Mmmm?" she- who was supposed to be the one doing them- hummed from where she was doing pull-ups on a sturdy tree branch.

"Can I ask you something?"

"You know I-" She made a grunt of exertion as she pulled herself over the branch. "Hate that question. Just ask."

He looked down at the hot water, watching it swirl as he spun the rag through it. "If I had… romantic feelings for someone, would you approve of me being with them?"

There was a crashing sound and a yelp, and he spun around to see her on the ground.

"Are you alright?"

She quickly sprung up, hurriedly dusting off her tunic and crossing her arms, pretending she hadn't just fallen.

"You have romantic feelings- Okay, first of all, why'd you say it like you're Hwang? And second of all, you like someone?" It sounded like she was trying to sound laidback, but her incredulity bled through. "Wait, it's not like, the Virgin Mary or some weird Christian thing, is it?"

"No," North Pyongan said, turning back to the dishes, needing to finish them before the water grew cold.

"Then who is it?" his sister demanded, marching over, leaning down to jab his shoulder. "That one chick in Sinuiju? I've got to warn you, I think if you want permission to date one of our women, you'll probably want to ask SH. Just so you have the advantage when you've got to defend yourself."

"It's… not one of our people," he admitted sheepishly.

The cold air grew a little more frigid.

His sister's voice was dangerous as she said, "You had better not be about to tell me you're having some kind of forbidden romance with some Yankee nurse."

"No," he quickly assured her. "Never."

He could hear the cogs in his sister's head turning as she tried to figure out what options were left.

"Chinese?" she guessed, less venomously than before.

"Sort of. Yes." He set aside another dish, not looking at her.

"Damn it, stop making me guess." She prodded him again. "Just tell me who it is!"

"Liaoxi," he muttered, cheeks hot.

"Hah? Don't mumble."

"Comrade Liaoxi," he said louder, and his sister's eyes widened.

She stared at him. He stared back, eyes just as wide, hands still slowly cleaning a bowl without looking.

"The Chinese province," she said eventually.

"Yes."

"The foreign province that's living with us."

"Yes."

She blinked rapidly. "You realize Korea's going to garrote you, right? Like if you told him that right now, he'd probably waterboard you in that basin."

"I know," North Pyongan sighed. "But I'm going to ask him for permission anyway. If you say yes."

"Why do I have to say yes?" South Pyongan crossed her arms, still looking unnerved. "Why are you asking me for permission like I'm the man of the house? Why are you asking permission at all? Did you knock her up so now you're trying to take responsibility?"

"Please don't talk about her that way," North Pyongan scolded, stopping his hand from reflexively crossing himself. "And we haven't done anything together."

His common sense also told him that was impossible. But even if it wasn't, he believed intimacy should be saved for marriage.

"Sorry," South Pyongan said, starting to pace in tight circles. "It's just- Liaoxi? A Chinese chick, province, whatever. Really?"

"Yes." North Pyongan finished the last dish and stood, drying his hands on a dry cloth. "And I am asking you for permission because you're my sister, and your opinion is important to me."

"Okay, well, my opinion is Korea is going to beat your ass even bluer."

"Please stop pacing."

He reached out and took her shoulders, forcing her to stand still and look him in the eye. Hers skittered away.

"I really like Liaoxi," he said sincerely, and he did feel slightly like a maiden begging her father for permission to marry the man she wanted. "But you are my sister. I'm not asking whether or not I should ask Korea, or for political considerations. I'm asking you if you would personally be comfortable with me courting her."

He could tell she wasn't entirely comfortable with the idea by the way her arms crossed over her chest like a shield, still refusing to look at him.

“Exactly,” she insisted. “I’m your sister, not your dad. My opinion shouldn’t matter. Korea’s probably shouldn’t, either. It’s your love life.”

“We both know Korea’s opinion does matter.”

Maybe not if they were humans. But they were provinces, and so was Liaoxi. It mattered.

“And your opinion matters to me.”

His sister heaved a sigh. “Fine.” Her boot tapped on the ground in an erratic staccato before she suddenly demanded, “She’s not seducing you, is she?”

North Pyongan blinked, letting go of her shoulders. “No.”

“You’re sure?” She squinted at him suspiciously. “I think you’d probably be pretty seduceable.”

“I wouldn’t be,” he replied, indignant.

“Please,” she snorted. “You always think chicks that are flirting with you are just being nice. So if you actually think she’s flirting with you or has feelings or something, it’s probably because she’s laying it on thick.”

‘Clearly not thick enough.’ Thinking of a few nights ago, he couldn’t exactly fight the first part of her accusation.

“I know she has feelings for me because she told me,” he corrected, and she nodded victoriously.

“See? Seduction.”

“She isn’t like that.”

If she was trying to seduce him, she would have done a poor job by freezing him out for the couple months

“I bet she is. Like country like province. China’s a seducer. I can tell.” South Pyongan narrowed her eyes at nothing. “Pretty boys always are.”

“Let’s stay on topic,” he said, guiding her away from a China rant. “Liaoxi isn’t a seductress. I know her feelings are genuine. And so are mine.”

“I just don’t want you-“

His sister cut herself off, finally looking him in the eyes. Hers flicked over him, from top to bottom, then away.

“Whatever,” she said quietly. “You can take care of yourself.”

“Sister-“

She sighed. “If you really don’t think she’s seducing you, I trust you. And if you really like her, I think you should be with her. Or whatever.”

A weight was lifted from North Pyongan’s heart as he lay a hand over it.

“Thank you.”

“Bleh.”

She tried to turn away, but he pulled her back. It needed to be said, even if it made her squirm. He knew because he would need to hear it, too.

“I know you said no more gross talks-“

“So you’re shutting up?”

“-but I want to tell you something.” He squeezed her wrist. “We aren’t normal people. Even if by some miracle Korea gives me his approval, I won’t be leaving the household to start my own. I’m staying in yours.”

“Trust me, you can leave anytime,” she muttered, half-heartedly trying to free her wrist. "More kimchi for me."

He took the hand attempting the liberation, so he was holding both. “Family will always come first. You will always be the most important woman in my life- you’re my sister.”

South Pyongan tilted her chin up and away, trying to hide her face. “Yeah, maybe don’t tell her that.”

She still sounded casual. But the line of her shoulders had relaxed.

North Pyongan let her go. “Liaoxi would understand. She has her own family.”

She loved Liaotung, even if their relationship was different than he and his sister’s. And China may not be her real brother, but he knew he came first to her, too.

“Their family is different than ours,” his sister said quietly, then shook her head, saying in her normal volume, “If you’re done grossing me out, go hang out with your woman.”

He flushed. "We aren't together yet.”

South Pyongan smirked. “You made the mistake of telling me you liked her. I’m gonna tease you for it.”

He wouldn’t have it any other way.

“Just please don’t do it in front of Korea,” he implored. “At least not until I ask him.”

“Want me to ask for you?” She cracked her knuckles.

“I think I can manage,” he said, smiling. Then he bit his lip. “And if he doesn’t give me permission, please don’t pester him.”

“I won’t,” she assured, surprisingly easily.

Before he could leave, North Pyongan’s eyes strayed to her collar, brow furrowing. “The burn on your neck is bleeding through.”

She glanced down, even though she couldn’t see the bandage on the side of her throat.

Clicking her tongue, she said, “Yeah. I think I worked it too much when me and Korea took out those traitors. It hasn’t been scabbing right since then.”

North Pyongan went to tell her it was probably because she insisted on doing pull-ups when she was on watch, then paused.

“At dinner you said you were with a squad.”

His sister pursed her lips, immediately looking suspect. “Yeah. I was. Me and Korea and an assorted group of guys. All together. Hunting reactionaries.”

He raised an eyebrow. She made a rude gesture at him.

North Pyongan shook his head, smiling as he went to go inside.

“Hey, wait.”

He looked back over at his sister. She was facing the trees, her arms crossed and her back to him.

“About that whole talk we had before, about… getting stuck with the enemy.”

His eyes dipped. “Yes?”

“Don’t worry about it,” his sister said unexpectedly. “You were right. Even if we couldn’t risk restarting the war, Korea would. He’d go get you. Or me.”

“I’m not sure he could afford to restart the war just for us,” North Pyongan gently spoke the thoughts he had before out loud.

“No. But I think he would."

The words made him blink in surprise.

South Pyongan shook her head like she was shedding water. "And even if he wouldn't, it's like what you said- he could for South.”

As much as she hated Korea’s brother, there wasn’t a drop of bitterness in her voice, for the same reason she had abstained from the vote on whether or not to kill him if they had to. Some of their cousins might feel scorned by not knowing if, even after all their years of loyalty, they came before South. But how could either of the Pyongans feel that way when they understood?

To North Pyongan, Korea was the only individual person that came before his sister. And as much as he loved him, that was because he was Korea. Their country and all their people depended on him. And they had to be more important than anything. If it weren't for that…

"Korea couldn't leave us Divided," South Pyongan said, tipping her face back to look up at the starry sky. "He'd come for you. And…"

Her head bowed. "I know you could handle yourself until he did."

Pride and deep affection welled in North Pyongan's chest at her recognition.

"I know that you could, too."

It hadn't been about whether or not Korea could come for them before, and it wasn't now. It had been what they were admitting. That hadn't changed. It still ached.

But it hurt a little less.

The Northern Pyongan smiled at his sister. "I love you, eonni."

Not turning to him, she clutched at her head in anguish. "Go inside before I end you."

North Pyongan chuckled.

As he swung closed the heavy steel door, he took one last peek at the waxing moon hanging heavy in the sky, a silvery petal suspended in ink.

If one of them was captured, Korea would come for them. That went for any of the provinces. Even if it was only because he couldn't abandon his brother, whether for their country's sake or his own. If a ceasefire couldn't be forced, Korea would get South and all his provinces back, no matter what he had to do.

Until then, because there was nothing else he could do for them, North Pyongan sent a prayer up to the heavens for their captured cousins.

North Pyongan thinking of ways to compliment a woman, with the main woman in his life being his sister: 'I admire the way you can put a bullet in a man's head from a thousand metres away. Also you remind me of a fish.'

Yeah sure whatever. Let's do an armed 'intervention' in the Taiwan strait and show no lessons will be learned ever. It's not like since we don't have full control over our own military, the US will have to get involved, plunging us into World War III or anything (but they know this, it's the goal for some, while others are betting that China will show reserve since China doesn't want war, and are just trying to provoke a reaction, allowing them to make a better case for remilitarizing. It's like pointing a gun at your neighbour every day and threatening to shoot him, until he tells you if you don't stop, he's going to defend himself. Then you use that as an excuse for why you're waving around a gun, or to shoot him first. It's exactly what the US does to the DPRK. The Japanese government learned it from the best). If China launched missiles at us tomorrow, most people wouldn't deserve it but everyone in power definitely would. At least I get to die smiling knowing they would, too, I guess.'

The term waterboard didn't exist until years after this, but the practice existed. In English I could be calling it 'water cure,' but I'm using waterboard for clarity. Also fun fact, during the Filipino-American war, an American officer waterboarded a Filipino prisoner and only received a fifty USD fine and a month-long suspension. The tortured man had to do ten years of hard labour. This was not the worst thing they did. A man was acquitted for ordering the killing of ten-year old boys because he had orders to 'kill anyone capable of beating arms.' And he decided they were. And since he was 'just following orders,' it wasn't his fault. Investigations on the US Army's actions ended when they conquered the Philippines.

Betray Me Like A Man

South Chungcheong bolted up as the front door slammed open and heavy boots pounded through the manor.

She had never had the luxury of sleeping lightly, so her mind was already clear as she lurched out of her bed, heart pounding. No knives or weapons for her, but for the needle clutched tight in her hand as the other smoothed her skirts, the fabric tremoring under her touch.

Surely America would not charge in so boldly, surely she was not going to finally lose, surely-

She would not go down without a fight. And when she did, ‘twould be at her own hand. Let him have his fun with a corpse. The bastard would get no satisfaction from her.

The boots didn’t stop outside her door, even at the alarmed voice that bade them. They reached it and it burst open just as aggressively as the other, the blinding beam of a flashlight pinning South Chungcheong to the far wall.

“Rise and shine, babe!” America called, his obnoxious voice filling her room with noise and her chest with tension. “See?" he tossed over his shoulder. "She’s already up and decent, Southie. Nothing to worry about.”

From behind him, South peered through the fingers he had clapped over his eyes, seeming relieved to see her standing fully clad in the white and black choson-ot she used for sleep.

He was a weak man. If he was here, violation was not to be her fate tonight.

But South Chungcheong’s body only tightened, her fist around the needle and her chest around her lungs.

She had been found out then. What else could it be?

"Good thing you're already dressed," America said, flashing her a grin. "Why don't you put down that little needle and follow us? We've got something to talk about."

South Chungcheong found her voice. "I demand to know the meaning of this."

"I don't care," the foreigner said, so chipper she could have driven the needle so hard into his eye that it burst. "Get those gams moving, dame."

"I will not be going anywhere until you tell me what is transpiring."

She glared at the Southern one, the weak link, and he flinched under it. Dark shadows painted his under eyes, and sleep dust lined the corners. His black suit lacked a tie, and was buttoned unevenly. It looked as if he, too, had been pulled from slumber.

He opened his maw, but America spoke first.

"We've gotta get this show on the road, Southie," he told him. "Get her to drop the pricker and come along."

The puppet looked at her with a plea in his eyes, willing her to obey without the Commands so that he could feel better about himself.

South Chungcheong did, carefully placing her needle on the nightstand and smoothing her skirts once more before marching past them to the door, her head held high. Not because she wanted to fulfill his desires, but because if those slithering appendages of Command were to be forced into her mind so soon after waking, she would not be able to maintain her composure.

She would not bow. No matter what her punishment was to be, she would not give them the satisfaction of breaking her.

"There's a good girl."

America's words made South Chungcheong's teeth creak as he shoved past her in the narrow hall, leading her to the open front door, where a strong wind had blown snowflakes across the entry room, invading the heated manor with its grasping fingers.

Beyond the portal, the blizzard waged war on Busan, obscuring the midnight sky with swirling gusts of snow. The beam of America's flashlight turned it into a confounding kaleidoscope of white, grey, and black as he stepped out into it, shielded by his heavy military coat.

South Chungcheong's winter clothes had been confiscated last year to discourage her from even trying to leave. As she stepped out into the storm, the wind sliced through her choson-ot like the knives that could soon slice through her flesh.

She did not know what would be done to her. She knew she would be left in America's hands. That was enough.

"Do you w-want my coat?" South asked from behind her.

"I would sooner let acid touch my skin than your American hides," South Chungcheong replied, as cold as the blizzard, words tight in throat as she fought her chattering teeth.

There was no running. Even as they passed beyond the front gate, her feet would not obey her. The Commands still gripped her tight.

She could defend herself. But there would be no point to it once she was in whatever torture room America was taking her to.

Though the flurrying snow, she spotted a dark shape looming. A truck, engine running, but headlights dark.

"Need a boost up, dame?" America shouted over the howling wind, and did not wait for a response before his hands clamped around her waist, lifting her into the truck bed.

South Chungcheong's skin crawled all the way down into the bone, but she did not give him the satisfaction of a reaction.

"Behave yourselves back there," the wretched man called, before disappearing around the side of the vehicle. A second later, the truck started to move.

Two armed men- the puppet's handlers- had taken his place, hanging off the back. Their cold eyes pierced into South Chungcheong as she slid back from the entrance, realizing she was not alone.

Several of the other provinces were there. North Gyeongsang, bereft of his bulky glasses, South Gyeongsang, and the quivering waif, Jeju. They huddled together in the corner for warmth, just as underdressed as she, doubtless startled from sleep the same way.

"S-South Chungcheong," South Gyeongsang said, beckoning her over. "Get in here before you freeze."

"Do you know why these miserable little men are doing this to us?" she inquired, eyeing the Yankee guards distastefully.

"N-N-No."

"Then I have no use for you." South Chungcheong pointedly turned her back, looking out at the snow swirling in their wake.

They made several more stops, picking up the rest of the peons. The Jeollas, who melded into each other like the single-minded organism they were as soon as they were together, Gyeonggi, his eyes pathetically wide, tears rimming them as the cold seared the burns on his cheeks, and her brother, ignorant as ever.

"Get the fuck off of me!" he snarled as he was shoved into the truck bed, jostling South Chungcheong.

The green-eyed Yankee gave him a smack across the chest with his rifle for his trouble.

South Chungcheong leaned away from him, brushing at where he had touched in disdain. "You think you would have learned by now that reckless defiance only ends in disgrace."

North Chungcheong angular eyes flashed as he curled his lip at her. "And you think you would've learned that keeping your head down like a good little slave still ends with you in the back of the truck with us. This feel nostalgic to you, sis?"

He could not possibly know how much.

South Chungcheong scoffed, but did not flay him with her tongue. The cold was gripping her too tightly.

The ride was not long, but felt as an eternity. America drove torturously slow, giving the blizzard time to freeze them. As they drove into the wind, the canvas covering cut the worst of it. But seated near the opening, the currents curled their fingers in to tug at South Chungcheong's goreum, and the cold followed them, slithering across her chest.

The presence of her cousins did nothing to warm her. She would have thought America would take advantage of their isolation to do what he wished to her without the others knowing, but perhaps she was to serve as an example.

Or perhaps this was nothing, merely an exercise in terror. But South Chungcheong did not hold tightly to that hope.

When the truck finally stopped, she slid out before the Yankees could lay hands on her, near stumbling on her frozen feet. They burned inside her thin shoes, and the fingers she had kept primly clasped together refused to straighten.

The snow cut all vision, and the cold masked all scent. But in port cities, the wind blew in off the sea more oft than not. As they had been driving towards it, she deduced that the large rectangular building they were being shepherded towards was a docks warehouse.

"I thought we'd be going to the police station, or your headquarters!" she could hear the Southern one shouting.

"More room here, kid!" America shouted back.

That did not bode well. The station or foreign headquarters would have provided some semblance of professionalism, others that could bear witness, even if they were just as bloodthirsty as their Yankee master. More chances of leaks, and as such, less of a chance for brutality. But this dark warehouse, isolated on the edge of Busan, and the truck headlights that had never once turned on, bore very, very poorly.

As they entered the warehouse, and the overhead lights turned on, washing the piles of crates and boxes stacked almost wall to wall in filthy yellow light, the last bit of warmth in South Chungcheong's marrow froze.

There was a man curled up on the ground.

His head was shaved, bloody scabs curving across his scalp where the razor had cut too close. He was dressed in filthy peasant's clothing, a loose shirt and pants that had once been white, and were now grey with filth and embroidered with patches of rust red. His knees and chin were curled into his chest for warmth, his hands unable to join, bound as they were behind his back with coarse hemp rope.

South Chungcheong's heart thundered in her chest, drowning out the roaring of the muted blizzard raging outside.

Run run run 'Move damn you-'

Still her feet did not obey. Even if 'twere not for the chains of Command, her iced-over tendons would not have let her get far.

She had been a fool. And worse than that, she had known she was being a fool and she had still done it anyway. She had followed a man's whims and ended up getting burned for it, just like all the idiots she had always scorned.

Perhaps she deserved this.

"Why don't you fellas go warm yourselves up, get a cup'a joe or something?" America suggested to the waiting guards, and they saluted before marching from the room, along with South's handlers.

'Twas just the provinces, the foreigner, and the puppet now. And the man.

His eyes opened a crack at America's boisterous tone, lids peeling back, waylaid by the ice crystals frozen to his lashes. As they landed on the provinces, on her, they widened in terror.

His body twitched, trying to rise, and a tortured scream tore from his throat as his chin peeled away from the tops of his knees, leaving a layer of skin behind on the fabric. South Chungcheong suspected he had been soaked in water shortly before this.

"What are you doing to him?!" South Gyeongsang and her soft heart cried, lurching forward.

America stopped her, a wall of muscle in her path. "Ah ah ah, babe. You don't want to get to close to him. He's a dangerous prisoner."

"You're torturing him!" she cried, trying to slap at his chest.

Her hand froze in mid-air, and America took it, faux-waltzing her back towards the others as she struggled to break free.

The water was not the only damage. As the man struggled and heaved himself up onto his bloody knees, more marks of torture became clear.

He was gaunt, his bruised cheekbones near poking through his skin, and his formerly straight nose had more crooks in it than Rhee's government. From her position to the side of the door, carefully not centering herself, South Chungcheong could see that his blackened fingertips were raw, not a nail left on them. His lips were bloodied and burst, and when he spat scarlet phlegm on the dirt floor, it was clear he was missing more than one tooth.

"Look at this!" North Chuncheong cried furiously, marching towards South. "Look at him! This is what you're letting this bastard do to our people! You're letting foreigners match into our country and torture Koreans!! How can you think you're in the fucking right?"

South backed away from his words. "He's an enemy spy. Don't act like North doesn't torture spies, too."

"We never even tortured fucking Japanese!" the incensed male Chungcheong cried.

"Enough of this."

South Chungcheong sliced through the useless chatter with her tongue, tilting her chin as America's attention was drawn to her, along with everyone else's.

"The hour is late, and the night is cold," she said, fighting to keep the waver from her voice. "Inform us of why we have been dragged from our slumber so uncouthly, so that I may return to my bed."

"You seriously don't even care what they're doing to this guy?" he brother demanded, disgusted.

She ignored him, as did America.

"Well you see," the foreigner drawled, sauntering over to the prisoner. "We've got a little problem. A coupla weeks ago, one of Southie here's officers was found dead in a ditch nearby the base he was stationed at. Tragic accident, the word on the street is."

America stood next to the man, leaning his full weight on the hand he placed on his shoulder, making him bare his remaining teeth.

"But word behind the scenes is that he mighta been assassinated. Ya see, one of my guys thought he saw a labourer hanging around that shouldn'ta been."

He was speaking in some ridiculous affect, not enunciating his 'r's,' and turning his 'o' sounds to 'a's'.

"And while we ain't gawt no luck finding him, we did find a guy he was seen meeting with a little bit before that." America's hand squeezed the prisoner's shoulder, hard enough that he drew a tortured moan from his ruined lips.

"And after talking to him real polite-like, he told us dat's da truth." He beamed down at the man, who stared forward, focused on a patch of ground. "Ain't that right, pal?"

"Go… to… hell," he forced out, words lisping and stiff.

"We also got something else interesting out of him." America's cold white grin turned on the provinces as his accent dropped, and South Chungcheong's pulse stopped.

"He said he did it on orders. And he said those orders came from a province."

There must be far more grievous wounds hidden under his clothes, or that left no marks. No hand-picked personal agent assigned to a Provincehuman would crack so easily.

The eyes of the others widened as they exchanged glances, each wondering whose handler he was. It was pitifully obvious that they did have handlers. Only Jeju shrunk down, desperate to avoid being accused.

South Chungcheong remained poised. "'Tis obvious the North would have had agents in place to pass instructions during the period before the war. Only an idiot would still be unaware of that fact if he were in your position. Why must I be dragged out of bed to be informed of it?"

"Because after he told my guys that, he clammed right up." America patted his back. "No matter how nice they ask, he won't give 'em a peep more. And you're right, dame- only an idiot wouldn't know. And I'm not an idiot, am I?"

He grinned at her. Her expression did not flicker, even as a stitch of relief crossed her nerves.

A chance.

"We're fully aware some of you folks were having a little more contact with the North than ya should have been. I mean, hell- some of youse were even taking to the hills. Ain't that right, beefcake?"

"And I'd do it again!" North Chungcheong spat, like an imbecile.

"So of course I knew." America's head scanned down the line, until his gaze landed on her again. “The problem is that is seems like this guy is still in contact. But he won't tell us how. I mean, none of you have been out and about for awhile, have ya?”

His bottomless aviators bore into her. South Chungcheong blinked back, unimpressed.

“So, that’s the question, isn’t it?” he drawled, his hand resting on his hip, and the pistol at it. “How’d he get in contact? And which province is he working for?”

He strafed the others again, cold and predatory. “Any ideas?”

None of them said anything. Except for that imbecile, of course.

“If you want to know so bad, why don’t you just have him Command it out of us?”

South winced as North Chungcheong flung a hand at him.

‘Idiot.’

“We could,” America acknowledged. “That’s definitely Plan B. But South here wanted to give you the chance to come clean and tell us all your wicked deeds are in the past. ‘Cuz I mean, if they aren’t, and it has to be forced out of ya, well…” He shrugged. “That’d make you a traitor. Just like this flip.”

The man stared at the floor, his crooked jaw tight with the same guilt in his swollen, bloodshot eyes, blood dribbling from his mouth as he shook and trembled uncontrollably, his clothes frozen to his body.

Even North Chungcheong went quiet.

“You were brainwashed before,” America said jovially, voice echoing around the cavernous room. “You’d eaten up years of North Korea’s lies, and didn't have time to unlearn 'em. And he Commanded you to fight, didn’t he?”

The other provinces' faces were stony. South Chungcheong’s was bored.

“But now, you’ve seen just what he’s capable of.” America let go of the man, swaggering towards them. “You’ve seen him and his boys cut down peasants and massacre poor innocent folks.”

“That never happened!” Gyeonggi burst out, then hid behind South Gyeongsang’s frame.

“You’ve seen how vicious and savage him and the Northerners are,” America continued, unabated as he strolled right up to them. “And you’ve seen how good me and Southie have been treating you. So if you’re still spewing his propaganda, and working with his agents…”

He leaned around South Gyeongsang to peer at Gyeonggi.

“That would make you a real, bonafide Communist, wouldn’t it? And you know what happens to Communists.”

South Gyeongsang put herself between them. “Leave him alone.”

America’s lips curled as he lowered his face towards hers. “Or what?”

The woman trembled, clearly trying to strike him once more, but unable to. Completely helpless.

There was no ‘or what.’ She could do nothing to America, and he could do anything he wished to her. Unlike South Chungcheong, she had not even a saving grace.

“Enough with your games.” South Chungcheong felt his gaze fly to her like an arrow. “Tell us what you desire so I may leave.”

“I ‘desire’ whoever owns this guy to come forward,” America said, taking a step back from South Gyeongsang. “I want you to tell South you’re reeeeeally sorry for hurting his feelings, then tell me how you got in contact with ole Northie. That’s all. Quick and easy.”

‘Twould not be so simple. South Chungcheong could tell that even her cousins kenned it.

America had been tricked. Somehow, with all his precautions and guards, one of them had still had enough spirit and wit to make contact with an enemy agent. They had done it right under his hideous foreign glasses. He had been slighted. And men did not take being slighted well.

There were ways to punish that left no mark. And South had not believed her before. He would not believe any of them now. He would not wish to.

The Southern Korea may be deluding himself into thinking that if the traitor came forward, they would be spared. But he was the only one in the room that was.

"And if no one comes forward, then South uses the good ole Commands, and whoever fesses up is going to be staying in some less comfy accommodations than they are now," America continued casually. "Just for caution's sake. Clearly we can't have a traitor just hanging around, having our guys assassinated. And on the off chance you all manage to bite your tongues off before you can tell us, I'm sure this gentleman here will tell us real soon. His winter's about to get a lot colder otherwise."

The prisoner was weak. His tremors were draining the last bits of energy in his body, and South Chungcheong could tell by the look in his eyes that his mind was on the verge of breaking. She had no doubt that 'twould not take much more to make him spill his innards.

South looked uncomfortable at the overt mention of torture. He was not so stupid as to believe it wasn't being carried out on the man.

But he protested not.

It seemed America no longer had an inclination to hide matters like this from him. The Korean had moved on from denial to justification, as he had done earlier.

If she were to be tortured, strung up and violated, would South be told? Would he justify it, just as he justified the rape of their women and the brutalizing of this man?

No one was speaking. No one would come forward, not even to say the man had not belonged to them. They were too stubborn.

South Chungcheong loathed drawing attention back to herself, but she did it anyway.

“You are admitting you tortured this traitor,” she stated. “As such are we to believe his confession was gained under duress?”

“I wouldn’t say ‘torture,’ per say,” America said, spinning his pistol around his finger. "Just fed him his buckwheats."

“So that is a yes.” South Chungcheong arched a brow. “And how, pray tell, do you know he spoke the truth? Men being tortured will say anything to put an end to it.”

‘Twas why the Northern one had never utilized it, even when she could tell he would like nothing more than to make one of their Japanese captives scream.

“She’s right.” A rare admission from the Northern Jeolla. “You don’ even know-“

“-if he was tellin’ the truth,” her sister finished.

South Chungcheong allowed her voice to grow slightly more heated as she stalked across the floor towards America. “You have dragged us all out of bed at this unwarranted hour without coats or boots to interrogate us solely on information gleaned from a tortured prisoner. Have you no respect?”

“You’re really letting him treat us this way?” South Gyeongsang asked South, more disappointed than furious. She had always been more of a lady than their more uncouth cousins.

South shrank back. “I-“

“Forget us!” North Chungcheong cried, storming at him. “You’d let him treat one of our people that way?! If that man really is a spy, it’s because he’s a damn patriot. Because he can’t stand having Rhee and this bastard rule over us! Because he wants our country to be free.”

South Chungcheong’s brother may be an imbecile, but he was a reliable imbecile. His fervor was working up the others.

“Even if Korea’s army tortured one'a Rhee’s agents-“ South Jeolla began.

“It’s differen' than torturin’ one'a his,” North Jeolla finished.

“Them and their masters cut down my workers for strikin', they massacred my peasants on Haui Island for not wantin' to hand over grain they couldn' afford to give, they murdered my coal miners just for celebratin' Liberation Day!" The Southern Jeolla not only shockingly finished her own sentence, but followed it with another. "I ain’t never seen one'a the KPA gun down a civilian on our way to the Raktong, but I did see Rhee’s butchers massacre my people.”

“The Communists started it!” South protested.

“Rhee started it by oppressin’ us!” South Jeolla cried, her pale skin red around her blue flower. “He started it by refusin’ to give us our land and killin’ our comrades! America started it by Dividin’ us and you started it by lettin’ him march his soldiers in and occupy us again!”

“Look at Jeju.” South Gyeongsang gestured to her, and the waif curled in on herself like it was the last thing she wanted. “Do you think it’s normal that she’s like this? Do you think it’s normal that she’s afraid of her own shadow and can’t even talk? What do you think he-“ She glared at America. “-and Rhee’s criminals did to her?”

South flinched back as if she had hit him, his arms wrapping around himself. “They didn’t do anything to her.”

Jeju’s thin shoulders hunched around her ear slits.

“You Commanded us so we wouldn’t be able to spread ‘Communist propaganda,’” North Chungcheong cut in. “Why do you think the Commands aren’t stopping SJ from telling you about what happened in her province? Why do you think I can say this man is a fucking patriot? Answer me, S-S-S-"

Finally with a bit of a man's fire, South's eyes flashed as he shouted, "Don't call me that! I am Korea."

America was watching the proceedings with amusement, pistol dangling from his finger. The Commands would still be an issue, but one problem at a time.

'Now.'

"You're not-!"

"I am sick and tired of this!" South Chungcheong exclaimed, and before anyone could react, she lunged forward and tore America's firearm from his grasp.

He snatched at her, but she darted back, pulse running wild in her veins as she fought pleaded begged for her arm to point the gun where it should be pointed. She would not bow, but she would get on her knees if her body would just let her-

It did not. The urge was too strong.

So instead she spun before America could grab her, pointing the pistol at the prisoner. Her finger quivered on the trigger, but would not apply that final ounce of pressure. The Commands would not let her harm anyone.

In that split second before she could be stopped, she looked down at the man, demanding that he understand.

And the man on the floor looked up at her, his vision clearing, resolve hardening it.

"Long live Korea," he said, then lunged at her with the last bit of strength in his body.

South Chungcheong pulled the trigger, and Pak Seo-nam slumped to the floor, dead.

The stunned silence seemed to fill the warehouse, eclipsing the sound of the storm outside. The clatter of the gun as South Chungcheong dropped it on the floor broke it.

North Chungcheong's muscles twitched as he tried to go for it, but his body would not obey. America lunged for the firearm, getting it safely back in his grasp.

"Are we done?" South Chungcheong asked coldly, blood creeping across the floor to caress her shoe.

"What the fuck did you do?" North Chungcheong demanded.

South Gyeongsang's hands had flown over her mouth in horror, and the others were in much the same state. Jeju was staring at the dead man, eyes wide and vacant.

"What did you do, dame?" America's echoed. "Or rather 'why?'"

She could not see his eyes, but the real question was clear in the way he tilted his head at her.

'How?'

She answered him, not the Northern Chungcheong. "I eliminated your pawn before you used it as an excuse to humiliate us more."

She spun to South. "I will not deny that some among us were imbecilic enough to work with the North before the war. But do you truly believe that somehow one of them made contact with an agent when we have not even seen the sky in months? We are not allowed to set foot in our yards, let alone in a spot that could serve as a meeting place. The entire street is monitored- no one sets foot on it without Rhee, someone in his cabinet, or America knowing. That man-"

She gestured carelessly at the corpse. "Was a traitor. I would not be surprised to find that the North sent him here to be caught, and to try and sow dissent amongst us. What value did this assassinated officer have?"

"I- I don't really know," South stuttered. "He wasn't even a general, I don't think."

South Chungcheong nodded decisively. "You forget that I know exactly how the North works. He sent this man to set up an assassination of an unimportant target so that he would be taken into custody and spill his 'secrets.'"

'Twas dangerous, but she knew the Yankee must already be thinking it. The Southern one had to as well.

"In fact, as the only person here who did not join his little crusade last year, aside from the useless waif, I would bet that he desired for you to suspect me."

South looked at her as she looked at him the same way she had the prisoner, and his brows furrowed in.

"If he did truly work for a province," South Chungcheong continued. "What is more likely? That it is one of us heavily-surveilled prisoners? Or Gangwon?"

"Hey! Leave Gang out of this!" Gyeonggi cried.

"You'd seriously throw him under the trolley?" North Chungcheong demanded incredulously.

South Chungcheong grit her teeth. 'Morons.'

Was Gangwon not the sole southern province out of America's grasp?

"You seem awful eager to blame someone else, dame," America said, and her muscles wound tight. "I wonder why that is?"

South Chungcheong rounded on him, lips thin, irritated without being incensed. "I am eager to put an end to this and leave this filthy, freezing warehouse, and I am eager to stop being summoned in the middle of the night for matters that bear no import to me. I do not care who amongst us is a traitor- I am already aware of where these fools' loyalties lie, as are you. I want this war to be over so that I may go back to being comfortable and not have to put up with nuisances like this."

She glared up at him, in aggravation, not defiance, her hands at her side, not clenched or shaking.

America stared back, dark and empty.

Then he swung his head to South. “Command her.”

South Chungcheong followed his gaze, looking the Countryhuman in the eye. He met them, searching.

Her heart pounded, her breaths shallow, though she refused to let them cloud the air.

There was no way to fight the Commands, whether it was just her or all of them. The only thing she could do was what she hated most- depend on someone, and hope South was not as stupid as his actions. Or as cruel.

South stared at her as she reached out for solidarity she could not hope to receive.

Then he broke her gaze, looking at the others, then back to America.

“I don’t think I need to.”

The temperature in the warehouse lowered.

“What was that, kid?”

South put his hands in his pockets, shrugging. “She’s right. If he was working for someone, it was probably Gangwon. There’s no way he isn’t with North. He would've heard me on the radio by now if he wasn't.”

“Sure,” America said patiently, leaving South Chungcheong to close on him. “But we could know for sure with one little question. ‘All provinces, was this guy your handler?'"

“North wants me to suspect the provinces,” South said, and though he sounded casual, he could not hide the way he shrank back from the larger man. “If I Command South Chungcheong, or any of them, it'll just make them want to listen to me less."

America's hand closed on his shoulder. "There is a spy in our midst, South. A spy that ended up getting one of your boys killed."

"And now he's dead, too," the Korean replied. "And it's not like whichever province it was would know who the actual assassin was." The man's swelling in his throat bobbed. "It's over. If it was one of these guys, then let's just lock them up tighter so nothing like it can happen again."

His arms crossed over his chest as his lips thinned, his voice darkening with sincerity.

"I don't want to let North win."

America stared down at him. South Chungcheong mentally willed her moronic relatives to keep their mouths shut, and they did.

The Yankee looked back at her, his black gaze piercing into her flesh. Not a muscle on South Chungcheong's face twitched. Men were like hounds. One could not provoke them.

"Alright, Southie," America eventually said. "Have it your way. You're in charge, after all."

His heavy hand slammed down onto his shoulder as the judgement was rendered.

South Chungcheong's legs went weak, and her insides watery. But she knew 'twas not over. Not until she was inside her prison manor. And perhaps not even then.

No. She knew t'would not be over then. Not so long as the war waged.

"Thanks," South said, and the relief in his smile was palpable. "Can we go back now? I'm freezing."

The cold may have saved her tonight. Not even America wanted to go stand in it for privacy. And men in charge did not like witnesses seeing their subordinates have to be convinced, only submit.

“Sure thing, kid.”

America gave South Chungcheong one last, long look, then went for the door. South and the province followed, the latter with her chin up. She could feel the eyes of her cousins on her, accusing her with their weight.

‘Traitor.’

She left no crimson footprints. The dead man's blood had already frozen over.

—

An hour later, South slid into South Chungcheong’s house, knocking on the door to her room.

“It’s me.”

She was still awake. “Come in, if you must.”

He opened the door. She was standing against the far wall, like when they’d came for her earlier, only a darker shadow in the dark room.

They stared at each other in silence, as they had in the warehouse. As he had read the look in her eyes, a plea and a confession all at once.

“America asked me how you managed to shoot that guy,” he said eventually.

“And what did you tell him?”

“The truth. You’re so mouthy that I was worried about your guards roughing you up, and Commanded you not to hurt anyone unless it was in self-defense.”

He’d been worried he’d made a mistake doing it all those months ago. And maybe he had.

But he was glad for it tonight.

“And is that the truth?” she asked. “’Twas my guards you were worried about?”

“Yes.”

She scoffed softly. “Will you repeal it now then?”

“No.” He bit down on the urge to justify himself and defend his friend. “Don’t tell America.”

“Do you hear yourself?” she demanded. “You beg me not to tell a foreign country about your decisions involving one of your provinces like a child pleading with his mother not to tell father he was in the pantry. Is that how Korea should act?”

South was silent. Then, “I can’t help you next time, South Chungcheong.”

“Cannot? Or will not?”

“Both.”

Another long silence.

“I would not expect you to,” she said eventually, and the ondol floor did nothing to warm the words.

He wanted her to ask why he had tonight. Even now knowing what he knew, some part of him wanted her to reach out again, to connect, to feel like he had in the warehouse as she met his eyes and he defended her. He’d felt betrayed, but he also felt…

But she didn’t.

So South backed away, closing her door. The blizzard that lashed at his skin felt warm compared to what was inside his heart.

He had thought South Chungcheong was different. He had thought she was the one province his brother hadn’t brainwashed, the one province he hadn’t won over. The one South might, maybe, someday get to come around, to like him more, to see him as Korea. But he had been wrong.

She was just like all the rest.

In the howling storm, he felt very small. And very alone.

I've wanted to write this chapter foreverrrrrr. South Chungcheong's seed of lawyerdom showing. I want to get to her backstory chapter so much. Also when America slips into a accent, he's doing New York Italian mob boss. He's the only one that gets the joke, but his target audience is himself anyway.

'They're letting a terrorist in the White House!' I regret to inform you, but there's always been a terrorist in the White House. It's called the President of the United States. There's another terrorist in the White House.

Empty Stomachs, Full Hearts

"-gang? Chagang?"

Chagang blinked blearily as he heard his name called. He looked up to see North Pyongan standing over him.

"The food is ready."

Chagang could barely smell the pots that steamed on the stove. His nasal passages were choked with the sharp scent of iron.

A wisp of concern coiled around his cousin. But the azure joy shining around him was much brighter. It pierced into Chagang's skull like a stun grenade. It took a moment to clear the haze of North Pyongan's emotions away so he could respond.

"Thank you."

He stood, the last to fill his bowls, ladling small portions of rice and soup into them. He took kimchi from the crock Comrade Kim Song-ae had specially made for them for winter, careful not to take too much. With their numbers, it was quickly running out.

"I feel like your headaches are getting worse," SH fretted from her seat.

All the provinces were back from their lands tonight. Their colours were loud, refreshed with worry, fear, grief, and everything else trying to get as many people as they could through winter brought.

It made Chagang's head feel muddled. Lately even good emotions did.

The red and gold that sometimes flickered around North Pyongan when he looked at Liaoxi had grown brighter recently. As he sat next to the female province, it flared, wreathing his head like a fiery halo. It flickered from her, too, breaking cracks in the usually colourless air around her.

As beautiful as it was, Chagang had to fight to push it away. The night seemed dull in comparison.

"Chagang?" SH sounded concerned.

"You're starting to space out again, Big Guy," South Pyongan teased. "Careful, Hae might steal your food if you do."

"Ah'd never steal anyone's food," Hae said indignantly, her eyes fixed on his rice. "'Specially not Cha's. Korea's got him workin' real hard."

Not as hard as when the war was in its active phase. Instead of coordinating full-scale actions, Chagang had to travel around the provinces assessing the condition of the rear units, making sure the aircraft-hunting teams were prepared to counter aerial landings, and visiting ammunition and weapons factories. The difficult part was the travel.

And the colours that came off the workers. Bright bursts of tawny, cream, and blue as they succeeded at over filling quotas or overcame a problem on the production line, and cloying ash, ink, and sick yellow as they tried to work through mourning those they had lost, and fearing for those they hadn't. Interspersed with stabs of dark red as they thought of the ones that had caused this. The enclosed underground rooms only served to choke Chagang even more.

"Do you need to see Kangwon?" SH asked, anxious olive threading through the anger that was always with her now.

"I'm fine," Chagang said, making himself lift his spoon to his mouth.

The soup was thinner than usual. After returning from their lands, his cousins had set aside even more of their rations, and were working to stretch out what they kept even more. He had memories of North Pyongan working in the KPRA to powder venison and vegetables to make them last longer. This tasted like the potato powder he had helped make a few weeks ago.

"Here."

He looked up to see Liaotung holding something out. Taking it revealed one of the hard ginger candies that China sometimes pulled from his sleeves.

"And don't complain," she said before he could speak. "China gave it to me to give to you."

Chagang accepted it, sliding it into his pocket for after dinner. He still wasn't sure if it accomplished the same thing that fresh ginger did, but having something in his mouth made it easier to concentrate enough to push the colours back.

"Thank you."

"Anytime. I'll try and convince him to send home for more." The teal-skinned woman returned to her sister's side, huddling against her on the log.

Her emotions were better contained than her sister's, but not as well as China's. He could see discomfort shivering off of her in the cold.

Liaoxi's was even stronger. But where her side brushed against North Pyongan's, the red and gold warmed it. This pleased Chagang.

What didn't please him was the fog he could see coming from his cousins again as he eased his guard. The yellowish-grey was thick and pungent. It didn't come from the cold, but from hunger.

The Chinese provinces were hungry, too. But their provinces weren't in as dire straits. Between the Koreans' people starving and their efforts to abate that even a little, Chagang hadn't gone a day without being drowned in that yellow-grey sea since fall began.

The colour of hunger was the same as discomfort, but the texture was different. It was denser, more muddled. Something felt by the body and mind both. The empathetic hunger was thinner, but more long-staying.

Before the war, he had never experienced that secondary hunger, or even his own. He had been formed in 1949. The food issue had been solved by then. Even if his people weren't feasting, they hadn't been starving. Any hunger of his cousins' was temporary, not strong enough to be seen. As was his.

He had North Pyongan's experiences of it. He couldn't know exactly how it felt, but he knew of it.

The reality was much worse. It clutched at his insides like claws, leaving him hollow, except for an occasional sharp pain that stabbed through his guts like the one in his temples. His head felt stuffed, and his stomach felt empty. And someplace deeper than that, that he knew no amount of rice or soup would fill. It wasn't his, after all.

"If your headache isn't going away, maybe you should start eating more," SH suggested.

"You should all be fucking eating more," North Hamgyong grunted from where he was standing by the mountainside. "You're being idiots."

"Mm, yes," Hwang said, hunched over by the firelight to read 'Military Knowledge.' "Those of us limiting our caloric intake are idiots, aren't we?"

"Shut up," North Hamgyong growled. Irritation prickled from his shoulders. And orange-tinged yellow. Chagang had suspicions, but they were not his to share.

"Or maybe you're just a selfish jerk!" SH snapped, her dark red aura flaring. The edges were tipped with oily black. It hurt to see.

South Pyongan raised her hand. "I'd like to not be caught in the crossfire here."

She sounded casual. But ochre guilt flickered around her hands as she spooned the last of her rice and soup into her mouth. Her bowl had been fuller than theirs.

"Sorry," SH apologized, her own ochre directed at her cousin. But not her brother.

North Hamgyong curled his lip. Chagang did not see his colours. He had shut in eyes in preparation.

"I'm alright," he said to SH. "I'm eating enough."

"Okay," she said, and he knew she still had worry and maroon swirling around her. "Just don't push yourself."

Chagang had to. If he didn't visit the factories and units, then Korea would. He would never rest. In order to lift even those light tasks from him, he had to overcome the headaches. And he knew eating more wouldn't solve that.

"And why wouldn't you be eating enough, I wonder?"

They all jumped as China emerged from the woods. Except Chagang. He hadn't seen him coming. A sharp shooting pain in his temple had just momentarily paralyzed him.

North Hamgyong recovered first. "None of your business."

"I apologize for my relative, Comrade China," SH cut in. The colours around her contrasted sharply with her tone. "He's suffering immensely from the bombing of his land right now. It puts him in an unpleasant mood that no one enjoys."

His own deep red joined North Hamgyong's usual cloud of dark blue and heavy grey-black.

"No offense taken," China said smoothly, gliding over to where his provinces sat. "But only because you're lovely enough to make up for it."

Liaoxi sighed, and Liaotung made a sharp clicking noise with her tongue.

"Gege is allowed to have fun, Little Sisters." He folded his arms atop Liaotung's head, making her hunch. "So, why wouldn't our strong silent type be eating enough?"

He was looking at Chagang. But the province decided that wasn't enough to consider it a direct question. He took another spoonful of soup.

"None of us really are," SH said quickly. "You know what it's like being on rations."

"En," China said with a knowing smile. "Don't worry, your secret's safe with me. I don't like getting involved in things that don't concern me."

Liaotung made a skeptical noise, and he leaned on her head harder.

"Your Countryhuman won't be back tonight, by the way," the Chinese country added. "He took off in the Jeep for the front camp."

Spikes of alarms shot from Chagang's cousins. It should have been a relief that he wouldn't have to block out Korea's overwhelming colours. But he felt his own dread.

"Did he say what he was going to do?" Hwang asked, olive fizzling around him. He had even put down his magazine.

"I believe he was just going to speak personally to our negotiators about that little problem involving your cousin," China answered. "I would have gone with him, but he actually pushed me out of the vehicle. My vehicle," he added, like they had forgotten.

Chagang still saw no irritation from him. He wondered if China being willing to sleep in the same room as Korea meant he really didn't feel it. Or if Hwang's snoring had just been too much.

Thinking of what he had seen from him at the Foundation Day speech, and when he had hustled into their room that final time to snatch his radio equipment, he decided he had his answer.

"It would be dangerous to discuss Gangwon over telegram," the male Hwanghae pointed out. But his unease didn't vanish.

The American negotiators had started asking leading questions about the southern province. It was definitely a precursor to demanding him back. The northerners had been ordered not to tell him, or Kangwon
Which was good. Their colours were overwhelmed with stress already.

But it being logical for Korea to visit near the front didn't whisk any of their anxiety away. Even if he had went for a logical reason, they all knew his emotions could give him a new one. Chagang especially.

SH masked her colours with a smile. "I'm sure he'll be fine. I'm sorry he took your Jeep. Again." The sigh in her voice couldn't be masked. "I hope he at least didn't make you walk here from the city."

"No," China assured her. "He booted me out on the edge of these woods." He straightened, stretching luxuriously. "Come on, Little Sisters. Gege has home and army updates."

Liaotung slid from under him, but didn't succeed at making him fall. She finished the last of her food, then set her dish near the washbasin. They were on rotation, when SH didn't bully her way into doing them. Tonight was Chagang's turn.

"You, too, Xi'er." China smiled at Liaoxi. Chagang almost saw embarrassment seep out of her before it was whisked back in.

She stood. She didn't give North Pyongan more than a backwards glance. But Chagang saw her red and gold touch his hand.

China gave his cousin a knowing smile. You didn't need Chagang's ability to see his cheeks turn purple.

"Gege's going to have the room to himself tonight," China sighed as he took his provinces inside. "He's going to be so cold. And lonely."

"A tragedy," Liaotung said dryly.

"If only there were a couple dear, sweet little sisters willing to warm him up," he continued forlornly. "Or lend him their coats."

"Alas, it seems his hopes will not float," Liaoxi chimed, slamming the door.

"Fucking weirdos," North Hamgyong grunted. At least he didn't feel strongly about it.

"Weirdos who are helping us Liberate our country," Hwang reminded him, already reimmersed in his magazine.

"Some fucking help-" North Hamgyong couldn't see SH's flare of red. But he cut himself off with a 'tch' anyway. "Whatever."

"Oh wow," South Pyongan said, tossing her dish at the basin. "He's actually learning how to shut his mouth. Didn't know he could do that."

"You want to fucking die?"

Their bickering was friendly, but the other dark emotions were still leaking from North Hamgyong and SH. Chagang went to close his eyes to escape them, but was distracted by a flicker of ochre.

He looked over to see Hae, who had been weirdly quiet. She had drank all her soup, but somehow still had most of her rice left, when usually she inhaled it. She turned away from him and the others, and he could hear her spoon scraping her bowl. When she sat up, it was empty.

She popped up, still stained with guilt, and carefully stacked her bowls with the others, picking up South Pyongan's to nestle it on top. Then she skipped back to flop back down next to Chagang. Her hand patted her pack, greyish-blue impatience joining the guilt as she looked around to make sure no one had seen her.

She caught Chagang looking and the ochre spiked.

He stared at her. After a few second-long staredown, she waved her hand in front of her face.

Chagang kept staring. Her shoulders slumped with the teal of relief.

'Hm.'

"Korea shouldn't be coming back tonight, but make sure the supplies are hidden anyway," SH was ordering.

"I will," North Pyongan assured. "I'll take first watch, too, if no one else wants it."

SH looked to his sister. "South Pyongan, do you want second watch?"

"Ugh," she moaned. "You know I hate second watch. It's like I've got just enough time to fall asleep, but I don't actually get any rest. I feel like shit when I get woken up that soon."

"That's why you need to adapt," SH said. "But fine. North Hamgyong will take it."

"And who the fuck said I'd do that?" he grunted, dark blue stabbing from him.

"Me," SH said sweetly. "The schedule maker. Unless you want the job."

He *'tch'*ed.

"That's what I thought. So North Pyongan, North Hamgyong, Hae, me- Hwang, do you need time to prepare your teaching materials tomorrow?"

He shook his head 'no,' and she nodded.

"Then you'll go next, and South Pyongan can do last watch so she has time to work out in the morning."

The woman raised her glass in a toast. "My favourite cousin!"

Chagang blinked. "And me?"

"You need a rest night," SH decided. "I'll do the dishes, too."

"Korea won't like that."

"I'll do the dishes, too," she repeated forcefully.

"Oh no you don't. Bad. Bad SH." Red-blue crackled from South Pyongan, though her tone was casual. "Stop stealing dish-duty. Unless it's from me," she added after a moment of consideration.

"I-"

"Opinion rejected! Tiger Fists of Fury!" South Pyongan lunged at her cousin, heaving her into the air and over her shoulder, spinning them both around in rapid circles.

"Put me down!" SH shrieked, clinging to her cousin's back as her legs whirled through the air.

"Quite a lack of 'fists' in this 'Tiger Fists of Fury,'" Hwang remarked, not looking from his pages.

A lack of fury, too. Chagang was relieved to see the colour shrink.

A guilty ochre blob crept away while no one else was looking.

"Okay, okay!" SH cried after a few more seconds of her punishment. "Chagang can do dishes! Put me down before I throw up."

"Oh, and the takedown!" South Pyongan cried, sliding her off her shoulder and slamming her onto the ground. Fairly gently. "Another victim of progress in the People's Korea!"

"You're the worst," SH moaned. Her nausea made the air around her swirl with more yellow-grey discomfort. But it swirled through sky blue.

"Actually I'm the best. Because I won." South Pyongan flexed over her supine body, then started for the bunker. "I'll go get my beauty sleep now. And Chagang I swear to the General, if you let her do dishes, you're both going to find out why it's called 'Tiger Fists of Fury' tomorrow."

The door slammed.

'Scary.'

"I doubt there is a reason," Hwang remarked. He read his magazine with one hand. North Pyongan loaded small sacks of rice into the other. "I suspect she just made that up."

"I've never heard her use it before," North Hamgyong confirmed.

"Which means she'll have the freedom to make something up tomorrow," North Pyongan said, finishing loading their cousin up, then lifting his own bags. "I would stay away from dishes if I were you, SH."

Their cousin grumbled. Chagang watched strands of shame rise from her.

Hwang frowned as he finally looked around. "Did Hae go inside already?"

That would have been unusual. She always bided as much time as possible before she went into the bunker. Chagang could see the uneasy dread every time she passed into the mountain, like dark grey and yellow pins stabbing into her arms.

"She went toward the latrines," he said.

Hwang still frowned, olive returning to him. It was out of character for Hae not to ask SH or South Pyongan to go with her.

"I can go check on her," SH said, staggering to her feet. She shook her head clear and brushed off her pants.

"I bet she cracked open your burns," North Hamgyong grunted. Dark blue and light olive coloured the words.

Sometimes Chagang wished his other cousins could see the colours. Looking at SH reminded him not to.

"Only on accident," she said, smiling tightly. "That's the only reason South Pyongan would hurt me."

Her words stabbed at North Hamgyong, drawing blood that was tan and a red darker than it should be.

He stormed inside.

"Perhaps you two should schedule a session with Kangwon," Hwang said, his olive deepening.

"Perhaps you should have a lovely night, Hwang."

"Yes, Comrade General." He scampered away from her, North Pyongan following.

SH huffed, standing up. She eyed Chagang.

"North Pyongan is coming back," he said to defend himself. "He'll tell South Pyongan if you do the dishes."

His cousin huffed. "I'll go get Hae, then. You saw her go for the latrines?"

He nodded. In the same direction, at least.

SH set off, and a minute later North Pyongan returned, taking up his guard post while Chagang set the water they had drawn earlier on the hearth to boil. Jangsan was a relatively small mountain, with no running water sources, so the river was still their closest option. Kangwon worried about intestinal parasites.

Left alone with just the cousin that was in a good mood, Chagang stopped trying to force the colours away completely. His headache eased slightly. He decided to save the ginger candy for another occasion, though his mouth watered thinking about it.

He needed to tame his hunger. They all did. Chagang never complained, but South Pyongan enjoyed it. North Hamgyong didn't, but did it anyway. And Hae would sometimes attach herself to Korea and moan that she was hungry. Her own discomfort from the hunger was almost never visible. She only did it because it was something she felt, and she wanted to comfort herself with their Countryhuman. Her colours were never accusing.

But Korea's alway reacted like they were. Ochre and chartreuse interspersed with drops of maroon like she had stabbed him.

His own hunger was never on display. Like his pain, drops of it would well out of him like he was being squeezed in a vise, before being wicked away. Chagang didn't think he or any of the provinces could manage that. But they didn't have to. Korea thankfully couldn't see the colours. They didn't have to hide it from themselves. All they had to do was hide it from him.

He would have to look for an excuse to bring it up with his cousins. In the meantime...

Chagang eyed North Pyongan over his shoulder. He was gazing intensely into the woods. But dreamy wisps of red and gold drifted around him. They made the hunger more bearable.

"Does Korea know about you and Comrade Liaoxi?"

His cousin made a strangled sound. Alarm bristled like cat hackles.

"M-Me and Liaoxi?" he stammered, then sighed in realization. "Did South Pyongan tell you?"

"No."

His cousin waited expectantly. Chagang watched the water boil.

"You're together, aren't you?" he eventually prompted.

North Pyongan nodded. The embarrassment on his face couldn't be seen through the embarrassment around him. And joy.

"We... are," he said shyly. "And Korea does know. I asked him if it was acceptable."

Chagang had assumed. His cousin wouldn't go behind Korea's back. And Korea had been aiming suspicion and unease at the Chinese woman for a week. More than even when they had first arrived. If he suspected without being told (unlikely), then he would have confronted North Pyongan.

"And he actually said yes?"

"Yes." Azure popped off of his shoulders. "Surprisingly easy."

Odd. Korea wasn't a romantic. Not in that way.

"Does he want you to use your relationship to gain more information from her?"

His cousin shook his head. "I told him I wouldn't be comfortable trying to sneak it from her anymore, but I said I'll still pass on anything important she tells me. She's aware."

"Why did he agree?"

North Pyongan thought for a moment. "I don't know. But I promised I wouldn't let my feelings for her interfere with my duties. Our country will always come first."

Christians weren't supposed to feel pride. Chagang had yet to meet one that didn't. Violet glowed around North Pyongan.

As it should. Regardless of any other reasons Korea had permitted him to court the Chinese province, it meant he trusted the man to hold to his word. Chagang knew how good that felt.

"She likes you, too," Chagang said.

More joy tinged with surprise came from him. "You think so?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

Because Liaoxi masked her emotions like China. The red-gold had to be strong for Chagang to see it.

"I do."

The water had come to a boil. He let it bubble to cleanse the bacteria.

North Pyongan was lost in a giddy cloud of emerald and azure. "I think she does, too."

More crimson and gold lit up the night like fireworks. Chagang missed fireworks. Their colours always echoed in the audience with far more beauty.

After a long moment, he asked, "How did you realize you liked her?"

His cousin raised his brows. "I feel like you're being uncharacteristically curious about this."

"Answer the question."

—

Hae crouched in the trees, watching. The creature watched back, its eyes all shiny as they reflected the moonlight making its way through the treetops. She held her breath.

Slowly, it snuck out of the dark, creeping towards her.

'Slorp slorp slorp.'

Hae wanted to clap with joy as the scrawny yellow dog started to scarf down the rice she'd saved for him, but knew from experience that she'd scare him away again. So she watched, trying not to let the happiness bubblin' under her skin make her vibrate.

Once he was done eating, it didn't matter so much if he ran off, so she chirped, "Howdy."

The dog flinched back, but didn't run away completely like he had the first few times.

"Did you like it?" Hae asked, pointing at the spot on the ground where the rice had been.

The dog snuffled around in the snow like there was more, and she felt bad for gettin' his hopes up.

"Sorry it's just rice again," she apologized. "We ain't- We haven't got meat in a li'l bit."

Korea had fed her meat a few times after she got back from the POW camp, and she'd had a bit of powdered meat soup a few times at the front, but not since then. The last time she'd even seen it had been at China's birthday party.

Hae loved meat, but she knew there were people that needed it more. It was real hard to let their animals grow big enough to make a good meal when their pastures were gettin' bombed.

The dog looked at her, whinin'.

"Ah'm okay," she assured him. "Ah ate enough earlier."

Her stomach growled. 'Traitor.'

"You din't hear that."

The dog whined again.

"It's okay," she chirped. "Korea's feedin' me, but you've got no one to feed you. So ah'll do it, even if I'm hungry."

She could suck on rocks to make herself forget about her empty belly for a li'l while, but her furry comrade didn't know how to do that. And besides, she'd never be as hungry as in the hole, so it din't really matter.

So whenever she found her mouth waterin' as she thought about pork and beef and chicken and- Um, anyhow, she'd just pop a rock in her mouth and remember that no matter how good the fake pink Yankee meat had tasted in prison, a stone tasted better now that she was free and back with Korea.

The dog flopped down in the snow. Hae felt bad. Dogs didn't know how to squat like people did, and even if they did, they didn't wear boots. His paws and belly must be cold all the time. She wondered if SH could make him little shoes out of fabric she didn't need.

"Oh, ah forgot to tell ya last time!"

Her excitement made the dog jump, and she clapped her hands over her mouth.

"Oops, sorry," she whispered, relieved when he didn't just run off. "Ah'll be quieter."

He chuffed like he was sayin', 'You better,' before floppin' back down.

"Anyhow," she made sure to whisper. "Korea told me Rim Gun-hon got got."

The dog looked confused.

"You don't know him," she explained. "But he was a real bad guy that got people to hurt me, and locked me up. And ah just know he hurt some of my people, too."

Her gloves clenched in the snow.

"But he's gone now," she said, relieved. "Korea says our agents heard about it. He said he must'a got sick or somethin'."

Good. Hae knew that even if they couldn't have got the death penalty for him after they were Reunified, Korea would have made sure he still paid for what he did.

But nothing he did could pay back what he'd helped do to Sincheon. Hae preferred him bein' dead.

"Dead as a Yankee," she told the dog. "And don't feel bad. He deserved it. Oh! But we're not allowed to tell anyone else, 'cuz Korea doesn't want anyone havin' too much information, in case we get captured again."

She thought that was a li'l silly. The no-good yellow-bellied bastard had been one of the Southern One's, so wouldn't he already know he was dead? So would 'Merica, since Korea said he ran the Southern army.

But if Korea wanted her not to tell anyone, then it couldn't be silly, and so she'd keep her mouth shut.

The dog looked at her with his big brown eyes, and Hae was pretty sure his li'l eyebrows were furrowed.

"It's okay," she assured him. "Ah'm not actually goin' to get caught again. Korea wouldn't let that happen. Ah'll still be around to feed you."

The dog looked happy about that. Hae inched forward, reaching out her hand, and-

He jumped up and back, givin' a li'l warning yip.

Hae pouted, sitting back on her haunches, foiled again. "Dang it."

"Hae."

The province jumped up guiltily, and the dog scrambled away into the woods, quick as a rabbit.

"Wait!" she called, spinnin' around. "Don't go! She's friendly!"

He was already gone.

Sighing, she turned back to SH, tryin' not to look too guilty.

"Howdy, SH."

Her cousin crossed her arms. Even though all the evidence was gone, she put it together immediately 'cuz she was real smart.

"You were feeding the rest of your dinner to that dog, weren't you?"

"No," Hae muttered, diggin' her toe in the dirt. "Ah mean yes. Aw shucks!"

SH sighed. "Hae..."

"Ah know," she said glumly. "Korea wouldn't be happy. But he din't tell me not to," she quickly added.

He knew the dog was hangin' around the mountain. He just didn't know it was because she'd been feeding him ever since she saw him that first time.

"I'm not happy," SH told her, real distressed-like. "You're already on half rations. You can't be giving half of that away to a stray."

The words she'd been planning on using on Korea if he caught her burst out.
"Buthe'ssocoldan'lonelyan'hungryan'he'srealskinnyan'ahdin'twanthimrootin'a "Ppang?" SH interrupted.

"'Cuz the first thing ah fed him was a bit'a that steamed bread we had that one time," she said proudly.

SH shook her head. "It's better than 'Clucky' at least."

"She died for her country," Hae said sadly, rememberin' all her favourite moments with their chicken, like when she ate her. "And she was delicious."

SH looked happy that she'd praised her cooking. That was promisin'.

Hae rounded her eyes. "You din't actually see me feed him, did ya?"

SH looked like she knew where she was goin'. "No."

"So you could maybe just think ah was lyin' when ah said ah was, and not tell Korea?"

SH squinted at her. Hae slumped.

She knew even if SH had said yes, she'd feel bad about it. 'Cuz then SH was sort of lying to Korea, and she didn't want to make her do that. And it would feel like she was, too.

"If you stop feeding it, I won't tell him," SH offered hopefully.

Hae looked over at where Ppang had went, then admitted, "Ah won't stop unless Korea tells me to."

She couldn't just leave Ppang out in the cold with no food. But she knew she couldn't bring him into the shelter. Korea had always been real firm that she wasn't allowed to bring a pet home unless it was a chicken (and that was a temporary pet since the second she stopped layin' eggs, she'd end up like Clucky). So the least she could do was give the poor puppy dinner, even if it was just a li'l bit of rice.

"I'm sorry, Hae," her cousin said, all gentle-like as she put a hand on her shoulder. "If you won't stop feeding it, then the only way I won't tell Korea is if you stop pooling half your rations with us. That way you'll still be eating... the same as everyone else."

SH couldn't say 'enough.' None of 'em were eating enough. And their people weren't either.

Hae looked down. "No. Our folks need that."

She really liked Ppang, and wanted to help him. But he was still just a dog. People came first.

"I'm sorry, Hae," SH apologized again.

"Korea's goin' to be mad." He'd probably yell at her.

But he'd be disappointed if she'd chosen Ppang over their people. And that would be worse.

"He'll be mad at all of us once he realizes what we're doing," her cousin sighed. "But I'll try to catch him in a good mood once he gets back. I don't want him to be mad at you, I just don't want you to starve."

She was pleadin' with her eyes for Hae to understand.

"Ah know you're just lookin' out for me," she assured her.

She knew she wasn't eating enough. The others weren't either, but she really wasn't. She wasn't lonely or bored, but she was hungry hungry hungry all the time. Not as bad as the hole, but it still felt like her insides were all hollow. Sometimes when she was suckin' on a rock, her body made her swallow it, hoping it was real food.

But it still made her sad she wasn't goin' to be able to feed Ppang anymore, especially when she'd just promised she would.

"Can ah still hang out with him, even if ah can't feed him?" she asked hopefully.

"The dog?"

"Ayuh."

She'd feel guilty not bringing him food, but at least she could give him a friend.

"I don't think Korea would make you stop." SH looked out into the woods. "Unless it has rabies, or looks sick."

Hae shook her head vigorously. "Nope! His nose an' eyes are all clear, and he doesn't snap at me or anythin'. He's just skinny, and growls a li'l when ah try to pet him."

"Maybe don't try and pet him," SH disappointedly advised. "Dogs have dirty mouths. We don't want to give Kangwon another patient."

Hae pushed out her bottom lip, eyes growing wider.

Her cousin sighed. "If he seems nice, you can try petting him again. Just be careful."

"Ura! SH!" Hae glomped to her side. "Ah'm still sad you're tellin' Korea on me, though."

She put an arm around her. "If it's any consolation, you probably would have accidentally told him soon anyway."

"Ah know," Hae sighed.

If Korea told her not to tell somethin', she was a locked box. But when it came to her own things she din't want to tell, she was as leaky as the woven sedge baskets she'd made back when they were all first learning.

She looked over her shoulder as SH took her back to the bunker, but Ppang hadn't returned.

Hae knew her cousin was just lookin' out for her, and she knew it was probably good Korea was goin' to tell her to eat more, and make sure she did. But her belly felt sick knowing she had to wait for him to yell at her.

No matter how hungry she was, she knew that would feel worse.

An important notice- I read a date in my notes wrong (never ask to see my handwriting in any language), so I took the part about voluntary repatriation out of Protectors' Onus to be used later. If you want, you can go back and read North's POV in that chapter again since it will provide a little bit of context for the next chapter. If not, you should be able to use context clues to get it. Sorry for the confusion!

China wishes that he smoked solely so someone could ask for a light, and he could lean over and use the cigarette in his mouth to sensually light the one in theirs. The reasons he doesn't are myriad- against taking anything even vaguely druglike; you can fake being a smoker for a role by spending time in a smoking parlour, but you can't fake not being a smoker (as someone whose parents smoke, the scent is not maskable); doesn't want yellow teeth- but this one pro comes very close to outweighing the cons.

Personality confirmed. My friend saw one of the bears a week ago and didn't tell me until today. She said she was scared I would try to hunt it. She is right.

Hunger

Another ‘Christmas’ had passed without America and MacArthur’s ‘Home By Christmas’ plan being realized. The provinces had thrown a celebration to commemorate it, and to celebrate one year since North had broken Kangwon, Hae, and South Pyongan out of the POW holding camp.

Yet North couldn’t make himself feel smug. He, his people, and the Chinese volunteers may have been able to withstand America and his puppets, and take half his stolen land back. But it was only half.

And the rest of his provinces were still prisoners of war.

He hadn’t heard anything since the news about Rim Gun-hon. The assassin had gone into deep-cover, and he had no way to get in contact with Pak Seo-nam. And he couldn’t risk contacting his agent again. All he could do was… get a ceasefire.

Another thing that had passed- the thirty-day limit to sign. The battleline hadn’t changed much, but would still need to be negotiated again. America had got his extension.

Seven days of refusing to discuss the POW issue at all, until with the deadline rapidly approaching, North and China’s negotiators had handed over their list of prisoners in hopes of forcing him to talk. Every non-Korean prisoner’s name, rank, and unit, painstakingly translated into English, and every Korean’s in their proper language.

And in exchange, they had been given a list of one hundred thirty-two thousand men and women. Just their names. In English.

It was near worthless, just like the next one the Yanks sent, only two days before the deadline. Their people’s names had been poorly transliterated into their respective languages. Korean had a limited alphabet, so English characters could carry over acceptably with a bit of guesswork. But with how China's language worked, matching sounds wasn't enough. His characters had multiple readings, and it was clear that they hadn't been considered.

The Americans had the reactionaries, and they had China's Nationalists. There was no excuse for the botched translations.

And there had been no excuse for the lists being short forty four thousand people. Forty four thousand missing between the reports the Americans sent to the Red Cross, and the ones given to them. America's Libby had insisted they were civilians from the south that had been released, before changing his story a few days later, and claiming they were still waiting to be screened.

North couldn't know if the number represented those killed in the camps that the Americans wanted to hide, men taken for the reactionary guerrillas, to be snuck back into the north to commit assassinations and sabotage, as the man South Pyongan had captured had confessed to, or if they really were just awaiting screening. Whichever one it was, as they waited for a new list that Libby had spitefully said would come 'eventually,' time had ran out.

And North knew it would run out again. No matter how many deadlines were set for a ceasefire, America would meet none of them.

'Persevere.' They just had to keep persevering, to prove that Korea would not be conquered. They had to be more trouble than they were worth to America. North had to force him to give up on his country.

He had to get his brother back.

He stopped in the middle of the road out of Pyongyang, looking back. "Stop following me."

China did, tilting his masked head. "Did you hear me?"

"Yes." North hadn't. He'd only known he would be there.

The other man gave an unconvinced hum. "Where are you heading off to with that, I wonder?"

North shifted the small straw sack in his arms, attempting to hide it without putting it behind his back. “None of your business.”

China’s eyes squinched. “A tiger father really doesn't raise canine sons. Though that’s not always a good thing.”

“I’m not in the mood for this. Go away.” North turned, starting off. “I said go away.”

“You didn’t say it spitefully enough,” China said, still from right behind him. “So I’ll accompany you to the mountains. Unless you want to scare me off again?”

North realized where they were, but didn’t let it show. He kept walking.

“Fine. But leave once we get to the foothills.”

“As you wish, Comrade General.” China slid smoothly to his seeing side.

They walked down the road, powdery snow sloughing around North’s boots, while every one of China’s steps landed lightly, barely disturbing the terrain as he walked in the path of cart tracks.

North’s skin shivered as they passed that field. The tips of winter wheat poked out of the snow, the wind having finally freed them from the blanket that last week’s blizzard had dumped on them. The fields stretched out, pure and untouched. You would never know that the remains of over thirty people had been pulled out of a mass grave on its edge almost a year ago.

North knew. He had faces and names to match the feeling in his bones now.

How many of those forty four thousand missing names were lying in mass graves in the south? When it was finally Liberated, how many new places would send that shiver through his skin? Would he even be able to set foot on Jeju or Geoje Island without his insides being hollowed out with grief and refilled with rage?

How could South?

He didn't look toward the field, but China did, his slender eyes scanning it. North waited for him to say something about last year, but his eyes only met his for a moment, then looked away.

He wondered if China could feel that same feeling. Was the suffering of their people bound to their lands, or could they find it wherever they went? If North crossed the Amnok and retraced the trail of the Arduous March, would he feel himself walking in the footsteps of those he had lost? Would China have to feel the loss of hundreds of thousands of his people every time he crossed the Amnok and Chongchon?

Would he feel it at Chorweon?

North didn't want to know. He wanted China to say something. He wanted an excuse to get mad at him to get rid of the heavy feeling pressing down on him like snow on winter wheat, or earth over a mass grave. But no matter what he said to antagonize the other man, he just hummed, or responded like North had been genuine, denying him the satisfaction.

"Are you simple?" North eventually demanded, going for a blunt attack.

"I prefer the term 'uncomplicated.'"

"Or slow." He knew China wasn't. And he also knew he had to have a threshold for what he would take from another country.

"'Slow the river flows, swift thoughts do fly. When river rushes forth, deep reflection does die.'"

It clearly wasn't this, though.

They had fought before. If North held him down in the snow, maybe it would be humiliating enough to goad him into it again.

He wasn't heading for the Hyongjes this time. Shortly after the mass grave, North had turned down a narrower road, heading towards Mount Taesong.

"We're here," he said, stopping as they reached the foothills, holding his straw sack tight to stop himself from doing what his body wanted. “Leave.”

“Alright,” China said, surprisingly easily. “But take this first.”

He reached into his bulky padded winter jacket, and pulled out another small sack, like the one North was holding.

The Korean stared at it.

“Take it,” the other country urged.

“I won’t take your rations.” North took an instinctive step back as he realized what China was offering. “You need them.”

The ones he had left when he went to the trial had been one thing. He’d had to be eating in his own country. But the man’s high cheekbones had started to look too sharp lately.

China raised his eyebrows wryly. “But you don’t need yours?”

“These aren’t my rations,” North denied, trying to hide them again. “It’s donated grains.”

“Mm,” China hummed skeptically. “Then that’s what these are, too. Take them. Consider it a gift for over a year of friendship.”

North’s eye flicked down.

It had been a year and almost two months since they had met on the outskirts of Kanggye. One year, two months, and thirteen days since the People’s Volunteer Army had crossed the Amnok.

A year since China had left his country for Korea.

“I’ve been waiting for you to commemorate the anniversary of the kindling of our fires of friendship,” China sighed, still holding the sack of grain out. “But I suppose you’ve forgotten.”

“We aren’t friends,” North growled, trying to inject anger into his voice. “And you should go home.”

“Is that an order?” China lilted.

North’s jaw feathered as he looked away. “You have fought for a year. Any debt you or yours owed to my people is paid.”

“You’re not the one who decides that, I’m afraid,” the other man said. “Especially when you don’t believe in the concept of debts. If I left now, mine would still feel unpaid.”

“You aren’t doing anything here,” North stressed. “You haven’t seen combat in months, and you can’t reveal yourself to bolster your soldiers. All you’re doing is giving America another chance to drag you into court.”

“I like to think I’m doing something very important here,” China said with an offense North hoped was genuine before it was clear it wasn’t. “I’m keeping you company.”

“You are the worst company I have ever had,” North growled, frustration twisting inside him. “Does the fact that I don’t want you around me mean nothing to you?”

“Very little,” China airily acknowledged. “You’ll recall me mentioning that it’s a possibly I enjoy being yelled at.”

“That’s not what I-“

North cut himself off, clenching his fists.

He knew it didn't. China had been lying when he said North had power over him, it was obvious with how he liked looking for any possible loophole in what he was told to do. There was no way he didn’t secretly enjoy laughing at him when he denied what he wanted, like right now and every time he followed him or slept in his room. Even if North never actually ordered him to leave, it was because he shouldn’t have to. China should just listen. But he didn’t because he was arrogant, aloof, and liked feeling smarter than everyone around him.

So why did he tolerate North treating him like this?

He had to want something from him. Even if that wasn’t why he was here, even if paying he and his people's 'debt' to North's was really what had brought him to Korea, there had to be something else he wanted. Otherwise he would stay with his mobile Command or go fight at the front. He wouldn't still be putting up with North.

"Was that enough to make you feel better?" China asked, unfazed by the low growl rumbling in the Korean's throat. "Or do you need to yell at me properly? Because if it's the latter, I suggest we head back to the bunker. Sound carries in the foothills."

North's skin still prickled, and his insides felt uncomfortably tight. But he couldn't afford a repeat of what had happened outside Anbyon.

"Give me the grain and get out of here," he growled, snatching the sack from China.

His fingers dug into the woven straw, into the grains beneath. Rice. A full day's worth.

China smiled, wrapping the grey and white scarf more snugly around his neck.

North held the grain tightly, opened his mouth, then snapped it shut and started his hike into the mountains.

His shoulders itched, telling him to turn around and make sure China really was leaving. But he refused. He knew even if he was, the man would be looking back at him. He didn't want to give him the satisfaction.

He wouldn't return to the bunker tonight. Hae needed to be reprimanded over what SH had told him this morning, but he would do it tomorrow. Sleeping in the same room as China was out of the question. And it was New Year's Eve. His provinces would want some sort of acknowledgement. He couldn't take that right now, not when he had to make a speech tomorrow.

He had to. He couldn't let his soldiers and the rest of his people think he was blaming them for the war not being over. Not again.

As the terrain around him became more sloped, and the severed tree trunks started to be replaced by those still standing, North's breath came in shorter, sharper bursts, and his head started to spin. The heavy pall of exhaustion that had been draped over him sank down into his bones, trying to force him to lean against a tree to catch his breath.

He grit his teeth, pushing through it, ignoring the black fuzz that obscured his view of the snowy mountain forest.

Truthfully, before his outburst he wouldn't have... entirely minded if China made the hike with him, so long as he left before North did what he had to. He was ambivalent towards the idea at least. Unlike last year, he hadn't been going to do something classified- fetching the book of names his agent had left for him. There were no American tire tracks on the road to boil his blood, and the old mass grave at the edge of the field was as disconnected from China and his soldiers as it could be. He knew by now that the other country wouldn't attempt to assassinate him, and while North was restless and churning with irritation, he hadn't been filled with that wild fury that made his chest grow tight and made him think he might actually hurt his comrade.

But his chest was tight. Each filling of his lungs took more energy than he had, but if he didn't breathe deeply enough, it felt like those dregs drained without being replenished. The exhaustion pressed harder on him, trying to drive him down into the snow.

North knew why he felt this way. But unlike the others, for him it was a purely physical problem. And he wasn't weak enough to let it conquer him. Or to let another country witness the fight.

With China gone, he was free to move the rock he had slipped into his cheek back onto his tongue, rolling it around in his mouth. He would have removed it before he reached the spot in Mount Taesong's eastern foothills, if he had known someone would be there.

North knocked on the door, not expecting anyone to answer, allowing him to hide the sack inside like he usually did.

So he tensed as someone called, "Who's there?" in a tight, nervous tone.

He hesitated, then shook his head, slipping the rock into his cheek again. “Korea.”

“Comrade Korea.” There was a note of surprise in Oh Tae-min’s voice, but the tightness was still there, one North knew well. “Come in.”

North slipped in, pleased when shutting the door didn’t rattle the entire thin frame of the hut. South Pyongan had done most of the work, and she had done it well. He would consider her capital surveys as the final test. If she did them well, he would make sure she ended up in the Ministry of State Construction Control. The classes would just be formalities- he knew she could muster the patience and discipline now that she wanted to.

The thought of the classes he had assigned all of them before the war began made his shoulders feel heavier. But he kept them straight, focusing on the boy in front of him.

Oh Tae-min had pushed past a thin curtain that divided the house in two, and was leaning heavily on his cane. North could tell by the lines around his dark eyes and the tension in the reddened knuckles clutching at the carved magpie atop his aid that he had identified the feeling in his voice correctly.

“Sit,” he said, nodding to the roughly-carved low wood table, and Oh Tae-min gratefully lowered himself down, his lame leg trembling.

“I’m working,” he assured him, hands tight around the edge of the table. “I’m sewing jackets in o- in the bedroom. I sleep in there, and Han-jin sleeps in here.” He gestured at the small sitting room and the shelf with their sparse collection of cooking utilities with a sudden burst of frantic energy. “And I was just in there working. I just…”

His gaze lowered to the table as the energy drained, gripping it tighter. “Couldn’t make the walk down to the aid station today.”

The ache in North's hip might still have not came back, but he had lived with it for most his life. And he still had others. He knew how it could feel when winter got its jaws into your bones. And he could tell by the set of the boy's jaw and the look in his eyes that offering any empathy wouldn't be appreciated, thankfully allowing him to get straight to business.

"I brought you and Hyun Han-jin extra rations." North set the sack he had brought on the table.

China's contribution would go to another family. He might bring it to the young girl SH and Kangwon had been looking after- Yun Jin-suk- and her father. It had been a few weeks since his last delivery.

Oh Tae-min's eyes widened as he felt the straw sack, and the rice shifting inside it.

"I can't accept this," he said, looking up at North.

He wasn't the first to say it.

"It's part of a program decided on by the Food Administration Bureau," North lied by rote. "Through the creative efforts of our peasants, a few counties were able to overfill their projected harvests this year. As thanks for the State's efforts in cutting taxes and loaning out farming supplies, the patriots have kept up the tradition of donating the excess."

That part was true. But it went to their soldiers, factory workers, and storehouses, not non-productive workers that had already received their rations.

"You have been selected for this round," North told Oh Tae-min. "If you've ever came home to grain deliveries before, it was likely because of that."

"No, I know that," he said, which was strange, since North had made it up, and he hadn't been around to tell it to when he made his previous drops. "But we already received ours today."

The Countryhuman's eye narrowed. "You did."

Oh Tae-min nodded, his brows furrowing. “Comrade North Pyongan always brings it for us. He brought today’s by earlier.”

He tilted his head at the corner, and North stalked to the clay pot there, opening the lid to find a layer of rice on the bottom. More than there should be for two boys on non-productive worker's rations.

His jaw feathered.

“Comrade Korea?” Oh Tae-min prompted. “Is something wrong?”

North turned around, expression composed. “No. It seems a mistake was made at distribution. I need to ask a few questions, so that nothing like this happens again.”

Oh Tae-min seemed confused and slightly wary, but he answered his questions, winding North tighter.

When he was done, he departed and, working off a growing suspicion, visited Yun Jin-suk’s dug-out.

She was in a private session with a female tutor Hwang had helped set up, but her father graciously informed him that they had already received today’s donation, and had been periodically. North knew that he’d been receiving some because he had been the one making them, and had told him the reason why.

But he didn’t have the supplies to make them ‘periodically.’

North gave him China’s gift, since it was technically extra and Yun Jin-suk needed to make up for the months she had spent wasting, then set off to scour the hills, hands balled into fists.

A young single mother with a son and daughter, a worker at the Paper Mill whose grandmother had a lung infection, the umployed father of a student at Kim Il-sung University. They all had the same story- they had been receiving donations from their Provincehumans, who told them a story about how it was excess on behalf of the State, the same story North had been telling people. And he had no doubt that if he were to visit the refugees in his provinces, he could find some that told the same story.

Now he knew why South Hamgyong had been so worried when she told him Hae had been giving half her rations to that mutt.

At the end of the day, blood boiling, he burst into the hospital, interrupting Kangwon just as he was sliding the IV out of his heavily bruised arm, a fresh bag of blood hanging on the pole.

"Kangwon," he growled, and the man flinched back, his guilty body language already telling him everything he needed to know.

"With me. Now."

—

SH squatted by the agungi, her olive gloves draped across her thigh so the fire could warm her palms directly. Hae huddled beside her, bundled up in her red scarf and long coat. The thick fabric couldn't muffle the sound of her stomach rumbling.

"Comrade Mao Zhilong," her cousin said, looking up with eyes round and white enough that it didn't matter the moon hanging above them was only a pale sickle. "Do ya have any more candy ah could have?"

Hae's endless spirals of guilt at accepting presents from him had finally been ended by Korea firmly telling her that so long as she asked China for something, it wasn't a bribe.

SH knew Korea didn't like having her ask the foreign country for food, which meant he must have been sick of Hae flinging herself at his feet to beg for forgiveness once a week. And it might mean he didn't expect China to actually attempt to bribe her, or at least not to get anything out of it.

'Which means he could be nicer to him.' And stop stealing his darn Jeep.

China upended his long, bell-shaped sleeve, shaking it over his gloved hand.

Nothing came out.

“Sorry, Little Tiger,” he said ruefully, tucking his hands back into his sleeves. “It’s been awhile since I received a care package. But once I do, you’ll be the first person I look for.”

Hae pouted. “Okay.” At SH’s nudge, she added, “Thank you.”

She went back to watching North Pyongan as he made more of their powdered potato soup, like a tiger watching a deer from the dappled shadows of the forest.

“Hungryyyyyy,” South Pyongan moaned, draping herself over her brother. “Hurry upppppp.”

“I could cook faster if you weren’t on top of me,” he politely noted, and she moaned louder.

“I could cook faster,” SH offered in vain.

North Pyongan always took his time, letting the soup simmer for almost an hour, and adding seasonings pinch by pinch. They didn’t have any that weren’t salt and gochugaru (another gift from Comrade Kim Song-ae) right now, but he was still adding them almost by the grain.

“On second thought, take as much time as you need, brother,” South Pyongan said hastily, releasing him. “Sorry, SH, but you failed to kill us that first New Year’s. You’re not getting another chance.”

SH huffed. Her soup hadn’t been that-

She felt the burnt bits in the thick grey sludge crunch beneath her teeth with the kind of mental clarity that should be reserved solely for things that were happening in the moment, and shuddered.

Okay, it had been that bad. But it had been her first time cooking! She’d gotten at least slightly better since then. Her food could be considered edible. Broadly.

‘Maybe I should be painting those memories away, too.’

“I think you’re all exaggerating,” Liaotung said from her spot next to Liaoxi. “Comrade SH can’t be that bad at cooking.”

They had a full seating set-up now, with fallen logs and rocks arranged around the cooking area. The bunker was becoming a proper base.

It made the thing behind the wall pace faster. It never rested nowadays, just stalked back and forth from the moment she woke to the moment her head hit the pillow, turning to howling and clawing at the wall whenever she thought about the ships lined up off her coast, or the ruins that covered her lands where Hungnam had once stood, or the hollow-cheeked, empty-eyed people lined up for ration distribution, or that this was still wasn’t over and Yankees were still drawing breath in their country.

Or her brother.

“You’d be wrong,” he grunted to Liaotung. “She’s shit.”

“At least I help out,” SH said tightly, nails curled into her palm. “You could try cooking, you know.”

North Hamgyong snorted. “Why would I? I know I’m not any damn good at it.”

The dark thing snarled, but before SH could bite back, Chagang suddenly let out a strangled sound.

They all looked at him in alarm as he clutched his head.

SH’s brows drew in. “Cha-“

“Korea’s coming,” he gasped out, and a moment later they heard the crunching of snow as Korea stormed towards the clearing.

All the Korean provinces jumped to their feet, immediately sensing the darkness he brought with him as he halted amongst them, his eye shooting straight to Hae.

SH’s chest tightened at the fury she saw in it, and she stepped slightly in front of her cousin. He hadn’t seemed this angry when she’d talked to him earlier.

But his glare didn't stop on her. It moved to SH, burning into her skin before moving to each of her cousins, one by one, the firelight painting his face in red light and deep shadows.

The Chinese provinces shifted nervously in their seats, understanding that something was wrong.

China seemed unbothered. "I didn't expect you to be back-"

"Leave," Korea interrupted, not tearing his eye from the Korean provinces. "Take your provinces with you, and don't come back tonight."

Liaoxi and Liaotung looked to China, their expressions tableaus of unease.

He rose. "Come on, Little Sisters. Comrade Korea is in charge, so let's be obedient."

They climbed into the Jeep, and drove away, Liaoxi looking back at North Pyongan. He remained straight-faced, like SH and the others.

As they waited for China to leave, more snow crunched, and Kangwon jogged up, chest rising and falling deliberately slow as he tried to catch his breathing.

"Korea-" he tried, clearly not for the first time.

"Shut. Up," Korea growled.

Kangwon winced, and SH caught his eye. She crinkled her brows, and he darted a look at the pot on the stove, then flattened his lips.

'Oh no.' They had known this was coming. But that didn't stop the dread from coiling in SH's stomach.

Korea stood amongst them, his muscles visibly wound tight with rage.

"Korea?" SH prompted, keeping her voice neutral. "What's wrong?"

North Pyongan went to take the pot off the stove, and Korea snapped at him, “Keep it on!”

The male province did, keeping his gaze down as he kept stirring.

Korea crossed his arms, still glowering at them all. “Carry on.”

Hwang’s notes had been set down long ago. “If you could just tell us-“

“Carry. On.”

Hwang shrank down, and so did Hae, cringing into SH’s side.

“Korea,” she ventured, her voice small. “Ah’m real sorry for feedin’ Pp- the dog.”

He gave her a scathing look that could have obliterated someone else, let alone Hae. She hung her head, wilting like a dead flower.

Korea had told them to carry on, but none of them could with him standing there, radiating a tangible aura of fury. SH could feel it inside her, crushing her heart in its grasp and making her organs feel watery. The dark thing had finally gone quiet, slinking back from a force greater than it.

The provinces all remained standing, stiffly avoiding Korea’s eye as North Pyongan kept cooking in silence. The tension in the air could have been cut with a knife.

North Hamgyong tore through it. “This is bullshit. We know why you’re so fucking pissed. Just get it over with.”

Korea looked at him from under lowered brows. “I would advise you to stay quiet.”

And because SH’s brother wasn’t a complete idiot, he did.

North Pyongan stood back from the soup, hesitating as he peeked at Korea from the corner of his eye.

“Go on,” their Countryhuman said coldly. “Get your rations.”

North Pyongan did, tentatively taking the cooked rice from their clay pot to add to the soup.

"No," Korea said sharply. "Separate."

"I was going to make juk," the province said quietly.

"And now you are not."

North Pyongan started to plate their rice, adding some to each bowl, and probably regretting not letting SH cook after all.

SH cursed their bad timing. Most days they at least would've had the rest of the grains set aside, but since tonight was New Year's Eve, they had wanted to make sure some of their people could have a good meal. The deliveries had been done early.

With the rice and soup in their tin bowls, Korea turned to look coldly at the others.

"Come get your dinner."

SH was standing closest, so she grabbed hers first, passing Hae's over to her. At Korea's direction, they went over to their seats, perching on the fallen log. SH cupped her frozen hands around the hot soup, watching it steam in the frigid air. Her stomach growled loud enough to hear, but she didn't dare touch her spoon.

When everyone was seated parallel along two of the fallen logs, Korea stood before them, backlit by the flickering fire. No one met his eye.

When he finally spoke, his voice was as icy as the frozen spears hanging from the tree boughs above. "Does that look like enough food to you?"

SH looked down at her brimming bowl of potato water, and her quarter-full bowl of rice.

No one answered.

"I said, 'Does that look like enough food to you?'"

Sitting closest to him, SH took the fall, making sure her voice was clear and concise as she said, “No, Korea.”

“No.” He curled his lip at her. “And I know for a fact that the rations for an office worker are enough to live off of. So where are the rest of yours?”

South Pyongan hand went up. “Hey, before this goes any farther, I’d like to request leaving me out of it. Look. Full bowl.” She tilted it at him. “And it’s not just ‘cuz North Pyongan’s playing favourites. It’s because I’m being responsible and eating my portion.”

“But your brother hasn’t.” Korea shot a glare at the man next to her that made him flinch. “He has been giving half his rations to Hyun Han-jin and Oh Tae-min for the past five months.”

That was longer than they’d had the pact for, like with SH and Jin-suk.

“And who fed them when he was deployed on his mission?” Korea switched his glare back to South Pyongan, who winced.

“I haven’t done it recently?” she tried weakly, then hastily caved. “Okay yeah, no recess for me. Got it.”

North Pyongan tried to defend himself. “Korea, they couldn’t receive rations when they were first discharged from the hospital. I had to-“

“They are now!” Korea snapped. “Most of the people you idiots are giving your food away to are on rations!”

“Korea,” Hae piped up in a tiny voice, fidgeting with her mittens. “Ya shouldn’t yell at Hambu at least. He ain’t got nothin’ to do with this.”

Hwang didn’t correct her for once, following Korea’s gaze at it swept across the clearing to land on North Hamgyong, hunched over next to Chagang.

SH’s brother met his eyes defiantly, crossing his arms.

“Kim Mae-jon.” Korea said the name as an accusation, and North Hamgyong *‘tch’*ed. “She also receives rations.”

“It’s not enough,” he growled. “She’s got two growing kids, and they don’t understand why they can’t eat as much as they used to.”

SH blinked in shock at the realization that her brother had been giving away his rations with them.

But now that she thought about it, she realized that with how he always ate standing off to the side, she’d never seen his bowl. And she usually tried not to look at him in order to keep the angry thing quiet.

Now peering across the few feet between them, she could see the rice bowl at his feet was just as empty as hers.

“I could have arranged something!” Korea snapped.

North Hamgyong snorted. “Like what? We know damn well the State is wearing itself out as it is.”

“I would have worked something out,” Korea insisted.

The others stayed quiet. They knew what Korea’s ‘something’ would have been. He had promised the same thing to North Pyongan for the two young men, and to SH for Jin-suk. It was why they had days when they could give their rations to someone else in need. It was where they had gotten their ‘donated excess’ story from.

North Hamgyong didn’t have the same tact.

“You don’t get enough rations to feed everyone,” he said. “And you don’t have any right to get pissy with us when you’re doing the exact same damn thing.”

“You need your rations!” Korea snarled, advancing on him, making the Pyongans lean away and Chagang curl in on himself. “How do you expect to function when you’re eating next to nothing?!”

Before any of them could protest his hypocrisy, he whirled on Hae, eye flashing.

"And you."

Hae shrank as he stormed towards them, looming over her.

"Put your bowls down," he ordered, and she meekly obeyed, setting them on the ground.

Immediately, Korea grabbed Hae's collar, hauling her up with a squeak.

It was rare for him to get handsy with the small woman, and it made SH reached for him in alarm. "Korea-"

He smacked her hand away, not even looking at her.

"You haven't even been giving your rations to our people," he snarled in her face. "You've been giving half to a fucking dog. Every single damn time you've complained about being hungry while your dinner is sitting in some useless mutt's stomach! How many fucking meals have you missed?"

"Ah've been-"

"How many?"

Hae's gaze dropped, her voice choked past the collar Korea was twisting against her neck. "A lot."

Her honesty was clear in how easily Korea had lifted her off her feet with a single hand.

"Are you stupid?" he demanded, and Hae's eyes widened in hurt.

"Ah'm not! Ya know ah'm not!"

"You are." He dropped her aggressively enough that SH had to stop her from falling over backwards before rounding on the rest of them.

"You're all fucking idiots!" he snarled, eye blazing. "You are given exactly enough to keep you healthy. What do you think happens when you don't eat it? You can't supplement rice with fucking flavoured water!"

"And you aren't even eating that," Kangwon pointed out.

"This is not about me!" Korea shouted, and the province's shoulders hunched. "I need you all fully functioning. If you're passing out and making wrong decisions because you're too stupid to eat what you're given, then you are useless to me and there's no point in risking keeping you active. If you want to eat less calories, then why don't I lock you up so you don't need as many. Is that what you want?"

"No, Korea," SH answered for them, staying seated so he wouldn't feel threatened. "But you can't go off on us like this when you're doing the exact same thing but worse. You're eating even less than us-"

"Because I can take it!" Korea burst out, rounding on her. "I am strong enough to get by without eating. You aren't."

South Pyongan pursed her lips at that, and he whirled to her like he'd sensed it. "What do you think people will think if their provinces are walking around as skin and bones on the edge of passing out? How does that reflect on our country? What does that say about the war effort?"

"What does it say if our Countryhuman is walking around as skin and bones?" SH demanded, rescuing South Pyongan from his attention.

"I always look like this!" Korea snapped, sunken eye blown wide above his hollow cheekbones. "You don't. People can tell, they're talking. And hunger doesn't affect me- it does affect you. I've noticed that you're all exhausted, I have noticed when your minds wander because you can't think about anything other than food. I thought it was because of the empathetic hunger, but clearly I was fucking wrong."

SH knew he was right. Despite her best efforts, she would sometimes catch herself focusing more on her stomach than words being said to her. But she also knew he was wrong about himself.

"We're used to going without food, too, Korea," she reminded him. "We ate just as little as you during the war against Japan."

"It's different!" he snarled, even though it shouldn't have been. "We have food now, we have fields and a Food Administration Bureau, and rations. You shouldn't have to go hungry!"

His words echoed up the mountain as his chest heaved up and down, his breath clouding the air in erratic bursts of icy mist.

SH paused, her eyes flicking to Kangwon. He was watching Korea's back sadly, realizing what she and likely their other cousins had.

The Southern Hamgyong lowered her eyes. "We just wanted to help, Korea."

"I know," he said, quieter, though no less furious. "And if you had excess food to give, I would be praising you. But you do not. And I will not have my provinces starving themselves."

"But it's okay when you do it?" North Hamgyong challenged.

"I am not starving myself," Korea lied to their faces. "I know my limits."

North Hamgyong curled his lip, echoing SH's own disbelief.

Korea drew himself up, glaring again as he addressed all of them.

"No more. You are going to eat everything you are given, and if you give away or waste a single grain of rice then I am going to have you locked up until the war is over."

"Korea-"

He ignored SH again, glaring at Hae.

"And if I hear you gave any more of your rations to that mutt, I am going to skin it and make you wear the fur as a coat."

Hae's gold flower paled at the very real threat, likely remembering the animal furs Korea had brought them to keep warm during Paektusan winters.

"But he's hungry," she protested, bottom lip trembling.

"And so are you," Korea growled. "And you are the one I give a damn about."

He levelled his glower at all of them. "I am not letting any of you starve."

"But what about the people we've been supplying?" North Pyongan fretted. "Tae-min and Han-jin can get by on rations and what the women at the aid station bring them, but some of the others can't."

"Yes," Hwang piped up. "I've been cautious when supplying anything to our lumpenproletariat, but Mr. Sin Hi-sam is only unemployed because a mental ailment makes it difficult for him to work anywhere with loud noises. The air raid he was caught in left an indelible impact on him."

"Jin-suk needs more than what she gets as a student, too," SH spoke up. "They're not war dependents, and her father only makes money collecting firewood."

She still didn't like the man, but she didn't want the girl to lose the last family she had left. Her brother was still missing in action, and without the proper list of POWs from the Americans, they couldn't know if he was in a camp down south or dead.

Kangwon nodded. "I haven't been giving away as much as everyone else, but I help with them sometimes. It's my opinion as a doctor that they both need to eat more."

"And what the fuck am I supposed to tell Kim and her brats?" North Hamgyong demanded. "'Sorry, you're on your own now?'"

Hae's lip was still quivering, but she overcame it to say,

“KoreaComradeAejaneedsjuktogetbetteran’ahjus’metsomeorphansoutsideHaejuan’they’rereact

Chagang had been giving away his rations just like them, but he didn’t add to their words. SH noted with concern that his chin was pressed to his chest, his eyes squeezed shut.

Korea was backing away from their protests, his shoulders climbing up around his ear slits as the look in his eye started to grow wilder.

Trying to make him feel less cornered, SH softened her voice and spoke over the others. “Korea, even if it was the wrong decision, everyone we’ve been looking after is used to relying on us. It feels wrong to just cut them off now.”

“Which is why you shouldn’t have been giving away something you couldn’t afford to in the first place!” Korea snapped.

North Hamgyong scoffed. “Because we’re the only ones that start shit we can’t follow through on.”

The look Korea turned on him was a truly dangerous one. Unable to think of anything quick enough, SH brushed a smear of blood and ink over the weak point in the wall just as the dark thing lunged at it.

“Korea, ignore him,” she said quickly. “He’s an idiot, you know that.”

“Fuck you,” her brother spat.

North Hamgyong had already stood, so she did, too, blocking Korea’s line of sight to him. As much as she’d like to see her country put him in his place, she needed to de-escalate the situation.

“You’re right,” she soothed. “We were stupid to start doing it. But you can’t blame us when we’re just following your lead.”

“Yes I can,” Korea growled, taking his ire off her brother.

“Not without being a hypocrite.” Knowing she wasn’t going to get anywhere with that, she said, “We were stupid to start, but we did. We can’t just cut them loose now. They’re our people.”

“I’ll take care of them,” he said, and she shook her head.

“You only have so many rations. You get just enough to keep one person healthy, too. We’re taking care of a dozen, on and off.”

“It doesn’t matter. I’ll think of something.”

“Why don’t we take a vote?” SH suggested.

“I’m not letting you vote on starving yourselves!” Korea snapped, fists flexing.

“Then let’s just vote on whether we would be willing to keep feeding people, even if it meant we went hungry.” SH turned her back to him, looking at her cousins. “Comrades? Who would vote for that?”

She raised her own hand high, and North Pyongan almost immediately joined her, along with Hwang. Hae took a tentative look at Korea, then raised hers. South Pyongan glanced at her brother and shrugged, voting. North Hamgyong glowered like he didn’t want to vote the same as SH, but grudgingly raised his own hand. He nudged Chagang, who raised his with a great effort, eyes still closed tight.

Kangwon leaned back on his palms. “Abstaining due to conflict between what I’d decide and my opinion as a doctor.”

SH nodded decisively, pleased. “No need to ask for opposition then.”

She turned back to Korea, whose eye followed her hand down to her side. She realized he was locked on to her exposed bandages, and curled her fingers over her burnt palms.

“We’re all willing to make sure at least some of our people get enough to eat, Korea,” she told him. “Even if it means we go without.”

Korea's gaze moved to her face, and he shifted back, the line of his shoulders tense as his eye darted between all of them. A log in the fire burst with a crack behind him, and for a moment she thought he was going to throw himself at the agungi.

Then his shoulders slumped, and he looked back at her, not quite meeting her eyes.

"Fine," he said quietly. "One day a week you will be allowed to give out half of your rations."

"Two days," SH countered. "Hae and… North Hamgyong feed children. Extra food on weekends will be good for them."

Korea's jaw feathered. After a long moment, he assented. "Two days. Half of your rations. Nothing more."

It didn't feel like enough. But SH knew they wouldn't get any more concessions from him.

"Thank you," she said, smiling nonthreateningly at him.

The cords in his neck spasmed. "And I'll work something out for the other days."

"Korea," SH tried gently. "Maybe you could join us with the two-day rule?"

"I'll work something out," he repeated stonily. "And I meant what I said. If I find out any of you are giving away even a single grain more, you aren't going to see sunlight until the war is over and we're Reunified."

North Hamgyong made a noise. SH's fists clenched, painting full bowls of blood and rice and dead white limbs over the wall as she silently threatened him to keep his mouth shut.

He must not have heard her, because he did.

"Kangwon, you may be needed in the hospital and with the Mobile Medical Corps, but don't think I won't find another way to punish you," Korea threatened.

“Yes, Korea.”

“And South Hwanghae?”

“Ah’ll stop feedin’ Ppang,” Hae muttered into her chest. “Ah promise.”

“Stop naming wild animals, too.” Korea’s gaze roved over all of them again, and SH watched his throat flex. “I’ll make sure your charges are taken care of. I will. I won’t let anyone starve.”

Before anyone could get another word out, he vanished into the forest.

SH’s knees unlocked, and she slumped back onto the log, heart beating light and quick as bird wings.

As hot as Korea’s anger could flare, it never frightened her. She understood now it was because it reminded her of hers.

It left her feeling shaky and ill for a different reason, the same reason Kangwon was sinking down into the log, and Hae wasn’t falling on her supper even now that she could.

They were all quiet, listening to the pockets of air in the wood on the fire pop and crackle like distant rifles, or bombs. SH watched a snowflake spiral down to land in her soup, not melting as it floated on the surface. She inhaled, calming her heartbeat.

“I think we shouldn’t complain about being hungry to Korea anymore.”

“No fucking shit,” North Hamgyong grunted, sitting back down heavily, starting in on his cold meal. “He’ll just say it’s our own damn fault.”

“Don’t talk with your mouth full,” SH said distractedly. “But I’m not joking. I know we used to, but I don’t think we should anymore. It feels… different.”

When they had been fighting against Japan, she’d never complained about hunger. She would rather go hungry for the rest of her life than be well-fed and caged again. But she would tell Korea when she was hungry, or when one of the others was, so he would know they needed to get supplies or go hunting. She'd been keeping up the habit, only mentioning it so he knew she was going to the market to use her stipend to buy flour or potatoes for powder.

She had thought she was sensing something weird from him when she did, but she assumed it was because he didn't really like her 'taking food' from their people, even when they were choosing to sell it.

But now…

Chagang raised his navy head. "He takes it personally."

His usually smooth voice was raspy, and Kangwon said with concern, "Your nostrils are bleeding."

Chagang touched a mitten to his smooth face, where scarlet blood was trickling from a source that couldn't be seen.

"Cold," he said, wiping the blood on the log.

SH nodded at his earlier words. "He takes it personally now. That's a good way to say it."

Their hunger had used to come from the Japanese, from them buying up their produce and draining the peasants dry, shipping all their harvests across the East Sea. SH had used to crouch amongst crates on the docks and watch hauls of fish and crates of vegetables and dried fruits be loaded onto ships, and wait for her chance to snatch one back. They and their people had been starving because the puppet government cared more about money than national pride or their people, and because they were part of a guerrilla resistance movement. They had no supply lines or trading partners or state stores of grain. All they had was whatever they managed to catch, forage, or purchase from empathetic peasants or merchants.

But now they had fields, they had supply houses, foreign trade, patriots who donated what they could afford to, and the ability to loan out seeds and produce farm equipment and fertilizer. SH had been able to personally make sure the peasants in her province had the tools they needed to get the harvest in on time. Their workers owned the factories, their peasants owned the fields, and the State operated ration distribution and held the power to mass mobilize their people to sow seeds and harvest the fruits of their labour. They had a government that cared, and Korea was in control now.

And they were still hungry.

SH knew it wasn't their fault, and she knew it wasn't his. It was America's. It was him and all his savages and puppets that had murdered their peasants in their fields, razed storehouses and seed stocks to the ground when they couldn't take them as they fled, and were lounging around in their fertile lands to the south, squatting on the Honam Plain like gluttonous neoguri, tearing their crops away from their peasants with their blood-greased hands and shipping them back to their dens in Japan, Taiwan, and America, growing fat while the Koreans that grew them starved, just like how it had always been and how it always would be if they didn't win.

SH knew their hunger wasn't Korea's fault. And she knew why he would think it was.

'You shouldn't have to go hungry.'

"That was a big reaction," SH told her cousins. "Even for him. It's obvious us being hungry upsets him, so let's not mention it to him anymore."

"He just reamed us out, and you're worried about how he feels?" North Hamgyong demanded.

"He was right," SH pointed out. "We knew when we agreed to do it that it wasn't the best for us, and he'd be upset when he found out."

'Even if he was being a hypocrite about it.'

Hae nodded glumly. "Korea just got mad 'cuz he cares."

Her own words made her brighten a bit, enough that she finally reached for her bowls.

SH nodded, then narrowed her eyes at North Hamgyong. “And you don’t have a right to complain when you’ve been saying the exact same things he was for months."

“Yeah, seriously,” South Pyongan said, lowering her voice to a gravelly imitation of his. “’You’re all idiots, you should be eating more, I’m a bastard with a dog’s face.’ And the whole time you’re giving away your food, too. Which makes me the only non-idiot, if anyone’s keeping track. And Kangwon.”

“I wasn't lying about giving some of my portions to Yun Jin-suk,” he admitted.

“Just me then. South Pyongan number one, baby!”

“Exactly,” North Hamgyong growled. “I was saying the exact same-“

He severed his words with a ‘tch.’ “Never-fucking-mind.”

SH couldn’t understand why her brother hadn’t told them he was using his rations for mutual aid, too. His grouchy forest green face gave nothing away that wasn’t unpleasant.

She sighed, then straightened again.

“From now on, no bringing up hunger around Korea. Not even jokingly or because you’re trying to get him to pet you on the head.” She looked over at South Pyongan and Hae.

“But I love complaining,” the azure woman whined.

“Ah don’t want to make Korea upset again,” Hae said quietly. “He’s tryin’ his best.”

“Let’s try not to mention it even in private,” SH continued.

“It’s not really good to bottle your emotions up,” Kangwon said, pointed enough that she glared at him.

“It’s also not good if Korea or one of our people overhears us,” she shot back. “And if we’re used to complaining with each other, it’ll be easier to slip up in front of someone else.”

“Private habits become public displays,” Hwang agreed.

“So no more muscular skeleton talk then,” South Pyongan said. “Got it.”

The others agreed easily. North Hamgyong glowered and showed his teeth, which meant he did, too.

SH nodded decisively. “Decision made then. Violators get fed to Hae’s dog.”

Her cousin’s face fell, and she winced.

“Sorry, Hae.” Realizing what else she needed to apologize for, she turned to her fully. “And I’m so sorry he targeted you like that. I thought I’d finally caught him in a good mood when I told him about you feeding the dog this morning.”

Well, not a good mood. But a low one. One she had hoped was less likely to explode on Hae.

“It’s alright,” her cousin said, rosebud lips trembling again. “Ah’m just glad Korea din’t skin him right away.”

“I can’t believe you haven’t been eating anything,” Hwang said, guilt painting his voice. “I should have noticed.”

“Ah tried to tell Korea ah’ve been eatin’ a few grains of rice, and the soup.” Hae’s boot tip nudged at the snow. “He din’t listen.”

“That isn’t enough, Hae,” Kangwon said gently. “Especially not when you’ve still been coming in to give blood. No more appointments until you’ve been eating right for a few weeks.”

“But Korea gives blood,” she protested.

“And we just had an entire conversation that makes it obvious why his decisions shouldn't be replicated." Kangwon exhaled heavily. "I'm sleeping here tonight. I think walking here with him permanently raised my blood pressure."

"And you don't want to get attacked by spirits walking back alone," South Pyongan quipped.

"Not true."

Kangwon scrubbed at his face with a hand, and SH felt a flush of shame. They'd been making his job harder lately, even if it was just by filling his heart with worry over them.

But it was hard to be healthy when they had Korea's example to follow. Even if SH knew it was wrong when he did it, their people appreciated it. They needed it. And when Korea was doing more than he should, it felt like the provinces weren't doing enough.

SH would rather he starved himself than feasted while others didn't. And she had realized she felt the same way about herself.

The anger flickered inside her, electrocuting the dark thing into resuming its pacing, talons clicking on whatever was behind the concrete wall.

They shouldn't have to starve, none of them. They should all be able to feast. Instead they were sitting here in the freezing cold eating thin soup and rice, and Korea was marching back into the night with nothing, all because of America, while the foreign man was probably still eating leftovers from Christmas, turkey and real potatoes and pie, tossing sticky, too-sweet scraps of chocolate to their people like he was their saviour instead of the country starving them.

'I'll make sure your charges are taken care of. I will.'

The desperation in Korea's voice only fed her fury. He shouldn't be blaming himself, he shouldn't be taking their hunger personally. Just because he was finally able to govern properly as their Countryhuman didn't make it his fault. He couldn't control the weather or the bombs or the shattered supply lines or make sure every single peasant and every single worker did every single thing they could to produce as much as they could and get it to their people.

But he did take it personally. And SH knew when all those circumstances out of his control conspired to steal more lives and hollow out the provinces even more, he would blame himself for that, too.

North is the epitome of when your parent is in a bad mood and you can feel it as soon as they enter the house. I like to think that modern day when he enters the high-rise after a bad day, South Pyongan feels her muscles tighten up on the fifth floor.

While looking at Chinese poems, I found one that makes me think of future North and China:

We bid each other farewell beside the hill,
As day meets dusk, I close the wooden gate.
Next year, in spring, there will be green grass again,
But will my honoured friend return?

It's also coincidentally by a man named Wang Wei.

Bloody Muzzle

1952

Hae slowly reached out her hand. The dog stared at her, eyes gleaming warily in the light of the flashlight she'd stuck upright in the snow. She reached out a little more, and its lip started to curl. She drew back. The dog's lip fell. Then she quickly reached out again, and it jumped back, growling.

The woman made a miserable little noise, hanging her head.

"It's going to bite you one of these times," North Hamgyong grunted, and she looked over her shoulder with wide eyes, finally noticing he was watching.

"Ahwasn'tfeedin'himahswearahwasjus'tryin'-"

"I don't fucking care," he interrupted. "If you want to be an idiot and give it all your food, I'm not going to be the one to tell Korea."

"Ah'm not," Hae stubbornly repeated. "And he isn't goin' to bite me. We're friends."

"It's a dog," North Hamgyong said. "It doesn't know you're just an idiot that wants to pet it. It'll bite if it's scared. Do you know how dirty dogs' mouths are?"

Hae puffed out her cheeks. "That's what SH said."

And she didn't know the fucking half if it.

"But ah know he won't bite me," Hae confidently declared. "He just gets a li'l growly. Like Korea."

Who'd probably get more than a little growly if he heard her say that.

North Hamgyong picked at the scar on his forearm, watching as she tried to pet the dog again, and it growled at her, inching back.

He heaved a sigh. "You're doing it wrong."

His cousin was shit with animals. Somehow. Despite the fact she worked on farms most of the damn time. She was fine with oxen and plough horses, but it was like the moment they got off work, her brain fell out of her ear slits around them. He'd watched her go from quietly coaxing a horse out of its harness to squealing like a moron as she tried to shove grain in its face. Not to mention all the times she'd terrorized their chickens or chased stray dogs and cats on the street.

Hae looked back at him. "What do ya mean ah'm doin' it wrong?"

"You're coming at it from above," he said. "Animals hate that. How would you like it if a giant hand was coming at your face?"

"Ah'm pretty short," Hae informed him. "That's usually just how it is. It doesn't scare me."

"You have marginally more brains than a dog." North Hamgyong squatted, taking off his glove, and holding out his hand.

The rangy yellow dog squinted at it, then its ears swivelled, and it looked off into the trees, hearing some night animal they couldn't.

"He's not movin'," Hae whispered. "Go for it, Hambu!"

He kept his hand extended as the dog looked back at him. "You have to let it come to you. And don't call me that."

He sat still, his thighs straining. Ssi-bal, the stupid ration-cutting had been fucking with his muscles. He'd have to make sure South Pyongan kept her hands off him or he'd never hear the end of it.

Hae watched raptly. North Hamgyong thought she was managing to sit still for once in her damn life before realizing she was vibrating so fast it was barely visible.

Whatever. She wasn't scaring the mutt.

After a minute, it crept forward, sniffing cautiously at his outstretched fingers, looking for crap to eat. Its tongue lapped tentatively at his palm.

"He's touchin' you!" Hae whispered in excitement.

North Hamgyong lowered his hand slightly, scratching the dog's chin. He made a contented snuffling noise.

"Ah want to do it." He could hear the noisiness trying to burst out from under her whisper. "HambuHambupleaseletmetry."

North Hamgyong pulled his hand back, wiping dog slobber on his pants. "Just hold out your hand. Slowly," he said before she could thrust it out like a spear.

Hae stretched her hand out with exaggerated slowness. The dog considered it. The woman's fingers trembled.

"Hambu, ah can't keep still," she whispered urgently.

"Then you don't get to pet it," he said mercilessly. "And don't call me that."

A second passed, then the dog stretched his nose out again, sniffling at Hae's limb.

"He's touchin' me," she said, ecstatic. "He's actually touchin' me!"

"Now lower your hand and come at him where he can see you."

She did, dropping her hand, then reaching out to stroke the white patch of wiry fur on the dog's chest. He didn't pull away.

"Ah'm doin' it!" she said, enthusiasm making her voice rise. "Ah'm pettin' him!"

North Hamgyong gave her a moment before attempting to pet the dog's head. The presence of another hand seemed to make him consider his choices, but then he sat back, accepting both of them.

"It's not fucking science," he grunted, scratching the hard-to-reach spot behind one pointed ear. “You’re just too loud and annoying.”

“Ah know,” Hae said happily. “Look, Hambu! His leg’s doin’ that funny thing that yours does!”

The dog’s leg was thumping up and down in the snow as North Hamgyong scratched his ears.

He swivelled his head to her. “What the fuck do you mean ‘that mine does?’”

“Sometimes when you’re sleepin’, you’ll scratch at your neck,” she explained, using both her hands to ruffle the dog’s chest now. “But you’re sleepin’, so it doesn’t work too well. So ah help out an’ scratch it for you! And your leg moves like that.”

“How long have you been doing that?”

“Forevah!”

“Well stop,” he ordered. “That’s fucking weird.”

“Okay!”

And damn SH had probably been letting her do it. He grimaced at the idea of her snickering as she watched his leg thump like a dog’s.

They pet the hound for a few more minutes, then North Hamgyong stood up. “Don’t pet it too much. You’ll overstimulate it. I’m not getting blamed if you get an infected bite.”

“Ah wouldn’t blame you,” Hae said cheerfully, reluctantly pulling her hand back to wrap her arms around her knees.

“Korea would.”

The dog heaved a pleased sigh, and flopped down onto the ground, resting his tapered muzzle on his paws. North Hamgyong’s fingers twitched, but he jammed them under his armpits.

“Ah’m sorry,” Hae said to the dog, her words squished by how her chin was set on her legs. “Ah don’t have any food for you. Korea says ah’m not allowed to feed you anymore.”

“If you want to feed it, do it,” North Hamgyong said, even though he knew it was more of a lost cause than getting his sister to open her eyes and see reality the way it fucking was. “Korea might find out you’re giving shit to people, but if he’s not around, he won’t realize you’re still feeding the dog. And now that you’re not starving yourself like a fucking moron, it’d be fine.”

“Korea says ah can’t,” Hae mumbled sadly. “Ah really don’t want to upset him again.”

“He didn’t give a damn about upsetting you.” She’d been near tears half the time he was yelling at them.

“He wasn’t tryin’ to upset me,” Hae said stubbornly. “He was just worried about me. Korea gets angry when he’s worried, like you.”

“I don’t get ‘worried,’ I'm usually pissed that someone's doing something stupid,” North Hamgyong scorned, then redirected her. “Korea could throw you off a damn cliff and you’d come up with a way to justify it.”

“You an’ Hwang are always sayin’ stuff like that,” she huffed. “Korea wouldn’t throw me off a cliff or make me jump. And if he did, he’d have a good reason, so ah wouldn’t have to justify it.”

She was just like his damn sister. He couldn’t stand her.

“And ah know he’s right this time,” Hae said, looking back at the dog. “And ah don’t want him to turn Ppang into a coat.”

‘Stupid ass name.’

North Hamgyong *‘tch’*ed.

Hae looked down as something hit the ground next to her, then snatched it up, turning her wide white eyes up at him as she clutched the steamed bun to her chin.

“A guy I was working on the rail lines with gave it to me,” he grumbled. “Said his wife made it, and wouldn’t take no for a damn answer. But it tastes like shit. I don’t want the rest.”

Unlike their siblings, neither of them had ever had the luxury of giving a damn what their food tasted like. Hae beamed up at him, knowing that. He should’ve just kept his mouth shut.

Hae’s smile fell, her small brows furrowing as she looked down at the remaining half of the bun.

“Korea said ah can’t feed him anymore.”

Knowing how her brain had to work to get around her obsessive devotion to Korea, North Hamgyong said, “He said you can’t give it your rations. You’re giving it half a stale piece of bread that I gave you.”

It was the same fucking difference, but after a moment of the tractor gears in her head grinding away, Hae brightened.

“You’re right! He din’t say ah can’t feed him your food.”

Happily, she held the bread out to the dog, even though Korea would definitely still beat her over the head with a sandal if he saw.

Ppang eagerly wolfed the bun down straight from her hand, not hesitating at all now, making Hae bounce up and down.

“There ya go,” she chirped. “Ah can still feed you, it just won’t be as often. Ah can’t always be takin’ Hambu’s food. He needs it so he can stay big and strong and smash bad guy’s heads together.”

“C’mon,” North Hamgyong said, ignoring the comment. “It’s fucking cold out here. Get your ass back to the bunker.”

Hae nodded, giving Ppang one last pet before jumping to her feet. The dog didn’t move, still gnawing on the chewy bread.

North Hamgyong crossed his arms. It’d been decades ago, but he could still smell the fur of the mangy street dogs he’d curled up with in Chongjin before that other mangy dog had came into his life. They’d made his sister nervous, but he'd still tossed food scraps to the ones around the docks warehouses even once they moved to Hungnam.

Of course, after he'd gotten sick, and his sister had gotten sold, he'd kept his distance.

He realized he was picking his scar again, and pulled his hand from his sleeve, irritated.

"Thank ya, Hambu!" Hae chirped. "For lettin' me feed Ppang, and helpin' me finally pet him. You're the best!"

"Touch me and die," he said gruffly, and she aborted her hug attempt. "And for the last time, don't call me Hambu. It sounds fucking stupid."

"Ah think it sounds cute," Hae chirped. "Cute an' stupid."

He cuffed her over the head. "Like you."

Her grin stretched wide enough that the gap in her teeth was fully exposed. "You think ah'm cute? Really?"

North Hamgyong shoulder-checked her hard enough that she fell over, storming away. Like a fucking spinning top, she lurched right back up, skipping after him.

"Even Hambu thinks ah'm cute," Hae sing-songed. "So when the war's over an' everyone's got enough to eat, he's goin' to give me his braised soybeans at dinner 'cuz they're my favourite."

"Ah'm going to drown you in the well," he retorted. "Leave my fucking soybeans alone."

Hae giggled, starting to walk mostly normal, but still with that damn spring in her step.

As they walked under the trees, the flashlight beam casting swinging shadows that would've scared the shit out of Kangwon, Hae said, "Hambu, why din't you tell everyone you were givin' your rations out, too? You were lettin' us think you were bein' selfish. Ah knew you weren't," she added quickly. "Ah thought you were just being pragma… pragmatic."

She looked smug before her brows crinkled again. "But the rest of the family thought you were bein' selfish."

Kangwon had known, since he took his rations back to the city for him some nights, and that damn Four-Eyes had figured it out. North Hamgyong would've rathered they didn't know shit either. Trust Korea to expose him like that in front of everyone. But if he did the same to him, he'd never hear the fucking end of it.

"You're not smart enough to get it," he muttered, shoving his hands in his pockets.

Hae frowned at him, not hurt like he'd wanted, just reinforcing his opinion that she wasn't as air-headed as she acted.

"Ah can't get it if you don't tell me."

"If I had a real fucking reason, you'd just tell South Hamgyong," he growled.

She nodded immediately. "Ah want you two to stop fightin'. Ah don't like it."

"And I don't like her," he growled, making her face droop. "And I don't have a real reason."

"Ah like her," Hae said quietly. "And ah like you. Ah like both'a you, so you should both like each other. You're siblin's."

"So are Korea and the Southern bastard."

"Mhm." She bobbed her head. "And Korea likes him."

"He shouldn't."

"Nope," she agreed. "The Southern One is evil and awful and mean and stupid. But Korea still loves him. And you an' SH aren't any of those things. Well," she said after thinking for a second. "You are kind of mean. But it's in a fun way, not a real mean way like the Southern One. So you an' SH should love each other, too."

North Hamgyong's teeth struck together like flint off steel, and he stretched out his legs, easily leaving her behind as he stormed back into the bunker's clearing.

She didn't know what she was talking about. It wasn't that easy. Not when his sister was always such a damn busy-body, and looked at Korea like that even when he'd just finished screaming at her for doing what he was literally doing, too, but looked at North Hamgyong like that when he said the same exact thing, not even doubting for a second that he'd keep all his rations to himself while their people were starving. And when she acted so damn positive, even when the truth was looking them in the fucking faces. Hae might be innocent enough to believe what Korea said, but South Hamgyong wasn't. And still she kept that fucking attitude, smiling as she declared they couldn't talk about being hungry without setting Korea off. And what did that say for the war effort?

'When the war's over,' Hae said. 'We will win,' Korea had said in his New Year's speech. 'When we win, when we're Liberated, when we're Reunified,' the others always repeated like a damn mantra, like saying it enough meant it had to come true.

North Hamgyong knew that wasn't how it worked. So his sister should, too.

'When we don't have to work here anymore, when we're free, when we have enough money.' But all that had been waiting for them was more suffering.

When America was done with Korea, that dog would be the only one eating well.

—

North watched from the shadows as the light of his provinces' flashlight retreated, and their voices and footsteps faded away. The dog remained under the trees, spotlit by the weak moonlight leaking through them.

He had come to make sure Hae was following his orders. She was, of course, in her loopholed way. It irritated him to compare the two, but she was like China in that regard, though her loopholes were less malicious. He should still go reprimand her.

The dog finished the bun, snuffling around for more food. North padded out of the dark.

It raised its nose, sniffing the air, then went back to rooting through the snow, unbothered by his approach. It wasn't that animals weren't afraid of him. It seemed like they just cared about him less. It had always been useful for hunting.

North came around to the dog's front, staring down at it.

It was rangy and yellow, with thick fur and large paws. Something in the triangle-shaped ears and creamy undercoat said its ancestors had once been tiger-hunting dogs from the northern mountains.

But this dog was just a mutt, scrawny and wild, with everything distinctly Korean bred out of it.

With no more scraps to be found, it sat back on its haunches, looking up at him expectantly.

"You've been taking my province's food," North coldly accused, then felt foolish for talking to an animal.

It stared up at him with uncomprehending eyes, waiting for the next scrap.

It had warmed quickly for a stray. Maybe it had been a pet before the war, for one of the rare families that could afford it. But it wasn't now. If someone had owned it, they were long dead or gone. At the very least, they couldn't afford to feed it anymore.

"Go," North said, jerking his head at the trees. "Get out of here."

The dog cocked its head.

"Go," he ordered again, fists clenching. "There isn't any food for you here. Stop stealing from my provinces."

It still didn't move, even when he bared his teeth in a language it could understand.

“Go!” he shouted, stomping his foot to scare it. “Get the fuck out of here! We can barely feed ourselves, let alone a useless mutt!”

The dog whined needily, and his vision went red. He drew his boot back and slammed it forward into the hound’s thin ribs as hard as he could, sending it tumbling back with a yelp of pain.

And still it didn’t run. It got down on its belly and came crawling back to him, eyes rolled back in its head as it whimpered, begging him for forgiveness, even though he had been the one to hurt it for no reason.

The anger drained from North, and he exhaled, crouching as he held out his hand. The dog’s muzzle nudged into it, and a wet, warm tongue licked his bandaged palm.

Hae had screwed up by feeding it. If you gave a wild animal food, it would come back, no matter what you did to it.

As the dog rolled over so he could pet its belly, North’s eye scanned its body in the dim light. It looked healthy. Its fur was dirty, but smooth, not tangled like it couldn’t take care of itself. Its eyes and nose were clean, and as he nudged the dog back onto its stomach to run a hand over its ears, he could see they were, too. It was lean, but not emaciated.

His teeth grit, imagining it rooting in ruined buildings and digging in fields, muzzle coming out crimson.

But it looked like it hadn’t eaten anything alive in awhile. No blood flecked its snout or stained its paws.

It was a scavenger, too useless to hunt its own food. The way it whined as he ruffled around to the back of its neck proved that. All it knew how to do was beg, even after it was wounded, hoping that by showing its belly it would be rewarded.

'Pathetic.'

North sank his fingers into the thick ruff, reaching back with his other hand.

He probably should have made South Hwanghae or North Hamgyong do this, made it a lesson.

But he didn't want to. It would have been a lesson Japan had wanted to teach him, unlike this one that he had imparted unintentionally. North didn't want to teach his provinces anything like that.

He had learned his lesson so that they would never have to.

The dog whimpered as he sank his blade into its throat, but didn't even try to fight back. It just looked up at him with big, dumb eyes, stupidly obedient until the last. North held its gaze as firmly as he gripped its ruff, holding it still as the life shook out of it, keeping its head tilted back to avoid wasting precious blood.

Still, some of it flowed over his hands, wet and warm.

When its brown eyes had glazed over, he pulled his knife out, sliding it back into the sheath, and lifted the carcass over his shoulder, exhaling a cloud of mist as the night grew darker. He scuffed a boot through the snow, disguising the drops of blood on it, then set off through the trees, the dog cooling against his body as he went to find someplace with more light, farther from the bunker.

His provinces had learned too many lessons that he hadn't been there to shield them from. But he was here now, to keep them safe, to do what was needed, to get his hands bloody so they wouldn't have to, just like he had done for his brother.

Korea wasn't going to let any of them starve.

One must question whether the volcano is a warning. Coincidentally timed with the government trying to start a fight with China. Kami also do not want to get hit by missiles, I expect.

And just to be clear, the morally questionable thing here is not that North is killing a dog for food. It's that he's killing a dog Hae likes. Eating dog is fine, especially during war time. It's literally just another meat. Humanely slaughtered dog is more ethical than most beef or pork that comes from slaughterhouses. I also think South Korea's insistence on banning it speaks to the level of Americanization of their society. Westerners who have the privilege of being able to eat what they want go 'oh noooooo the puppies, how uncivilized!' And we're all supposed to see it as uncivilized, too, because they don't do it. There's a reason why places like Taiwan and Hong Kong banned it first, and it's because they've been having Western 'morals' shoved down their throats for decades. Society is supposed to progress and cut out genuinely uncivilized things like sexism and child abuse, but there isn't anything uncivilized about eating dog. It is just meat, and in a lot of places it is a cheap, easy to raise meat that people rely on. As much as I love cats, I echo these sentiments for cat meat. When you hear about any new American attempt to ban cat and dog meat globally, just know that would probably kill some people. And when they call it 'barbarity,' just know that they don't see the mass culling of cows and pigs by underpaid, mistreated, traumatized workers the same way. They also don't see the genocide of human beings the same way.

I'm aware I'm weirdly passionate about the right to eat dogs, I promise it comes from my disdain of Westerners continuing to impress their practices and viewpoints on the entire world , and concern for the people that have dog meat as a large part of their diets, not because I just really want to eat dog.

Bleeding Hearts

Sitting on her knees, the heavy tread of approaching footsteps, the rustle of money changing hands and those little chuckles at a joke she did her best to pretend she hadn't heard because if she didn't the smile she was desperately fighting keep on her face might fall and that last little bit of self-control she had might snap, the door sliding open-

'BANG BANG BANG.'

SH's mind knew her clients never knocked, but her body shot up anyway, heart pounding so fast it made her feel ill, nails sunk into her bedroll.

It was only when Korea's voice called, "Get up," through the thick steel door that she relaxed, though her pulse still ran wild.

"I'm up, Korea," she made herself call back, raspy from sleep.

"Outside in five," he ordered, then his fist pounded on the men's door across the hall.

As SH rubbed the sleep from her eyes, she selected a paintbrush and colours from her palette, working to reinforce the wall with geysers of blood-streaked ocean water and singed parachute silk as blockade ships were obliterated and the infiltration teams the Yankees tried to drop over their country were shot down. Sights she would hopefully see while she was in her province for the next week.

She'd had another nightmare last night, even though she'd worked so hard yesterday, travelling across the entire Pyongyang area to make sure every refugee heard the New Year's broadcast. Korea's voice was more important than ever, and she had made sure it reached every corner she could carry it to.

Yet still her wall had been weakened, the thing taking advantage of her terrors to gouge at the concrete, not even waiting for her eyes to open before it was already pacing again.

But it felt calming to be able to practice her mental painting routine properly. So often nowadays she was forced to just spread colours on the wall slapdash, creating a chaotic splatter that's lack of form or meaning only made the wall feel patched, not thickened. Tracing the outline of twisted Yankee limbs from a long fall and abrupt landing unwound her muscles like a spool of thread, and gradually her shaking stopped.

SH let out a slow exhale, then her eyes snapped open.

"Rise and shine, comrades!" she called, clapping her hands together as she swung off the top bunk, her missing toes barely impeding her landing. She clicked on her flashlight.

Hae was already up and buckling on her belts, likely as soon as Korea's voice had touched her 'ears,' but South Pyongan was still a lump on the top bunk. She moaned miserably, pulling her pillow over her head. SH reached up to tug it off her face, but had to settle for dragging her bedroll towards the edge.

"Time for good soldiers to get to work," she chided.

"I'd rather die." South Pyongan raised her head, squinting blearily in the light of the beam. "What time is it?"

"It cannot be very late," Liaoxi chimed from her bottom cot. "Second last watch was North Pyongan and I's, ah…"

She ducked her head, tugging one slim brown boot on, making SH smile.

It wasn't like the two had been making broadcasts about their relationship, but it was obvious to anyone with eyes, especially when Korea wouldn't let SH assign watches to the Chinese provinces, but Liaoxi joined North Pyongan on all of his anyway.

She thought it was cute, though it also made her… slightly uncomfortable to think of her cousin doing… the things that men did.

But it was fine. Liaoxi wasn't one of their people, and she doubted North Pyongan was very interested in that sort of thing anyway. And it wasn't her business if he was.

"What she means is that she took last watch with your cousin, and hasn't been asleep very long." Liaotung gracefully leapt from the upper bunk, wincing as her socked feet touched the freezing cold concrete floor.

SH liked the ice leaking through the bottom of her feet and into her bones, but she went to put on her boots anyway, the one article of clothing she didn't sleep in when she wasn't in the field.

Liaoxi cleared her throat, nodding. "Comrade Korea arrived towards the end, and told us the bunker he would defend."

SH pursed her lips. Odd for Korea to steal last watch from Hwang. Actually now that she thought about it, it was odd he'd woken them up at all. Usually when he didn't sleep at the bunker, he just met them at the rendezvous point near Pyongyang to give their orders for the day.

Korea hadn't sounded urgent, but she still hustled to get ready, tucking her black officer's pants into her calf-length boots, sliding her navy gloves (a gift from a comrade in the Democratic Women's Union that had decided her drab military-issue gloves weren't pretty enough) up to the wrist, placing her winter ushanka firmly on her head, and finally wrapping herself in the thick olive long coat that went down past her knees, making sure the wind couldn't creep in any exposed gaps. SH might like the cold, but only in short bursts. Her ice bath last night had been enough, thank you.

Though last night's nightmares had left her feeling like she needed another.

The province shook her head, urging the other women to finish dressing, then shepherding them from the room, being far more polite with the Chinese sisters. Because she knew how to treat guests.

North Pyongan and Chagang were already in the hall, the latter doing brisk stretches. SH went to pound on the men's door again.

"Time to get up!" she called, her voice reverberating in the tunnel, making Chagang wince. "North Hamgyong, get your lazy rump out of bed!"

"Fuck you," came the muffled reply.

Satisfied, SH joined her cousins, Hae already pushing open the front door.

As soon as the crack of muted light spilled through, so did the smell.

SH froze as it hit her nostrils, and her mouth instantly flooded with saliva. The others stood at attention, too, Hae's eyes lighting up at something they hadn't smelled from a source that wasn't their own charred flesh in a long time.

Meat.

South Pyongan pushed past Hae into the outside, and SH followed with tentative hope.

It was still half-dark out, bright enough that she could turn her flashlight off, but early enough that the encircling forest and towering mountain were still painted in shades of grey and silver. The fire crackling through the trees was the only splash of colour, like blood on silk.

For once, SH didn't mind the oppressive pall of pre-dawn, too focused on the rich scent filling the air as she was lured towards the flames, and the sound of a ladle scraping against a pot.

It wasn't their usual one, but a much larger cast iron cauldron, too large for their stove. It sat over an open fire whose banked flames licked at the bottom. Korea stood over it, his back to them as he stirred its contents.

"Soup?" South Pyongan asked, darting to him like an arrow to peer over his shoulder. "Meat soup?"

“Congratulations,” Korea said dryly. “You have eyes and a nose.”

“Actually we don’t have the latter,” Hwang said as he joined them, his coat drawn tight around his thin body. “But my nares still aren’t deceiving me. You made soup with meat in it.”

“I went hunting last night,” Korea said, not looking up as he stirred. “I caught a deer.”

Hae sidled up to him with wide, hopeful eyes. “Korea, is the soup… for us?”

“Yes,” he said unexpectedly.

The woman’s face lit up, and she beamed, throwing herself at him. “Thank ya, Korea!”

SH blinked in surprise. “Are you sure?”

Deer were as scarce as the rest of their wildlife, either hunted down by refugees or driven into the depths of the mountains by the war activity of planes and vehicles. She would have thought any kill he managed to make would go to their people.

South Pyongan cut in before Korea could. “Hey, hey, cuz, don’t question our Countryhuman’s sudden generosity.”

She mouthed ‘Don’t ruin this for me,’ over her shoulder.

The mist of Korea's words twinned with the steam coming off the pot. “I’m sure."

“I assure you I'm not protesting,” Hwang said as the others gathered around, all drawn by the smell of meat. “But if you managed a successful hunt, shouldn’t we dry the venison for powder?”

Korea tapped his ladle on the side of the cauldron. “You didn’t have a New Year’s meal. Consider this it.”

SH smiled. So it was like that.

“I suppose this means I won’t get a meal for proper New Year’s?” China asked, breezing over to lean against the hearth, peering into the other pot bubbling away on it.

“Why would you?” Korea flatly asked. “I expect you’ll be in your country getting drunk again.”

A few of the provinces tipped their heads at that, but China just smiled.

“I expect you’re right. A pity,” he sighed. “And it’s the Year of the Dragon this year, too. It should bode well for us. Of course, that’s if we keep them fed.”

Korea rolled his eye. “The soup is for you, too. Consider it an early Lunar New Year’s meal.”

SH was even more shocked at that. It obviously wouldn’t have been good manners to exclude their Chinese comrades from a meal, but, well, she could definitely see Korea doing it.

China smiled. “Then I predict great fortune for the coming year.”

“Grab your utensils,” Korea ordered them. “It’s done. Boiled water is on the buttumak.”

It was a good thing he’d waited until it was almost done to wake them up. SH thought her stomach might jump out of her throat if he hadn’t. It almost did as she let her other cousins go first, struggling not to choke on her saliva.

When it was her turn, Korea swirled his ladle through the pot, coming out with cracked bones glistening with marrow, one of SH’s favourite parts.

“No eyeballs,” he informed her.

“It’s alright,” she assured him. Eyes weren’t really her favourite texture or tastewise anymore, they just…

She looked over at North Hamgyong, then went to her seat, reminding Korea to save some marrow bones for Kangwon and Gangwon, who would eat a bowl of the jelly if you let them.

China had held his provinces off, but let them go now. SH could see Korea didn't withhold any meat from them, or from the Chinese Countryhuman as he went last.

Even if he was... warming to China, food was a different matter. So long as a foreigner wasn't actually starving, she wouldn't have said her Countryhuman would share Korean resources with them. But here he was.

"What part do you like?" he asked in another shocking display of consideration.

China eyed the pot. "I don't suppose there's any intestine?"

As Korea fished a few segments out for him, Hwang said, "I hope you cleaned the deer well."

"If I didn't, blame the Kangwons," their Countryhuman retorted. "I did it the way I learned."

SH trusted him. Next to their doctor cousin, Korea was the best butcher they had. They'd never gotten sick eating meat he prepared.

They all took their seats around the fire as Korea curbed it, holding their steaming cups of boiled water and soup. It was a rich brown, overflowing with chunks of meat and flecked with green. The pot had been burgeoning, like the entire deer had been thrown in it, nothing like their usual method of stretching a carcass out for as many meals as possible.

SH looked up to see Korea taking his place on a stump over by the agungi. His hands were empty.

"Korea," she said, her own wrapped around her tin bowl. "Aren't you going to have some?"

"It's all for you," he said, expression blank. "Eat well."

Hae and South Pyongan didn't need any more encouragement before digging in. SH sighed, but joined the others, finally able to use her short metal chopsticks now that they had a soup that was more than thin liquid.

She almost moaned as her teeth sank into the meat, and the rich juices flooded her mouth, more fragrant than any deer meat she'd had before. Across the clearing, China did moan, earning a slap from Liaotung.

"This is quite tender for venison," Hwang echoed her thoughts, brow furrowed as he chewed with his hand over his mouth.

SH was too busy devouring her soup to scold him for technically talking with his mouth full. She'd been trying to suppress her hunger and keep her stomach quiet for the past few months, but now that it had been awakened, it was screaming for more.

"And it's flavourful. Is there doenjang in this?" North Pyongan asked in between spoonfuls.

"I borrowed some from Comrade Kim Song-ae," Korea said. "And dried scallions."

"It tastes excellent," China praised, closely examining a scrap of meat. "Of course, it could use some spice."

"Complain and I never cook again."

"I don't think I want you to cook again if there's no chili paste."

"You and your peppers," Liaotung muttered.

SH was pleased to see that her and her sister were eating daintily, but were clearly just as thrilled as the Korean provinces to finally have meat, and even more pleased she hadn't had to talk Korea into sharing.

China sighed dramatically. "Once I put our Sichuan back together, she'll understand me."

"Organs!" South Pyongan cheered from the opposite log, pulling a slice of liver from her bowl.

“You don’t like the texture of organs,” North Pyongan pointed out, leaning away from her chopsticks.

“No, but I like protein.” She popped it in her mouth.

For the provinces ‘like’ and ‘don’t like’ didn’t mean much when it came to food. Most of them had spent the beginning days of the Occupation in poverty, living off scraps and forage. It had been a good month if SH and her brother managed to snag a fish from a rich fisherman. They’d eaten slightly better after learning how to hunt, but it was still mostly unseasoned meat, namul, and the occasional wild fruit. And every single piece of the animal had to be used. It didn’t matter if you didn’t like the texture of thoroughly-cooked brains when your stomach was empty. It was only recently that their preferences had started to mean anything, and that had stopped mattering once the war began.

SH had been given quality food in the cage, but… None of it had tasted good. Her brother could scarf it down on every visit, but it had only ever been ashes in her mouth, washed down with bitter unshed tears in a sakura-print cup. Especially after she had learned meals added to her debt, and couldn’t be skipped. It had felt like she was swallowing the money she and her brother had earned, the paper edges of the yen cutting her throat. Every spoonful of chewy brain scooped from a deer’s skull had been easier to choke down than the light miso soup and green teas.

She peered at her brother from the corner of her eye, perched on a large rock near the opposite log.

He’d taken a few swigs of his broth, and now reached in with his chopsticks, coming out with a chunk of meat. He ate it eagerly, then his face went blank.

Next to him, Chagang winced, turning his attention to North Hamgyong as he stared down at the bowl for a long moment.

Then to SH’s shock, he set it on the ground.

Korea noticed, and his eye narrowed. “Eat.”

“I’m not hungry,” North Hamgyong muttered.

SH felt a flicker of anger that the dark thing shared. Korea had spent all night hunting, butchering, and cooking, definitely not getting any sleep, to make sure they had a nice meal. Her brother had to realize what it meant that he was giving the meat to them, and not their people.

She closed her eyes, running the brush over the wall, painting a deer with a broken neck.

“You need it,” Korea growled, the clink of spoons stopping. “Eat.”

He maintained contact with North Hamgyong, who stared him down in return.

Then his jaw feathered, and he picked his bowl back up, grudgingly taking another spoonful of broth, his throat flexing like he had to force himself to swallow.

Korea sat back, face unreadable as he watched them eat.

Unlike her brother, SH wasn’t ungrateful, so she eagerly finished off her bowl, trying to savour it without letting it grow cold.

Next to her, Hae wolfed down her own, only pausing to gasp, “Korea, you gave me an entire half’a the heart?”

“You need it to recover your energy.”

Hae squeaked as he pointedly glared at her, hiding her face in her bowl.

North Hamgyong grit his teeth.

Hae and South Pyongan finished before the rest of them, the Hwanghae carefully using her tongue to chase down each drop of liquid around her mouth, not wasting a drop.

“Thank you, Korea,” she chirped. “You’re a real good cook! Your soup's always been my favourite.”

North Hamgyong stood abruptly. “I’m done eating. I’m heading into the city.”

“You’ll likely still be walking when we come by in the GAZ,” Hwang pointed out.

North Hamgyong ignored him, *'thunk'*ing his bowl on the ground, drained of broth, but not empty.

“You din’t finish your meat,” Hae pointed out, her eyebrows furrowed.

The man’s jaw clenched as he glanced at Korea. “You can have it.”

“Really?” their cousin chirped.

He was already storming away.

Hae looked askance at Korea, and he inclined his head. She dove across the clearing and happily started in on the rest of North Hamgyong’s meat.

SH glared after her brother, but refused to let his bad mood ruin the first time she’d had a good meal in months. She turned her attention to digging the marrow from the bones. It must have been a young deer, since they weren’t as thick as she was used to. But what was inside them was just as good as usual. She hummed in satisfaction as the buttery jelly melted on her tongue.

As they were finishing up, Korea said, “There’s enough for you to take seconds to your provinces. Just make sure to leave enough for two meals each for Kangwon and Gangwon. South Pyongan, no fishing out all the meat."

The azure woman snapped her fingers.

"And I made soondae with the rest of the intestine and some glass noodles," Korea continued, nodding to the bowls that he never used for himself, but were now filled with short steamed sausages the colour of dried blood. "Share it with your bodyguards.”

“In Kangwon’s absence, I’ll point out that he said to be careful with blood products from wild animals," Hwang said, licking the last droplets of soup from his spoon. "They can cause parasites."

"I have parasites already," Korea deadpanned. "They're called provinces."

"A common infestation," China agreed, face buried in his bowl as he earned twin elbows from his own parasites.

As SH ran her tongue over her bowl, she moped a little. Korea's soup hadn't been anything fancy, and most of its impact had come from the fact that it was their first time eating meat in months.

But she knew it was still better than anything she could make.

"South Hamgyong."

She raised her face to see Korea glaring at her. His eye narrowed. She bit her lip, getting rid of the thoughts he knew she was thinking.

She would get better. When the war was won.

After they were all done, Korea stood up. He cast a slightly uncomfortable glance at the Chinese, then turned to his provinces, his face solemn.

"One day you will all be able to eat meat three times a day," he vowed, single eye burning with more intensity than the coals at his feet. "I promise."

SH smiled softly, answering for all of them. "We know, Korea. North Hamgyong knows, too."

At least he should.

Korea looked at them again, lingering on Hae, then turned back to the fire to douse it, billowing steam filling the grey dawn, enveloping him like soft white wings.

The soup had warmed SH from the inside out, and she resolved to find something to make Korea feel the same.

She examined the snow carpeting the ground beneath the canopy. The larches and hornbeams were thick around here, but there were glades. When planting season came, maybe...

SH nodded in resolve. It was worth a try.

For once she didn't fight to do dishes.

She looked off into the trees where her brother had gone, twisting her coat in her hands, then said, "I'm going to walk with North Hamgyong."

Korea shot a look at her through the clouds of steam. "I don't want you two going at it. You need to share a truck on the way to your capitals."

"He's the one you should be telling that."

He narrowed his eye, and she sighed.

"I just want to ask him something. I can bring him his second portion of soup, too. And I think he left without his pack."

Korea reluctantly assented, and she scurried to the men's room to grab her brother's pack, which was tossed haphazardly on his bed. SH filled his canteen with soup (it would encourage him to wash it, anyway), and went to hurry after him as her cousins cleaned up.

"South Hamgyong," Korea called warningly. "Behave."

She huffed, but agreed, heading off into the trees as the sky started to lighten overhead with the arrival of the pale creams and delicate blues of true dawn.

Her brother had made good time, and was already at the highway. SH had to jog to catch up, her firearms and their packs thumping against her back as she ran, not calling out until she was at distance he couldn't run from her from.

"North Hamgyong!"

He didn't look back. He actually started walking faster, which meant she hadn't just been being paranoid.

Her lips pressed together in irritation as she caught up to him.

"You could wait, you know."

"So you can nag me?" he grunted. "No thanks."

"So you do know the word thanks," SH noted. "You could have said it to Korea."

"Why?" her brother scorned. "He doesn't want thanks for feeding us. He thinks it's shit he has to do. Did you seriously follow me just to hammer a nail into my 'ear?'"

Trying to keep her good mood, SH took his pack off her shoulder, holding it out.

"You forgot this. And your soup."

He took his pack, but looked at his canteen with thin lips. It made the dark thing growl.

"You know Korea made this as an apology," she said, keeping her voice light. "You should accept it."

"He-" North Hamgyong cut himself off, knuckles flexing. "Whatever."

He snatched his canteen back, looking at it with a tight jaw before attaching it to his belt, not allowing even a break in his stride.

"It would be polite to say thank you to me, at least," SH tightly.

"Why?" he asked flatly. "You could've waited until the truck caught up. You came to say some stupid shit that I probably don't want to hear."

SH's own hands clenched as she ran her brush over the wall in soothing patterns.

She could tell he was already in a bad mood, in the way she'd become attuned to in the cage. It crackled off him, tightening her insides.

But she had to ask before they met up with their bodyguards. So she voiced the question that had been festering in her mind for the past two days.

"I came to ask why you didn't tell me you were giving away your rations, too."

"Because I didn't want my ass to be on the fire with all of yours," he grunted, not looking at her. "Some good that fucking did me."

"You told Kangwon," she said, frustrated.

Now that she knew what her brother had been doing, she could remember a few times Kangwon had hinted that he was in on the donations. She just hadn't realized it because the idea was so unlikely.

"So why didn't you tell me?" she asked, hurt. "Why did you sit there and insult us for months about something you were doing, too?"

"Is that all you care about?" he demanded.

SH blinked, baffled. "Yes?"

For over two months he'd been acting like all of them were the stupidest people alive for wanting to keep their people fed. He'd been vocally against it at the discussion where they'd decided on it, and said- and she quoted- 'Don't expect me to starve to death like you idiots. I'm not a bleeding heart moron.' He hadn't known about her helping out Jin-suk before that, but she knew if he had, he would have said the same things.

North Hamgyong *'tch'*ed, looking away again as his stride lengthened.

"What else am I supposed to care about?" SH demanded, keeping pace as anger started burning in her chest. "Should I care that you were being 'noble' like us by going behind our backs? If you had just said you were going to join us, I would have been impressed from the start. But you didn't. And you've been using it as an excuse to be mean to us, even more than usual."

The more she thought about it, the more it seemed like that had been his reason. She'd held out some kind of hope in her heart that if she got him alone, he might tell her something sympathetic like…

She didn't know.

And she supposed she'd been wrong anyway. It had been stupid to expect anything sympathetic from North Hamgyong, just as stupid as it was to ever expect sympathy from him.

"Why are you like this?" The words burst out of her in frustration, like they had last time. "Why are you always so mean? Even when you're doing something good, you always have to drag us, to drag me, down."

She swiftened her pace, grabbing his shoulder and hauling him around, making him stop.

"Why are you like this?!" he threw back at her before she could say anything. "Korea can call you an idiot all he fucking wants, he can scream at you and repeat all the exact same fucking things I did and that's just fine, but when I call you an idiot for starving yourself that's too fucking far?"

"Because Korea calls me an idiot because he cares," she hissed, nails dug into her palms. "You say it because you mean it."

He curled his lip at her, exposing yellowed canines. "And you just know that, just like you just know why Korea does it."

"Why else would you do it?!" she cried, throwing her hands up. "Why else would you constantly put me down and belittle me?"

She knew she should just keep quiet, stop him from baiting her into another fight, but she couldn't help it. The words poured out.

"I've tried to give you grace, North Hamgyong, I've tried to tell myself for years that you're just grouchy or that being mean is how you show you care. But how am I supposed to believe that when you look for every little opportunity to hurt me?! You made everyone think you were a selfish dog's son that doesn't give a darn about our people just so you'd have an excuse to remind me I'm an idiot at every other meal!"

North Hamgyong's shoulders hunched as he bared his teeth at her. His lack of retort just made her more furious.

"And I saw your face when we were listening to Korea's New Year's broadcast," she accused. "I saw the way you crushed Comrade Kim Il-sung's letter."

Her own was still neatly folded in her pocket, the hopeful words burning in her breast.

"I saw the way you looked at us." Her nails dug into her bandages as the thing's claws sank into the wall. "Because you wanted me to see. You wanted me to see you being a miserable bastard so I'd know you think we're idiots for thinking we can overcome America, and I'd feel worse because you just can't stand me being positive!"

"Because there's no fucking reason to be positive!" the male burst out, spittle flying at her. "We're fucked! How many times do I have to tell you that before you understand?! How many times do you have to see one less village on our way north before you get it through your skull? I was right about the talks not fucking working, I'm right about the Yank never letting us Reunify, and I am going to be right about him dropping a fucking nuke on us! The only way you couldn't see that was if you were a fucking dimwit!"

SH finally gave in to the urge she felt whenever she talked to him, baring her teeth back. "Well then you must be right again. I must be one. I must have been a dimwit for thinking we could get all the way to the Raktong, I must have been a dimwit for thinking we could come back from the Amnok and retake Pyongyang and Seoul, I must have been a dimwit for thinking we could withstand almost two straight years of being carpet-bombed, and I must be a dimwit for thinking we can beat America!

"None of that other stuff fucking matters!" North Hamgyong cried, bristling over her. “You thought we could win and we didn’t! We-“

The dark thing's snarl came out of SH’s mouth. “Don’t you dare finish that sentence.”

North Hamgyong showed his teeth, and she could tell he wanted to, just to spite her, just to make her feel worse.

“I can’t stand you when you’re like this." Hot blood trickled down her fingers to steam on the frozen highway. “Every time I try to reach out to you, you have to pick a fight. You make me so- so-“

“Say it,” he growled.

“Mad!” she cried, resisting the urge to stomp her foot. “You make me so angry!”

It felt good to admit out loud for the first time. North Hamgyong made her furious and he always had. The way he was always so standoffish and mean, the way he did whatever he could to hurt her, the way he’d looked at her over that table as they sipped their bitter tea. He enraged her, and he knew he did. He wanted to, she could tell by the way his eyes gleamed in satisfaction as the words tore out of her.

“That’s all?” he challenged.

“No!” she cried. “You’re an irritating, pessimistic prick that doesn’t have one nice word to say, and sometimes I think I’d be better off without you!”

Her voice echoed over the plains and North Hamgyong flinched back like she’d struck him, but for once she didn’t feel any remorse. He could lash out at her as much as he liked and she was just expected to grin and bear it and keep trying to be nice. He acted just like all the men she’d had to deal with in her cage, the cage he had put her in.

SH advanced on him, refusing to let him retreat from the fight he’d picked. “I don’t want to feel that way about my own brother, but I do! And you want me to!”

North Hamgyong swung back. “You can finally admit that I piss you off,” he growled. “But that’s fucking all? Why don’t you tell me the damn truth?”

“That is the truth!” SH shouted, eyes flashing.

“The real truth, South Hamgyong.”

Blinding rage punched a hole in the wall, and the angry thing reached one long black talon through.

“Why don’t you tell me the truth?” she snapped. “What were you going to say the last time we fought, before Korea interrupted us?”

North Hamgyong’s jaw feathered, and she pressed her attack.

“Go on, say it. I thought you wanted to talk about the truth.” She shoved him backwards. “Come on, what were you going to say, oppa?”

“Don’t fucking touch me!” he snapped, slamming his palm against the shoulder he’d put a bullet in, making her stagger.

SH caught her balance and looked up at him, feeling a dark gleam of anticipation from the thing forcing its twisted body through the crack in the crumbling concrete.

“Tell me.”

Even though she knew when he did, it would be the breaking point between them.

North Hamgyong was a live wire, quivering from his jaw down to his legs, rigid with the force of trying to suppress what she so badly wanted him to say and so badly didn’t want to hear. SH sank her teeth into the side of her mouth, copper flooding it as the angry thing thrashed and growled.

The sound of a truck engine made them both look, and they straightened as they recognized the GAZ.

In wordless agreement, they turned on their heels, starting down the road towards the city like they had been. SH could still feel the tension quivering from her brother, and her own jaw was locked as she hurriedly tried to paint over the thing, beating it back behind the wall, trying to think of anything but shattered tea cups and accusing eyes and swollen wounds leaking pus.

They stood off to the side as the truck pulled up, the Jeep behind it.

"Get in," Korea ordered from the driver's seat.

"I'm going to ride with our Chinese comrades," SH said, fighting to keep her voice at its usual bright level as her stomach churned violently. "If that's all right."

Korea looked between the two of them, his eye narrowed. SH could hear North Hamgyong's teeth creaking.

With a 'tch' that said they hadn't fooled him, he said, "Go ahead."

The two walked around the side of the GAZ.

Before they made it, SH leaned over and furiously whispered, "If you ever say something like what you said to me about the war to the others, you will regret it."

North Hamgyong snorted. "And what would you do?"

"I don't have to do anything." SH smiled sweetly. "Korea would."

He glowered at her. "Don't bother waiting at the truck. I'll find my own damn ride to Chongjin."

"Good." She turned her back on him before he could see the hurt on her face, marching to China's vehicle.

"In the back, Tung'er," the Chinese man said, shooing his province back. "Gege drives better with a pretty woman in the passenger seat."

"You've never driven better in your life," Liaotung muttered, climbing over the bench to join her sister.

SH thanked her, jumping up and smoothing her coat.

"I assume the green one is being unpleasant again?" China asked as they started down the road again.

"'Again' would imply that he ever stopped."

And he hadn't. Ever. He'd been unpleasant since the day he woke up in that hospital, like he was the one who-

He was in the bed of the GAZ ahead of them, seated next to Hwang. SH made eye contact with him, watching his lip curl. Then she pointedly looked away, out the window.

She was done trying to reach out to North Hamgyong. He never did the same for her. Even when he did, it was just because he was looking for another chance to get a hit in, like he had when confronting her about her assignment to talk to the women victimized by the Yanks and their puppets.

'I wish I hadn't-'

SH grit her teeth, painting over and over that crack, trying to picture anything she could to drive the dark thing and its rage away.

It all came out a sea of red.

The only people that know North is lying are North Hamgyong (because every time he's eaten dog before he's felt awful, so it sticks with him), Kangwon and Gangwon (animal experts), China (world's most distinguishing palate), and Hwang has a suspicion (studied carcasses whenever Kangwon butchered them, was very sick of venison during the Occupation days, and has a questioning mind). Modern day, North Hamgyong doesn't eat at sweetmeat restaurants, but he doesn't call attention to it. He just conveniently has other things to do whenever he's invited by the others.

If you're interested in what Chagang sees during the meal, he's actually just having a good time before North Hamgyong's realization. North is not giving off any guilt. Or if he is, it's not strong enough for Chagang to see. Would he have given off guilt when killing Ppang? Who knows.

Now real stuff. That Security Council resolution for the US being able to oversee Palestine and disarm resistance fighters makes me fucking sick. It's how seamlessly America manipulated shit, like usual. People are freaking out at China and Russia for not vetoing, but they literally can't. The entire Middle East supported it, the Palestinian Authority supported it. And while the PA is an Israeli puppet, they are also the legally recognized government of Palestine. If China vetoed the resolution, it would be played as them disrespecting Palestine's sovereignty, which is the thing they are always vocally saying they're vehemently against. And if the ceasefire 'broke' (Israel is breaking it frequently, but it's still held as being in affect) after the resolution was vetoed, Russia and China would both be held responsible for it. And the Americans heavily implied that it would be broken and worse things would come if the resolution didn't go through, which we all know is true. And we know the exact same thing that's happening now would keep happening even if the resolution was vetoed. No UN resolution will stop Israel or America, it never has. It would be nice if we lived in a world where morals could always come before geopolitical considerations, but we don't. China and Russia can't really do anything more than support Hamas and the other resistance groups from the sidelines with weapons and conferences, because if either of them got outwardly militarily involved against Israel it would start World War III. When you look at how fair their proposed draft that was rejected was compared to the American one that was accepted, it is just so clear what kind of people are in the United Nations. It makes me so furious. The Palestinian resistance will fight on regardless, but every trace of both America and Israel needs to be wiped off the map.

And A Happy New Year

Another fucking Christmas had passed. Another goddamn Christmas and America was still in this shitty country freezing his ass off in this shitty house while his Doughboys got slaughtered by commies and grew more ungrateful by the day, and Red China and North Korea were probably sitting together giggling about the fucking coup the Nork had pulled off with the POW holding camp last year, along with that doll.

And on top of everything America had to juggle, Truman couldn't even keep the one ball he had in his hands, and was letting their moronic workforce raise hell over wages back home. The man had been letting them go on their mini strikes damn near since the war started and steel began selling for more again.

It was natural for the price to go up as demand did, and it was natural for the steel companies not to want to raise wages unless the government started buying it for more. How else would they keep making enough to be the guys on top and not in the same boat as the rubes in the factory?

What wasn't natural was for those rubes to be so up-in-arms about it. It wasn't like they were working harder or had any right to the steel they churned out. So what made them think they deserved to make more pennies than they already did?

It was CCCP's influence, he knew it. Big Red sneaking his spies and rabble-rousers in to put ideas in honest, hard-working Americans' heads, spreading through America's workforce like a disease. It wasn't paranoia when he knew.

He'd seen how brainwashed the Norks and Red Chinese were firsthand now, how the POWs rejected the classes on democracy and refused to be screened so that after America was done with this place, Rhee and his boys wouldn't have to put them down like the other Reds, how so many of the ones that were screened had to have the commie beat out of them so they'd make the right decision.

And even then, America knew it still lurked inside of them like an illness, just waiting to flare up again.

That was what CCCP wanted to infect his country with, what Red China and North wanted to.

He wouldn't let it happen. He'd keep the virus out of his borders.

But first he had to save Korea.

America paced around the parlour, his cigarette jouncing in his fingers.

The groundwork for the prisoners of war had been being laid since October. But it wasn't enough. A few had had the scales fall from their slanty eyes, but nowhere near as many as there should be. The bulk still waved their red flags and chanted their slogans.

How was he supposed to just send them back to their Red masters? If he got his war with China before Korea fell, they'd go right back to killing for them, and their first targets would probably be the fellas whose minds had already been saved. They saw oppression in the men tasked with getting them on the straight and narrow, when all they had to do to be one of 'em was denounce North Korea and Red China.

They couldn't see that he was trying to save them, just like he'd tried to save the anti-Communists from Big Red's land after World War II. They'd needed to get free and clear before they got executed for being traitors, and he needed a bunch'a folks with weapons and a grudge. If fucking Britain hadn't been shaking in his knickers over the fate of his own POWs the Reds broke out of Nazi camps, America would bet his bottom dollar his steel workers wouldn't be succeeding at being so mouthy now. The best way to break up a strike was imported muscle with heavy accents and military training.

He turned on his heel, leaving a divot in the rug he'd had to have sent over to make this place a little fucking warmer.

But it would work this time. The Reds didn't have the leverage they needed to make the others waffle.

And Britain was in his pocket.

Some of the heat left America's stomach, warming his skin instead as he stopped next to the crackling fireplace.

Good ole Churchill had won the last election, just like he'd suggested. America hadn't done anything, of course. He didn't need to. It might've taken the old man a coon's age to come around, but he really was a democracy now. The limeys had just shown sense for once in their collective lives and decided they were sick and tired of having a pinko in charge.

And Churchill, now that was a man who knew what needed to be done. He'd visited the White House just yesterday to speak in front of Congress and recommit his full support to taking back Korea, and to pinky swear that if it came to war with Red China, he'd back up the blockade a hundred percent, boots on the ground. Or ships in the sea, rather.

America smirked, leaning an elbow against the mantle as he took a drag of his smoke, letting the good Cuban tobacco fill his lungs.

He'd wait a few days to call Britain to gloat. Let him sweat a little, the way America had used to have to while waiting for correspondence from across the sea.

His lips fell flat, eyes fixed on the crackling flames.

And because he knew the old bastard would have something fucking smart to say, something about how America had 'needed' his support.

He didn't. Britain needed his. It was why Churchill had invited America to throw his hat in the Suez Canal ring.

But America didn't join ventures, not anymore. He led them. He'd led the war against the Krauts and the Japs, he was leading Korea, he'd lead Red China, and he would lead every mission of any consequence in the future. He would lead the final campaign against CCCP.

America didn’t raise his torch in the crusades of other countries. He was on his own, a more just and sacred one than any before, to claim his destiny and save them all.

He'd let Britain splash around in the Suez Canal for a bit, just so it would really hit home that he wasn’t in charge anymore. His land was rapidly shrinking, while America’s only expanded, soon to be with those same colonies that had formerly decorated his crown. His economy was going down the shitter, and even though old Churchy had said he hadn’t visited Washington to beg for money- the old man was still too proud to come crawling on his knees- he would, the way he’d expected America to do after the Panic of 1893.

But that hadn’t been the end of his Gilded Age. It’d only been a stutter, the mid-act crisis that would make America’s eventual climatic victory all the more satisfying. This was the end of Britain’s. The king was dead, long live the King, and et-cet-er-a.

America’s smirk returned, twisting up so the firelight reflected off his even canines.

Scratch that. He wasn’t going to call Britain.

He’d send him a letter.

Smoke filled the country’s lungs as he inhaled deep, the headiness of future victory swelling his head.

The pieces were coming together. His stay-behind army was in progress for if he had to switch horses, and the seeds of North Korea's destruction were being sown across the Parallel even as the smoke left his mouth in a billowing cloud of grey. America had Britain, he had Britain’s leadership, and he had the UN.

Now all he needed was Red China.

The front door opened, and he pushed off the fireplace, flicking his cigarette into it.

“Back from the market, Gracie-baby?” he called.

“Yep!” her voice echoed from the hallway. “I picked up the stuff

you had sent over. Can I make mashed potatoes tonight?"

America scrunched his face, joining her in the kitchen. "How 'bout roasted, babe?"

It was like she'd become obsessed with making mashed potatoes lately. She'd made them before, obviously, since a man had to have his taters, and it was a reasonably easy thing for her to learn. But ever since Christmas, she'd been taking the allowance he gave her to the market and buying up every potato she could, boiling them in the big cast iron Korean pot, then standing in the kitchen for hours as she mashed and mashed them with the potato masher he'd gotten her for the holidays until they were as smooth as a Jew's tongue. She was dammed focused, too.

Grace looked disappointed by his request, but didn't argue. 'Course not. He had her trained good by now.

America slung himself into the sturdy kitchen chair, deciding to watch her get down to business, lighting another cigarette as he did.

"I brought the paper for you." Grace folded it the way he liked, setting it in front of him, and pushing his ash tray over.

It was bronze, shaped like a hexagon and engraved with curling vines and Oriental patterns. It looked more like a bowl for soup than ashes, but it served its purpose well. Grace had learned her lesson from last year, and hadn't needed a reminder to get him more than a cheesy card, or to keep her sticky fingers to herself.

Well, he didn't know she had. But she'd kept them out of South's pockets, at least. The kid didn't smoke yet, so the bronze tray couldn't've been his. That was all that mattered.

His lips twisted as he tapped ashes into the shiny bowl, thinking about their little drive down to the docks on Christmas Eve.

There'd been something fucky going on there, he knew it. And more than South being an idiot and giving the dame the chance to kill someone by changing up her Commands. He thought he knew who the Nork's agent was.

But it wasn't South. And that was really all that mattered. He'd reassigned a coupla Grace's guards to keep an even better eye on him lately, but all he did was lie on his heated floor and whine to himself, like usual. If anything, the little kerfuffle with the prisoner had just primed him for dealing with the others. He hadn't made a peep over America missing the ceasefire deadline.

It didn't matter which province that guy had belonged to- most of them were traitors. And if even the dame had been brainwashed… Well, South just fully understood now what America had all along.

The Reds could get to anyone. Even the people that claimed to despise them and everything they stood for could have their minds scrubbed clean until they were just as smooth-brained as the commies. How could they just hand over more drones for their hive?

How could they make peace?

The Reds might have whatever brainwashing device CCCP had cobbled together from spit and pure commie determination. But America's boys in the camps were changing minds. Red China wouldn't sign anything, not when his POWs weren't being handed back. He couldn't tolerate his guys being shipped over to Formosa for Chang Kai-shek's army, and America couldn't tolerate returning more bullets for his arsenal before he came for him. This was a win-win.

'For me, anyway.'

America blew smoke rings up at the overhead light as his mind drifted, and he admired the curve of Grace's waist, and the bruises exposed by her knee-length, checkered shirtwaist dress, nodding with satisfaction to himself.

Another bitchin' Christmas present, on top of the potato masher and the little red earrings he'd got her, another 'requisition' from a soldier who'd found them just lying around. He spoiled her really. And all she'd gotten him was an ash tray. 'Something to remember our time in Korea.' Like he could fucking forget it when he'd had to spend a damn year and a half here.

He felt a flicker of irritation as he tapped more ashes from the end of his smoke. It felt good. He hadn't felt much of anything exciting for the past few weeks, aside from the little thrill making the Reds snap their caps with the talks had brought, and being pissed at the dame. And he'd worked that out on Grace pretty quickly.

There wasn't much action at the front, things in the rear were mostly locked down tight, aside from a little guerrilla resistance and sabotage that wasn't anything Rhee's bloodhounds couldn't deal with, South had been behaving himself, and now that the POW camps were going to be seeing a little more limelight, America was making himself scarce from them. And his girl had been keeping herself on the straight and narrow, her lessons learned.

Frankly speaking, America was starting to get bored. Bored of watching the same films over and over, projected on the parlour wall, bored of hearing about shit back home instead of steering it, bored of Grace, bored of…

"Dinner's ready," Grace chirped, setting a plate down in front of him, a roast beef sandwich made with leftovers from the roast last night, roasted potatoes, and peas, all smothered with gravy.

She smiled as she did it, showing off her pearly whites in a real one, not like the nervous teeth baring she'd been doing for a few months after Britain had made him put the fear of God in her. The way she'd been creeping around the house like a mouse with a cat had been pissing him off, and he couldn't even teach her a lesson for being afraid of him because if he went too far, he knew it would feel like the limey was laughing at him for making him get rid of another girl.

She hadn't been going unpunished, of course. It was just whenever he found himself gritting his teeth over her downcast eyes and shaking hands, he'd go take a long drive and short boat ride to one of the camps.

Now that she was in a better mood, though, he'd have to remind her it was pretty damn ungrateful for her to be afraid of her country. CCCP had gotten in those turncoats' heads back in November, but the Tennessean girl had no such excuse.

"Looks good, Gracie-baby," America appraised the meal. "But maybe you should put half of that sandwich back. You're finally losing weight, don't want to make all that progress for nothing. Carbs, y'know?"

She'd started taking walks every day, no matter how cold it was. He was pleased she'd finally decided to do something about her softening figure. Motivation, that was all it took.

"Mm." Grace smiled, obediently removing half of the sandwich from her plate. "Do you want it?"

"Read my mind, babe."

She spooned a few of her potatoes onto his plate, too, and in exchange, he offloaded half his peas onto hers.

"See, this is why we make a good couple," he told her around a mouthful of bread and beef. "We know how to trade."

Grace smiled, using her knife and fork- You know he'd seriously had to import those here, too? Even with how modern this manor was, it still hadn't had civilized cutlery- to cut her sandwich into bite-sized pieces.

America flipped a page in The Washington Post with his free hand, kissing his teeth as he came across another article on the steel industry bargaining.

"Is all that still going on?" Grace asked, tucking a strand of her long hair behind one ear.

"Yep." America got halfway through the article before he got bored of it, and returned his attention to his sandwich, sighing dramatically. "Some people just can't be happy with what they have, Gracie."

"I know you explained the whole thing to me before, but I sort of like, didn't understand it at all," Grace said, making him chuckle indulgently.

He loved when a broad didn't know squat. It was fun to explain it to 'em and watch them nod and pretend like they got it. Anyone that said women could be military- real military- or get involved in politicking hadn't seen one's pretty blue eyes glaze over as you tried to explain the concept of profit margins to her.

That was why he'd gotten tired of… Katherine, Katy, that was it, pretty quick. She'd thought working at a paper company gave her an idea about how those things worked, enough that she could try to explain them to him. And when she'd mentioned joining a union, well, that was sort of it for her.

"Of course ya didn't, Gracie," he said, starting on the third sandwich half on his plate. "Here, let me dumb it down for ya. Basically to stop inflation- that's things costing more, babe- while the war's going on, our pal Truman unlinked wages and prices. That means the companies can't just raise prices when wages go up, 'cuz that would crash the economy. We did the same thing during last war."

"I was sort of busy in nursing school," Grace said, spearing a bite of potato. "Some of my friends would talk about it, but it was sort of like, we're nurses, you know? What does that have to do with us?"

America pointed his fork at her. "And if everyone had that attitude, the world would be a better place. Anyway, Big Labour feels like they got the short end of the stick last time, and the government was favouring Big Business. So now they're demanding we don't stabilize wages. They want 'productivity bonuses' for if the company they work for's doing better than usual, and price controls and crap."

Grace's pretty little brow furrowed. "And we… don't want that?"

"If wages keep going up, that's how we get inflation," America reminded her.

A few of ‘em were extra pissed because they’d missed out on pay rises before the wage control act passed. But that should be between them and the company they worked for, not the government. They had bigger fish to blow up.

He explained that to Grace, adding, “So the wages for those ones went up ten percent instead of twelve, and they’re not too gassed.”

Truman had basically been trying to pacify them for the past year, and failing miserably. A ton of workers had resigned.

Which was fine. If they weren’t happy with what they got, they could go elsewhere. That was freedom, baby. They weren’t going to find a better deal.

“And ever since Truman let the steel companies raise the price caps, they’ve been running on empty.”

Prez Pinko's engine had sputtered a bit, too, since it sort of screwed with his whole ‘wage and price control plan.’ But America had made sure it was pushed through. The companies were already pissed at revenue going down, since the State of Emergency and Defense Production Act saw them selling to the government at lower prices, and didn’t let them sell as much to the higher-paying civs. In the kind of wham-bam-thank-you-ma’am war Korea had been supposed to be, that kind of mass buying for cheap the government did turned a tidy little profit. Hell, he’d said before that this war had taken them out of the backslide, and he’d say it again.

But the economy, she was a fickle beast. And when shit dragged out like this, it started to get expensive.

Workers had to work. If they didn’t, they’d die. But the companymen could walk away at any time if they didn’t feel like their wallets were cushy enough. And America needed that steel for Korea.

“So long story short,” he said, tiring of his own explanation. “Labour wants higher wages, business obviously doesn’t, they’ve been talking it out for a few months, and haven’t gotten anywhere. Labour’s started asking for ridiculous shit like eight vacation days a year, weekend overtime, and for me to step in."

Seriously, they were already overpaid. And they thought they could make demands like that? Working in a steel mill didn't take a goddamn genius. Anyone could do it. If two bucks an hour wasn't good enough for them, they could find work elsewhere.

Grace nervously watched his fist clench around his fork.

"And if they don't get it, then the workers are probably going to go on an industry strike," America finished with a false smile. "Which means no more steel for us."

The yucks already had one cooked up, but had been postponing it since December. They said that if they didn't get what they want, they'd strike for real at the end of February.

They were holding it over America's head, trying to threaten him into conceding, like he wasn't trying to fight a damn war over here.

The bastards didn't know how good they had it. They had the freedom to negotiate wages and make demands. He was using the steel they made to bring that freedom to Korea, to the world, and they wanted to cut it off over twelve more cents an hour.

Grace's dyed blonde brows were pulled in, her plump red lips pouted in thought.

"Something to say, Gracie?"

She bit her lip.

"Go ahead, babe, speak your mind," he encouraged. "I'm sure you've got one rattling around in there."

The woman took a sip of water from her glass, then tentatively asked, "Why don't you step in?"

America raised a brow. "Beg pardon?"

"If they want you to step in, why don't you?" she asked, curling a string of hair around her finger. "You could, couldn't you? The guys that work in the factory want their wages to go up, but the guys in charge won't let them. If they're going to walk away if they don't…

"Why don't you just make them raise the wages?"

America stared at her. Grace stared back, and he could tell she had a mind because she already knew she'd made a mistake before he even pushed his chair back.

'SMACK.'

The girl's empty head rocked back as his palm met her cheek, and was just as quickly hauled back by his fingers in her hair. She stared up him with wide, childishly shocked eyes, like she hadn't just said the stupidest fucking thing in existence.

"Do we live in Korea, Grace?"

Her slim throat worked. "No."

"Do we live in Red China or Russia or any other backwards dictatorship?"

"No."

"No. We live in the USA."

The USA tightened his grip in her hair, forcing her head back to make her look him in the aviators. "So why the fuck would I do something Red like that?"

"Ah- I'm sorry," Grace stammered. "I d-didn't think it was Red, I mean, I just, my pa used to work in a steel mill and he said the fellas in charge could afford to pay him more, they just didn't want to. I-" Her blue eyes dipped to the floor, blocked by his broad chest. "I just thought maybe you could make them."

"Your pa was a crazy sumbitch that blew your ma's brains out of her head on a Tuesday afternoon," he growled. "And 'making' companies do anything is what commies do. We live in a free country, Grace. Our workers have the right to demand higher wages, and the guys in charge have the right to make as much money as they want. And when they don't want to give any of the money that they worked hard for away, the workers have the right to pick up their stakes and leave. I'm not going to step in to deprive any of them of that freedom. And if that doesn't sound right to you, then that makes you a Communist."

He forced her head back more, lowering his voice. "Are you a Communist, Grace?"

"I'm not."

This time as she denied it, the tears in her eyes came solely from her hair pulling at its roots. Her voice was almost tired.

The reaction wasn't what he wanted. Instead of lighting a fire in his belly, it just made that dull feeling of boredom spread through him.

America's teeth grit as he prepared to swing her to the ground and try to reignite that spark.

The intercom went off.

They both looked at the hallway, and there was that spark, lighting in his stomach at being interrupted.

America wanted to ignore the chime and stoke it, but when the sound came again, he hissed through his teeth and shoved Grace away.

"Stay here for a sec, babe," he ordered.

She stayed seated, her blonde hair a curtain over her face, so that was probably a yes.

America went to the intercom, pressing the button. "What?" he snapped.

His gateman's voice crackled. "Guest list visitor, sir."

The Countryhuman clicked his tongue. "Send him in."

He straightened his collar, brushing invisible lint from his lapels, and a few seconds later, a nondescript man in civilian's clothing entered. Short brown military cut, ordinary green eyes, and an appropriate amount of stubble.

"Good news, I hope," America prompted, leaning against the entry wall.

"More volunteers willing to replace the South Pyongan-Hwanghae cells," the man clipped in a flat tone, pulling a neatly folded piece of paper from his pocket.

America scanned over the list of names, and where applicable, ranks and units. "Good man. But send some to the east coast, too."

The guerrilla units he'd had up north had been going through a little bit of an implosion recently after four entire units had gone dark when they were supposed to be carrying out a covert op. And judging by the transmission his listening post had received, they weren't going to be coming back in contact anytime soon. Now the others were having a leadership crisis and seeing mass defections.

So it turned out it wasn't just the Southern gooks that were spineless cowards. The Northern ones were, too, but specifically after pledging themselves to Rhee. The guy had to be some kind of bad luck charm.

"And a communication from Pyongyang," the man continued. "Agent Maine reports the retrieval operation was a failure."

America snorted. "Yeah, I put that together when I didn't have a province delivered to my door a month ago."

"Yes, sir," the man said, unsmiling. "Her only new movement updates are that Kangwon province has been travelling frequently, both at night and day. His movements are unpredictable, and he is frequently accompanied by both a medical team and North Korea himself."

The nurse. His movements were unpredictable to anyone that didn't know what he was looking for. And America had a hunch that he did.

But if North was with him, it was a no-go. He'd taken out over two hundred of his Doughboys and South's guys- a puny little special task force wasn't going to bring him in.

Besides, America could run with the 'a province chose to defect, I can't possibly return him now' line. Selling that North himself had would be a little more difficult, especially with how publicly mouthy he'd been with the UN and other foreign governments.

Plus it was hard to say how his drones would react. They could work themselves into a fury and throw themselves at America's line to get their king back, maybe even giving him a chance to snag Red China (though he doubted the slippery bastard would exactly put himself on the line for his puppet), or they could panic and rally harder to sign a ceasefire immediately. Which would be harder to avoid when he had their literal Countryhuman in hand.

Unless he could get him to…

No. North Korea might be the brainwasher, not brainwashee, but those ideas would still have sanded his brain smooth. America had been able to tell how stubborn he was from their brief meeting alone. The fact that he was still holding fast with his country in ruins around him just proved the American right, as usual.

Best to stay focused on the provinces. That reaction would be predictable. Northie was barely tolerating making peace while the Southern ones were down here- there was no way he'd be able to sign if America had one from the North. It'd make him look even weaker than he was.

"No major operations for awhile," he decided. "The units will need time to rebuild and reorganize. But inform Agent Maine to keep Command updated on movements, just in case. Especially Gangwon province. And see if she can get us any hard proof of him being in Communist hands."

The broad had already told them he was, and America's boys were dual-lobbying his return with the prisoner of war topic, but actual photo proof, or something like it, would make a possible withdraw from the talks more sympathetic.

He didn't need it of course. It wasn't like anyone but CCCP would actually give him a real challenge over it, especially now that Britain and the UN had fallen in line. But he liked to have his bases covered.

"Yes, sir." The man gave him a few more unimportant updates on sabotage operations, then left with a sharp salute.

Grace was still sitting at the table when he came back to the kitchen. Her blue eyes peered out from her waterfall of blonde locks. The red handprint stood out against her creamy white skin like a brand.

America grinned.

When the itch under his skin was satisfied, they lay in bed together, looking up at the ceiling in the dark. The fireplace crackled in the parlour, but it wasn't enough to warm the bedroom. America ran his hand over Grace's smooth arm, feeling the pebbles on it.

"America?" she said quietly.

Her voice was clear. He hadn't been any rougher than usual this time. She hadn't meant anything by her comment- she just had a crazy dad that filled her empty head with crazy ideas. And he liked her a little bit crazy, that was why he'd chosen her.

'Sides, she'd given him an idea for Truman. His term was up after this year, but there was nothing stopping him from running again after four more. He still needed to pay for thinking he could outmaneuver America, so the Countryhuman was going to make sure that didn't happen. And the best way to do that was to sour him in the eyes of the shareholders.

America wouldn't step in between Big Business and Big Labour. But Truman would.

Remembering he had a girl, he said, "Yeah, babe?" winding her soft hair around his finger, a stripe of gold joining the red.

"What happens after the war is over?"

"We go home," he said. "Get to watch television and have proper heating again."

Grace was silent for a long while. "Ah don't think ah have a home."

"'Course you do, Grace," America soothed, running his hand along her silky locks. "America's home. I told ya you can count on me. I'm all you have left, aren't I?"

"Yes," she said, nuzzling into his neck.

He rested his chin on the top of her head. "Do you want to get circled, babe? Spend the rest of our lives together? Well, the rest of your life."

Grace's warm breath shuttered against his neck. "Yes."

"Then when the war's over, we'll get hitched," he said, sliding his hand under the sheets, along the knobby column of her curved spine. "I'll buy you a car, and all the fancy clothes and jewellery you want, and a nice house with a big kitchen so you can cook mashed potatoes for me all day. You like the sound of that?"

He gently pinched the swell of her hip so she'd know the question wasn't rhetorical, and she nodded into the crook of his neck.

"I do."

"Then that's what'll happen."

America held her in his arms, pressing kisses to her head as she drifted off.

Grace wasn't making it home from Korea. She'd seen and heard too much. He'd been forced to do too much to her by North Korea and Red China and Truman and CCCP and that Northern doll and Britain and this damn war. And sometimes by her. It wasn't all her fault. But it was enough that he couldn't trust her around the newshawks back home. He knew she'd never betray him, but she wasn't the brightest, and those bastards could be tricky.

And she was getting boring.

He cupped the side of her neck, stroking his thumb along the soft skin, feeling her carotid artery beat under the pad, light and steady.

It was fine. He didn't need her for much longer anyway. The Northern doll would take her place soon enough. Soon North would break and bend the knee, or he'd get the proof he needed that the chink was here. Whichever came first, America could take the war to Red China. Then he would feel alive again, the growing boredom blasted away by new fights, new political chess matches, new land to conquer and people to save, ones whose brains weren't entirely washed yet, and would appreciate it more than the gooks.

Even with how crazily devoted the brainwashed Norks were to their master, there was only so much they could take. He bet that even now, Northie was learning his lesson.

The Reds weren't the only ones that could spread sickness into someone else's country.

America's lips curled up against Grace's skull, the moonlight through the window glinting coldly off his aviators.

Another Christmas had passed with the war in Korea still raging.

But it would be the last.

I cut my thumb open (again) while making tonkatsu, but I was busy frying, so I didn't stop cooking, and didn't really pay attention to anything but not burning anything. Then I took my plate to eat in the dark, did the dishes in the dark, worked out, and went to sleep. I wake up the next morning and wonder what all the weird black smears are all over the floor, stove, and fridge are. Blood. Everywhere. I don't think I want to know the colour of my sink water last night.

While going over American slang from this period again, I found the term ‘candy ass’ to mean a weak or wimpy person. In the world of this book, I think that slang wouldn’t become popular, since ‘candy ass’ could easily be believed to be referring to a certain candy-striped Countryhuman. It would be seen as being anti-American by implying that America is a wimp. It would only catch on in certain American leftist circles after the war in Korea was over, sort of implying that America is weak for not being able to conquer North, mocking him without mocking him directly.

Hunger Is A Dog

1922

“Gochisousama des- Ah!”

Hae giggled as Korea launched himself across SH, straight into Sang, wrestling around with her as everyone tried to get out of the way. Chungbuk rubbed his side while he did, since he was still hurtin’ from getting shot.

“It’s not good for digestion to move so much right after eating!” Sang cried.

“You can prick your finger when I’m done with you.” Korea wrapped his legs around hers and flipped her sideways.

SH shook her head, gently nudgin’ Hae. “Why don’t we move a little so we don’t get kicked in the head?”

Hae jumped up, letting SH take her wooden bowl as she licked the last bit of soup from her fingers, makin’ sure not to miss a single drop. It’d been real good. Sang had made it with ginger root, leftover bones from the rabbits Kang had cut up a couple days ago, and some of the plants that grew around Changsu Mountain. It was the best thing she’d ever tasted. But still…

She rubbed her stomach with her free hand, ashamed.

“I hate when you do that.” North Hamgyong’s voice came from above her, since he was sitting as high up on the ridge as he could with the trees still hidin’ him if someone looked up from way down in the foothills.

Hae craned her head back to look at him, poppin’ the finger on her other hand out of her mouth. “Korea says we can’t waste anythin’.”

“Then don’t get soup on your fingers in the first place,” her cousin growled. “We have spoons for a reason.”

Hae knew that. Kang had worked hard on them. But she liked to fish the chunks in her soup out with her fingers. It helped her eat slower, which he said she had to do if she didn't want to throw up again.

Even though he'd always warned her about that, after she'd almost gotten stolen by the Kempeitei, she'd been so happy (and hungry) that she forgot. Kang had looked away to check out NJ's ankle, 'cuz she'd twisted it on the run, and then Hae was getting scolded for inhaling her bird meat and having it come right back up.

She didn't like throwing up at all. It was gross and hurt, and more importantly than that, Korea had scolded her for wastin' food.

And there was something else. Something from the hole she couldn't remember and didn't want to.

"And ah lick my fingers for a reason," she said to North Hamgyong, plantin' her hands on her hips. "It's either that or ah puke, and you'd think that's a lot grosser."

He made a funny face. "I have no idea what goes on in that fucking head of yours."

"Language," SH chided, and he made another funny face at her.

Everyone looked over as Sang shouted, "I have him! Wait. I don't! I don't have him!"

She'd been sittin' on Korea's stomach, and had almost pinned him down. But he'd got one of his legs up in between them and jabbed her in the stomach, like he'd done to Hae a few times now. Sang let go of him for a second, and then Korea was free and kickin' out with his legs like a rabbit. It probably wouldn't have done much but hurt, except they'd got too close to the edge of the slightly flatter part of the ridge they were camping on, so Sang went tumbling down it.

The slope was only a li'l bit steep, so Hae could still see her cousin as she rolled away, yelpin' as she hit every bump on the rocky hillside before spreading her arms out and landing in a sprawl on her face.

'Ouch.'

"You killed her," Pyo remarked from up in a pine.

"I'm alright!" Sang's voice echoed up, a li'l dazed.

Korea had been watching her roll with wide eyes, but when she shouted, he straightened up, lookin' all serious again.

"A lesson on staying aware of your environment during combat," he shouted down at her. "And on not using Japanese."

"Ryoukaishimashita!"

Korea glared down at her, then looked back at the other provinces. "That goes for all of you- on staying aware of your environment, not on not speaking Japanese."

Hae wiggled sheepishly as he shot her a look.

"We are performing this mapping so that we will be better able to utilize our country's terrain for military operations," Korea continued. "That applies on a small scale as well."

Chungbuk raised an eyebrow. "You sure you're not just trying to cover for kicking Sang down a cliff?"

"It is a mild slope," Korea corrected in the same serious voice. Pyo called it his 'General voice,' since he was always givin' orders in it.

Hae thought that meant he was definitely trying to cover for sending Sang rollin'. But since he was saying it, it also meant they had to do it, so Hae burned it into her brain with all the other combat stuff Korea was teaching her.

She'd finally been able to start learnin' four months ago, as soon as Kang said she was strong enough. Now every morning when she woke up, she got to playfight- train with everyone else, instead of just watching. Korea was training her personally right now, since the others ‘went easy’ on her. He’d also started jumpin’ her out of nowhere like he did to everyone, which Sang din’t really like.

But Hae liked it! She didn’t get left out anymore, and she got to wrestle with Korea (not that she’d ever won yet).

Plus it seemed to make Korea feel better. She thought she might’a scared him by almost getting kidnapped, so he wanted to make Hae tough enough that it wouldn’t happen again, something that Hae also wanted to make sure of.

‘But even if ah did get got, Korea would come save me.’

She beamed to herself, her eyes on Korea as he dusted off his jacket. It wasn’t Japanese to her anymore, just like her clothes weren’t. When she buried her face in the faded drab fabric, it didn’t smell like blood and dank dirt like the Japanese soldiers. All she could smell was the green pines they slept under, musky sweat, and gunpowder from the submachine guns they were learnin’ to use. Korea-smell.

Hae was about to go help rescue Sang as she sat up, but SH and Gyeong were already on it.

As they went down, Korea went up, calling back, “Start your reading lessons before it gets too dark.”

Hwang made a loud sigh as he started to pull their learnin’ stuff out, making Hae pout.

She knew he didn’t mean it, though. He probably didn’t even realize he’d started sighin’ like that when it was time to teach her to read and write.

Korea said Hae was learning how to fight pretty good (it was ‘cuz if a move didn’t work, she never repeated it because he’d told her not to, and she always remembered everything he said ever), but Hwang said she was a slow learner when it came to words an’ stuff. And she still heard things in Japanese, and didn’t have all the common sense she should.

But that was okay! Korea said she was doin’ good, and that was all that mattered. She'd do even better, so then he'd tell her she was doin' great.

"Hwang, is it okay if we don't start right away?" she asked her brother, givin' him round eyes. "Ah need to ask Korea somethin'."

"Of course," he said, spreading their papers and stuff over the rocky ground. Hae could see her wobbly charcoal characters on them. She worked real hard to make them as neat as Chungnam's pretty handwriting was, but they were still squished and hard to read.

She always felt bad when she filled the sheets up, and wasted more paper. Hwang said it wasn't a waste, 'cuz she was learnin', but she knew it made him sad to run out. She got now why he always guarded his pencils and other things like a toad- it was real hard to get more.

Hae would work hard tonight. This would be the last night she had to learn her characters. She'd make her ㅅ's as graceful as Chungnam and SH's, and get the stroke order on her ㅎ's right. Screwin' up at reading and talking made Hwang frustrated, but didn't waste resources.

She skipped after Korea. Behind her she heard SH cry, "Gyeong!" and then the sound of someone else fallin' down the ridge. He was probably okay, though, since he shouted, "My glasses didn't break, guys!"

Korea looked back and saw her. "I thought I told you to stop following me to the toilet."

"You ain't goin' to the toilet," Hae chirped. "You're goin' to keep watch, and read your Russian books."

Korea *'tch'*ed, shifting the book he'd grabbed from Hwang's bag away from her. "Go do your lessons."

"Ah… wanted to ask you somethin'." Hae dug her toe at the ground, hopin' he wouldn't make her ask when North Hamgyong and the others could still hear them.

Her country sighed, and Hae brightened. He didn't sigh like Hwang, but in a way her brother said was 'exasperated.' She liked when he sighed like that, 'cuz it meant he was going to let her do something.

"Come then," he said, like she knew he would, so she skipped after him.

They were on Changsu Mountain, in her and Hwang's province. After Korea had said they 'needed to know their country like they knew their own bodies,' they'd come here to go over every inch of land. They were goin' to finish up the northeast, then move on to Kangwon. Hae couldn't wait! She'd mostly just seen parts of the north before this, like SH and Hambu's provinces, and the area around Pyongyang. Kang said they'd been in the Taebaek Mountains before, but she wanted to see Kumgang Mountain, since everyone said it was real pretty.

Gyeonggi said it was goin' to be hard to scout all those places, and take a long time, but Hae wasn't scared. Even though they'd be being chased by bad guys the whole time, it would still be better than the hole.

The hole had been small and dark and lonely, but Korea was big and beautiful and filled with her family, and nice people that cried happy tears when they brought them grain, and gave them gloves and things to stay warm. She wanted to meet more'a their people, to see Seoul and Paektusan and the Honam Plains and all the other places her family had told her about, and she wanted to see them with them. With Korea.

"Korea?" she said as they climbed. She'd wanted to wait until they got up top, but he was taking them on a long route, tryin' to stick to the patches of trees that covered the ridge, and she couldn't wait.

"What?"

"Ah'm…" She stopped, squirmin', and he stopped, too.

"What?" he repeated, exasperated again.

“Ah’m still hungry,” Hae admitted, looking down at her hands as they squeezed together.

“You just had soup,” Korea said, crossing his arms. “You want more?”

“No,” Hae said quickly. “Ah’ve got meat on my bones now, so ah don’t need any more than everyone else.” Even though some of them said she did. “Ah’m full, ah’m just… not.”

She didn’t know how to say it. She felt… hollow all the time, even when her belly was full of food and her heart was full’a her family. Like she had a second stomach that wasn’t a stomach, but was in the same place her real stomach was. She’d thought that was just what being hungry felt like, since she’d never got enough to eat before, she didn't think, and even when Kang and the others were stuffin’ her with jerky, soup, berries, and everything else they could after she was freed, she was still tiny and stick-thin.

But now her stomach wasn’t all hard and bulgy anymore, her ribs weren’t bumpy, and she was strong enough to get roughed up by Korea. And even though they had to go without eating some days, ‘cuz they were being chased, she never really got hungry, not the way she’d… used to? But she still felt hollow.

“Your common sense doesn’t tell you anything?” Korea asked.

Hae shook her head. There was a tickle in her head, but it got all jumbled up whenever she reached for it, just like her Korean.

She didn’t know how to explain it, even in Japanese. But Korea seemed to understand anyhow.

“It’s not your hunger,” he said, jaw doing its cute twitch. “It’s your people’s.”

Hae blinked. “Ah can… feel their hunger?”

“Yes,” Korea confirmed. “You all can. It’s part of being Provincehumans.”

Hae tried to reach for the tickle in her head again, using Korea’s words as a crook to snag something from the jumble.

She thought maybe there had been a guy in fancy robes and a silly hat that'd been hungry a lot, and the idea of that felt right. But that was all she could get.

She tilted her head at Korea. "Can you feel it, too?"

"Yes," he said after a second. "Our people are being starved."

"By the Japanese," Hae said, frowning. It was why they had to rob grain and stuff from their carts and give it back to their people.

"And by some of our own." Korea sounded like he didn't want the words to come out, but they did. "I've told you about the landlords."

Hae bobbed her head. "They own more land than they should, and the people that harvest everythin' aren't allowed to keep it."

"It's more than that."

Hae didn't have to struggle to straighten as Korea did now, doin' it easily as he raised his head, looking off over the southern slope of the mountain.

She looked, but all she could see were the plains far below. The sun had gone away behind the far side of the mountain, but red light still crept over to streak them.

"The miners and woodcutters slave away to dig up ores and fell trees, and the workers in the factories break their backs making steel and commodities out of them. And almost everything they make is stolen from them by men whose only 'labour' is deciding how much of the value they'll allow the ones actually working to receive."

Korea's hand clenched tight around the spine of the book. Hae couldn't read the title- it was one of the Russian ones, dirty and beat-up, its cover torn off.

"Businessmen make others do the hard work, and if things go well, they reap the profits. And if things fall through, they walk away." Korea's voice dipped into a growl as his hands flexed again. "And either way, the ones who actually do the labour suffer."

He dragged his gaze back to her. "It's baked into society. If we only defeated the Japanese, it would still be like that."

Oh! Hae knew this one!

"Which is why we have to make things better," she said confidently. "We're not fightin' to go back to the way things were- we're fightin' to progress."

She really liked Korea's speeches, so she'd asked Kang to tell her about all the ones she hasn't been around for. He'd sent her to SH for that one.

Korea nodded, makin' her beam. "Exactly. We are fighting to make a Korea where no one starves, where every single person can live under a tile roof and eat meat three times a day."

'Three times a day…' Hae's mouth watered at the thought.

"But until then, this hunger is a good thing." Korea pinned her with a look. "It reminds us that even if we are fed, our people are not. Our work isn't done."

Hae straightened up, putting the edge of her hand against her forehead like she'd seen the others do. "Yes, Gen'ral!"

Korea's short nail flicked her on the forehead. "Don't let South Pyongan influence you with that."

"But you are our Gen'ral," Hae chirped. "You're always sayin' we're not a family, we're an army unit. And Pyo says army guys give salutes!"

Korea gave another exasperated sigh, not saying another word before he went up the ridge.

Hae was relieved to hear she wasn't just hungry because she was greedy. She'd been scared to ask Kangwon about it because of that, since he already talked about finding more food just for her. If one of her cousins wanted to give her their leftovers 'cuz they were full, that was okay. But Hae would feel bad if whoever was on hunting or foraging duty had to work harder just for her. She didn't want to be like those businessmen, which was why she was trying to learn how to hunt like the others. She was already real good at foragin'.

Hae kept following Korea, trying to walk quietly so he wouldn't remember she wanted to come with him to ask a question, which she just had. She knew he wouldn't let her read with him, since whenever he read the foreign books, he had to sound words out and repeat them to himself to understand, and he didn't like anyone hearing that (he'd chased her off a few times). But she wanted to see the view from the top of the mountain, and she wanted to see it with him.

But by the time they left the trees and were on the last bit of steep rock that led up to the peak, Hae was huffin' an' puffin', and he definitely knew she was there.

Korea stopped a few metres up, looking back down on her, crossing his arms. She made her wobbly legs keep moving, shaking as she tried to find the next spur of rock to hold her weight, thighs burning as her lungs ached. Just two more feet-

When she'd almost made it to Korea, he reached out and grabbed her by the arm, pulling her in to steady her, like she knew he would. She didn't get special privileges anymore (at least that's what he said), which meant he'd still help her if she needed it, but she had to prove she was willin' to try first.

But she was pretty sure he kept his arm around her longer than he would've for one of the others.

Korea crested the ridge, helping her up to stand on the narrow strip of rock with him, and it was a good thing Hae had already asked her question, because everythin' else in her head disappeared as the world unfurled in front of her.

The setting sun sat low on the horizon, bigger than she'd ever seen it, a ball of fire that turned the clouds pink and gold, and washed the west side of Changsu Mountain. Its ridges fell away at her feet, carpeted in thick green forest, the leaves on the trees that had started to turn glowing all red and orange like embers in a fire. They stretched all the way down to the li'l village at the foot of the hills, nestled on the edge of corn fields that rolled to the edge of Unpha Lake.

From up so high, it was shaped like an eel, or the ryong from her common sense that Korea said weren't real, with scales the sun turned flaming crimson. It filled the valley between this mountain range and the one across from it, where they were headin' next, its head resting in the western foothills, a river leading from its mouth like a long red tongue, or a stream of fire. It wound away across the golden plains of Hwanghae, as far as Hae could see.

No matter where she looked there was always more, more mountains, more rivers and lakes, more villages and gold and green fields. She knew that if she wanted, she could follow that dragon's breath stream all the way to the sea, or wherever it led.

Her heart swelled, feeling like the sun was making it glow, too, fillin' her with warmth, and some nameless thing she couldn't describe, the opposite of the hollow their people's hunger brought her.

Hae felt something wet roll down her cheek, and reached up, confused. It hadn't felt like it was goin' to rain. Her fingers touched the moisture and followed it up to her eye, and her damp eyelashes.

Oh. She was crying.

She wiped at her eyes, hopin' Korea hadn't seen. She didn't want him to think she was sad, when really she was more happy than she'd ever been. Every time she got to see her country, it was more beautiful than before. Every day she was free with her family was better than the last, every day she was with him was the best day ever, and she never wanted him to doubt that.

But he wasn't looking at her. He was looking out at the valley, and even though she knew Korea didn't cry, the fiery light made it look like his eyes were glistenin', too.

“Look!” Hae pointed suddenly, excited to see small figures down below. “People are takin’ in the harvest, Korea!”

“Corn,” he said, blinking hard.

Hae nodded excitedly. “Wheat got harvested back in July 'round here, and rice ain’t until the end of the month.”

Korea gave her an odd look, but she was focused on the fields, watchin’ people walk between the rows of tall green plants, piling ears into carts.

Her excitement dimmed a li'l.

“Do ya think they’ll get to eat any of it?” she asked, looking back up at him.

“They’ll get some,” Korea said, all grim. “But not enough.”

Hae looked down, glum, then back up as Korea turned to her.

“But one day it will be enough,” he said firmly. “One day, our people’s fields will be in their hands, and our country will be in ours. Do you know what the most important thing is to a country?”

Hae wanted to say ‘its Countryhuman’ (specifically her Countryhuman), but knew Korea wouldn’t like that answer.

Guessin’ off of what the were talking about, Hae tried, “Food?”

Korea nodded, looking pleased. “The Japanese pretend that it is soldiers, the businessmen pretend it’s money, and the old nobles pretended it was status. But you can’t raise an army without food, workers won’t work without food, and none of those nobles would have even had that status if they hadn’t gotten it from owning land, land that was used to grow crops and raise animals.

“Food is control.” Korea’s eye flashed like fire, making Hae’s heart skip. “Whoever controls the food supply controls the people. If you’re dependent on someone else feeding you, whether it’s a monarch or a foreign nation, then you are bound to what they want from you. Whether you eat or go hungry is up to whether you are on ‘good’ or ‘bad’ behaviour. And the ones in charge are the ones that get to decide what good and bad behaviour are.”

His jaw tightened. Dimly, Hae could remember a plate of rice being kept just outside of her reach, just like her language.

“That is why Japan ships all of ours overseas,” Korea declared. “That is why the peasants aren’t allowed to keep their harvests, and that is why the first thing every colonizer sinks their claws into is agriculture. People who are hungry are too focused on survival to focus on fighting back.”

“But not us,” Hae said, squeezing her fist over her heart.

“Not us,” Korea confirmed. “That is why we need to arm our people with the will to fight. They already know what is being done to them is wrong, and they want it to change. We need to give them the hope that it can, that the risk of fighting back is worth it. That a few years of starvation is better than a lifetime of dependency.

“One day we will control the food.” Korea’s hands clamped down on her shoulders as he stared intensely into her eyes. “One day our people will control the fields and our government, and we will control Korea. It won’t be up to landlords or foreigners whether someone has food on the table. Food will always be an incentive, but it will never be a punishment for us again.”

Hae broke into a grin at the words, at the idea of actually being full for once, and knowing that everyone around her was, too. She couldn’t stop herself from glompin’ onto her Countryhuman, burying her face in his neck.

“Thank ya, Korea.”

His response thrummed against her ‘ear.’ “Don’t thank me. I am only doing what I’m supposed to. And you will be just as much a part of it as me and the rest of our people.”

Only because he’d saved her. Only because he’d lifted her out of the hole and was teachin’ her to read and write and fight and how to make things better. He was the reason she got to eat tasty food and breathe crisp mountain air, the reason she even knew their people weren't just something she'd made up in the hole to feel less alone, and the reason she could fight for them.

Hae turned her head slightly, peerin' up at her Countryhuman. His hands were at his sides, refusing to hug her back, but he wasn't pushing her away yet. His eyes were on the people down below, leaving the fields with carts piled high with corn. This year they might have to give it all away to landlords and for taxes. But one day they wouldn't have to.

"'To each according to his need,'" Korea murmured, then tilted his head like he'd just fit something together.

The sun was sliding down, and its light turned his blue skin the same rich shade of purple as the clouds above them. It wasn't filling his eyes with scarlet now, but they still had that fiery look in them, still glowed.

'Beautiful.'

Hae twisted her neck so she could see the sunset, nuzzling her cheek against his warm chest, savouring the few seconds she got to look out at their country with him, and Korea got to feel the same way she did about him.

—

1952

Hungry.

Hae bounced on the heels of her feet, looking around at the forest outside the bunker as she tried to wrassle with her impatience.

Ten more minutes. No, five? She hoped it was five. She'd been tryin' to keep count, but whenever she did, she always started to think about other things 'cuz counting was boring. Hae already knew which number came after which number. But thanks to that, she forgot which number she was on, so which number came after wasn't important.

She tried to make the time go faster by thinkin' about other things. She'd finally gotten those orphans into the orphanage before she came back to Pyongyang. That was good! Just 'cuz their folks had been no-good murderin' reactionaries didn't mean they were. They were just kids. And she'd been getting everyone ready for harvesting the winter crops and planting season. It was only January 10th, and they wouldn't start talking about sowing for real until February, when she'd get to start goin' around to take stock of all the seed stores and field space they had to make sure they were getting as many crops as they could planted.

'Let not an inch of land go idle!' Hae would make sure it didn't. And to do that, she has to get people excited way ahead of time, and just as impatient as her. It was her job as part of the Ministry of Agriculture. Like the Gen'ral said, the struggle for food was the struggle for the country, and victory at the front.

There were six hours in a night. They usually got back to the bunker at twenty-two hundred and got to sleep at twenty-three hundred (but it was a li'l later tonight since they'd had to give their provincial reports to Korea), and they woke up at five to get to Pyongyang or the assembly area to take off for their provinces. Not counting Kang (though he was here to give them check-ups tonight), Gang, or the cousins the Southern One still had trapped, there were seven of 'em to keep watch (Korea didn't want Comrade Liao Shī or Liao Juān doing it, even though they were really nice). But since SH refused to put Cha on the schedule again 'cuz he'd been all headachey after getting back from Kanggye, there was one province for every hour tonight. Which meant Hae had to wait an entire hour to go do what she needed.

'Dang it!' She'd gotten distracted thinking about other numbers. She'd lost count again. Had it been five minutes? It felt like five minutes. But North Pyongan wasn't here for last watch yet.

What if he didn't wake up in time? He'd never overslept for watch before, but he'd stayed up late whisperin' with Comrade Liao Shī, so what if he did tonight? It wasn't like Hae could go wake him up- Korea always said if you were on watch, you had to stay on watch. You couldn't drop your guard or walk away for even a second. And Hae never did. Even when she was losing track of time, she made sure her eyes kept moving between the trees and the sky, looking for the planes she could hear in the distance. But going inside the bunker would definitely be droppin' her guard. And she couldn't call out 'cuz then she'd be waking everyone up, and Korea always said not to hum or talk to herself when she was on watch, so the enemy wouldn't hear her. So she definitely wasn't allowed to yell.

Her stomach growled, and she sucked harder on the rock in her mouth, tryin' to shush it.

Hungry.

If she was this hungry after eating her rice rations, how hungry would he be? What if he was back now and waiting for her?

Maybe she should-

The door behind her opened and Hae sprang back, spinning around.

"Pyobu!" she cried happily. "You're awake!"

Her cousin nodded, holding the door open for Liao Shī, who shuffled out, wrapped in her big jacket and both of their blankets, then quietly closing it.

"I thought I would relieve you early so you could get some more sleep."

Early? Oops. Good thing she hadn't gone to wake him up.

"You must be tired after your drive from Hwanghae," North Pyongan said.

Her an' Hwang had almost gotten bombed. A bunch of Yankee planes had shot up the checkpoint ahead of them, and they'd only just missed being exploded because Hi-chun- one of her bodyguards- was real quick with seizin' control of their truck and hiding them into the hills outside Sariwon.

They hadn't been trying to kidnap her or Hwang like they'd tried to do to Pyobu. They'd just wanted to kill their Public Security folks at the checkpoint.

Hae's hands balled up, but she smiled. "Thank you, Pyobu!"

She didn't have a watch, so she couldn't tell if it really was early. But she knew it was 'cuz her cousin wouldn't lie.

"You can sleep in my cot, if you pl-lease," Liao Shī said. She was shiverin' real hard, even with all her layers. Not Hae. She didn't get cold. "It should still be w-warm for thee."

Hae brightened, then remembered she really had to so something.

"Thanks a bunch, but ah have to go use the latrine," she said, inchin' away. "Ah might… be a li'l bit."

North Pyongan smiled. "Are you going to look for your dog?"

"Ayuh." Hae pouted, then quickly shook her head. "Ah mean no. Aw shucks."

She hasn't seen Ppang on the morning they left for their provinces, even though she'd snuck away with a piece of the meat from the tasty soup Korea had made to try and feed him. It was just a li'l nibble, and it hadn't been her rations- it was from the meat North Hamgyong gave her, so she was still followin' Korea's orders.

But she hadn't been able to find him, so she'd eaten it herself. And she hadn't seen him last night, either, even when she'd gone looking. Korea (who she'd accidentally told she couldn't find him, and promised she really really hadn't been tryin' to feed him anything (because North Hamgyong hadn't given her anything) said he'd probably just realized he wasn't going to get any more food and left.

But Ppang wouldn't do that! He was her friend, and he hadn't left any of the other times she went to her province. He at least would've stuck around to say goodbye.

"Ah've got to try and find him," Hae said defiantly, raising her head to her cousin.

Pyobu's brows furrowed as he looked out at the dark woods. "I don't like the idea of you going off alone."

“Ah can take care’a myself,” Hae told him, even though she didn’t really like it, either.

He gave a li’l smile, his eyes going far away. “I know you can.”

“I can go with, if you w-wish,” Liao Shī offered.

“It’s okay!” Hae chirped. “You’re cold, so you can stay and cuddle with Pyobu to warm up. Ah’ll be okay.”

Her cousin went purple. She couldn’t tell if Liao Shī went orange, since her cheeks were already a pretty shade of it from the cold.

“Hae-“

“Ah’m off!” she said, skipping away. “Ah’ll be back at muster time! And ah’ll be safe.”

She wasn’t letting some Yankee bastard or traitor kidnap her.

Once she was out of sight of the bunker, her legs stopped skipping, and she switched to walking. It was quieter. Just ‘cuz she didn’t want to scare Ppang away. She wasn’t scared or nothin’. Anything.

She checked near the latrines first because she had to pee after standing watch for so long. The smell didn’t bother her so much because it was bad, but more because it made her think of the hole.

She’d forgotten about all that stuff before, but ever since she’d talked with Yang Jeong-nyeo, she could remember why sometimes using latrines made her insides get heavy. How Big Nose and some of the other guys would refuse to change her waste bucket, and how after she’d got chained up, she couldn’t use one at all.

Hae realized she’d wrapped her arms around her chest and shook herself.

No time for that! She had an hour to find Ppang. And since he wasn’t around the latrine trench (he was gross and tried to dig up buried stuff), she had to go somewhere else.

She checked the place she'd gotten him used to seeing her next, but there was only a new dusting of snow with no paw prints in it. There weren't any at the old latrine locations either, or near the empty fox den at the bottom of a big, twisty larch, or heading up the mountain. She couldn't find any anywhere in the little patch of forest.

Hae stood at the edge, peering out at the stretch of plains leading to the highway, peppered with the stumps of felled trees.

She didn't like the idea of going out there. The forest was dark, and the trees rustling sometimes made her jump, but it felt cozy and safe. Hae had used to like wide-open spaces, and she still did. But…

She didn't like that someone could be watching her. Someone like the men that had hurt Yang Jeong-nyeo and her daughter.

Hae shook her head again, lightly patting her bandaged cheeks.

She wasn't scared. Korea was never scared of bein' alone, and neither was she.

The province hopped out of the shadows, making herself skip across the ground.

All the grass between the dead trees was gone, worn down by the woodcutters and the winter weather. It made Hae sad to see all the dead trees, but Korea said they were goin' to replace them all with more farmland and orchards after the war, so it didn't make her too sad and she wasn't thinking about how that one trunk kind of looked like a guy crouching off to her right. Nope!

She kept an eye out for Ppang while also keeping one on her surroundings, and her hand on her pistol.

Some of the others (Pyo and North Hamgyong) complained about always having guards on them, but Hae never did. And she never sent them away either, even though Korea said she could have a li'l bit of privacy if she had something private to say to anyone. Hi-chun and Chim-bom were good comrades, never complaining when she dragged 'em to just one more field. And more importantly, they made sure she was never ever alone.

The wind picked up for a second, howling across the grassland, and Hae tucked her coat tighter around herself.

She made it to the highway without seeing any dog signs, and didn't see any as she darted across, either. Just tire tracks that made the white snow all dirty and gross. She did find a stain and some scuffed up snow on her way to the river that a brief peek with her flashlight told her was blood, making her stomach uneasy.

But it was just a li'l bit, and Hae could see fan shapes spread out on either side of it. Kang had told her that meant an owl had killed a vole, or something else tiny, and that its wings had brushed the ground as it swooped down from above.

'Poor vole.' But owls had to eat, too.

Her stomach rumbled as she looked at the red splash on the snow, feelin' her teeth sink into warm, furry flesh, and the spurt of hot blood in her mouth as the rat squealed.

She hugged herself guiltily. Poor rat. It would've been fine if she ate him, but she'd just bit him and let him go.

Her stomach growled.

Hungry.

The blood looked fresh, and she wanted to see if she could spot the owl somewhere, but she kept herself focused on Ppang.

What if an owl had gone after him? It couldn't swoop him away, but it could gouge him with its claws, or something else could hurt him. What if he was curled up somewhere, hurtin'? Hae had to find him.

She searched all down by the river, looking for prints in the snow and frozen mud along the bank, or a spot where something could have laid down, or anything that could tell her a li'l yellow dog had been by to get a drink.

Even though she searched until the sky started to lighten, she found nothing.

Hae sighed, shoulders slumping as she crouched at the edge of the river, poking sadly at the ice on the edges with a stick.

Maybe Ppang really had picked up and left. Or maybe he'd gone and visited one of the mines or military complexes on the other side of Jangsan, and one of the workers had taken him home. That would be good. They wouldn't have Korea telling them not to feed him.

Even though she'd miss him.

Hae stood, tossing her stick aside. She'd try and look again tonight. For now she'd better get back so she'd be at the bunker in time for muster. Korea had slept there last night, so it was extra important. So was breakfast.

But before she walked away, she paused, frownin'.

There was something in the river. A small shadow fetched up against the ice. Hae pulled out her flashlight, switching it on, relieved to see it wasn't a drowned animal or person.

It looked like a straw package, like the kind she and Hwang had kept their blood sausages in for the ride to Hwanghae (between them and their bodyguards, they hadn't lasted to Haeju).

Hae fetched her stick again, carefully testing the ice with her toe. It had been getting even colder lately, so the stuff near shore was thick enough to hold her, but the center of the river was unfrozen, and the ice farther out was thinner. She went as far as she could, then reached out with the stick, trying to nudge the container onto the ice. When that didn't work, she got worried about dislodging it and having it sink.

What did Pyobu say about crossing ice? Right- it was better to spread your weight out instead of concentrating it.

Hae got down on her belly and wriggled forward, reaching out her arms to grab the package. The ice creaked a li'l, but she didn't weigh much right now, so it held, and her heart leapt as she lifted the box out of the cold water, and shimmied back to shore.

She popped up, opening the lid, and her eyes widened.

Clams! The box was full'a clams!

There were eight of 'em, all nestled in soggy straw. One of them had a smashed shell, but the others looked alright. She couldn't tell if they were alive or dead though, because she didn't really get how clams worked.

As Hae stared down at the stripy li'l shells and the pale meat poking out of the smashed one, she felt her mouth start to water, and the stone she'd been sucking on slid down her throat.

She didn't notice, too transfixed by the clams, and the memory they'd brought her.

Sitting tucked in a cove down near Gangneung, everyone gathered around as her, Pyobu, Pyo, and Gyeonggi spilled all the claims they'd harvested at their feet, dozens of them. They hadn't been able to make a fire 'cuz the Japanese were nearby, but it din't matter because clams were one of the few things Kang let them eat raw. Him and Sang had diced them up and they'd had jogae-hoe. Some of her cousins hadn't liked the thin slices of slimy meat. Korea hadn't, even though he didn't complain. But Hae had. Kang had sliced them thin enough to melt in her mouth as Pyo tossed them to her, and she hasn't missed a single one 'cuz if she did, Korea would scold them for wasting food. They were fresh and fishy and chewy and Hungry. Hungry hungry hungry hungry hungry hungry hungry

Hae didn't know what she was doing until she felt the squish of raw flesh between her teeth, ice water spurting out and filling her mouth. As she swallowed it down, the shock made her start thinkin' again, and she realized she'd dropped the box and was on her hands and knees in the icy mud, gloves tossed aside. Her face and hands were wet and cold, and the side of her finger stung where the broken shell had cut her as she tore the clam meat out of it.

Guilt flooded her like it had with the rat, but not for the clam. It was already dead. But these could've belonged to someone, and even if they weren't looking for them, she should share them with her cousins. But there already weren't enough for all of them, and she'd just eaten an entire one to herself.

For once she didn't feel happy about eating something tasty. She felt guilty and sick, her stomach sloshing the clam meat around as she curled up into a ball, her forehead to her knees.

She didn't like how being hungry made her feel, like she was back in the hole, like she was a small trapped animal that would sink its teeth into anything. Even Ppang sniffed his food before he ate it.

Hae shouldn't feel like this. She was used to being hungry, and this wasn't as bad as the hole, it wasn't. Korea had made her soup and soondae and she was able to pick her rations up every day and she was finally eating most of them again. She was used to feeling like her belly was eating itself.

But not as much as she'd used to be. She'd gotten used to comin' home to the house on the Taedong to see North Pyongan or SH had made supper, both equally delicious to her, to walking through the door and smelling the thick warm smell of steaming grain and cooking meat, to being given apples and persimmons and whatever else her people had grown with their own hands and wanted her to try, having dinner with 'em, a whole bunch of different foods she'd never had before, some her common sense hadn't even known about, even after it had started working right. She'd had more types of meat and vegetables and fruits and spices in the last two years before the Southern One started the war for real than in the thirty-eight years before that, and even though she'd never gorged herself 'cuz she knew plenty'a people still couldn't, and their people down south still had nothin', she'd always had enough.

She'd been fine when they started runnin' out of rations down at the Raktong, she'd been too focused on savin' people when she was scrounging for food in Haeju with Hwang, or Sincheon with her guerrilla unit, and as hungry as she'd been in the POW camp, even though she knew she would've eaten a beetle if she got the chance, it hadn't been like this, howlin' inside her and making her hollow.

It wasn't her hunger, and the clam couldn't fix it. The rat wouldn't've been able to either. It was her people's and she wasn't used to it nomore. She wasn't used to seeing them line up for their rations and know they weren't just another part of their meal but the only thing they'd get to eat all day. She wasn't used to seeing them thin and tired and starving and she wasn't used to how it felt to be hungry for someone else, for thousands of someone else's. To have all their desperation and hunger forced on her until it burst out and turned her into a dog that would eat rice if you offered it to it.

Hungryhungryhungryhungryhungryhungryhungry

She wanted to cram the rest of the clams in her mouth, shells and all, and try to fill up the hole inside her. To eat enough that her people would be full, too, to eat enough that no one would ever be hungry again. It was unfair that she could be hungry with them, but she couldn't feed them.

'You'll make sure they can feed themselves,' Korea's words came from the place she kept each and every one of them safe. It was what he'd said to her after he'd found out that she could farm, and learned stuff about crops real easy.

'Our people will be in control of our food. And when you're ready, you will oversee the agricultural arm of our future government. You'll make sure they keep that control.

'You'll make sure they can feed themselves, South Hwanghae.'

His voice made her trembling stop, just a li'l.

She would. Not right now, but soon. The weekend was comin', and she could give her rations away to Comrade Ae-ja so her grandson could make juk to keep her strong enough to beat her lung infection. And then she could work even harder at sowin' than she did last year, and encourage everyone to grow their own food and bring it to market, and feed tons'a people. And then when the war was over and Korea had won, she could make sure everyone was fed, and they really could live by 'From each accordin' to his ability, to each accordin' to his needs.'

She wasn't a dog- she was a person, and one of Korea's provinces. She could bear her own hunger. It was everyone else's she had to fix.

Hae took a shaky breath, slipping her hand under her to wipe at her face. She wasn't crying, she just… still had water from the clam on it.

She sat up and carefully replaced the lid on the straw box, holding it in her freezing hands, putting her gloves in her pocket so they wouldn't get damp. Looking both ways down the shoreline didn't show anyone, even though the light was that pretty shade of blue-grey that let her see all the way across the river to the stumps stickin' out of the snow on Undu Hill, and she'd been sitting here long enough that if someone was looking nearby, she would have heard them. Calling out a few times didn't get any reply either.

She hadn't seen any bootprints while she was looking for Ppang, so it seemed like the only way these could've got here was if they floated from way upstream. She'd feel really bad if she was stealing the clams from someone, but the only thing worse than that would be letting them go bad. The ice-cold river would've kept them fresh so far, but they'd still turn eventually.

Hae nodded decisively, starting back to the bunker, not looking at the straw package in her hands.

She wondered if Korea would want her to give the clams to their people, but she didn't know how long they'd been in the river. Kang said they had a higher tolerance for parasites and stuff (gross), so it was probably safer if her and her cousins ate them, though she knew Korea wouldn't.

And thinking of the deer soup he'd made them, she bet he'd be happy if she brought in some more forage for everyone. He might even say she'd done a good job!
Andshewouldn'tgetintroubleforgoin'lookin'forPpang.

The idea washed away her worry, letting her skip again, excitedly making her way back to the bunker, where everyone was already up and about, Pyo doing stretches to warm up while Pyobu splashed his face with water from the basin before it was boiled, and Hwang was already readin' over his notes for the articles he was editing. Usually they'd head to the barracks chefs to get their breakfast, and everyone had to wait with their stomachs clenching. But today Hae could make the truck ride in a li'l easier.

Korea was doing his own stretches by the door, and he looked up as she skipped in, eye narrowed.

"Were you looking for that dog again?"

Hae skidded to a halt in front of him, enthusiastically holding up the box of clams.

"Ayuhahwasbutahwasn'tgoin'tofeedhimahpromiseahwasjus'tryin'tomakesur

"South Hwanghae, Military Report," Korea ordered.

Hae's heels slammed together as she straightened up. "Ah found this box of clams floatin' in the river, Korea."

His eye zeroed in on the box, and he snatched it from her hands before she could blink, makin' her huff.

"SH says to say 'please' before grabbin' things."

"Where did you find these?" he demanded, looking at the clams.

He didn't sound as excited as she hoped. Hae pouted.

"Down by the fork where we get water." Realizing why he was probably worried, she added, "Ah din't steal them or anythin'. No one was around."

Korea still looked tense. Raising his voice, he called, "Did any of you see any planes last night?"

"Yeah, a few," Pyo said, stoppin' her crunches. "I didn't see them, but I heard a couple fly by to the northeast."

Everyone else said they'd heard them, too, gatherin' around as they realized something was going on. Hae's belly was starting to do flips.

Something was wrong.

"Did anyone see them?" he snapped. "Did they fly close?"

Hae was the only one who nodded. "Ah din't really see it, but one flew low over the highway around…" She'd lost count of time, right. "Maybe four-thirty. Ah think it was a pamphlet dropper, 'cuz ah heard a bang, but no explosion."

Stupid Yankees, droppin' lies on their people, telling them their People's Army were the ones rapin' and killin' and torturin', pretending they weren't the ones putting babies in women that didn't want them and throwing her people down mineshafts.

Korea hated the pamphlets, too, but she'd never seen him react this way to them before. Him and Kang gave each other really serious looks, then he stormed towards the GAZ.

"Everyone in the vehicle, we need to go to the river."

Disappointed he didn't like her present, Hae said, "Ah don't think there's anythin' wrong with 'em. They tasted fine."

Korea whirled around violently. "You ate one?"

Hae nodded, ashamed. "Ah'm sorry, ah know we're supposed to cook everythin', and ah should have shared, but ah was so…"

She bit her lip, twisting her hands together. She couldn't tell Korea that. SH had said not to, and she didn't want to hurt him.

"Vomit."

Hae looked up, confused. "What?"

Korea stared back at her, his eye blown wide open in the way it didn't do unless he was worried.

"Make yourself throw up."

Hae blinked. “But-“

“South Hwanghae, you need to throw up right now.”

“Korea-“

He shoved by SH. “Do it. Now.”

Hae cringed back, wrapping her arms around her stomach. She felt guilty about eating the clam, but she didn’t want to waste it. And she was still so hungry.

“But ah don’t want-“

Korea didn’t let her finish the sentence. He lunged at her, swinging her into a headlock, one hand grabbing her jaw hard enough to hurt, forcing it open as he stuck the fingers of the other one into her mouth.

Hae cried out in surprise, the sound gargled by Korea shoving his fingers down her throat. Her cousins started yellin’ in alarm and trying to pry him off’a her.

Hae was too confused to understand what was going on, the clearing spinning as Korea swung her away from the others, fighting off their efforts to stop him as he stabbed at the sides of her throat, trying to make her puke. She gagged and her mouth told her to bite down, to protect her meal, but she didn’t want to hurt Korea. His fingers already tasted like blood and burnt as they dragged over her tongue. Her throat clenched around them, and Hae bit the side of her own cheek instead of him before she was suddenly being pried away.

Pyo dragged her back, pressing her chest protectively to her back as she demanded, “What the hell was that?”

Hae gagged and spluttered as SH and Kangwon stood between her and Korea.

“What-?!”

Kang held up a hand to SH, his voice all soothin’. “Korea, there’s better ways to handle this."

Korea ignored them, locking onto Hae again. "South Hwanghae, throw up now."

Hae really really didn't want to, but his eye was so wide and panicked, and Korea wouldn't have done that to her unless he had a good reason, and he was tellin' her to.

Closing her eyes, she pulled away from Pyo, bending over as she jammed her fingers down her own throat, touching the swingy thing at the back of it, not stopping when it started to convulse as she gagged, even though it felt gross and hurt. Her stomach didn't want to let go of its food, gripping painfully as it tried to hold on.

But then it surged, and the clams and last night's rice and soup came up, splattering on the frosty ground.

Pyo jumped back. "Gross."

"My food," Hae whimpered mournfully, eyes stinging.

"Did you just fucking Command her?"

"No!" Korea snarled at North Hamgyong.

Hae's throat hurt, but she made herself say, "Korea wouldn't do that." Her voice came out all raspy.

"What is fucking wrong with-?!"

"Shut up!" SH snapped at her brother, and Hae wanted to tell them not to fight over her, but she started coughing, throwing up more bile, her stomach clenching around nothing as the last bits of dinner came up.

Korea grabbed her by the arm, hauling her back. "Get away from it. And get away from the clams, all of you!"

North Pyongan and Hwang stepped back from the box real quick as Korea gripped Hae's shoulders, his fingers digging in as he looked her over like he did after a battle, his eye still wide.

“Ah’m sorry, Korea,” Hae said, still confused and hurt, but knowin’ he wouldn’t be upset like this if she hadn’t done something really dangerous. “Ah just wanted to bring everyone some food.”

His grip on her tightened.

“Korea, it’s alright,” Kang soothed, stepping in. “Let’s just explain calmly, okay?”

Hae’s burn scabs felt like they were about to tear as Korea put more pressure on them. Then he let her go, shoving her away from him to be caught by SH.

“During November, the enemy was making suspicious flights over the northeast and west,” Korea clipped. “We are concerned they were conducting more germ warfare operations.”

Everyone’s eyes went wide now.

“Why didn’t you tell us?” Hwang asked.

“Because we didn’t know for certain, and you didn’t need the extra worry.”

“And now this idiot might be poisoned because of your heavy mouth,” North Hamgyong growled, thrusting a hand at Hae.

“I told you all to watch out for suspicious planes!” Korea snapped, rounding on Hae. “I told you to watch out for them dropping objects that weren’t bombs! Why is this the one time you didn't listen?!”

“Ah thought you meant to look out for pamphlets an’ stuff.” Hae tried to keep her tears inside as SH stroked her back. She knew Korea wasn’t really mad, he was just scared for her. “Ah din’t think it would be clams! If ah thought they’d came from a plane, ah wouldn’t’a eaten ‘em.”

Or maybe she would’ve. She wouldn’t have said she’d bite a rat, after all.

“We didn’t expect clams either, Korea,” Kangwon said, sliding in between them again. “It’s just been pamphlets, clothes, and those beetles that one time."

"Beetles?" Liao Juān asked, and Mao Zhilong whispered something into her 'ear.'

Korea scrubbed his hand over his face, then demanded, "Why would you find clams in the Taedong? It's polluted, and our fishers haven't been able to bring anything in from the sea for months."

"Ah- Ah wasn't thinkin'," Hae confessed, hanging her head. "Ah was just hungry."

The word slipped out, and she clapped her hands over her mouth.

Korea's jaw clenched, and she quickly said, "Ah'm sorry, Korea, it's not yo-"

"You're going to be sorry!" Korea snapped, eye flashing. "What if you get smallpox?!"

"Smallpox hasn't been documented from eating animals," Kangwon cut in.

"It could be on the box!" their Countryhuman snarled. "They put it on chicken feathers, they could put it on anything! And smallpox isn't the only thing that can make you sick. What if it's something else, something worse?"

Hae's stomach churned, and she couldn't tell if it was because he was yelling at her or because she was already getting sick.

"Am ah goin' to die?" she asked in a small voice.

"If you do, it's your own fault." The words had barely left Korea's mouth before he spun to Kangwon. "Get her to the Quarantine Hospital now, and get those clams to a lab after. Don't take your gloves off and burn them once you're done. Take the Jeep."

Kangwon saluted, catching the keys that Mao Zhilong tossed him, and carefully picking up the straw box.

"Come on, Hae."

His voice was easy, but Hae could see the way he looked at her, like he was waiting for symptoms to set in.

SH reached out for her, but Korea snapped, “Don’t touch her! If she’s infected, it can’t spread.”

Hurt flashed across her cousin’s face, but she pulled away.

Hae wanted to hug her, she wanted to hug Korea and have him tell her she’d be okay, and tell him she’d be okay, and she’d promise to never ever eat anything she shouldn’t ever again, and then everything would be okay.

But if she was sick, she didn’t want to give it to him, too.

“Ah’ll be alright,” she assured SH, making herself smile. “Even if ah’m sick, Kang’ll fix me right up.”

“Go!” Korea ordered, and his voice was so tight that Hae threw herself into the Jeep right away, sitting as far away from Kang as she could, the box of stupid stupid claims between them.

“You’ll be okay.” It was Kang’s turn to reassure her as he drove them through the trees. “We don’t know for sure the Americans dropped these.”

But he kept his eyes facing forward, and the second they got out of the trees, he hit the gas hard, the engine growling like Korea as they rocketed towards the hospital.

As Hae sank down in her seat, her stomach roiled uneasily.

I'm still sick. Write what you know. uu

Hae, oblivious: Ah’m goin’ to finish learnin’ Korean soon!

The nefarious Hanja:

The conversation was something like this- Hwang- Well done, Hae. I would say you have a mastery of written Korean on a par with the others now.

Hae: Ura!

Hwang: Now we move on to Hanja.

And then the despair on Hae's face convinced North to stop using Hanja, which is why the DPRK only uses Choson'gul now.

'Individualist' types tend to say Communist societies are 'authoritarian,' and rant about dependency, but they never want to hear about how the DPRK encourages bootstrap behaviour way more than America. The American system does its best to completely alienate the bulk of society from where their food and commodities come from, and has so many laws against public gardens and fruit trees and distributing food or selling your own for the exact reasons North describes in the flashback- because if you control the food, you control the people. While the DPRK teaching Marxism already makes their society more aware of their relation to products on a base level, and from day one they encouraged people to take care of themselves. During the early years of the DPRK they were very honest about 'the Japanese ruined industry behind them, and never developed the North for agriculture. We have limited land right now and cannot feed you. So everyone needs to pull up their bootstraps and start feeding themselves.' They encouraged home gardens and selling produce at market to make money, and the sheer act of taking away the right of landlords to control more land than they could farm put the method of food production directly into the peasants' hands. During the war, they encouraged even more gardens, driving for every factory, military unit, and office to have one to feed their people and sell on the side. The state provided equipment, animals, and seed, but the bulk of food was in the hands of the masses. And with the cooperative farming system, the feudalist peasant system was changed while still keeping control of the majority of agriculture with them. People were also encouraged to keep gardens during the Arduous March. And nowadays, they still heavily encourage personal gardens, even on the rooftops of apartment blocs. I saw this article once (I think it was on DailyNK or one of those other CIA sites), that said the DPRK was ‘encouraging capitalism’ to fend off starvation, and it was literally just them encouraging selling produce from personal gardens as usual. Which shows that whoever wrote that either genuinely has no idea what capitalism is or was being purposefully malicious (it’s probably that one). Capitalism is when the means of production (including agricultural means) are in the hands of a few private owners, and the bulk of people are employed under them, with no direct ownership. Socialism is when those means are in the hands of the people (personal gardens included) and the state, which gives the generated surplus value that would go to capitalists back to the people in the form of healthcare, and those seed loans and agricultural equipment. Even in a complete Communist society, 'trade' would still occur, so of course it occurs in a Socialist society with money involved. The DPRK encourages self-reliance on a personal level as well, but it isn’t the self-reliance of individualist types, who have an ‘everyone should take care of themselves and no one else, and if you can’t cope, then you should just die’ mindset. It’s the self-reliance of being able to feed yourself and your society, and having the state to support you in that. Pull yourself up by the bootstraps for your country , not because you’ll die on the street if you don’t.

Also I was cooking offal soup. One guess on what happened to my finger. Again.

Little White Lies

Kangwon knew something was very wrong as soon as Hae threw up again.

He'd stayed with her in the Quarantine Hospital for a day, unable to leave her side, both because of Korea's orders and his own worry. Then on the second, she'd bolted out of the room and into the hospital toilet, just making it in time before the onset of diarrhea.

Kangwon had stood outside, hoping for the best. Maybe the mollusks had just been bad. He'd used to think eating raw seafood was alright, since so many people did. But he knew now they could be dangerous. Maybe it was just a bit of bacteria affecting Hae's gut.

He kept telling himself that until the distinctive sound of vomit splattering on the floor met his ear slits, more than bile.

His stomach dropped.

He whirled to the door. "Hae, did you just throw up?"

"Ayuh." Her voice was thick and weepy.

"I need to come in."

"Don't," she half-sobbed. "It's gross."

"It's alright. You know I've had to deal with stuff like this before." Kangwon tried to keep himself steady, even though his heart was pounding fast enough to overload a heartrate monitor.

He'd just had to listen to his cousin empty her bowels for an hour. There shouldn't be anything left to throw up.

"Please," he pleaded when Hae didn't answer.

"Alright." She sniffled, and he could hear the sound of fabric rustling. “Ah’m decent.”

Kangwon slid in, not flinching as a foul, fishy odour smacked him in the face. He was careful not to open the door more than a crack, even though the hall was empty.

It was good he did because Hae was curled in the corner behind it, tucked into a little ball with her head between her knees.

“Kang,” she whimpered, clutching her stomach. “Ah don’t feel good.”

“You’ll be okay,” he automatically soothed, even as his eyes strayed to the puddle of vomit on the floor, and his own insides clenched.

It wasn't half-digested food or the clear bile that came from an empty stomach. It was thick and cloudy white, like water after rice had been soaked in it overnight. Peering into the porcelain toilet bowl showed that her diarrhea was the same.

With a scrabble and a sudden burst of movement, Hae lunged past him, shouting, “Turn around!”

He did, and she made it to the toilet before her bowels exploded again.

Kangwon stared at the cream wall as his cousin sobbed miserably, fighting the urge to put a fingernail on his mouth.

She’d been vaccinated against it, like him. But vaccine science wasn’t anywhere close to being perfected yet. They only cut the chance of catching illnesses, they didn’t eliminate it.

“Kang,” Hae slurred when her bout was over. “Ah’m thirsty.”

She would be.

“I’ll go get you some water,” he said.

Before he could leave, she asked, “What’s wrong with me?”

Kangwon didn’t hesitate. “I’ll tell you as soon as I get you that water. Don’t lock the door.”

He slid back into the hall, then sprinted until he found a nurse leaving a room with a chart in her hands.

“Comrade Kangwon,” she said, looking up in surprise. “What-?”

“Find someone to get me as much boiled water as possible,” Kangwon interrupted. “And don’t let anyone go in Comrade Hae’s room without proper protection.

“We’ve got a patient with a case of cholera.”

Kangwon hadn’t dealt with cholera much in the past. It wasn’t endemic to Korea, and the only outbreaks he’d heard of had been in port cities and villages, brought there by maritime trade. He’d only ever seen one patient personally, a young man near Wonsan whose home had been rural enough that Korea had let him try to help when his family mentioned it while they were sheltering in their barn.

Kangwon had stayed in their woodshed with him for three days, feeding him as much rice and water as possible, trying to replenish the fluids his body ejected before he could dehydrate.

He'd died with his sunken eyes wide open in his pale blue face, that thick rice water diarrhea leaking from between his legs. Cholera killed quick.

That’s why Kangwon started the treatment before the stool test even came back, getting the hospital cooks to prepare as much steamed grains and boiled water as they could. Hae needed a constant supply of food and water to keep from dehydrating, especially with her burns.

He told her this as she sat on the corner of her cot, shaking. The toilet was being disinfected for other patients, but several buckets sat in the corner. He’d made sure she was in an aboveground room with a window. The light coming through it made her white skin even paler than usual, and leeched the gold from her flower. The dark shadows under her eyes were stark against it.

“You’re going to be okay,” Kangwon reassured her, placing a gloved hand on her knee. She was in a thin, striped hospital gown to make it easier for her to get to the bucket in time. "We just need to make sure you stay hydrated. And you need to eat, even if it just comes back out.”

Hae looked down at the bowl of rice in her lap. “How long will it last?”

“Probably around a week.” The vomiting and diarrhea would stop around then or… Well.

But Kangwon wouldn’t let that happen.

“You’ve already gave me a lot,” Hae said, still looking at her rice. “Ah’ve had two days’ worth’a rations at least.”

Her cousin nodded. “You need to eat constantly. Otherwise the only thing your body will have to get rid of is fluids.”

Hae stared down at the tin bowl, unmoving.

“Hae,” Kangwon prompted, keeping his voice steady. “Go ahead and eat.”

She raised her eyes to his, and he already knew what she was going to say.

“Ah can’t. Ah can’t let you waste that much food on me.”

He exhaled. "Hae, It isn’t a waste if it’s part of your treatment. Medicine is meant to be used.”

“But it’s not just medicine,” she insisted. “It’s-“

Her eyes widened and she lurched forward. Kangwon just caught her bowl as she shoved it at him, turning away as she dove for the bucket, and more of that strong fishy odour filled the room.

Hae let out a pained whimper that made Kangwon want to comfort her. But he kept his back firmly turned.

"See?" his cousin moaned miserably. "It all goes right through me. Ah'm just goin' to waste it all."

"It's not a waste," Kangwon insisted to the wall. "Even Korea wouldn't say it's a waste if it makes you better."

"But ah say it's a waste." There were tears in his cousin's voice. "Ah was stupid, and made myself sick, and now ah'm takin' food we need for our people. What if the Yankees give more people cho-cholor-"

"Cholera."

"That." She groaned, followed by another wet splatter.

"We don't know it was the Americans," Kangwon said. "We need to investigate first."

It was suspicious that clams had appeared near Pyongyang in winter, especially when they weren't making it to market even in season, like Korea had said. And it was also weird that they were clams from the East Sea, not the closer West Sea. But Korea's search had only turned up one other basket, and they hadn't got the lab reports back yet, so Kangwon wasn't going to jump to conclusions.

"Ah bet it was," Hae muttered with bitterness that usually didn't come from her. "They're destroyin' our fields and murderin' our farm animals to starve us, and now they're feedin' us poison to kill us. They're evil, all of 'em."

"They're people, Hae," Kangwon said gently. "And there's no such thing as innately evil people. Just people that get taught bad things and make bad choices because of it."

"And evil miguk-nom."

"Hae-"

"It doesn't matter why they're evil!" She cut him off with sudden heat. "Ah don't care if they were born evil or they got evil by doin' a lot of evil stuff! They are. They're the ones that poisoned me, and they're goin' to poison more of our people, and you're goin' to need more food for them 'cuz they can die. Ah can't."

There it was. Korea's exceptionalism rubbing off on her, finally in a way that was genuinely harmful.

There was a pause. "What if…"

"Hae-"

"Don't turn around," she said quickly, and while he twisted back, took the opportunity to say, "What if you let me die?"

"No," Kangwon said immediately, hands fisting on his legs. "We're not doing that."

"Pyobu died," Hae reminded him. "And he said he was only dead for less than an hour."

"He would've been dead for longer if he hadn't been woken up," Kangwon told her. "And drowning is different than an illness, especially if you didn't want me feeding you while you were out."

"It can't be that much longer," his cousin protested. "You said ah'd die from dehydration. If you just gave me water, ah bet ah'd be better in no time."

"Hae, we don't even know if you wouldn't die for real," Kangwon said, sitting on his gloved hands. "No one entirely knows how Provincehuman deaths work. You chose to eat that clam, even if you didn't know it would make you sick. We don't know if that counts as suicide or not."

"Hwang said he thinks Countryhumans have survived poisonin's before," Hae stubbornly argued. "It doesn't count as killin' themselves, 'cuz they don't know they're doin' it."

"He also says it's difficult to know for sure since no Countryhuman's ever wanted to admit they got successfully poisoned," Kangwon shot back.

He heard his tone rising, growing thin like his brother's, and tried to rein it in.

"I'm not risking your life off of rumours from decades ago," he said firmly.

"But-"

Hae cut herself off with a guttural groan, and Kangwon's nails sank into the underside of his thighs as he heard her convulse, spraying more diarrhea into the bucket at the same time as vomit splattered onto the floor.

There was a clattering sound, and a loud sob that sent him to his feet, his worry forcing him to turn around.

The bucket had spilled over, foamy white stool carpeting the cement floor. Hae had fallen the opposite way, trying to avoid it, but her knees had still landed in the puddle of vomit.

Kangwon went to her as she raised herself on shaky arms, her eyes wide and glazed.

"You're okay," he soothed, kneeling down to help her scoot away from the vomit, holding her upper half against his chest.

"Don't touch me," she mumbled, something none of their family had ever heard from her before. "Ah'm gross and ah'm goin' to get you sick."

"Cholera doesn't pass person to person," he reassured her, rubbing her shoulder. So long as he kept his gloves on when handling the buckets, he'd be safe. "I'll be alright. And so will you."

He took her shoulders, making her look him in the eye.

"I'm not losing you, Hae," he vowed.

Korea couldn't be talked out of his martyrdom once his heart was set on it, but there was one thing he could use to sway Hae from hers.

"If I let you die, and you really did die, how do you think that would make me feel?" Kangwon asked, staying steady. "I'd have to go the rest of my life knowing that I pretty much killed you. And everyone else would know I killed you, too. Korea would. Do you think he'd ever forgive me for that?"

Hae's eyes flickered down. "No."

"No. And I wouldn't forgive myself." He squeezed her shoulders. "And even if you can't die from it, you can still feel pain. You'd feel how it felt to die of dehydration. You don't deserve that."

Just like Korea didn't deserve all the knife wounds and bullet holes he always came back from his ventures with, or the burns that carpeted his body that he refused all relief for.

"I can't let you die, Hae." He tilted her chin up with a hand. "I'm a doctor, and I've sworn that I would always do everything in my power to help my patients and nothing less. I'll never change my mind on that, especially when it comes to you."

Hae's eyes filled with tears. "Ah know, ah'm sorry. Ah just-" Her round face crumpled. "W-What if ah actually die, and then you get real upset 'cuz you tried everythin' to save me but couldn't, andthenyougetmadatyourselfan'Koreagetsmadatyaan'Koreagetsmadathimse

"Hae." Kangwon cut her off with another soft squeeze. "I won't lose you. And nothing I give you will be a waste. The only way I'd be mad at myself is if I didn't do everything I could to save you."

Hae sniffled. "And Korea?"

"I won't lose you," he repeated, pulling her into a hug.

"Ah'm sorry, Kang," she whimpered. "Ah din't mean to upset ya, ah'm just- Ah'm scared."

Hae's voice broke, and she finally wrapped her thin arms around him, squeezing tight as she shook against his chest.

Kangwon couldn't help but add the tears soaking his chest to the list of fluids she was losing, and his eyes strayed to the bowl of rice to the side. But he held her for a minute, murmuring reassuring words into the top of her head, giving her the part of her treatment even she couldn't see as a waste as he stroked her back comfortingly.

"You didn't upset me," he eventually soothed, even though his insides felt just as shaky as her body. "Now let's get some more water and rice in you while we have a chance."

He helped her back onto the cot, getting a cloth to wipe the vomit from her knees.

"Kang?" Hae asked after she'd guzzled down a glass of water. "Can you do me a favour?"

"Sure."

"If ah do die, please don't blame yourself." She looked up at him, small brows furrowed. "Ah know you don't do that so much anymore, but ah don't want you beatin' yourself up if ah don't get better."

If Hae died for real, Kangwon knew there was no amount of reassurement he could give himself that would ever lift the guilt from his shoulders.

"I won't," he promised.

She looked relieved. "And try to make sure Korea wouldn't blame himself either."

"I'd try," he said, which was all he could do.

They both knew he wouldn't succeed.

"And…" She bit her lip, looking down at her bowl of cold rice. "If ah die not for real… Don't tell Korea until ah'm better."

Kangwon's brows went up, and she hunched her shoulders.

"Ah don't want you to lie to him, and ah know he'd get mad if he found out-"

That was an understatement. Not telling him about Kim Mi-ju's passing had been bad enough. If Kangwon didn't tell him Hae had 'died…'

"But if you tell him, he'll be super worried about me, and he's got enough to worry about right now." Hae rubbed her thumb along the edge of the bowl. "And he'll get mad at you, even though he shouldn't, and then you'll be super upset, and you need to focus on makin' sure more'a our people don't get sick. So please…" She raised her big watery eyes to him. "Don't tell him."

Kangwon hesitated, then let out a long breath.

"I won't."

Hae's shoulders slumped, and she finally lifted the spoon to her mouth, eating her medicine.

Kangwon knew Korea would insist on seeing Hae, but he could keep him away from the Quarantine Hospital by reminding him that he couldn't risk getting sick. And out of all the provinces, Kangwon was the only one that ever had any real success at lying to their Countryhuman.

Because Hae was right. Korea would blame himself. And with everything else he was carrying right now, none of them could afford that.

"But I won't lose you," Kangwon repeated, wrapping an arm around his short cousin, smiling at her. "We'll have you healthy again in no time, guarantee."

Hae looked up at him, smiling tremulously back, her freckled cheeks bulging with rice.

She died four days later.

—

Pens, papers, clothes, food. As North sent out the word, these were some of the things his people had reported being dropped from American planes since the start of January. Items all in short supply, that his people needed, and some of whom wouldn't be able to resist taking, even after they were warned they could be contaminated.

And North knew that was the word for it. It didn't matter that cholera could come from raw seafood naturally- he knew someone had infected those clams, contaminated them with deliberate intent, just as they'd been dropped near where the provinces usually drew their water from with intent.

And there were the other things being dropped.

It was America again, spreading plague amongst his people. His smallpox last year hasn't done enough damage, so he was trying again.

North strode down the empty street, heading for the military hospital for the fifty time in as many days, his skin prickling like it was being stabbed full of needles.

He'd been vaccinated, like the others, like Hae, as they'd been trying to do to their entire population, especially after last year's outbreak. Hae should have been fine. But now she was sick, and it was-

North grit his teeth.

They weren't making accusations yet. Kangwon and most of the other officials in the Ministry of Health wanted to investigate first. They were seeing cases of smallpox again, and an increase in dysentery, but not enough for an outbreak, or to say confidently that it was intentional.

But North knew it was. Most of the cases had been coincidentally near areas where witnesses had seen American planes dropping non-explosive bombs, and the smallpox had only started appearing in the past couple days, a week after the first reported sighting. Once another week passed, they would undoubtedly see more. Fourteen days, the average incubation period for smallpox, and how long it had taken last year for symptoms to start appearing after the Americans had retreated.

Hwangju, Kuni-ri, Chunghwa, and just south of Pyongyang. Those were some of the places they had reliable reports from so far. All coincidentally in the path of their supply line from China to the front, and all coincidentally in areas where the MiGs didn't operate in force.

Like last year, it was too many coincidences.

North barged into the hospital, announcing his intention to see Kangwon to the receptionist before striding to his provinces' room.

Gangwon wasn't there, likely off helping with hospital tasks. He still couldn't perform surgeries, but North thought his practice with sign language was making his hands steadier.

He snatched their notebook off the pile of neatly arranged materials on the counter along the wall, trying to go over their notes to distract himself while waiting for Kangwon.

But after a few minutes of shaping his hands around the gestures, he set it aside and started to pace around the cramped hospital room, unable to fight off the other worry circling in his mind.

America had finally done what he'd been fearing- accused North of harbouring Gangwon directly. But instead of the word 'harbouring,' he'd used 'holding him captive,' and claimed that the fairness of the peace talks was shaken when one side was 'in possession' of a province they shouldn't be.

North grit his teeth, heel grinding against the cement as he turned.

One side was in possession of provinces they shouldn't be. Rhee and America had nine provinces that didn't belong to them, and an entire half of their country. They had his brother.

The Americans hadn't threatened to call the talks off again yet, but it was implied. And it was a punishment.

After 'Christmas,' Joy and Libby had proposed that North trade refugees from the south for his own imprisoned soldiers, which was not happening. Some of the refugees were guerrillas, but many were civil servants that had sided with them and followed one of the retreats, or men and women from the Worker's Party and other organizations, or just civilians that had chosen to come north. No matter what they were, they would be targeted by Rhee's government on their return, either with attempts to recruit them into their own guerrilla operations or for punishment for choosing North.

His soldiers had training, and knew what they had signed up for. The refugees didn't. He wasn't going to treat them like bargaining chips by trading them head-for-head as you would stock animals. They had chosen him, and he was going to honour that.

He'd managed to dodge the proposal by reminding the American negotiators that Admiral Joy himself had said there would be no discussion of political matters at the table, so political refugees were off of it.

But Gangwon wasn't a discussion- he was a demand. North had refused to trade his people, so now to remind him who was 'in charge,' they wanted his province.

North pivoted just before he hit the wall.

They weren't getting him. Gangwon was his. He had been his ever since he'd appeared in the cave mouth with his armful of wood, looking more relieved than anyone North had ever seen. No, before that, as soon as he'd leaped out of that tree and looked at his Countryhuman with fearful, awed, achingly familiar eyes.

America had put that fear back in them after North had worked so hard to take it away. And S- he had also driven him to maim his own body just so he could keep fighting for their people. North wasn't letting the foreigner do anything else to him.

He slammed his palm off the hard wall, violently slinging himself around again as the door opened.

Gangwon flinched as he whirled on him, but Kangwon just blinked in greeting, shutting the door behind them.

“How is she?” North demanded without pause.

“Hae was fine this morning,” Kangwon said, walking by to strip off his gloves and place them on a surgical tray. “I’m heading back to check up on her right now.”

“I want to see her,” North demanded, not for the first time.

“You can’t risk getting infected,” his province reminded him.

Gangwon’s brows furrowed as he read his lips. “Are you saying he could catch it? B-But cholera isn’t contagious. Well, it doesn’t pass person to person like that.”

“It doesn’t usually pass person to person,” Kangwon said, pouring a bit of antiseptic on his hands, focusing on the liquid as he rubbed it into his palms. “But it also doesn't usually show up in clams in the Taedong in early January. And I’d rather not have Korea visiting the Quarantine Hospital. We’ve got other sick people there. And you’re more likely to catch something if you’ve got a compromised immune system, say from things like lack of sleep or not eating enough.”

He shot North a side-eye.

“When will she recover?” he demanded, ignoring it.

“Probably in around a month,” Kangwon said, also not for the first time. “Maybe two.”

Gangwon swivelled his head to blink at him. “W-What did you say?”

They had all collaborated to decide which signs would represent which province. Kangwon made the one that represented South Hwanghae for his brother, sliding his thumb against his index finger. “Hae should get better-“ He tapped two fingers to his chest, then raised them.

The bits of sign language that had been being taught in Seoul hadn’t been tailored for medical scenarios, so North was letting the Kangwons invent their own with whatever was convenient to them.

“In one to two months.” One finger, two fingers, and four quick motions to spell out 월- month.

Gangwon looked uneasy as he read his brother’s gestures.

North narrowed his eye. “What?”

His province looked at his brother, then said, “N-Nothing, Korea. I’m just worried she’ll miss sowing s-s-season. Hae w-would hate that.”

She would. But North stared at him longer.

Gangwon squirmed, his green cheeks dusting with red, the way the old Kangwon’s had used to do when North watched him in the cave.

North swung his head to the other Kangwon, who had already returned to tidying up his counter space, and was carefully placing a patch over his newest track mark. He saw him looking, and sighed.

“Korea, she’ll be fine, really.”

North stared, piercing into his eyes. Kangwon stared back, lifting an eyebrow slightly.

“What?”

“…Nothing.” North broke contact, looking down at his arm. “We’re going to be travelling a lot for the next few weeks. Give less blood.”

“Whether or not any outbreaks turn out to be intentional, our blood is going to be the best line of defense we have against losing people,” Kangwon said, rolling the sleeve of his white lab coat down over his bruises.

North grit his teeth. Medication should be their best line of defense. The blood was a last, desperate measure when they had nothing else.

“But if you want me to give a little less, you should, too.” His province turned back to him. “Or maybe stay behind. You don’t have to investigate personally.”

“I do.” He couldn’t stay still while his people were being poisoned.

“Korea, you can trust me to get to the bottom of things,” Kangwon said. “I know what I’m doing.”

North knew that. And he knew he wasn’t much use when it came to medical investigations.

But he didn’t say anything.

“Go check on South Hwanghae,” he ordered instead.

Kangwon exhaled slightly, but nodded. “Alright. See you tomorrow morning in time for a check-up.”

“I will see you at the rendezvous point.”

His province shook his head, patting his brother on the shoulder as he passed.

North watched the door shut.

He wasn’t letting Kangwon go off around the countryside, even with a team of doctors and lab techs. Especially with a team of precious doctors and lab techs. Not when they still hadn’t found out who had told the enemy that North and South Pyongan would be using the north highway that night.

And when those clams had been found where they had been.

Ssi-bal, Hae had better be okay.

“Korea?” Gangwon ventured, bandaging his own arm. “Have they s-said anything about me at the talks yet?”

“No,” North clipped.

“If they d-do-“

“We have spoken about this,” North interrupted. “Focus on present issues, not ones that haven’t happened yet. Come take my blood once you’re finished with your arm.”

Gangwon blinked at him in surprise. “I th-think I read your lips wrong.”

North repeated what he’d said, cobbling together gestures to convey he hadn’t.

His province stammered, “You w-want m-me to draw your blood?”

“You’re steady enough to take your own,” North said. “You can take mine.”

He didn't like letting the Kangwons do even that, but he couldn't give the task to Kim Yong-hwan today. It had been too long since his last check-up.

He couldn't take their routine today, not when thoughts of Hae were making even the dead nerves in his skin feel raw.

Gangwon smiled, his eyes lighting up as he hurried to put his supplies away, successfully distracted.

He and Kangwon had enough to worry about, and more to come.

As they left the room, North took their notebook and the charcoal stick they were using to write.

He eyed the rooms as they passed them, catching a glimpse of a man swathed almost entirely in bandages as a nurse slid out of Room 7. His head was buried in the hand of one arm. The other ended just below the shoulder. North’s jaw creaked, but he didn’t let himself look away.

They had the lab to themselves, the distant chatter and beeping of medical equipment muted by the door Gangwon slid shut. North folded his tunic neatly, and took a seat on the chair as his province set up the IV pole.

"You probably shouldn't be giving blood this much," his province said as he attached the clear bag.

He had decided that since he was deaf, he could take advantage of it to nag North without hearing his protests. He did it frequently when the Countryhuman read their sign language textbook.

"Like Kangwon said, you don't get much sleep or food, so your immune system's already compromised," he continued to babble.

North flipped open the notebook, using the charcoal to write something down.

"There's already sickness going around," his province reminded him, preparing the needle. "We don't want you to catch anything."

North tugged on his long white coat, holding up the notebook. The man turned to look at it, slumping as he read 'SHUT UP' in bold characters at the top of the page.

"Yes, Korea," he sighed, continuing his work in silence.

Pleased, North set the book down on his lap.

His eye strayed over to the other page, and the words Kangwon had been writing to communicate with Gangwon. He didn't want to read the half of a conversation, but he took notice of Sip Tal-sun's name, Kangwon confirming for his brother that the man was back with his family and recovering well physically, and would recover mentally as well.

North read between the false comfort his province tended to give. 'Would recover mentally' meant he hadn't. And the Countryhuman didn't think he would.

He should go to the Quarantine Hospital when they got back, no matter what Kangwon said.

Gaze drifting, he read a sentence at the bottom of the page.

'I'm alright. Just tired.' The words after it were discussions about treatments for patients, a clear misdirect.

North shut the notebook, setting it aside.

"You're s-sure you want me to do this?" Gangwon checked, holding the IV tubing in a hand that shook slightly.

"We wouldn't be here if I didn't." North crossed his arms, then uncrossed them, rolling up the sleeve of his undershirt, and holding his arm out for the man to disinfect.

He did, trembling as he dabbed the cotton ball against blue skin.

Gangwon didn't use a tourniquet, able to find his vein with an old familiarity. But once he had the needle pressed against it, he hesitated.

A russet hand with a sewing needle trembling over a boy's bloody back.

North's jaw feathered, and he snapped his fingers in front of his province's face, making him look at his mouth.

"You are fine, Gangwon," he enunciated. "Even if you screw up, it's not going to kill me. Just do it."

His province squeezed his eyes shut, breathing out. Then they opened again, and he took North's arm more firmly.

"S-So I'm looking for your cephalic vein," he said, his finger already on it. "It hurts a little more than the m-median cupital, but we've already punctured that one a lot, so I'm going to let it heal, and use this one instead."

North didn't bother reassuring him of his pain tolerance. He was just doing what he'd used to when he would treat him, explaining his actions to put them both at ease. Though it was just for his benefit now.

"That's why I'm taking from your forearm, too," Gangwon continued, growing a little steadier as the cold tip of the shunt dimpled North's skin. "Your antecubital fossa is too bruised, and… burnt. Th-That's the crook of your arm, by the way."

North felt a flash of pride at the scientific terminology. Gangwon hadn't received the same medical training as Kangwon had during the years before the war. He had been stuck with their old knowledge, cobbled together from experience. But he'd been absorbing the medical textbooks as easily as his brother had.

"Here it goes," his province said nervously. "Three, two-"

North didn't react as the needle slid into his vein. Gangwon flinched more than him.

He stared anxiously at his arm like he expected his Countryhuman to start bleeding out, then slumped in relief as red started to slowly work its way through the tube.

"I did it."

"Obviously," North replied, flexing his other hand impatiently.

Drawing his blood only took around ten minutes, but he could never stand the wait. He should be speaking to their Minister of Health, Ri Pyong-nam, or investigating the countryside for more suspicious illnesses, or visiting Hae to make sure she really would be okay.

He shouldn't have shoved his fingers down her throat the way he had. He should have just calmly explained why he needed her to throw up, and she would have. But as soon as she'd said she'd ate one of those damned clams…

"K-Korea," Gangwon said, sitting down in the other chair. "You're going to shake the needle out."

North made himself stop his restless jittering. Kangwon was right. Without enough antibiotics, their blood would be needed in the fight against a pandemic. It couldn't stop it, but it could minimize casualties.

'I should get some braised soybeans.' He could get Kim Song-ae to make them, and have Kangwon give them to Hae. She needed as much food as she could get to recover, and would probably be glad to break up the steamed grains Kangwon said he was feeding her with kongjang.

And she would understand what they meant.

"S-So how are the talks going?" Gangwon asked.

"They aren't," North replied stiffly. "They still haven't turned over the list of missing POWs. And they brought up the repatriation issue again."

America had finally laid his card on the table and flipped it over, the card North had known was coming since the moment he and China's proposal for the complete return of all prisoners had been denied.

'Voluntary repatriation,' America's newest way to postpone peace. He was demanding that POWs be allowed to choose where they were repatriated to.

It was a complete reversal of the international law codified in the Geneva Convention, but he claimed that North and China's soldiers would be 'subjected to inhumane treatment' if they were returned, and so they should be given a choice.

"Damn." Gangwon- who if North suggested be allowed to choose where he was repatriated to, would surely be ignored- sighed. He shifted a little in his chair. "K-Kang suggested maybe it wouldn't be a bad idea. Getting rid of our reactionaries, at least for a little while. Y'know, if it would get peace."

"It wouldn't," North said stonily, grabbing the notebook to write the words their fledgling sign language couldn't convey. "America would just come up with something else. And any traitors we turned over would be turned into fodder for Rhee's youth groups."

In a broadcast a couple days ago, the degenerate had claimed that over five thousand KPA soldiers wished to stay in the south. Even if it could be trusted, it was a relatively small number, considering the amount of his soldiers in captivity. And North knew the Yankees had volunteers, guerrillas, and civilians from the south in the camps-

His jaw tightened as he thought of Song Kum-jeong.

-that would want to return to their homes, not the north.

But he also knew that since they had been forced to turn to conscripting, there would be some ideologically weak soldiers that genuinely wanted to join Rhee's side. Soldiers that could be sent back over to sabotage them and maraud around their villages like the group he and South Pyongan had lain waste to.

More than that-

"And we can't trust that our soldiers wouldn't be coerced into refusing to be repatriated."

The decision of a prisoner of war couldn't be trusted, not when they were in active captivity. There was no way of knowing if they truly wanted to stay, or if they had been told that was what they had to say. Fear or threats could have swayed them. Especially when he not only had his sources in the camps reporting being taken into interrogation rooms and told that all of the atrocities America and Rhee's army's had committed were on the KPA's hands, and were routinely inundated with other lies about Socialism, the northern government, and North himself, but Libby himself openly declaring that prisoners on Geoje Island were being 'taught democracy.'

And some had said worse was going on.

"Or tortured," North growled, hand closing around the charcoal, his blood rushing faster into the IV.

"I k-know, Korea," Gangwon said quickly, moving his hand like he could lower his country's blood pressure with his mind. "You don't need to tell me. And that's what I told Kangwon."

"He spent time in America's holding camp," North said coolly. "He shouldn't need to be told."

Gangwon winced, clearly regretting bringing his brother up. "He knows Am-merica's awful. He just thought since there's other UN troops at the camps that t-torture and stuff wouldn't happen." His jaw clenched. “But I said it would. America would make them.”

He slid down in his chair, thin shoulders hunching around his ear slits.

“America wouldn’t have to,” North replied. “The other nations are just as complicit as him.”

Especially Britain, who was the only other one with guards in any force at the camps.

Gangwon shifted as he read the words, his eyes casting down to his lap. “I k-know. We know.”

North exhaled soundlessly. He knew they didn’t, not entirely. Kangwon had always tended to give foreigners the benefit of the doubt. Not when it was clear they didn’t deserve it, like with Japan himself, but with their people as a whole.

And he had been right. It was the ruling class of countries that were different, wrong, not the masses.

But some of the masses agreed with them, like his own reactionaries that wanted to stay with Rhee, even after they had to know what his forces had done. There might be good people in America and Britain, he knew there were good people in the other colonized or formerly-colonized countries that had troops here, like the Philippines and India.

But even the most compliant or open-minded of the American POWs that fervently denounced their own army after being told even some of what they’d done had killed Koreans. They shouldn’t have had to be taught that being sent halfway across the world to murder people that had never done anything or wanted to do anything to them was wrong. They should have known.

There might be good people in the nations invading them. But none of them were in Korea. And there were definitely none in the enemy camps.

He would talk to Kangwon again to try and impress that. He didn’t necessarily want his province to lose that hopeful part of himself, but he didn't want it to get him in trouble either. He had been lucky it hadn't with that black soldier in Taejon.

Gangwon fell silent as North turned his head, watching his blood fill past the halfway mark on the bag.

'Voluntary repatriation.' The blood rose faster.

This wasn't the first time America had tried something like this. It was why he had known to expect it, even before CCCP had raised the possibility in his New Year's letter.

He and Britain had attempted it with the Soviet after the World Anti-Fascist War, citing that since he had declared soldiers that didn't fight to the last as the Nazis tore their way across his land traitors, they would be in danger of being executed if they were returned to him.

They hadn't cared about Soviet citizens when they were attempting to put down the Bolshevik Revolution or supporting the White Army in their pogroms. All they had wanted was to keep the men willing to defect to give them a supply of armed reactionaries to fight Communism in their own countries.

And neither North nor China had the same order as CCCP had. While the Chinese Communist Party members were expected to kill themselves before being taken, they wouldn't be eliminated for failing, only shamed and thrown out of the Party. America's 'concern' was based on nothing but the massacres he had lain at North's feet, the massacres he and Rhee's soldiers had committed.

Nazi soldiers hadn't been given a choice during the World Anti-Fascist War. Neither had Japanese. Sick soldiers had been returned to their brutal states during the conflict, knowing that the price for their capture could end up being death, and afterwards they had been returned to American-controlled Japan and West Germany, and Soviet-controlled East Germany, where there would be many reasons for occupying soldiers to get revenge.

But now that it was Korea and China, the law had to change. Or more, now that America wanted it to. And they didn't have the power or leverage to fight it as CCCP had.

North knew that so long as the Reunification talks after the ceasefire succeeded, he would get all of his people back. It was more dangerous for China to lose any Nationalists in his ranks to Chang Kai-shek on Taiwan, since they would be used to attempt to retake the mainland. But he had the broad support of his masses. He could beat them, and even retrieve them one day.

But they couldn't accept this. If they let this happen, it would set a dangerous precedent. Laws had already been bent and broken to justify America's invasion of him- not having North at the vote, his planes already bombing Korea before allowance was given, the United Nations being involved in a civil war at all, and America being here, holding his brother captive.

If North just rolled over and let them impose this new decision, it would let the entire world know that America could break and change any laws as he pleased. It would let America know that. He couldn't accept that, and America knew he couldn't accept that.

And so the war would continue.

When the sides of the IV bag were bulging from the blood inside them, Gangwon removed it from the pole, hurriedly preparing to get it to storage.

'At least this winter isn't so cold that's it's freezing there.'

North let his province whisk the droplet of blood on his forearm away, and place a small patch over the area, even though it shrank the amount of skin not already covered in bandages even further.

"Make sure you eat something," Gangwon advised, knowing it was hopeless.

North didn't reply, hiding his wince as he stood, feeling warmth spread across his knees as they straightened. He subtly peeked to make sure blood wasn't seeping through his pants.

"Korea, do you want me to give you a check-up?" Gangwon offered tentatively. "I could clean your wounds after I-"

“No,” North said sharply, then sighed as the man flinched. “It isn’t you, Gangwon,” he repeated what he had to Kangwon. “You did fine with taking my blood. I just have things I need to do.”

Like his brother, he didn’t buy it, looking hurt, though his lips tilted up a bit at even the slight praise of ‘fine.’

It really wasn’t them. Or it was, but not for the reason they were thinking.

North had to take that fear out of Gangwon’s eyes again. And he couldn’t ever let it come back to Kangwon’s.

“Before I leave,” he started, extending the offer he'd been thinking of to make up for it. “I’ve been thinking about transferring you to the Quarantine Hospital. Do you accept? ”

Gangwon’s eyes widened. “Me?”

His Countryhuman nodded. “America won’t stop at a few contaminated air drops. There will be more sickness coming, and we need every hand possible there. I have Kangwon busy investigating, and you could do more work with the ill than the injured.”

The military hospital involved more surgeries, and they couldn’t risk exposing Gangwon to any soldiers that would return to the front and possibly be taken prisoner. The province was relegated to sanitation and tending to permanent casualties, tasks that any nurse could do. His talents would better serve where he could diagnose diseases, distribute medicine, and use treatments that didn’t require steady hands.

“Of course, Korea,” Gangwon said quickly, his eyes glowing. “But I’m a little scared to tell Comrade Kim she won’t have anyone to do laundry anymore.”

When he was excited enough to lose the stutter, his voice became less high-pitched, deepening to a more mellow tone that sounded almost exactly like his brother’s.

North couldn’t remember if he had ever sounded like South. His brother's voice was imprinted in his memories from the first time he'd heard it, coming from behind him as Japan loomed over them, but his own was lost to them.

Had his voice been smooth and melodic in the beginning, before years of screaming and being pummeled in the throat had changed it, or had it always been rough? He knew South would know.

The chord inside him twinged. He hadn't felt any pulls on it since his brother had reached out back during Liberation Day, though he'd tried pulling on it after his Foundation Day speech, hoping that it might spur South to try and listen to the broadcast, and hear the promise under his words.

'I won't give up on you. Not ever. Not again.'

He hadn't received a pull back.

North realized Gangwon was watching him in concern, and clipped, "Kim Yong-hwan will live."

"Then I'll pack my stuff up and get Kangwon to take me over after." His province smiled. "Thanks, Korea."

Hae would be thrilled. She was likely going stir-crazy.

And while he and Kangwon were in the field, North wanted someone watching over her that he could trust.

Before Gangwon could leave with the blood, North said, "Wait."

The man tipped his head at him in question.

"Do you think Kangwon would lie to me about South Hwanghae's condition?"

Gangwon's nail drifted to his mouth, silent for a second. Then, "N-No, Korea. I know we kind of d-downplay stuff sometimes, but it's just so… B-But I don't think he'd do that for her."

North examined him for a long moment. Gangwon met his gaze.

"Hm." He walked by his province, buttoning his tunic back up. "Get that blood to storage."

"Yes, Korea."

North strode down the hospital hallway, hearing soft weeping coming from behind the door to Room 7.

He knew those clams had been from the enemy, and he knew America was using germ warfare again. It hadn't worked to his satisfaction last time, so he was trying again, trying to break them, to kill as many of North's people as possible before the ceasefire was signed.

The Yankee had better pray to his god that they managed to combat it as well as they had last winter. Because if plague swept across he and China's people, then North was going to make sure devastation rained down on his.

And if anything happened to South Hwanghae, America was going to wish he had signed the armistice while he still had the chance.

I was making hanami dango after writing this chapter, and as I boiled them, the mochiko floated on the surface of the water, creating a thick white scum, and I thought, 'Ah. Cholera diarrhea.' I fear that's a thought I will have often in the future. So that's great.

We are in the germ warfare arc now (amazing name, I know). I'll put some sources and do a full write up on the accusations of germ warfare in 1952 (and why I believe them) towards the 'end' of it to avoid spoilers, and just put non-spoiler clarification information where it's needed. My only clarification for this one is that this clam drop is a made-up incident (though not entirely fabricated as we will see later). But unless I say otherwise, the incidents will all be reported as they happened in real life. Also if you recognized some of the voluntary repatriation lines, it's because this is where I relocated them to, as I said before. ^^

Also yes the sign language symbol for Hae that they're using looks like the modern day finger heart. It's completely a coincidence, but it hurts modern day Gangwon's heart to see it every time.

Long-Cherished Desire

1942

Kangwon made the hike up Paektusan alone, seemingly.

He should've taken people with him, at least Hae and Gyeong. Ever since the bulk of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army had fled Korea to carry on the fight in Manchuria and the Soviet Union, there was no major force left to stop the Japanese from crawling across the northern mountains.

But they were busy, and he needed to get away.

He passed under the pines, their needles scratching at his face, until they were replaced by the high branches of bare birches, and those gave way entirely, leaving him exposed on the mountain face. His breath steamed, freezing to crystals almost as soon as it left his lips, and he could feel the cold seeping through his boots, even with all of the rags he'd stuffed in the toes.

But he kept climbing until the peaks towering above him parted like the spears of palace guards, and he stood on an outcrop of rock, looking out at Heaven Lake.

It sat in the cradle of snow-capped mountains, even blacker than the sky above. But it wasn't the black of the old cave, or the dark under the trees that could conceal anything, and made him uneasy even tonight. It was the dark behind his eyes when he finally snuggled down in his bedroll next to GG and Hae after a long watch, or of the womb.

Kangwon had never experienced that, but he imagined if babies could remember it, that was what they would- soft, warm dark. Though instead of a fetus, Heaven Lake carried stars, caught in the water like they belonged there, glimmering like hundreds of coins.

The sight made Kangwon feel a bit better, like it always did. But it couldn't get rid of the weight in his heart. He'd washed his hands already, but he kind of wanted to go plunge them into those dark, freezing waters.

He bit down on the tip of his gloved finger instead. He couldn't afford to get sick.

His other hand uncurled, trying to get the frigid air on top of the mountain to cool the fevered warmth he could still feel clinging to his palm.

A rock clattered behind him, bouncing all the way down to the lake to land with a splash, but for once he didn't flinch. He'd known he wasn't really alone. Though he hadn't thought he'd actually come out.

But it turned out he was even less alone than he'd thought. Instead of who he expected, it was a human man in the uniform of their guerrillas, one of the few who'd remained in Korea. Most of them were from the old core of Korea's Army, but not him.

"There you are, Doctor," Bong-nam panted, gasping for air as he jogged over to stand next to him. "I saw you heading up the mountain from down in the camp. Thought you might like some company."

Kangwon smiled. "Thanks."

He hadn't really wanted to be alone. He just needed to get some air.

Bong-nam let out a low whistle as he looked out at the lake. "Isn't that something?"

Kangwon kept his voice low to stop it from echoing over the water. But the man's was a whisper brought on by awed reverence.

"Yeah," the province agreed, watching the reflected stars twinkle. "It really is."

"Do you think the first Korea was really born here?"

Kangwon appreciated what he was doing, playing along. “Who knows? Hwanung and Sinsi were probably just myths, same with Dangun being divine. But there’s no reason Gojoseon couldn’t’ve really been formed here.”

“Wonder what he was like?” Bong-nam only waited a second before answering his own question. “Definitely not as great as our Korea.”

Kangwon didn’t know if he’d caught sight of his other tail on the way up. But knowing he was there didn’t change his own answer.

“Definitely not,” he agreed.

Bong-nam shoved his hands in his pockets, shivering as a cold wind blew off the lake.

“You should say what you want so you can get back,” Kangwon advised. “I don’t want you getting sick.”

“You knew I was trying to distract you?”

The province gave a half-smile. “You got the doctor small talk from me, so yeah.”

“I guess that’s true.” The man chewed on the inside of his cheek, then finally said, “It wasn’t your fault.”

Kangwon looked at the lake again, exhale pluming in front of his face. “I know. I did everything I could have.”

And he’d still had to hold the boy’s burning hot hand as he died, breath rattling in his little lungs.

Bong-nam put a hand on his shoulder. “Then don’t be so hard on yourself, comrade.”

“I’m not,” Kangwon assured him. “I know I couldn’t've saved him. But…”

It had just been typhoid. And yeah, when it came to kids there was no ‘just.’ But it was a preventable disease. There were old immunization methods and a modern vaccine, and it was easily curable with antibiotics.

"That's what's so frustrating," he murmured, heart squeezing with his fist.

He had confidence in his abilities now. He could remove a bullet, disinfect a wound, and have it sewed up in under ten minutes, he knew how to amputate a limb with no regrets because he knew when there was no other way, and he never even trembled. The Kangwon whose hand had shook as he stitched the shallow cut of the boy that was now the man standing next to him would've keeled over if he saw any of what the Kangwon now had dealt with in the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army.

But he couldn't save a child with an upset stomach.

Typhoid was worse than that. But it was curable. Kangwon just couldn't do it. No amount of confidence or steady hands or medical knowledge could've helped. Only the antibiotics.

"I know what you mean," Bong-nam murmured, and it seemed like he really did, because he said, "Watching someone waste away, knowing that there's a cure, that there are pharmacies full of medicine you could use to save them. But knowing you'll never be able to afford it."

"Who did you lose?" Kangwon asked. He'd never mentioned a personal loss from sickness before.

His friend looked out at the womb full of stars, his hand clenching around nothing.

"Lot of people in the village," he said eventually. "Not your fault, Doctor. You couldn't have saved them even if you were there."

Kangwon sighed, but he couldn't do it heavily enough to exhale the grief out of his lungs, or the lingering taste of the sick room.

He'd have to walk Do-cheon's mother back to her village tomorrow. He'd have to carry that small, frail body in his arms and help her lay her last son to rest.

He scrubbed a hand over his face, hearing soft footsteps behind them. Their watcher was finally coming out, though he didn't know if it was to comfort them or just stop Kangwon from being vulnerable. Probably both, knowing him.

"North Chungcheong and the others should return by tomorrow night," Korea said, coming to stand next to his province, ignoring Bong-nam's surprised yelp. "The local villages will know to avoid the area for the next two weeks, and to take precautions for another couple months."

"Good." Two months should be long enough for any other villagers' symptoms to show. At least they could help prevent an outbreak.

"How long were you standing there?" Bong-nam asked nervously.

Korea side-eyed him. "Long enough to have put a bullet in your skull if I was an enemy."

"Big Brother's still so scary."

Three years of combat and more years of harsh living conditions had carved deep lines into the corners of Choe Bong-nam's eyes and mouth, but he still called Korea that.

And Do-cheon would never hear his little sister call him 'oppa' ever again.

"Kangwon."

He raised his head to see Korea looking at him. His Countryhuman flicked his eyes to Bong-nam almost uncomfortably, then turned slightly more towards his province.

"This is why we do this," he said firmly. "This is why we fight. Because every day we lose people that we don't have to. Because the hospitals have the equipment to treat their wounds, and the pharmaceutical companies have the medicine to cure their illnesses." His jaw feathered. "But our people don't have the money."

“It isn’t fair,” Bong-nam muttered, his hands balled at his sides.

“No,” Korea said fiercely. “It isn’t. And when Korea is in Korean hands, it will change, I promise.” He looked back into Kangwon’s eyes. “I told you it would. That’s why you followed me.”

It wasn’t the only reason.

“Japan is going to burn in this war,” Korea said with certainty. “His country is going to lose, his people are going to bring him down, and even before they do, Korea is going to be ours. And then you will never lose anyone that is capable of being saved again.”

His country's fingers dug into Kangwon’s shoulder. “I know it.”

Kangwon ducked his head at the surety in his country’s voice.

For so long, it’d been Korea’s confidence that had kept him steady. It was his belief in him that had allowed him to heal Bong-nam, to treat sick villagers on their travels, and mend the soldiers of Korea’s Army. He’d finally found his own confidence during the years with the KPRA, but it always filled him with warmth to be reminded that if it ever gave out, he’d still have his Countryhuman’s.

“I know it, too, Doctor.” Bong-nam slung his arms around his shoulders from behind. “You’ll be the best doctor in Free Korea, and every time I get a cold, I’ll come straight to you.”

Kangwon opened his mouth to joke that a cold wasn’t worth a hospital trip, then closed it.

Because that was the goal, wasn’t it? To have it so that if one of their people was even a little worried, or even if they weren’t worried at all, just inconvenienced, they could come to a hospital and be healed. They wouldn’t have to keep suffering through their work because they couldn’t afford to find out what was wrong or buy medicine. They wouldn’t have to worry about losing their home or selling their heirlooms to make sure they could afford it. All they’d have to worry about was being healthy again.

“Thank you,” he said to them, swallowing. “But I can’t let that make me feel better about losing a patient."

He'd never been able to follow Korea's advice about cutting out pointless emotions.

Of course, he'd never tried.

"No, you can't," Korea said, tugging his hand out from under Bong-nam's arm. "Because until then, we will lose more people. And every single one of them needs to be remembered."

"And avenged," Bong-nam added fervently.

Korea dipped his head. "And carried forward." He fixed Kangwon with his eyes again, stars glimmering at the bottom of them. "But for every patient you lose now, you will save hundreds in the future. Thousands."

And Korea would save millions.

Kangwon breathed out, then nodded. "I know. I'll remember that."

Korea returned the nod, and the fire in his voice banked. "Good. Now get back to camp. It isn't safe out here."

But it was safer than before. Since the battle against Japan on the slopes of Paektusan, they hadn't seen a single Kempeitei unit hunting them.

Bong-nam slapped Kangwon on the chest, pushing off of him. "Comrade Korea, Comrade Kangwon."

They looked at him, and he put a fist over his heart. His brown eyes shimmered under the starlight.

"I just wanted to let you both know that I'm honoured to serve in the fight to Liberate our country. That's all."

The soldier's formality didn't suit him. But maybe that was just because Kangwon could still see the round-faced boy with gap teeth beaming up at him.

“And your country is honoured to have you in the fight,” Korea replied, the formality fitting him better than most things, but never as well as the fire. “One day we will bring your family home.”

Bong-nam’s lips pressed tight to hold in his emotion, and he raised the edge of his hand to his brow. “We’ll bring yours home, too.”

Korea’s expression didn’t change. Only Kangwon or one of the other provinces would’ve seen the tightening at the corners of his lips.

“Yes,” he said simply, and Kangwon knew if it hadn’t been for that article in the paper, Korea would still be the only one that knew ‘South’ even existed.

“We should get going,” he said, saving him.

Korea turned away. “You go first.”

“Korea-“

“I’ll be down.”

“And he just said it isn’t safe,” Bong-nam loudly whispered.

Kangwon just shook his head. “Don’t spend too much time up here,” he advised. “You won’t be happy if you become one of the patients I have to save from a cold.”

Korea didn’t respond, his eyes fixed on the stars in the lake.

“’Night, hyung,” Bong-nam called quietly, rubbing his hands together to warm them, and part of Kangwon wondered if that was what Korea’s brother had called him.

He knew Korea hadn't called him ‘big brother’ at least. He’d called him South, even before he’d put years between them.

Strange how one person could recontextualize almost everything someone had ever said.

The boy sighed, padding back up the small ridge, looking back at Korea again, his silhouette cutting a person-shaped swathe out of the lights in the lake.

At least Kangwon wasn't afraid to leave him alone up here. He'd reined himself in after Japan.

Kangwon still didn't know why he'd spared the other country, none of them did. But he liked to secretly hope it was because he'd accomplished his other reason for following Korea when he'd left his cave. The thing that had given him the confidence to.

'Even just a little.'

And in time, they'd accomplish what they'd both set out to do- save Korea.

Kangwon left his Countryhuman staring out at Heaven Lake, and the stars trapped down in its depths.

—

1952

The hospital room was neat and bright, the fishy smell that had filled it just yesterday smothered under the acrid smell of disinfectant and antiseptic. A pitcher of boiled water sat on the side table, and a fresh hospital gown was draped over the back of the small chair.

And Hae's body was laid out on the cot, unmoving and unbreathing.

Gangwon stared at their cousin's peaceful face, his eyes wide. Kangwon had told him what to expect so he wouldn't have to experience the same heartbreak and fear he had when he got back with more rice to find her sprawled on the floor, dead. But it still took him a second to collect himself.

"Korea is going to k-k-kill you."

Kangwon winced. "We can't tell him."

“He’s g-going to find out. He was alr-ready- already s-s-suspicious.”

“I know.” He’d been hoping to avoid telling his brother about Hae’s condition at all so he wouldn’t have to lie to Korea with him. But his surprise over the prediction of a month or two to recover from cholera had almost given him away, and now he'd be working here. “But it’s what she wanted.”

Gangwon tentatively approached the cot, reaching out a hand. It trembled as he reached under the white cover, taking Hae’s wrist before moving to the left side of her torso.

Pain flashed across his face. “Sh-sh-she’s- Her heart’s not beating.”

“She’ll be alright,” Kangwon soothed, coming to stand next to him. “It'll probably start up some time today or tomorrow.”

He sounded a lot calmer than he’d felt yesterday, as he’d held her on the bed and poured litres of water down her throat, trying to rehydrate her, then tore through every single book they had on Countryhuman anatomy again. He’d had to get the Premier to requisition them for him when he saw Hae’s condition degrading, since Hwang would pick up on why he'd wanted them.

One of the old Chinese texts had said the heart of a Provincehuman would stay silent until the wound that had killed them was fixed, but there was no source for the knowledge, and Kangwon hadn’t been able to sleep, thinking about how Liaoxi and Pak Ga-ram had said North Pyongan’s heart had only been stopped for around a half hour.

Gangwon seemed to be thinking something similar as he looked down at their cousin, holding her hand now. “B-But…”

“She hasn’t dissolved,” Kangwon pointed out.

And that was a firm fact with multiple sources- when a Countryhuman or its wards were formed, they formed out of golden dust. And when they died, they dissolved back into it.

“I think it’s just taking awhile because she’s so low on calories, and her body has to deal with her burns, too. Plus her internal organs need to recover first."

Cholera killed through dehydration, and dehydration caused organ failure. North Pyongan would've only had a bit of lung and brain trauma to heal- Hae's body had to repair all of hers.

Kangwon bit his tongue on telling his brother that. Gangwon didn't need that reassurance, since everything about North Pyongan's mission had been as classified as possible from him. He knew their cousin had been in rough shape in the hospital, but not why, or how bad.

Gangwon eased a little, though Kangwon could see he was still worried. He would've been. He was.

"Look after her for me while I'm in the field," he said to him, trying to sound as relaxed as possible. "I'll try and keep Korea away once we're back, so you don't have to deal with him. And if he does find out, I'll take the blame."

"You d-don't need to do that," Gangwon said.

Kangwon turned the corner of his lips up. "I'm the one that lost her."

His brother reached out to take his arm. "Kang, I kn-know if there was a way to save her, you would've."

"Yeah." He looked at Hae's face, her brows smooth and her purple eyelids completely still, and thought about how dehydration shouldn't have given her a fit. She had to have thrown herself out of bed to try and make it to the hallway to find him.

Instead she'd died, scared and alone on the floor.

"Yeah," he choked again, then leaned down to hug Hae, squeezing her against his chest.

She was as cold as a corpse should be, but rigor mortis had never set in. She was limp and frigid in his arms, and not hugging him back and it was so unlike her he wanted to keep squeezing until he could make her heart start beating against his again.

But it didn't.

Kangwon took a steadying breath, and carefully lay her back down, rearranging the blanket around her, pulling it snugly up to her chin. Gangwon put his arm around him, rubbing his shoulder.

"Don't try and give chest compressions or anything," the russet province said calmly. "Just keep her burns clean, feed her rice slurry and water, and let the recuperative coma do what it needs to."

Gangwon nodded wordlessly, still gazing at their cousin's cor-body.

Kangwon put a hand on her pale cheek. "I'll be back, Hae. I've got to go make sure no one else is getting sick. Gangwon will take care of you while I'm gone."

"I'll m-make sure you're not alone," his brother murmured.

That was the important thing. That she wasn't alone.

Kangwon took a deep breath, then set out to see if he could prove America had killed his little cousin.

For three days, he and Korea travelled around South Pyongan, Hwanghae, Pyongyang, and the western edges of his own province. From before dawn to almost dawn again, they interviewed villagers for more accounts of American planes dropping things that weren't bombs, spread the word to be careful of anything that's origin wasn't known, performed check-ups with a unit of the Mobile Medical Corps, and treated minor ailments.

Kangwon could tell it made Korea antsy when he took the time to check an old white phosphorous injury or give a prescription for a common cold, but he never stopped him, just disappeared into the hills to look for more witnesses.

And they found more. Most people only reported hearing a non-explosive bomb go off, but the few that went to check the area the next morning found nothing. A handful had seen the American jets dropping pamphlets, which wasn't out of the usual.

But a few had seen something way more suspicious than that.

"And it was right around here?"

The older woman nodded anxiously, looking around the misty mountain path. "It was."

It was early in the morning of the fourth day, and they were in the foothills of the mountains north of Koksan Town, a town on the Pyongyang-Wonsan highway.

"It happened just two nights ago. I was up early with my granddaughter fetching water, when I saw one of those Yankee planes coming in."

Korea cut the woman off. "What type?"

The grandmother shook her head of black curls. "I don't rightly know the official names, or what have you. But it was one of the smaller ones."

A fighter-bomber then, like most of the sightings.

"It came in over that way." The woman traced a path in the pale grey sky from the southwest to the northeast, then circled it around the mountain. "Then on its way back, I heard that damned whistle what means you're about to be blown up."

Yeah. Kangwon didn't think he'd ever be able to get that sound out of his head. Every time he almost dozed off, that high-pitched screaming whistle would make him jolt back up, even when he was safe in the underground hospital.

"I tried to run with my granddaughter," the woman continued, her hands fisting in her skirts. "But my joints aren't what they used to be, and I tripped on the other side of that ridge there."

Korea shifted impatiently as she gestured, and Kangwon subtly nudged him with his shoulder.

"And then?" he prompted.

"Well I was damn near sure we were going to die," she said. "But Pong-dol was crying up a storm, so I pulled myself together and tried to keep her calm."

Her raspy voice was matter-of-fact, but Kangwon could see the way her frail shoulders shook at the memory.

"That was very brave of you," he told her. "I'm glad you survived."

The woman took a shaky breath. "That we did. I was waiting for the blast, but it never came. It was more a 'pop.' Then the damned plane went back the way it came."

"You must've been relieved."

She snorted. "That's a word for it. Once I knew it wasn't one of those bombs that takes a lifetime to go off, I sent my granddaughter over to look around while I collected myself. I figured we could use any papers for kindling."

"You shouldn't touch anything that comes from the planes," Korea said, tension quivering in his voice. "Call Public Security or contact the Worker's Party from now on."

"Oh I will," the woman emphatically agreed. "Pong-dol wasn't gone a minute before she started screaming, and came blubbering back to me, talking about a swarm of bugs."

Kangwon's heart sank.

"I thought it was nonsense and told the girl to give my heart a break, but she insisted. So I followed her over here." She gestured around the area. "And what did I see but a bunch of flies buzzing around. Flies! In January!"

"That is strange," Kangwon agreed, watching as Korea started to poke around in the blackened leaf litter.

“Nothing here now,” he reported.

“There wouldn’t be,” the woman said. “I went straight back to town, and sent some men over to deal with it.”

Kangwon toed at the ground, confirming that the mulch wasn’t blackened from rot, but from being burnt.

“Good,” he approved. “Anything the planes drop should be dealt with the same way, even if it’s something useful.”

“Did they capture any of the flies?” Korea asked.

“Mr. Pak said there weren’t many left when they got here, but they burnt up all the ones that were.”

“That’s fine.” Kangwon would rather they didn’t have civilians handling possible biohazards anyway. “Getting rid of the immediate threat is more important.”

The grandmother rung her chapped hands, her brow furrowed. “I heard last year that the Yankees were spreading smallpox. Is this the same as that?"

Kangwon was going to say ‘We don’t know yet,’ but Korea cut him off.

“We believe so. Which is why it’s important that you make sure everyone you know is aware of the proper protocol for handling suspicious objects.”

Kangwon didn’t correct him. He supposed if people thought there was deliberate malice behind the drops, it would be a better incentive for making sure they followed those protocols.

He got more details from the woman- the exact time she’d seen the plane, the number of flies she guessed there’d been, and the information of the men that had dealt with them- then let her go.

“It’s germ warfare,” Korea said as soon as she was gone.

“Probably,” Kangwon admitted, scanning the nearby bare bushes. “We've got those other stories, too, and I’ve never heard about flies appearing this early, especially as many as she said.”

He also really didn’t like that the majority had gotten away.

They searched the immediate area to see if they could find any of the dead flies outside of the burn zone, but came up empty-handed. Finding a fly in the forest was about the same as looking for a Mr. Kim in Seoul.

“At least the good news is they shouldn’t be able to get far in this cold,” Kangwon said.

Korea didn’t look reassured. “Come on. Let’s go find the men that got rid of them.”

They found the Mr. Pak the old woman had mentioned, and he confirmed that she’d came to his door early in the morning, and he’d taken some materials out to the area to burn. He also said that there had only been around thirty flies when he got there.

After that, they sent Mobile Medical Corps on while they turned back for Pyongyang. The Premier was giving instruction to officials from the Ministry of Public Health, and Korea wanted Kangwon there.

He mulled over his notes as they drove, keeping one ear slit open for planes.

Most of the reports had taken place in the early morning, after three and before six, usually while it was still firmly dark out. That wasn’t exactly unusual, since the enemy pilots would want to avoid their anti-aircraft teams. And it also wasn't so strange that Koksan was another place on the supply line to the front, or Wonsan. The Americans would want to sway people who could sabotage the war effort most.

But he thought it was weird that most of the drops were outside villages instead of in them. The pamphlets earlier in the year were usually dropped directly, since their aircraft-hunting units couldn’t cover an entire city, and not every village had one. But aside from a few pamphlet bombs dropped over Sariwon and Pyongyang, most of the witnesses over the past few days had said the bombs were dropped outside residential areas. There was a sort of… secretiveness to that.

Kangwon tapped his charcoal against his chin, realizing something. “We never found a container.”

Korea slowed as they approached a checkpoint. “Could they have sprayed them like the leaflets?”

The province frowned. “I don’t think so. That’d be rough on the flies.” Even more than the cold. “And they were pretty clustered, if the witnesses saw correctly. Plus there's that popping- Mrgh.”

Korea had grabbed his jaw with one hand, rubbing at the charcoal spot on it so he’d look presentable for the Security Force men.

Kangwon stayed silent as they checked their identity cards, thinking.

“The woman that saw those beetles near Kanggye,” he said when they were through. “She said they were spread out, right?”

Korea nodded, accelerating down the muddy road towards Pyongyang. “Her letter said there were some caught in the trees in both directions. She was just able to see the ones that landed in a clearing."

He guessed beetles were sturdier than flies, and could probably take being sprayed better. And it didn’t sound like the woman had stuck around, so there could’ve been the fragments of a container, and she just didn’t see them.

Kangwon pictured a bomb exploding mid-air, raining shrapnel far away, like the leaflet bombs sometimes did, and those fake ‘atom bombs.’

But he and Korea had searched a pretty wide radius, and hadn’t seen anything. And they were both pretty good trackers. Plus the clustering.

There was a missing piece there, and with the white-marked spider beetles. They weren't out of season like the flies and other things, but…

"It's weird, isn't it?" he said, looking over at Korea. "Those beetles were found back in November, same with the other strange drops. But we barely saw anything in December, and no one else reported insects until two weeks ago."

This wasn't the first appearance of suspicious insects. Alongside the supplies being dropped, people around Chunghwa, Hwangju, and the other areas had reported seeing clusters of mosquitoes and flies, and even small rodents that came from nowhere, but after an American plane had passed.

"We didn't really see any unusual cases back then either." The flights had been unusual, targeting isolated villages, but the beetles had been the only strange ordnance, and there hadn't been any sudden spike in illness.

Korea's jaw worked for a few seconds. "Test flights."

Kangwon nodded in realization. "Studying distribution methods, maybe. Or seeing which areas near the border they could get away with infecting."

As he used that deliberate word, he realized he'd accepted that America was using biological warfare again as soon as he'd heard about the beetles.

He ran a hand over his face as Korea said, "You know what this means then?"

"Yeah." Kangwon exhaled tiredly. "The tests are done. We can expect to see more animal drops."

There were only certain bacteria that could be caught from non-organic materials. You could get smallpox just from wearing a shirt or using a blanket infected with it. But something like cholera only came from infected water or ingesting infected waste.

'Or shellfish.'

Using living vectors not only increased the amount of possible diseases, but added other methods of transmission. An infected fly could bite a human, or just land on food and leave bacteria behind. And some sicknesses couldn't pass directly from insects to humans, but they could with another animal as an intermediary, like a bird or pig.

Smallpox, typhus, typhoid, scarlet fever, yellow fever, malaria. Cholera. All the diseases Kangwon had read about and experienced flooded his mind, along with their symptoms, incubation periods, and how they killed.

And it was his job to stop them, when he hadn't even been able to save Hae.

"Kangwon."

He winced as Korea slapped his hand away from his mouth.

"We will handle it," his Countryhuman said firmly. "We avoided major outbreaks last year, and we will avoid them this year."

Last year had been a last-minute measure. The Americans and Rhee's clique had dumped germs on their way out, expecting the smallpox to soften them up, but not cause their own troops problems when they came back north.

But they should know they weren't getting back north now. They wouldn't be trying to weaken them, but to destroy them.

Still, he nodded. "Yeah. And I'll try and get us enough proof to expose America to the rest of the world."

"There is no amount of proof that could turn anyone that matters against him," Korea said coolly, and Kangwon shrunk a little as he remembered their conversation from when they'd first set out.

But he said firmly, "I can't believe that, Korea."

"Was last year not enough to convince you?"

"We didn't have enough solid proof last year to convince someone that didn't want to be. But flies and mosquitoes appearing mid-January can't be just hand-waved, not when we have so many non-army witnesses." Kangwon patted the eyewitness accounts. "Even if the UN is completely bought out, the other countries just need to be shown what he's really doing, in a way they can't turn away from. And even if they don't care, their people will. They voted against war with China, didn't they?"

"Because they didn't want to bear the cost," Korea snapped. "Not because they suddenly care. And Churchill just reaffirmed Britain's support for a naval blockade." His hands throttled the steering wheel as they reached the outer limits of the city. "Do you think Gangwon knows about China?"

"Nothing's changed from the other five times you've asked."

Kangwon knew there wasn't any getting through to Korea on this, at least not when there were germ bombs and real bombs being dropped on their country. Any mellowing on foreign countries he'd done over the years had been undone by the United Nations vote to invade them.

Well, not all of it. The fact that he'd told them not to kill America unless they had to was proof of that.

Korea drove him straight to Moran Hill, cutting the engine.

"Korea, are you sure you want me to go to the talk?" Kangwon asked. "The lab results on the clams Hae ate should be back."

"Gangwon has likely already received them," Korea responded, pulling a strip of white cloth out of his bag. "I'll get them from him."

Hiding his alarm, Kangwon said, "Make sure you get him to meet you outside. The Quarantine Hospital is isolated enough you don't have to worry about him hearing any broadcasts."

Korea eyed him in piercing silence. Kangwon stared back steadily.

"I really don't want you getting sick."

“Fine,” his Countryhuman clipped after a moment. “Blindfold.”

He sighed. “Korea, we all know where the complex is. You don’t-“

“Blind.fold.”

Kangwon sighed again, but obediently let Korea tie the fabric around his eyes, then help him from the Jeep, guiding him around stumps, and under the shadows of the last trees. He could hear voices, then felt walls close around him, before Korea helped him down a set of concrete stairs. Kangwon was fairly skilled at walking blind from all his time in the forest (he had good night vision, but sometimes the things he could hear made him screw his eyes shut so he couldn’t catch a glimpse of something he didn’t want to), so he made it down without taking long enough for Korea to carry him, which he wouldn't put past him if no one was watching.

They came to a stop, and his Countryhuman tugged the blindfold off, stuffing it in the pocket of Kangwon’s lab coat.

“It’s starting soon,” he said. “In.”

Kangwon went to reply, but Korea was already marching away. He sighed, entering the room.

He spotted Ri Pyong-nam in one of the wooden pews, and hustled over to discuss their investigation until the door opened and the Premier walked in. He smiled at Kangwon as he passed, a twinkle in his eye.

From the first words out of his mouth, Kangwon realized why, and why Korea had been so insistent he attend a twenty-minute lecture.

When the instruction was over, Kangwon thanked the man profusely, who watched him with amusement, since he wasn’t doing a good job at hiding his vibrating.

He couldn’t help it. All his exhaustion had been blasted away.

“Thank you,” he said again, bowing his head.

“Don’t thank me,” Kim Il-sung demurred. “It’s only the long-cherished desire of the Korean people, planned out by our Public Health officials, like Comrade Kangwon. I’m only here to convey it.”

Kangwon thanked him again, then tore out of the room, only just remembering to put his blindfold back on as he retraced the route Korea had brought him, taking the steps carefully, but quickly, until the cold of the afternoon air hit him again.

“Comrade Sip and Comrade Ri,” he called as he fumbled for the door out of the building that covered the complex entrance, knowing Korea would have sent them over. His fingers grazed rough wood before it swung open.

“Comrade Kangwon?” Ri Il’s deep, smooth voice said with bemusement. “I’m not entirely sure you need the blindfold when you’re inside.”

“Try telling Korea that,” the province replied. “Can you get me off the hill? I need to get to the Quarantine Hospital.”

The two men guided him by the shoulders until they were clear, and he could tear off the blindfold and take off for the hospital, feeling lighter than he had in months, certainly in days, making his feet fly.

He had to tell Gangwon, and the fact that had been his first thought after hearing the news made his heart soar.

‘I have to tell my brother.’

To his joy, he saw him before he even entered the hospital, as soon as the foothills opened up. He was standing beside the low building, talking to Korea.

“Korea!” he called, and his Countryhuman looked first, his brother not reacting until he realized he had, deafened even more by the fabric-stuffed ushanka on his head.

Korea turned his way, and Kangwon couldn’t help it. Even though there were nurses smoking around the side of the building, and his bodyguards were behind him, when he reached his Countryhuman, he wrapped his arms around him, careful not to apply too much pressure as he buried his face in his shoulder.

“What are you doing?!” Korea snapped. “Off!”

Kangwon pulled back, grinning, keeping his hands on his shoulders. “We’re really doing it? We’re setting up free healthcare?”

“You knew we were.” Korea twitched, but not strong enough to knock his hands off. “You were involved in calculating the logistics.”

“I didn’t know we were doing it next year.”

Kangwon had thought they’d have to wait until after the war was over, and maybe years after that, until the State was wealthy enough. But Premier Kim Il-sung had just stood behind the podium and declared, ‘We must introduce universal, free medical care from next year.’

“I was too busy to tell you,” Korea dodged.

His province beamed, pulling him in for another hug as emotion swelled in his chest. Joy, relief, and the aching feeling that someone else should be here, but the surety that he'd given his life for this very thing.

“This is what we were fighting for,” Kangwon murmured into the rough fabric of his uniform, and Korea’s arm returned to his side, deciding against hitting him on the head.

“We’re already taking care of soldiers, factory and office workers, and their dependents, and doing emergency aid and treatment for war injuries for free,” his Countryhuman said stiffly. “If this war has exposed anything, it’s that we don’t need as many funds as we thought we did when we put enough effort in. No cost for protecting our people is too high.”

Kangwon pressed his face against him tighter, then pulled away, leaving Korea with a brighter red band on his flag than usual as he tried not to look at Ri Il or Sip Yung-su standing off to the side.

“W-What’s going on?” Gangwon asked loudly, and Kangwon didn’t waste time trying to sign it out, grabbing the notebook Korea had dropped and scrawling the news in it, his handwriting sloppier than usual.

His brother's eyes widened as he read the words, filling with the same light glowing inside Kangwon. He whipped his head around to their Countryhuman.

“You mean it, Korea?”

He huffed in annoyance. “Why are you acting like you doubt it? I told you we would be doing this someday.”

“I d-didn’t doubt it, I just-“ Gangwon shook his head, then raised shaky hands to sign as he said, “Thank you. And I want you to know I’ll never regret doing this-“ He gestured to the damaged ear slits under his ushanka. “When it let me stay with you. This is why I did it.”

“And this is why we followed you.” Kangwon slung an arm around his brother, smiling at Korea. “Thank you, Korea.”

“You don’t owe me any thanks,” the man said, averting his eye. “You had the same desires as me, and you helped make this possible.”

And he had given them the wings to take flight.

“Then thanks for keeping your promise.”

Not that he’d ever doubted him. Ever since the tiger-boy in his cave had leaned across the fire with burning eyes, Kangwon had believed he could do anything. And Korea had made him believe that he could do anything, too.

“I haven’t kept it yet.” Korea’s arms crossed, then uncrossed, and he spoke slowly enough for Gangwon to read his lips, adding some rough signs to it. “But I will. I will get us through whatever the Yankees throw at us next, and by 1954, whether the war is over or not, Korea will have free, universal healthcare. Because nothing is more precious than the lives of our people.”

"'And there's nothing we can't spare for them,'" Kangwon echoed Kim Il-sung's words from earlier, breaking into another grin, unable to stop himself from turning to his brother.

Gangwon met him halfway, embracing him tightly as he laughed into his shoulder, and Kangwon laughed, too, as the reality of it kicked in.

No more struggling to cobble together cures out of food and herbs, no more villages depending on one person with shaky hands and sewing expertise, no more children dying of curable illnesses while antibiotics rotted in pharmacies. He knew it'd take years to build a perfect system, but this was a start. The start they'd never dared to imagine in any of their daydreams in the cave.

Kangwon would deal with the germ warfare, no matter what came their way. He'd nurse Hae back to life, save every one of their people that he could, and stamp out any pandemic before it could begin so that as many as possible would live to see their bright future. And he would get proof of America's crimes to the rest of the world, and make them understand they shouldn't support him or this war anymore.

And maybe if he did, Korea could hug his brother like this, too, and their entire country could be happy and healthy, like they'd always dreamed.

"Cauterization," Kangwon murmured against his brother's ushanka. He wasn't sure if he heard it, but he had to be thinking it, too.

From the corner of his eye, he could see Korea's expression soften, just enough that only one of their family could've caught it.

It said what words or sign language never would.

North and the long string of little brothers he's lost. Kangwon and the childish exuberance that only the thought of free healthcare can bring out.

I have survived another earthquake. Now I can do my clarification for the test flights in November. Korean civilians and soldiers, and Chinese soldiers reported strange flights over the northeast and west during that month, and a captured pilot later said they were test flights. So they weren't contagious, but were more designed to find out how bacterial carriers would spread once dropped. I can't find anything that specifically says insects were being tested at this time, and the first confirmed reports aren't until January, when the real flights took place. So I'm only saying beetles were tested once during this period to be safe. Did I just really want to have the menacing drop scene as foreshadowing, and beetles were much more dramatic than leaflets or toilet paper? Yes. But I'm being honest about it, so it's okay.

Her Shackles Are Different Than My Own

Hwang held the back of his bandaged hand to his forehead. It felt warm, but that could very well simply be because the underground office he was in was stuffy.

Next he took his pulse, counting the way Kangwon had instructed him to. Ninety-five beats per minute was in the average, but a tad quick for him, and irregular. But ever since Hae had been transferred to the hospital, he felt that his heart had been beating anomalously. It was why he had to monitor his stomach extra carefully. Was it sloshing around from illness, or concern over his sister? Right now, he decided it was the latter.

Finally, he took out the small blush compact of Hae's. He had attempted to bring it to her in the hospital, knowing that being able to spread make-up on her cheeks and admire herself in the small reflective surface would cheer her up, but Kangwon had refused him entry, and advised instead that he keep it to reassure himself.

Hwang had never quite understood the reasoning behind keeping objects to remind you of a person when they were no replacement for the person themselves. But he had to admit that being able to run his thumb over the tiger embossed on the silver casing did provide some small comfort.

Perhaps it was just the calming repetition, similar to rewriting the draft of the speech he was working on for tomorrow's joint meeting of People's Committee chairmen and Party officials for the fourth time.

He would get back to that. First he had to check his face.

The cheek exposed by the bandages was concave, but that was usual. He was also pale since his flag base was white, obviously. His eyes were perchance the slightest bit bloodshot, but he could attribute that to late nights and rubbing them as he tried not to think about Hae's condition. The dark circles likely came from that as well.

All in all, he would need to freshen up before tomorrow's meeting, but he didn't believe he was sick. At least not yet.

Hwang let out a long exhale as he closed the compact, setting it on the corner of his desk as he picked his pencil back up to finish the final draft, eternally grateful he still had no major burns on his dominant palm, just a few that pinched between his fingers.

With the positioning of their provinces compared to the areas hit by possible germ warfare so far, he and his sister were the most likely to develop sympathetic fevers, alongside South Pyongan, the Kangwons, and Korea himself, of course. But Hwang knew that between his travelling through villages to the POW camps at the border, his interactions with the prisoners there, as well as his work with students and refugees around Pyongyang and Hwanghae, he was the most at risk of developing an actual ailment. Even before the dreadful business of this second wind of germ warfare, he had been conducting these health checks, though slightly less obsessively.

Hae was at risk, too, with the amount of socialization she sought out, and her admittedly lax health standards. Hwang should have told her to be more careful. He should have instructed her to wear a mask, and not to eat anything she found, and realized she had been giving away her rations to that dog, and-

He sighed, setting his pencil down, removing his glasses to rub at his eyes again.

There was no point in dwelling on things that had already transpired. But he couldn't stop himself from dwelling on what could transpire, and no matter how hard he thought on the matter, he couldn't think of a more comprehensible word for his speech than 'bespeaks,' and he had no Hae to turn to to ask for one, or to inquire whether she thought it was clear enough.

Hwang swept his papers aside, regretted it, and picked them up, arranging them neatly in the ‘Party work’ stack to be returned to later. Then he removed more from the 'POW work' pile to peruse, along with Kangwon’s copied notes on the biological warfare.

Part of his work was to inform the POWs of the germ warfare their own government was engaging in, emphasizing that any pandemic would likely wreak havoc in the camps were it to spread. Which was true. It showed an astounding lack of care for their own captured soldiers on the American military’s part, though it made sense. The more prisoners that died in their camps, the worse they would look.

But he needed to be cautious with what he shared. Hwang wholeheartedly believed Kangwon and Korea’s conclusion was right- America had undoubtedly used germ warfare last year, so there was no reason he wouldn’t use it again, especially with more time to refine his methods, and now knowing that the other nations didn’t seem to care about the truth of the matter. Yet he didn’t want to share half a story to American prisoners only to be called a liar if any facts turned out to be wrong in the future.

Korea had informed him that they’d shot down two American pilots back on the 13th that appeared to have been involved in the drops, and were in the process of convincing them to divulge information on their work. Hwang didn’t entirely trust a prisoner of war not to simply say what he knew his captors wanted to hear, but they should be able to get at least the seeds of truth out of them.

A pity he couldn't be the one to interview them. Korea didn’t want the influence of a Provincehuman associated with any account they gave, but Hwang wanted to know the exact specifics of everything. How the pilots had transported the flies, mosquitoes, voles, beetles, and other creatures, what they had been told about their cargo, how they had infected them.

China had mentioned sending scientists from his country to work with their own to run more tests on the captured specimens to find out the specifics of the bacteria, as they had with the mollusks Hae had brought back.

They had been positive, of course. Meretrix meretrix, contaminated with Vibrio cholerae. Quite normal, unlike everything else about the situation.

And targeted, if he had to say. Hwang could see no other purpose for dropping them near a running river.

He let out a burdened sigh. All chains of thought led back to the prison of worrying about his sister, it seemed.

Luckily, he was saved by the door opening.

Hwang looked up to see a white, red, and olive blob, and slid his glasses back on, seeing it was someone he'd been meaning to speak with lately.

“SH?”

She was dressed in her officer’s uniform, unlike him in his Party suit, and her white brows were slightly furrowed. “Korea wants us.”

Alarm brought Hwang to his feet, hands on his desk. “Did he say for what?”

SH blew a puff of air. “No. But it’s not Hae. I got him to say that much.”

That was good, but still worrisome. It sounded like a work matter, but the only sphere the two of them tended to collaborate in was information and publicity, and if something was urgent enough to pull them away from finalizing their speeches for the joint meeting-

Ah. There was another thing they were both involved in.

Hwang lurched forward, then back, stuffing all his papers in his briefcase, not forgetting to grab Hae’s compact before hustling after SH, making sure to lock the office door, though it was now empty.

“I wish he wouldn’t do this to us,” he fretted as they hurried down the underground halls of the local Party headquarters. “Would it kill him to offer even vague assurance about what he wants to discuss?”

“You know,” SH said, dodging around a man carrying a stack of paper taller than him. “I think it would.”

They found Korea in the abandoned Party Foundation building, which he seemed to enjoy using for clandestine meetings. Likely because no one could overhear it if he decided to yell at them.

Hwang had realized another worry on the way over. Korea hadn’t been predicted to return from the field until tonight. Something had been important enough to summon him back to Pyongyang early.

As soon as they burst into the office, Hwang blurted, “Is it Choi- I mean, him?”

To his alarm, Korea dipped his head. Hwang didn’t relax until he said, “He’s fine.”

“You could have led with that,” SH pointed out, hand over her heart.

“You didn’t give me the chance,” their Countryhuman said, but without his usual snap.

A serious matter then. Hwang wouldn’t rub his chest just yet.

“He has intel for us.”

Korea sounded slightly reluctant as he said the words, and didn’t immediately follow up. The provinces didn’t prompt him, knowing he would speak when he felt like it, though Hwang sometimes wanted to shake him when he did this.

After what felt like far too long, he *‘tch’*ed. “Or he could. He says he believes he can get information on who our leak is.”

SH perked at that, though Hwang said, “I assume there’s a catch.”

“Yes.” Korea ground his jaw.

“The Yankee woman has it.”

—

SH's eyes widened alongside Hwang's as they exchanged glances, and she bit down on saying Grace's name.

"How does he know that?" Hwang asked immediately.

Korea didn't look pleased as he said, "He told her he's our operative."

Hwang gaped, and SH put a hand over her mouth.

She hadn't known Choi Jung-nam well, but he'd been an informant of theirs for years, and involved in the anti-Japanese struggle for just as long. He should know better than to just tell someone he was a spy.

"I'll admit he wasn't exactly the most subtle as a young man," Hwang said, echoing her shock. "But he grew over the years. I refuse to believe he would reveal himself so carelessly."

"At least not without a good reason," SH added.

"Here it is." Korea pulled a paper from his pocket, tossing it across the desk. "You decide if it's good or not."

His tone said what he thought about it.

Hwang snatched it up before SH could, eyes scanning the entire thing in just a few seconds before passing it to her.

"He's aware of her abuse," he said grimly.

SH snatched the letter, reading the frantic, messy handwriting as fast as possible. The message was personal enough that it had to have been handed off to another agent personally, not left in a dead drop.

'Can get info on problem. E-' She guessed that was Grace's codename. 'Has it. Got close, made friends. He hits her, she wants away. Told her my mission, says she knows a mutual friend. Wants to meet me somewhere. She'll give me intel if I get her out. Want to get her out. Can we trust her?'

At the bottom, in large, slanted characters like it had been added last minute, it read, 'SHE LOOKS LIKE MY DAUGHTER.'

"I suppose that's the issue with field agents," Hwang was saying, pinching the bridge of his nonexistent nose. "You need to strike a balance between someone good-hearted enough to want us to be victorious, but ruthless enough not to throw the mission away out of compassion."

"It doesn't sound like it's thrown yet," SH said, setting the letter down.

"No, but it will be once he lets her lure him into a trap."

"That's what I want your input on," Korea interrupted. "Do we risk letting him meet with her on her terms?"

"No," SH said immediately. "It's too dangerous."

Hwang frowned at her for a second before looking at Korea. "I know my previous words would make you think my answer would differ, but I think we should."

SH's brows shot up. "You just said it's probably a trap."

"It is," her cousin admitted. "But it's a risk we need to take."

"He could die."

Hwang's jaw ticced. "I am aware. But we can't pass up the chance for information on our leak."

"I don't think she'd even have information like that," SH pointed out. "I'm sure she's picked up on some things that would be worthwhile, but the identity of what has to be a high-level operative?"

She'd been willing to chance that Grace might slip up and tell Choi Jung-nam something she shouldn't, or been desperate enough for company to invite him into America's base. But the idea that she would risk her Countryhuman's wrath to tell him directly, or that she'd have the exact information they needed…

“We’d be risking a comrade for nothing.”

“Not nothing,” Hwang said sharply. “This leak has likely been responsible for the attempted abduction of North Pyongan- which resulted in several comrades being injured- as well as, I suspect, the placement of those clams.”

He swung to Korea. "Mollusks infected with Vibrio cholerae could taint a body of still water, but not a river like the Taedong. I believe that they were purposefully left at the fork where we gather water, either to tempt us into eating them or in an attempt to contaminate our drinking water in specific. This, along with the ambush on North Pyongan, implies that the location of our bunker has been compromised and our movements are being watched, likely by this very operative.”

Korea’s jaw feathered. “I agree. I’ve ordered more soldiers to be stationed nearby in case of aerial attack.”

“And I assure you I’m not coming solely from a place of emotion, but they helped poison my sister,” Hwang stressed, looking back to SH. “She’s recovering from her illness, but what if she wasn’t? Or what if North Pyongan hadn’t been able to fight off his would-be kidnappers? What if one of us isn’t able to next time?”

He looked back to Korea, laying a hand on the desk. “I don’t wish for anything to happen to our comrade. But this is what we sent him to do, and we agreed the risk of speaking with the target was worth it. We can’t allow compassion or personal feelings to compromise the mission.”

SH made a frustrated sound. “That’s not what I’m doing. I’d be willing to risk him if I thought there was less of a chance of it being a trap, but there isn’t.”

Grace was being abused, yes. But even if she had fully woken up to that and wanted to leave America, why would she want to help them? The only reason she’d helped SH with the holding camp layout was because the province had manipulated her emotions with that sketch of a family.

SH felt pity for the girl carved from marble and obsidian that had talked about being cursed and cried into her breast, with bruises on her creamy skin, and big, childlike eyes that had gazed at that picture so tenderly.

But she felt no pity for the Yankee that had called her people's skin 'exotic,' referred to the prison yards as holding pens, and spoke so blithely of the destruction of their country.

Grace might be a scared, lonely, trapped woman. But before that, she was an American.

Hwang sighed, tapping the desk. "I will admit our comrade's judgement is likely being hampered by emotion in his desire to help her. We can see that by how he appears to have told her his allegiances solely based on her story of abuse, and how he compares her to his daughter. I doubt a Caucasian American woman looks anything like a half-Korean, half-Japanese one."

No, but SH did know what he meant. She hadn't looked anything like Eonni after all.

"But do you think America would truly permit her to open up about what he does to her, even as a ploy?" her cousin asked. "Surely there would have been better ways to lower our comrade's guard, ones that didn't compromise his image. You yourself told me he seemed to care about that."

SH crossed her arms. "I just find it hard to believe she would suddenly turn on America after tolerating him for so long."

Grace had came to her with that bruise in November. It had been over a year of her being mistreated by her Countryhuman, and things had almost definitely gotten worse once she wasn't around witnesses in Gyeongmudae.

"Why would she only want to leave now?"

"Maybe she wanted to leave before," Korea said. "And our comrade is just finally giving her a chance."

SH turned her head to him so fast her neck cracked. He gazed back at her with an unreadable look before looking away.

"Make up your minds. Once a decision is made, we need to move fast."

Hwang tapped his chin, thinking, and SH's eyes fell to the letter again, finding that line.

'Says she know a mutual friend.'

She wondered if those had been his words, or if that was how Grace had described her. A friend.

Big blue eyes turned gunmetal grey in the moonlight, and a child's awed whisper. 'You actually drew me.'

Suddenly, shame cascaded through her entire body with the force of a flood, dousing the dark thing. Or at least making it retreat.

"It is true that the timing seems coincidental," Hwang admitted. "To suddenly attempt to leave now-"

"No," SH cut him off firmly. "She couldn't leave before. She didn't have a chance."

Hadn't she thought that while in captivity? That there was no way for Grace to escape? That she was trapped, at America's mercy? And she'd just told herself that would have only gotten worse.

Grace no longer had even the thin walls and full rooms of Gyeongmudae to protect her. She was alone with America, constantly monitored by guards. It was a miracle she'd been able to speak with Choi Jung-nam to tell him what she had at all, or that he'd managed to make contact with her in the first place. And yes, that could be another sign that it was a set-up, and that America had allowed it.

But if it wasn't, it meant Grace was desperate enough to risk trying to escape. And there was nowhere else to escape to. Anyone in South's puppet government would turn her over to America immediately, and she couldn't speak Korean to ask a civilian for help. She also couldn't risk going to another Yankee. All of the ones surrounding her were her Countryhuman's butchers, ready to assault and kill at his order. Her own country was full of them, too, full of greedy sick people that would turn her over in a heartbeat for a few dollars. SH knew it had been foolish to plead with the nurse to go home and help her people. She would find no freedom across the sea. Even if she made it back to America, Grace was trapped.

Caged.

"We should trust her," SH said firmly.

Hwang arched an eyebrow. "Did you just receive some new information I'm unaware of?"

No. She'd just realized she couldn't let the dark thing's growling drown out her own compassion.

It didn't matter if Grace was American before she was a woman. SH was a Korean and a revolutionary before she was one, and she wasn't like the foreigners. If she could help give another woman the chance to fly, she had to try, even if they were a Yankee.

Grace had given her hers in Gyeongmudae after all.

"Our comrade should be careful," SH said, ignoring Hwang. "But I think he should meet with her, if he can."

"Okay, well." Hwang blinked in confusion. "I concur. As I said several times."

"Then I will get word to him." Korea pocketed the letter.

SH watched him carefully, attempting to discern what he thought about their decision. But his face was still as unreadable as his voice.

"Will we actually attempt to rescue the target?" Hwang asked, pushing his glasses up.

"We have to now," their Countryhuman responded, showing a tint of irritation. “And soon. Otherwise she could just tell America about our operative.”

“Which would also jeopardize her own safety,” Hwang pointed out. “She would almost definitely have to divulge why she knew who he was in the first place."

“But she’d be scared,” SH countered. “So she probably would tell him everything.” She looked to Korea. “I know we had a good source with our comrade, but maybe we should just recall him?”

Her cousin pursed his lips. “He could still get us intelligence once she’s safely away.”

SH shook her head decisively. “America won’t just let her get away. He’ll track down everywhere she went, everyone she even could have talked to. He won’t stop until he gets her back.”

She’d had ‘clients’ that would grow jealous and bitter when their acquaintances told them they’d slept with her, too. They would take it out on her, demanding to tell them she’d never sleep with the other again, and to say she was theirs.

Her stomach surged unsteadily as the thing behind the wall returned in full force, panting darkly. Hwang gave her a concerned glance.

And that had just been men paying for her body, who had no claim on her. Part of her job educating peasants was to look for signs of domestic abuse in the women isolated out in the countryside with no one but their husband, bringing them the word that divorce was legal now, and helping them seek it if it was needed. And more than once she had to call in protection when their ex-husbands came after them, not content with the law declaring them free. The men didn’t love their wives, didn’t see them as anything other than son-bearers and slave labour. But they did see them as theirs.

Grace was America’s woman. And men didn’t take losing what was ‘theirs’ well. A country like him wouldn’t be the exception.

She would give anything to see his face when he lost Korea.

"If our comrade stays after she's gone, America will find him," she said to the other two. "And then he will find his family. We can't protect them in Japan."

Hwang adjusted his glasses, looking slightly guilty. "Ah, yes. I didn't consider that complication. Perhaps it might be best if this is his last mission then."

Korea's foot tapped behind the desk for a few moments, then he said, "Fine. The order will be to get the intel, then get the target and himself to a handler who will transport them north."

"Once he gets here, could we get his family's address and arrange for transportation for them out of Japan?" Hwang beat SH to asking. "I don't need to remind you of our comrade's wife's trustworthiness, I hope?"

Korea lip twitched. "I won't abandon her. Or their children and their families. But we're trying to cut down on non-productive workers, and we're tight on resources as it is. I'll-"

Korea lost the battle to his facial muscles, his lip curling in a grimace as he reluctantly finished, "Arrange with CCCP to have them stay in the Soviet Union until the war is over."

Hwang bobbed his head, satisfied, but SH hid her own face scrunch.

She didn't dislike the idea of going to the Soviet for things as much as Korea did (not possible), but she couldn't help but feel like the more help he gave, the more strings he had to tie around them. It didn't matter If he didn't want a puppet. Like she had told China, CCCP was still one of the countries that wanted something from them.

'He'll have just as much luck as America.'

"What about the target?" Hwang asked. "Will we keep her? A nurse with Western medical knowledge could come in handy, especially with recent events."

"No," SH said before Korea could. "We can find her somewhere else safe. She doesn't belong in Korea."

She wanted to give Grace her chance, to free her from her cage. But her thoughts on where she should fly after hadn't changed.

Korea nodded. "I don't want an American anywhere near our sick or injured. For all we know, this could all be a set-up to get her into our hospitals and infect more people."

SH didn't entirely trust Grace, but that was still a little…

She exchanged a look with Hwang, raising her brows. 'Do you want to say it?'

He inclined his head. 'You may have the honour.'

"A bit paranoid," she said out loud to Korea.

"We shot down another pilot who we are almost certain was engaging in germ warfare," he replied blankly. "And may I remind you that three days ago, more masses of flies, fleas, spiders, and mites were found in Pyonggang County. I am not letting any Yankees anywhere near our hospitals."

"A fair point," Hwang admitted.

SH's brows furrowed. "Is Kangwon okay?" Pyonggang County was one of his, and she hadn't seen him since then.

"He hasn't reported any fever yet." Korea eyed them both, like he could see into their immune systems. "How do you feel?"

"I'm healthy, by my examinations," Hwang said immediately. "If any of the people in my province are sick, it isn't a great enough number for it to affect my body-"

He bent his head with a sudden cough, clearly biting off 'Yet.'

"No fever, Korea," SH reported, anger broiling inside her, agitating the dark thing.

Between the joint meeting and Army Foundation Day, she would be going to her province to warn her people of the air drops. The bugs were horrifying to think about, but it was the other objects that made her blood burn.

It was bad enough when the Yankees were dumping non-infected things, foreign clothes and food with stupid little surrender slips and lying leaflets attached, trying to win their people over by acting like they were their saviours, like it was so benevolent of them to relieve their suffering when they were the reason they were suffering in the first place.

SH thought of America telling her it was a good thing he was here to stop people in Seoul from starving, like he was doing it to help and not trying to put their country in billions of dollars of debt to him, and making sure their people starved permanently.

'Good thing America is here to help, huh?'

She should have shoved that too-sweet chocolate down his throat while they were fighting, should have made him choke on it.

SH grit her teeth as the thing bared its fangs, before she realized Hwang was looking at her in concern again, and quickly painted American dollars on her wall, the edges singed and the flames coming off them a mix of gold and blood scarlet. It allowed her to straighten, giving Korea a smile.

He looked at her with that piercing look, like he knew what was churning inside her, but just said, "Good. Report to me the moment you feel one come on. If there are other symptoms, report directly to the Quarantine Hospital and Gangwon. Try to be discrete."

"It wouldn't be good for morale if our masses knew their Provincehumans were ill," Hwang dutifully repeated.

It was the reason they weren't telling anyone about Hae. Only they and maybe a few nurses in the hospital knew what the Yankees had done to her. And the General, of course.

The dark thing flipped and thrashed, but SH painted over it to ask Korea, “And what about you? Have you felt any fever?”

“No,” he clipped, like every time she’d asked last year.

“And if you do get one, will you tell us?”

“There’s no point,” he said bluntly. “Telling you wouldn’t make it go away.”

“Yes, but-“ SH sighed, knowing there was no point in finishing her own sentence.

She wasn’t sure how the sympathetic fevers worked, whether if a province had one it meant the Countryhuman would, too, or if it was a percentage thing. Even if enough people in her province were sick to make her sick, maybe there wouldn’t be enough in the country to make Korea sick.

Hwang had already begged him for an answer, but he refused to give it because somehow having a fever that they all had because of something they couldn’t control would make him weak, presumably. They would likely never know the answer for sure because of that. Kangwon might, but his ‘patient confidentiality’ face could win money in a card game.

“Just stay healthy,” SH advised instead.

“Don’t tell me what to do. Now I need to go pass my instructions on to our comrade’s handler.”

Korea brushed past them, but paused abruptly at the door.

“Did Kangwon say anything to you about Hae’s condition?”

“He won’t let me visit her,” SH said. It saddened her, but she knew it was for the best. They couldn’t chance more of them getting sick. “But he says she’s recovering well. He said she says ‘Howdy,’ and wanted to know if we’re all healthy.”

Hwang nodded. “He said much the same to me. He purports she’ll be better at the end of next month, or perhaps mid-March.” He frowned slightly. “Why are you asking?”

Korea's eye flicked between the two of them for a second. "I just wanted to know."

Before either of them could say anything else, he whisked out of the room.

SH sighed, leaning her palms back against the chilly desk. Hwang mimicked her.

"What are you willing to bet he's not sleeping when him and Kangwon are in the field?" she asked him.

"Absolutely nothing," he replied. "Only a fool takes a bet he knows he'll lose."

SH sighed again, tipping her head back. Korea hadn't been back to the bunker since Hae had gotten sick, and probably wouldn't be until any pandemic was averted.

'If it's averted,'* her thoughts muttered darkly, and the thing growled.

Painting, painting. Dead soldiers with pallid skin and rice water vomit crusted around their slack lips, like the kind Kangwon had said came out of Hae.

She wasn't sure if she or China was more put out by her Countryhuman's absence. The Chinese man had been absent, too, so she had a feeling Korea's presence was really the only reason he slept at the bunker. And since he was sending those scientists over, she would paint away any suspicion at that.

"I also wouldn't bet against him not eating," Hwang said, rubbing his face. "Even with Kangwon's presence. Our cousin doesn't usually have the wherewithal to force him into self-care."

"Not unless he gets down on his knees," SH muttered.

"Beg pardon?"

Right! She wasn't supposed to tell anyone about the time she'd walked in on that.

“Kangwon’s focused his efforts on trying to make sure Korea doesn’t die of gangrene,” she said, pretending she didn’t see Hwang’s intensely curious expression. “Which means we need to get him to do the other things.”

Her cousin accepted he wasn’t getting an answer, and nodded sagely. “The united front, as it were. Though you’re the only one I’ve ever seen successfully convince Korea to eat.”

“Sang has,” SH pointed out. “And Hae and North Pyongan. And Kangwon, too, actually." Without the embarrassing begging she hadn't been supposed to see. "And South Pyongan got him to drink that moonshine that one time.”

Holding up a finger, Hwang said, “Correction- you’re the only one I’ve seen manage to convince him to eat when he doesn’t want to.”

“Korea never wants to eat.”

“Yes,” Hwang agreed. “But sometimes he doesn’t want to eat because he feels like he shouldn’t want to, and sometimes he doesn’t want to eat because he truly doesn’t.”

SH had thought almost the same thing before. Korea was that way about a lot of things. She could still remember that night in the village at the foot of Chilbosan, when she’d held her hand out to him, and the way he'd looked at it before denying her.

But it was sort of shocking to hear those thoughts echoed from Hwang.

“That’s surprisingly emotionally intelligent of you to notice,” she appraised.

“I’m quoting Hae,” he admitted.

That was why the words sounded familiar. They were SH’s thoughts. She’d said them to her little cousin when she first asked why Korea didn’t eat much.

“And when it’s the latter, you are the only one of us I’ve seen sway him,” Hwang continued.

"You all could if you tried." SH didn't do anything special to convince their Countryhuman to do things. She just refused to back down when he got growly. They all knew he wasn't actually going to follow through on any of his threats, so there wasn't any reason to cower.

Even North Hamgyong could convince Korea to eat. He'd just never care enough to try.

SH flexed her fists, pushing off the desk. "We should get back to work. I have a painting to finish by tonight."

The halls were dim, all the other offices locked in their disuse. Hwang hustled after her as they made their way down them.

"I've never quite understood why you dodge compliments," he said, pushing his glasses up. "I think it's quite impressive you have the spine to push through when he gets as he does."

SH didn't really know why she was dodging this compliment either. She just…

'I'd rather be able to convince him to eat by making him something he'd want to.'

She had never given up on her original reason for wanting to cook. But at his rate, she would never learn how. All those years during the Occupation, they'd never had enough food for her to waste learning. And when they finally had, Kim Jong-suk had passed before she could give her the lessons she had promised. And then the war came, and even after they won, it would be years of recovery before they would have enough resources that she wouldn't feel guilty wasting meats or spices.

"How long is your speech for tomorrow?" she asked blithely. "I want to make sure I didn't overwrite mine."

"You never over or underwrite," Hwang answered immediately, adding before she could speak again, "It's one of the things I admire about you, alongside your previously mentioned forcefulness."

SH pursed her lips at the word. She really didn't want to bring up the topic, but the tension inside her had been building for months. So as they reached the entry hall, she stopped, prompting Hwang to look back at her.

“Don’t pretend you admire my ‘forcefulness,’” she said, keeping her voice light. “You’ve been eyeing me since Hungnam. You’re scared I’m going to snap again.”

For an entire year, whenever the thing scratching at the wall made her voice lower or her teeth grit, her cousin would give her those furrowed brows and side-eye.

His cheeks dusted violet where his flush reached his ice blue flower. “I wouldn’t say I’m scared, and I don’t consider you to have ‘snapped.’ You gave into a perfectly reasonable fit of emotion. I recall telling you I had my own.”

Alone, with no eyes to judge. And when he said he’d given in to hysterics, she just knew he meant tears and hyperventilating. If she had done that, it would have been forgivable. Tears and tearing at her clothes would have painted her as unreliable just as much, but they were expected from a woman.

But SH didn’t want to cry. She had never wanted to cry. All those times she’d pressed herself into the corner and covered her body in clothes to protect it, and sobbed into her hands it had been because she’d wanted to scream instead, to smash those sakura cups and rip the fine silks apart at the seams, to rend the next man that tried to use her limb from limb and rage.

But she never could because she knew it would make her undesirable, and only put her more in debt. The pressure had built and built until she had to cry because if she didn’t, the next pig that fell asleep on her arm wouldn’t wake up.

“And I don’t look at you like you’re about to blow someone’s brains out,” SH said tightly.

“In my defense-“ Hwang saw her narrowed eyes and seemed to think better. “Ahem.”

“Yes, ‘ahem.” SH painted the dark thing back with a pistol that hadn’t been just out of reach, firming her tone. “I was angry, Hwang. I’d just had to walk through the ruins of a city I lived in for years and governed for even longer. I had to climb over the wreckage of buildings I knew, that I helped oversee being built, and see my people homeless and dead.”

Her fists squeezed as she remembered those rows and rows of white corpse shrouds, still so many even after all that time, and the thing’s weight made the fresh paint crack as the wall bulged.

“I had a right to be angry,” she said, struggling to keep her voice calm. “I’m not going to let you make me feel ashamed of that.”

Her cousin had been watching her with raised brows since her first statement.

“I’ve never heard you use that word or any of its synonyms for yourself before,” he said, then shook his head. “I mean, I’m sorry, SH. I never meant to make you feel as if I was judging you.”

He straightened up, putting his fist over his chest. “I saw Hungnam fall. There is no reaction you could have had that would be disproportional to me. I wouldn’t have reacted the way you did, but in a way… that makes me envious.”

SH blinked. That was the last thing she’d expected to hear.

“Envious?”

Her cousin nodded, removing his glasses to polish them on his lapel. “I’ve always been envious of your passion, and your fortitude. If I had half of it, I wouldn’t have spent so long being a cog in the machine during the Occupation.”

They hadn’t helped SH.

“It’s why I was thrilled when Korea said you would be joining me in information work.”

“And Sang,” SH said automatically.

“Yes.” Hwang’s slender throat bobbed. “And Sang. The same qualities that make you so skilled at convincing Korea to take care of himself will serve just as well for our people.”

He slid his glasses back over his eyes, tightening the chain as he looked at her in the light coming through the small glass windows flanking the door.

“That’s why I’m truly not judging you for Hungnam. The only way I would think you had something to be ashamed of was if you hadn’t backed down from killing that prisoner.”

‘Agree to disagree.’

“Then why have you been looking at me that way?” she asked, frustrated.

Hwang shifted on his feet. “The last time I tried to speak about it, you choked me with my tie.”

SH took a step back, out of reach. “Why?”

“You’ve been acting… uncharacteristically uncharitable lately,” he said delicately.

SH bristled at that. “I haven’t.”

She’d been nothing but charitable, though Korea didn’t like them calling it that. She had been giving half her rations away even before the joint decision, and now with Hae in the hospital, she was collaborating with Hwang to make sure the old woman she’d been helping look after was taken care of. And unlike her actually uncharitable brother, she hadn’t been lying about it.

“What would you call your initial decision about Grace Hartman?” he challenged. “You should have been leaping at the chance to get her out of America's grasp, even if it was almost certainly a trap. I've never known you to look the other way from a woman in peril.”

“I would if it would jeopardize an operation,” SH said defensively.

She would hate it, but she would.

"But this case involved the possibility of the operation succeeding," her cousin pointed out. "We approved Ch- him talking to her to retrieve information that she possibly had. That, combined with freeing her, should have been enough to prevent any major hesitation from you."

SH crossed her arms. "If she was one of ours, or some other woman, I wouldn't have hesitated. But she's a Yankee."

"Precisely." Hwang gestured at her. "I've never known you to show prejudice against even Japanese women, yet you're showing it against an American one."

SH had never been able to look at Japanese women the same way she did their men because she knew their situation wasn't any different from Korean women's. Tens of thousands of them had been forced into sexual slavery alongside theirs, kidnapped from lower class neighbourhoods, sold by parents to pay a debt, or willingly volunteered because they'd been told that giving their bodies to their soldiers was patriotic and served their country, and they had no other way to do that as a woman. The Japanese comfort women had been victims just as much as the Korean comfort women, and the Japanese women forced to sell themselves even before that had been forced to do it for the same reasons as Korean women- because they lived in a society that didn't see them as people, that hated them.

Yes, some Japanese women had looked away or been complicit. But so had some Korean women. The rich ones, the bourgeois, the ones that had never had to worry about missing their next meal or calculating how much their flesh was worth. They were victims of the patriarchy, too, but they didn't even realize it, and they lauded it for the 'protections' they had, disdaining the women that didn't share them.

'I would never do that, that could never be me.' But it could. If their husband died, or lost interest and cut his oldest concubine loose for a new one with fewer wrinkles, they could easily end up like the women on the streets, or following soldiers to their camps.

Or like SH.

Yankee women were different. No matter how chained they were, they all saw themselves as free, like Grace thoughtlessly recounting how her parents had to take out loans to send her to nursing school, or how most of her friends had to drop out to get married, giving up their hopes and dreams for a man that would treat them like a slave, not ever seeing anything wrong with it.

They did exactly what America wanted them to- ignored their chains and the way they were seen as just another household object, ignored that the small freedoms they did have came at the expense of women in other countries that had to die to give them their rich husbands and the status they only gained in wartime and that still wasn't anywhere near that of a man's.

Most of the Japanese women SH had ever met or heard of were poor, prostitutes, or dishonoured, like Choi Jung-nam's wife. And almost all of them had sympathized with Korea's plight, with Korean women's plight, because it was theirs, too. In a way, they were colonized, just like them.

They didn't all feel that way, of course. Plenty of them, no matter how low they were, would always see a Korean as lower. But SH would say with confidence that they were the exception.

It was the other way around with the Yankees. Some would care, some would see a Korean woman as a sister. But they were the exception. The majority of them were like Grace. No matter how nice or friendly they were, the women that had to suffer overseas for their country's conquest were too foreign, too 'exotic' to truly see as people.

Like all Yankees, so long as one could pretend she was free, it didn't matter if others weren't.

But despite the thoughts stabbing at the dark thing like branding irons, SH said stiffly, "I changed my mind, didn't I? I do want her to be free from America. That's why I changed it."

"You usually wouldn't have had to change it," Hwang stressed.

“I’m worried you’re letting your resentment of the Americans colour your perspective.”

“They deserve to be resented,” she replied acidicly, seeing the shattered remains of their chosonjip, and Hae’s strained face as she climbed into the Jeep.

“Perhaps,” he said. “Yet you and I are members of the Worker’s Party. We need to be more enlightened than the average layperson, and attempt to approach decisions with as few biases as humanly possible. At least negative ones.”

SH crossed her arms tighter, fingers digging into the bandages under her uniform.

It was hard to argue when she knew he was right. She knew from the shame that had filled her that her initial response had been wrong. She had felt knee-jerk suspicion and hadn’t considered why or done any self-criticism over it. But she wasn’t a reactionary, she wasn’t a Yankee, and she couldn’t let her personal feelings interfere with government matters. And she wouldn’t be the same as those foreign women.

“And…” Hwang wrapped his fingers protectively around his tie. “More than that, I’m truly concerned over your relationship with North Hamgyong.”

“Don’t be,” SH said tightly, both relieved and dismayed at the change of topic. “It’s the same as it’s always been.”

“I think that is simultaneously half true and half not, which is what worries me.” Her cousin adjusted his glasses, noticeably not releasing his tie. “Your bickering has always been… more hostile than most, but I find your recent complete refusal to acknowledge each other makes me even more uneasy.”

After that day on the road, SH had made sure to ignore her brother at breakfast and dinner, the two times they were forced to see each other, even biting her tongue when he made one of his doom and gloom predictions about Hae and everyone they knew dying of cholera. And after tomorrow, when they went to their provinces, they would take separate vehicles.

Kangwon had enough to worry about. He didn't need to add stitching North Hamgyong back together after she was done with him.

No, she didn't want to hurt her brother. He wanted to hurt her. She just wasn't going to let him have the satisfaction anymore. She could see the little glances he gave her after making a pessimistic comment, trying to rile her up again, even after what he'd almost said last time.

He wanted an excuse to say it, she knew. Even with what the consequences would be.

So she simply wasn't going to give him one.

"Yes, that expression right there makes me uneasy," Hwang said, angling his tie away from her, then realizing what he was doing and facing her again.

"Why don't you talk to North Hamgyong?" SH retorted. "He's the one that always starts things."

"I've attempted to," Hwang sighed. "But some of us still share the view that men shouldn't speak about emotional matters."

"Let me guess," SH said scathingly. "He said 'Men don't talk about that shit,' right?"

Her cousin inclined his head. "A direct quote. And some of us aren't good at discussing emotional matters in general, and also lack the fortitude to press the matter."

"There's no matter to press," SH told him. "We're fine. Speaking of not letting personal feelings jeopardize operations, that's what we're doing."

"Letting things simmer doesn't solve anything," Hwang said. "The pot will only boil."

"I'm not taking advice from someone that just said he wasn't good with emotional matters," SH sniped, then sighed. "I'm sorry, that was uncalled for."

"It's fine." Hwang straightened his tie, only making it more crooked. "I'm just worried for you. The both of you. I care for the two of you greatly." He cleared his throat in embarrassment. "And I don't like to see the rift between you widening even further."

Did he think she did? It was North Hamgyong's fault. Every time she'd tried to close the distance, he just pounded the ground until it cracked more.

"We've never had a good relationship," SH hedged.

Hwang hesitated. "What about in… your early years?"

SH tried to make a sarcastic quip. 'You can say before I started to-' But it wouldn't leave her mouth.

"It doesn't matter," she clipped. "I don't remember."

The way things had been didn't matter. Who cared if they'd been happy or not? All that mattered was what came after.

Hwang's lips flattened in disappointment. "I see."

SH let out a heavy exhale. "Look, Hwang. You're right- I've been off lately. It's the war. The constant pain, hunger, our people dying, these stupid talks, and now this germ warfare again."

And all of that just fed into the dark thing, making it pace faster, giving it sharper teeth, longer claws, thinning her wall and making it that no matter how many layers of paint she applied to it or a real canvas it was never enough.

But she couldn't tell him that. Then he'd really look at her like she was going to bite him.

"I'll try to stop letting it affect me. My decisions," she corrected when it looked like he was probably about to say something about boiling pots again.

He kissed his teeth. “That brings me some comfort at least. And I’ll try to stop casting you worried looks. But if I can’t, just know my worries aren’t about you snapping.”

SH wished he wouldn’t worry at all, that he’d just wipe that outburst from his memory like Hae could. But this was the next best thing.

She bit her lip, then said, “But there’s nothing I can do about North Hamgyong. We can’t all have Hae as our sibling.”

“I know.” He wrung his thin-fingered hands. “Though I still find it unfortunate.”

“We’re both going to be unfortunate if Korea finds out we’re loitering around,” SH said in a brighter voice, pasting a smile back on her face.

“Quite right. And I have speech to finish revising for the fourth time.”

Reluctantly, Hwang started for the door. SH tugged at the hem of her tunic.

Just as he reached for the handle, she said, “Wait. Have you… heard anything from that prisoner?”

“Why?” Hwang asked, almost warily.

“I just want to know if he told anyone about… all that.”

Looking relieved, he said, “If he’s told other prisoners, no one has mentioned it. He is in the camps, but I, ah, purposefully make sure he’s never chosen to speak with me.” He coughed lightly. “He could speak about the incident once he’s freed, but it shouldn’t be too much of an issue. It would look bad, yes, but it would also look good that another Provincehuman stepped in to stop you, and that you yielded. If we were forced to confront it, we could just made a statement saying you were under a huge amount of duress. Or-“

“No,” SH cut in sharply. “Don’t tell anyone that.”

"But-"

"Hwang." SH grabbed his shoulders, and his lightness let her accidentally push him up against the door. "Don't tell anyone about how I was acting. Please."

Hwang winced as his back hit the hard wood behind him, blinking in surprise. "It wouldn't be too detrimental to us. Generally it would only be foreigners that cared. And even they would have to admit that an emotional reaction is to be expected."

It was to be expected, because hysterics were expected from women. If SH had been a man, her outburst could have been ignored, or at least written away as protective fury. She would be a man seeking righteous vengeance against another man, even if they didn't think that man had deserved it.

But she was a woman. And the enemy would use her rage to paint her as weak and unstable. Women were too soft to lead, too irrational to make political decisions, too driven by emotion to be trusted to govern. Those were all things she'd heard as the Worker's Party rallied to free women from their chains and get more of them into the halls of power, sometimes from other comrades, sometimes from other women.

Emotion in men was lauded. When the General raised his voice, it was because he had something worth saying. Even when he showed softer emotions, his eyes tearing up on their Foundation Day or when he'd first returned to Korea, it was praised. He felt so deeply for their country that it didn't matter that men had been told for so long that tears were weakness. And when Korea gave himself over on stage like on their Foundation Day, screaming with righteous fury and passion, it only drew people towards him more.

Even stupid North Hamgyong's pissiness was admired. He was unpleasant and rude, but their civilians didn't complain as much as they should because it was expected from a tough man. He was strong and seemingly stoic, and that was all that mattered.

China had said 'Passion is rarely something to be apologized for.' And that should be true. But it wasn't for women. Tears were weakness, anger was instability, and passion was hysterics. It was unfair, and she wanted to work to change that, but it wasn't changed yet.

SH wasn't ashamed of her anger, not anymore. It was no less justified than Korea and the General's, and it was far more justified than North Hamgyong's. She wasn't the unstable one for wanting revenge on one of the monsters that had murdered her people. That man was, coming here to kill, trying to say he had nothing to do with it because he hadn't been flying a plane, like it wasn't a thousand times more unstable to calmly look men and women in the eyes on the ground of the country you were invading and pull the trigger yourself.

But their enemies wouldn't see it that way. If they used the excuse that she'd been overwhelmed with emotion when she had almost killed that Yankee prisoner, it would just give the people that thought women didn't deserve a place in politics or the army more ammunition. If not even a Provincehuman was above a 'woman's weakness,' then how could normal women be trusted?

SH knew Hwang couldn't understand that, and… She didn't want to express it to him. So she moved for the propaganda angle instead, still pinning him to the door.

"You've said before that we're an exemplar. Korea is one of the first countries in Asia to give female Provincehumans equal decision-making power with males, and if you don't count CCCP's eastern republics, we are the first to have the sort of change for human women that the Law on Sex Equality brought."

"Yes," Hwang agreed, wiggling under her grip. "China has now joined us, but for a time, our northern half was the only strictly Asian country to have the extent of progressive laws for women that we do. I'd make the argument that we have some of the most genuinely progressive laws in the world even now."

"Exactly." SH's fingers dug into his bony shoulders. "And a lot of those other countries don't want their women to have the same laws as we do. They'll look for any excuse to keep them in chains. Having a female province..." Her jaw worked, and she reluctantly admitted, "Almost commit a war crime, would be exactly what they wanted."

They could counter reactionaries and their complaints here, but they couldn't stop foreign countries from using her to justify holding their own women back.

"Please, Hwang," she begged, heart squeezing. "I don't want to be used to hurt other women."

Her cousin searched her face, then dipped his head.

"A reasonable concern," he said. One I didn't think of originally, but do share. My preferred method if that prisoner does goes public once the war is over would be to completely ignore any accusations anyways, with giving an excuse only being a secondary option. But with this new consideration, if we are forced to acknowledge it, we'll just make a statement that obviously a crime didn't happen if he's still living and breathing, and was treated well in our camps, and that with no proof they have no right to lodge an official accusation against us."

Hwang tapped his chin, considering. "And then we'll redirect by reminding them about all of the proof we do have for their crimes, such as those biological warfare plans found in Seoul last year, and the insects we're in the process of testing. I'm sure they'll be eager to drop the matter after that. In fact-" He cleared his throat. "Ah, anyhow, I'll see that we don't bring up your emotional state at all."

SH sighed in relief, hanging her head. "Thank you."

"It's no problem, really." Her cousin tentatively reached up to pat one of the hands gripping his shoulder. "Now could you please release me? You're pressure-pointing my collarbone."

SH hurriedly let him go. "Sorry."

"Another thing I admire." Hwang rubbed his shoulder. "Your grip strength. Now if that's all sorted, let's get back to work."

SH followed him from the building, blinking in the harsh white light piercing through the grey skies. It wasn't snowing, but the wind was whipping fiercely, stirring the powder already coating the ground into a frenzy, filling the air with white, and obscuring the offices across the street. She was warm in her general's uniform, but Hwang shivered in his suit jacket as they returned to the underground office.

"May I ask you a question?" Hwang asked as they entered the governmental district. He looked around, then whispered, "Do you think it was… clinical of me to have agreed to risking our comrade so swiftly?"

SH made sure there were only Public Security officers smoking on the street corner before murmuring, "No. We really do need to find out who that leak is."

It was awful that they had to risk a friend to do it, not to mention the countless other operatives they had to have. But it was necessary. America wouldn't settle at failing to steal North Pyongan and getting Hae sick. If he couldn't kidnap one of them to stretch the talks out even more, then he'd try and make them all sick. He'd try again and again, until he got what he wanted, the way men like him were so used to doing.

"But I feel as if I should have hesitated at least slightly." Hwang worried at the bandages on his hands. "I didn't stop to think about the complications in bringing his family from Japan if he were to be captured."

"Hwang." SH put a hand on his pointy elbow as they walked. "It's fine. I did. United front, remember? And the fact that you're worrying at all shows you're not clinical."

Hwang didn't look satisfied, but then his face lit up as he smacked his fist into his palm.

"Shows!" he cried with sudden enthusiasm. "Or demonstrates! SH, you're a genius."

He broke into a sudden hustle towards the the single-story building sheltering the entrance to the offices, his bodyguards jogging past SH a second later to catch up, all of them disappearing inside.

SH stopped to watch him go, bemused. 'Ooookay?'

She lingered in the street, letting the cold wash over her, the whirling snow icing her cheeks, trying to let it be a replacement for ice water. She would have a bath tonight, even if it snowed again.

She wasn't really satisfied either. Her emotions were swirling uneasily in her chest. Shame over her feelings around Grace, worry for Hae and Choi Jung-nam and Hwang and Kangwon and Korea and their people, hunger, that feeling towards her brother. Anger.

She was glad Hwang had stopped her from killing that prisoner. Korea and the General would have been displeased. But she couldn't help but wish she had succeeded. It rankled, knowing he was out there in one of their camps, that when he went home he could fill Yankee newspapers with words like 'unstable, hysterical, crazy bitch.'

That America could do worse.

And no matter what Hwang said, his concern still itched. He didn't get worried in the same way over Korea's outbursts. He was concerned for him, yes, but he didn't watch him like that.

SH's sigh came out as a cloud of mist.

That was the price she had to pay for getting angry as a woman. South Chungcheong had warned her.

Actually, that would be the worst part of the Yankee POW making a public accusation. Her cousin would find out. And unlike foreign newspapers, she couldn't avoid her.

At least she didn't have to worry about how Korea would react.

'Do you think we would be here right now if we hadn't been angry? Anger is the only correct way to feel.'

SH clung to that as she held out her hand, watching snowflakes catch against the blue fabric, seeing snow-white skin as limpid eyes gazed down at her own portrait, the face of someone experiencing her first genuine kindness in a long while.

Despite her conflicted feelings whirling like the scattered snow...

She really did hope Grace would be okay.

‘I am not free while any woman is unfree, even when her shackles are very different from my own.’
-Audre Lorde

A concept: SH drawing Y/N's portrait and having flashbacks of Grace. Then seeing it on her wall post-reveal of who her abuser was and hugging her very tightly.

This is weird, but I feel like part of SH’s anxiety around other countries is because she’s worried they’re going to assault Korea. But it’s a subconscious fear. If you confronted her about it she’d be aghast and ask why you’d even think that. The majority of her anxiety is Imperialism and the fact that every country that has interacted with Korea has wanted to exploit it, but when it comes to North personally, she harbours a secret fear he’s going to be sexually assaulted, which is not a fear she typically carries for men, though unlike certain people (South Chungcheong) she is fully empathetic to men that it does happen to. It’s just not her first thought. It’s because she subconsciously views North as a woman (or at least similar to her) because of that need for control that stems from lost autonomy she feels echoed from him. And if she’s alone in a room with a man, she’s on edge. So if North is alone with China, CCCP, Albania, or other male countries in the future, she is also on edge (though China is eventually taken off this list). ‘Something about him just rubs me the wrong way, but I don’t know what.’ subconscious desire to take North by the shoulders and ask him if someone tried to touch him inappropriately (he would beat her with his shoe if she asked him this)
I love SH because if you just read Safeway and Warring Pyongyang, you think she’s the most normal province. And then you read this and you realize she’s far more messed up inside than most of them …Maybe all of them. Her and North Hamgyong are top contenders for sure. (South Chungcheong isn’t messed up inside she’s my perfect princess. Ignore the racism and misogyny and misandry and-)

Ruminating On Corruption

"Fuck off."

Hwang raised his thin ass eyebrows. "I haven't even said anything yet."

Curling his lip at him, North Hamgyong said, "No, but I know what you're going to. I told you I'm not talking about emotional shit."

The bastard had been trying to pester him since the damn ration mess last month.

"You know nothing of the sort," his cousin said with the kind of snooty arrogance that had made North Hamgyong want to punch his glasses into his face back when it'd been real. And still kind of did. "Perhaps I simply came for a smoke, and to discuss today's meeting."

North Hamgyong rummaged in his pocket, pulling a hand-rolled cigarette from his case and slapping it into his hand. "This is the last one you're bumming off me. If you're going to keep smoking, commit and buy your own."

"I save money this way."

The stingy bastard had his own matches at least. He fumbled with the box, managing to get one into his gloved hand.

North Hamgyong snatched it, touching it to the back of his two front teeth, and striking the match head on the edge, staining his tongue with the taste of sulfur.

Smugly, he held the flickering flame out.

Hwang clicked his tongue as he cupped it with a hand, using it to light his smoke. "Bad for your enamel, if Kangwon is to be believed."

He wasn't.

North Hamgyong shoved the thought away. There wasn't crap he could do about it anyways.

He snorted. "I didn't brush them for six years. You think I have enamel left?"

South Hamgyong was an annoying nag that'd used to make him scrub his teeth with a pine twig every night. He'd tried to keep it up after she decided to be a fucking idiot, but after a few months it hadn't seemed worth it, and he'd switched to gargling ocean water. If she gave so little of a damn about her own body that she'd put it up for sale, then why should he give a damn about his either?

He scowled out at the dark forest beyond the bunker, taking a drag off his own cigarette.

The snow spiralled down in loose flakes, not enough to deter the damn planes. He could hear them buzzing off to southeast.

'Probably dropping more damn germ bombs.'

"You want to talk shop?" he grunted. "Go ahead."

He shouldn't have challenged him. He knew damn well why he was really here, but the four-eyes never missed the chance to talk about work.

"I think we had a productive meeting, don't you?" Hwang asked, closing the gap between his heavy coat and the flaps of his ushanka, and looking more like a damn Ruskie fop than ever. "I believe our comrades have taken their criticism and will be the better for it."

North Hamgyong snorted, steam blasting from his nostrils like smog from a train's smokestack. The trains that were still getting blown up every day.

"They won't get better," he said scathingly. "They're corrupt. We should get rid of them."

"Most of them aren't truly corrupt," Hwang said, his voice only a

